Concerning this

TRANSLATION.

WHEN I first undertook to Reviſe this following Tranſlation, I had no Thoughts of having my Name made ſo publick as it has been ſince upon this Occaſion. Few Men I ſuppoſe will aſcribe it to Vanity or Ambition, ſince the French Language is ſo very common among us, that it is not thought a part of Learning to underſtand it: For though Tranſlating is not always the eaſieſt Employment in which a Man may be buſied, yet the Opinions of Men, by which moſt things receive their Eſtimate, have ſet ſo much an higher Value upon Original Productions, than upon any, even the exacteſt Copies, that it is no wonder if that has been for the moſt part concealed, which, when divulged, would have brought ſo little Credit.

But I am ſenſible that Apologies are tedious things to thoſe who are abſolutely unconcerned: And it will be rather expected that I ſhould acquaint the World with what they ſhall find in this Tranſlation, then either why it was Reviſed by me, after the ſeveral Tranſlators had finiſhed their Parts; or why the Notice of its future Publication ſeemed to have been immediately given by my Order. And here indeed I ought to ſay, that the Book it ſelf, with which the Engliſh Reader is preſented, is a very valuable One. The Doctrines and Practices of the Primitive Church are repreſented with ſo much Candour and Sincerity, that thoſe who are unacquainted with the Wrirings of the Fathers, need not fear being impoſed upon. Our Author is indeed of the Communion of the Church of Rome, and accordingly he does not (as indeed he durſt not) any where conceal his own Opinion; but yet, as long as he never ſuffers the Sorboniſt to break in upon the Hiſtorian, his Writings carry an Authority with them, greater than they could have done had they come from a Proteſtant. Truth, I confeſs, is the ſame, whoever ſpeaks it; yet all Men grant, that it carries a more Convictive Force along with it, when extorted from thoſe whoſe Ingenuity over-bears their Intereſt, than when it freely comes from Men that advance their Cauſe by telling it.

For this Reaſon I have taken as much Care as I could, that Monſieur du Pin's Sence ſhould be exactly preſerved; and therefore, when he cites Authors whom, for Form ſake, he was obliged to call Hereticks, if they are not named with Applauſe, it is not to be wonder'd at.

Advertiſement concerning this Tranſlation.

In ſome few places I have thought fit to interpoſe: But leſt that might occaſion any Confuſion, the Paragraphs are all incloſed in Hooks; which will plainly diſtinguiſh whatever I ſay, from my Author's Words.

The great uſe of Books of this kind is, to form an Idea in the Minds of thoſe that read them, of that unaffected Piety and Zeal which inſpired the Primitive Chriſtians, and which at laſt ſubdued the whole Roman Empire, and made its Princes follow the Banner of the Croſs of Chriſt with Joy and Pleaſure. What a Thing that was, can be but imperfectly conceived from the Writings, and, God knows! much more imperfectly from the Practices of this degenerate Age. The Abridgments of the Books of theſe firſt Chriſtians will be much more effectual to this Purpoſe, than a bare dry Hiſtory could poſſibly have been; for they wrote about Things that their Hearts were full of: And Men who are at all Times ready to lay down their Lives in Defence of any Cauſe, will produce warmer and more moving Arguments to awaken their drowzy Brethren, than can poſſibly come from others that are leſs concerned, becauſe in much leſs Danger:

If therefore the Reading of theſe Papers ſhall be a Means to incite thoſe that are able to draw from the Fountains in larger Quantities, having found theſe ſmall Streams ſufficiently inviting; and thoſe that muſt take what they Read upon Truſt, to endeavour to live up to theſe great Patterns which are here propoſed to their Imitation, I ſhall have my End; and ſhall think the Pains which I have taken in this Work, not only very well beſtowed, but my ſelf abundantly rewarded.

THE Author's PREFACE.

PART I.

The Reaſon of the Title. An Account of thoſe Authors that have written upon the ſame Subject. A general View of the Deſign of this Work.

THE Name of Bibliotheca, or Library, is not only given to thoſe Places that contain great Numbers of Books; but alſo to Collections that have been made by ſeveral Authors, and to thoſe Books that Treat of their Works. Thus Collections of the Works of ſeveral Fathers, are called Bibliothecæ Patrum: A General Hiſtory drawn out of vaſt Numbers of Hiſtorians, ſuch as Diodorus Siculus's Bibliotheca Hiſtorica: A Book that Treats of the Sacred Volumes of Scripture, ſuch as Sixtus Senenſis's Bibliotheca Sancta; or rather, Bibliotheca Sacrorum Codicum: A Treatiſe upon thoſe Authors who have written concerning Matters of Religion, as this of ours is, Bibliotheca Authorum Eccleſiaſticorum: And, in ſhort, any Book that ſpeaks indifferently of all ſorts of Authors, and Writings, compoſed upon different Occaſions, may be called a Bibliotheca.

This is not the firſt time that ſuch ſort of Libraries have been made: Apollodorus, an Athenian, a moſt Learned Grammarian, that lived under the Reign of Ptolomæus Euergetes, Two hundred and forty Years, or thereabouts, before the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt, compoſed a Bibliotheca of the Original of the Gods; that is to ſay, of the moſt ancient Hiſtory, as it lies diſguiſed under Fictions and Fables. In imitation of him, Diodorus Siculus, that lived in Auguſtus's Time, compoſed a Bibliotheca of General Hiſtory; which was taken out of an infinite Number of Authors. To theſe, we muſt joyn thoſe Authors that have written the Lives of Illuſtrious Perſons; ſuch as Hermippus, Antigonus, Satyrus, Heraclides, Ariſtoxenus, and Diogenes Laertius, amongſt the Greeks; and amongſt the Latins, Varro, Tully, Nepos, Santra, Hyginus, and Suetonius; who have compoſed the Lives of the Philoſophers, and other Authors.

To deſcend now to thoſe Chriſtians that have made Catalogues of their own Authors: Are not Clemens Alexandrinus's Stromata a Bibliotheca of the Opinions and Judgments of an incredible Number of Writers? May not the Hiſtory of Euſebius be called a Library of Eccleſiaſtical Authors? ſince his whole Book is little elſe but an Account of their Lives, a Catalogue of their Works, and a Collection of ſeveral memorable Paſſages. But St. Jerom is the firſt of the Chriſtians, that has expreſly treated of Eccleſiaſtical Authors; which Book was Tranſlated into Greek by Sophronius. Gennadius of Marſeilles, Iſidore of Seville, Ildefonſus of Toledo, continued it down to their own Times. Honorius Biſhop of Autun made a ſmall Abridgment of theſe four Authors. Sigebert of Gembloars, and Henry of Ghent, continued their Books down to St. Bernard's Time. And Laſtly, Aubertus Miræus, who publiſhed theſe Authors under the Title of Bibliotheca Eccleſiaſtica, continued the Hiſtory of theſe Eccleſiaſtical Writers down to our Times. Trithemius, who lived about Two Hundred Years ago, made a diſtinct Book upon the ſame Subject. We ought not to forget the Roman Council, held under Pope Gelaſius the Firſt, in the Year 494, in which there is a

Catalogu-

Catalogue of the Sacred Books, and of Catholick and Apocryphal or Heretical Authors. Amongſt the Greeks, the Learned Photius compoſed an excellent Bibliotheca, in which he gives a ſhort Summary of the Books that were read; and paſſes his own Judgment upon near Three hundred Volumes of different Authors, that not only treat of Religion, but alſo of Hiſtory, Rhetorick, Philoſophy, Grammar, Phyſick, Medicine, and other profane Sciences. But never was more Induſtry and Labour beſtowed upon all ſorts of Books, and eſpecially Eccleſiaſtical, than has been in theſe laſt Ages, wherein we have revived (if I may uſe the Expreſſion) all manner of Learning and Knowledge, and carried Criticiſm to a Perfection and Heighth that it never arrived to before. The Roman Catholicks and Proteſtants have ſeemed to Rival each other in compoſing of theſe Bibliotheca's. Eraſmus, who cauſed ſome of the Fathers to be Printed, writ ſeveral Prefaces and Annotations upon their Works, that contain abundance of judicious Reflections; and though he is ſometimes over-haſty in rejecting ſome particular Books, yet however we muſt own that he opened the Way for thoſe that followed him. Since him, moſt of thoſe Perſons that have obliged the World in publiſhing theſe Authors, have written their Lives, and made ſome Critical Obſervations upon their Works. But to confine my ſelf at preſent, only to thoſe that have written upon Eccleſiaſtical Authors, Sixtus Senenſis, in his Bibliotheca Sacra, has not only Treated of the Authors of the ſeveral Books of the Bible, but likewiſe of the Commentators too: And ſince there is ſcarce any Eccleſiaſtical Author to be found, who has not writ ſomething or other about the Scripture, he was obliged to ſpeak of moſt of the Fathers, and a great Number of other Eccleſiaſtical Writers. Cardinal Baronius alſo, whoſe principal Deſign was, to collect together every thing that had a Relation to the Hiſtory of the Church, in his Annals, has written the Lives of the greater part of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and mentioned their Books. Bellarmine writ a diſtinct Treatiſe of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, which reaches down to the Year 1500. wherein, after he had briefly taken notice of their Profeſſion, and the Time when they lived, he makes a Catalogue of their Works, with ſome Criticiſms upon them. This little Book is very valuable for the great variety of Things contained in it, but yet it is very imperfect, and his Critical Remarks upon the Works of theſe Authors are not always exact. Poſſevin, in his great Apparatus, that is diſpoſed in an Alphabetical Order, has ſupplied part of thoſe things that are wanting in Bellarmine's Book An Italian Maſter of the Sacred Palace, has made ſome uſeful Reflections and Notes upon ſeveral Books. Halloixius Treats very largely of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, but ſpeaks very little of the Writers of the firſt Ages. After him Father Labbé, a Jeſuit, compoſed a Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, as a Supplement to Bellarmine, but it is very imperfect; and he himſelf tells us, that it was only an Extract out of a great Univerſal Library, that he had been preparing a long time: but whether he never liv'd to finiſh it, or for whatever other Reaſon it was, it has not as yet ſeen the Light. I ſhall ſay nothing of thoſe that have made Critical Animadverſions upon theſe Authors ſince his Time, becauſe they have only copied from other Criticks that wrote before them, without adding any thing remarkable of their own. I ſhall likewiſe paſs them over that have Criticiſed upon ſome particular Books; as, Sirmondus, Launoy, and Morinus, upon the Books attributed to St. Dionyſius the Areopagite; becauſe it will be time enough to take notice of them, when I ſhall Treat of the Books upon which they have Criticiſed.

But we ought by no means to omit thoſe Books which the Proteſtants have written upon theſe Eccleſiaſtical Authors, becauſe, though they are full of Errors, Falſhoods and Invectives, and ſometimes Treat the Fathers with little Reſpect; and have beſides, upon falſe Conjectures rejected ſeveral Books which they diſliked, as not being agreeable to their own Opinions, and diſcovering their own Errors; though, I ſay, it muſt be owned, that almoſt all the Treatiſes written by them upon this Subject, abound with ſuch Faults as ought to be abhorred by all Catholicks; yet we muſt do them the Juſtice to confeſs, that for what has a Relation to the Critical part, they have ſometimes ſeen more clearly than the Catholicks themſelves, and have diſcovered ſome Things that we are obliged to acknowledge and approve. The Centuriators were the firſt amongſt the Proteſtants that ſeriouſly attempted to write the Lives of the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, and to make Critical Remarks upon them; and it muſt be owned, that their Books are very uſeful even to the Catholicks themſelves. Conrardus Geſner's Bibliotheca, Abridged by Joſias Simlerus and Friſius, and augmented by ſome others, is no ill Dictionary of theſe Authors. Perkins and Cook have publiſhed an accurate Examen of Spurious Books; but they have done it rather upon the Faith of other People, than by their own proper Light. Sculletus's Work upon the Fathers of the Four firſt Ages of the Church, is more conſiderable, not only for ſeveral

Points

Points of Hiſtory and Criticiſm, that are there very ſuccinctly ſet down; but alſo for the Analyſis, or the Abridgment of their Writings, which he has performed with great Exactneſs, but in a Scholaſtick Way, and conſequently tedious. Voſius's Treatiſes upon the Greek and Latin Hiſtorians, Poets and Philoſophers, amongſt whom he has placed ſeveral Eccleſiaſtical Writers, are excellent Things in their kind, and ſhew a great deal of Learning. Rivet has taken the greateſt Pains, is the moſt Exact, and has performed the part of a Critick beſt upon Spurious Works; but then his Book is not exempt from thoſe Faults that are common to Proteſtants, as we have obſerved above. I ſhall not mention thoſe that have ſpoken of the Eccleſiaſtical Authors by the bye; as, Toſſanus, Hottinger, Aubertin, Mareſius, Sandius, and many others: As alſo thoſe that have compoſed particular Treatiſes upon ſome Books; as, Blondel upon the falſe Decretals of the Popes, and the Books of the Sibyls; Daillé upon the Canons and Conſtitutions of the Apoſtles, and upon the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius; Pearſon, and ſome other Engliſh-Men, upon the ſame Letters; Voſſius upon the Creeds; Beveridge upon the Apoſtolick Canons; Alix upon Tertullian; and ſeveral others.

There is not one of all theſe Books which we have mentioned, that comprehends all that might be ſaid upon theſe Eccleſiaſtical Authors. Some of them contain nothing, in a manner, but their Names, and a Catalogue of their Works: Others only give a ſhort Account of their Lives, and handle what relates to the Critical Part very ſuccinctly. The greateſt part of them wholly employ themſelves in Examining the Spurious and Suppoſitious Books. Photius is the only Man amongſt the Ancients, that has made an Abridgment, and paſſed his own Cenſure upon the Books he mentions; but then the Eccleſiaſtical Authors he treats of are few in Number; and beſides, he paſſes over ſome of them very ſuperficially, and ſlightly. Sculletus is the only Modern Writer, who has given the World an Epitome of the Doctrine of the Fathers; but then he ſpeaks little or nothing of their Lives, and has made no Critical Reflections upon their Works, The perplexed manner wherein he treats of theſe Matters, renders him diſagreeable to the Reader: And beſides, he only concerns himſelf with the principal Authors of the Four firſt Centuries. Halloixius has wrote upon fewer of theſe Authors; and his Work, which is of a prodigious Bulk, is by no means exact, and he is full of falſe and uſeleſs things. Having thus obſerved the Miſtakes or Failures of all theſe Works, I undertook to make a Bibliotheca of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, more ample and perfect than thoſe that have hitherto appeared in the World; and that I might the better ſucceed in my Deſign, I endeavoured to render it as like as was poſſible to what we commonly call a Bibliotheque, or Library. Thus, as we ordinarily range the Books in thoſe places, according to the Order of their Matter and Time, I have likewiſe in this Work diſpoſed the Eccleſiaſtical Authors according to the Order of Time; and it will be an eaſie matter to reduce them into a Method, according to their Subjects, by the Aſſiſtance of a Table at the End of every Volume. When we enter into a Library, the firſt thing we generally take notice of, are the Titles of the Books; and in this Library alſo, at the firſt opening of the Leaves, the Reader may ſee the Names of the Authors, and a Catalogue of their Works. But ſince it is not enough barely to conſider the Titles of Books, ſo that we muſt of neceſſity read them over if we would be Learned, I have not contented my ſelf with making a Catalogue of their Treatiſes only, but I have drawn up an Abridgment or Summary of what is contained in them, obſerving at the ſame time what particular Opinions are to be found in their Writings. If in other Libraries, you often ſee the Pictures of Great Men and Famous Authors, either Painted upon Cloth, or Engraven upon Copper; here alſo you may ſee their Pictures drawn after a more Lively and more Natural manner; not only in the Hiſtory of their Lives, but alſo in the Judgment that we have given of their Stile, their Spirit, and their Genius. Laſtly, As in great Libraries Men are not content with having only one Edition of an Author, but endeavour if they can to procure all, or at leaſt a great part of them; ſo in this, I have taken notice of all the different Editions of Authors, that came to my knowledge, and I have endeavoured to omit as few, as was poſſible: However this Library of mine, will contain more Volumes upon Eccleſiaſtical Matters, than any other Collection of Books can pretend to ſhow; becauſe, it not only comprehends thoſe that we now have; but likewiſe gives an account of thoſe that are loſt; the Number, whereof is exceeding great; and then it may boaſt of another advantage wholly peculiar to it; and that is, It helps to diſtinguiſh thoſe Books that are forged, from thoſe that truly belong to the Authors, whoſe Names they bear, which are confounded and mingled together in common Libraries. This is the deſign of my Undertaking, a ſmall but very conſiderable part whereof I now preſent

to the Publick, which only concerns the Three firſt Ages of the Church; with a Reſolution to publiſh a Continuation of the other Ages (a good Part of which is already done) and ſo to bring it down to our own Times, if God gives me Abilities and Strength enough to finiſh ſo long a Work, and if the Reception it meets withal in the World ſatisfies me that my Endeavours may be of ſome advantage to the Publick. I am not ſo vain as to flatter my ſelf with having performed ſo great a Deſign, as perfectly as it ought to be, whatever Diligence, Pains or Exactneſs I have uſed in the Performance: But this at leaſt, I may venture to aſſert, That of all the Books that have been written upon Eccleſiaſtical Authors, there is none that comprehends ſo many things. If I have failed in my undertaking, I have this to comfort my ſelf, that I have drawn ſuch an Idea of a Work as may employ the Learned a conſiderable time for the Publick Benefit; and if they will be pleaſed hereafter to acquaint me with the Faults which I may have poſſibly committed, or inform me of thoſe things which I have let ſlip, and communicate to me part of their Obſervations, as well upon the Authors that are in this Volume, as upon thoſe that I ſhall examine in the next; I hope this Work will be able to acquire ſome ſort of Perfection, according to my hearty Wiſhes, for the common Benefit of Mankind, the Advancement of Learning, and the Advantage of Religion it ſelf.

PART II.

Some Obſervations upon the Method. An Account of the Deſign of the Work. Rules of Criticiſm laid down.

IT being not ſufficient barely to repreſent the general Deſign of this Work, as I have done in the Firſt Part of the Preface, I found my ſelf obliged to give ſome ſhort Account of the Method I uſed in the Management of it. I uſually begin with the Life of every Author, which I relate as ſuccinctly, and in as few Words as poſſibly I can. For there being two ways of Writing the Life of any Perſon; one by taking in the Moral; the other by comprehending the Hiſtorical Part: I have applied my ſelf wholly to the laſt, as being the moſt agreeable to my Deſign. In the firſt, I ſet down all the Actions of thoſe Men, whoſe Lives I write, and then enlarge upon their Vertues; and make ſeveral Reflections upon their Behaviour and Conduct: In the Second, I only take notice of the principal Circumſtances of their Life, paſſing over thoſe Actions that are purely Perſonal, and that have no Relation to the Hiſtory of their Times, contenting my ſelf with delivering Matters of Fact without a large Examination, whether they were well done or not. After this Manner, I have endeavoured to write the Life of thoſe Authors of whom I have Occaſion to ſpeak, chiefly taking notice of thoſe Circumſtances that concern their Writings, and may ſerve either to illuſtrate them, or to make the Order, Subject, and Occaſion of them known. For nothing is of more Uſe to make us underſtand the meaning of any Author, than the knowing when, and with what Temper he wrote, what Hereticks he oppoſed, what Opinion he deſigned to eſtabliſh; and laſtly, what Condition he was in at that Time. A Biſhop, for Example, writes otherwiſe than a Lay-Man, an African otherwiſe than an Aſiatick, and a Man under Perſecution, talks in a different manner from one that is at eaſe. An Author that attacks the Hereſie of his own Time, and beſides, has perſonal Conteſts with his Adverſaries, expreſſes himſelf in another ſtrain, than a Man that writes againſt an Hereſie that is extinct, and who has no other ſhare in the Quarrel, or no other Motive of Writing than to defend the Truth: In a Word, we ſpeak and we write generally according to the differen: Motions and Paſſions, with which we are agitated; the Objects that moſt forcibly ſtrike us, repreſent themſelves in a lively manner to our Imaginations, and by that means determine our Tongues and Pens to that ſide. After Tertullian was provoked againſt the Church, he never wrote one ſingle Book, wherein he does not fall upon it, and bring in the Paraclete of Montanus. St. Cyprian making it his Buſineſs to ſupport his own Authority and the Diſcipline of the Church againſt thoſe that attacked both, ſpeaks always of the Unity of the Church, and of the Publick Pennance. Origen, who was full of the Platonick Philoſophy, conſiders all the Principles of Chriſtianity as they have a Relation to Plato's Doctrine.

S. Athanaſius.

St. Athanaſius, a ſworn Enemy of the Arians, never took Pen in hand, but he fell upon them. St. Auſtin having the Donatiſts and Pelagians always in View in all his Writings, and even in his Homilies, talks perpetually of the Church and of Grace. 'Tis the ſame with all the reſt, and if we examine the Matter narrowly, we ſhall find that all Men are made after the ſame ſort, and agree as to this particular. We commonly know by a Man's Diſcourſe what Books he reads, what Sciences he ſtudies, what Religion he is of, what Profeſſion he follows, whether his Circumſtances in the World are happy or not, and whether he is well or ill received by great Men; ſo difficult a Matter is it to conceal our own Opinions, when they have once made a deep Impreſſion within! We offer a Violence to our ſelves when we attempt to conceal them for any time, and ſooner or latter they eſcape from us, notwithſtanding all our Endeavours to the contrary. And this ſhows what a conſiderable Advantage it is to us towards the better Underſtanding of any Author, to be perfectly inſtructed in the Hiſtory of his Life, and to know what Country he was of, in what Times he lived, what was his Profeſſion, his Genius and Inclination, what Hereticks he oppoſed, and what Intereſts he had to manage.

This very ſame Reaſon likewiſe makes us ſenſible, that it is not ſufficient to know in general the Age wherein any Author wrote; but that we muſt alſo, if it is poſſible, find out the exact Time and Year in which he wrote every Treatiſe, and ſo obſerve the Order and Series of his Works; for beſides, that a Man writes otherwiſe when he is Young, than when he is well in Years; it is a certain Truth, that the ſeveral Changes, that happen every day in the Courſe of worldly Affairs, and to every Perſon in particular, often make Men alter their Stile. Tertullian, when he was engaged in the Sect of the Montaniſts, oppoſes what he had formerly eſtabliſhed. St. Cyprian ſpeaks of the Reconciliation of Penitents, according to the different Circumſtances of the Times he lived in; St. Auſtin, when he writes againſt the Pelagians, ſpeaks otherwiſe of God's Grace and of Free-Will, than he uſed to do before. St. Athanaſius when he was under Perſecution, wrote more violently than when he enjoy'd Tranquility. In a word, ſince nothing is ſo changeable as the Mind of Man, and ſince every Accident, that influences it, is under continual Motion, it muſt neceſſarily follow, that an Author will write differently in different Times. It is therefore of infinite Uſe to obſerve, as we have done, the Chronology of any Writer's Works, if we can diſcover it either by Reaſoning, or by Conjecture; and this was more eaſily done in Polemical Diſcourſes, than Treatiſes of Morality. The Characters, that help us to know the Time and Order of their Works, are, 1. The Years of the Emperors, the Names of Conſuls; or laſtly, the Years when any particular Epocha's begin, as we find them any where ſet down. 2. The Names of Perſons that are mentioned there. 3. The Citations of the Works of other Authors, or of the Author himſelf. 4. Conjectures drawn from the Stile, the Matters that are treated of, and the Manner wherein they are delivered. I do not explain theſe Characters, becauſe they are ſo eaſie to be underſtood, and becauſe they may be ſo often diſcovered by an infinite Number of Examples in the Book it ſelf.

A Catalogue of the Works of theſe Authors was abſolutely neceſſary: Sometimes I made it ſeparately, and ſometimes, as I had occaſion to diſcourſe of them in a Chronological Order. This Catalogue as well comprehends the Books that we have at preſent, as thoſe that are loſt, whoſe Titles have been preſerved by the Ancients: but this has not been obſerved in the ordinary Catalogues, where they content themſelves with ſetting down thoſe Books only that are to be found in the Editions we now have. I have not ſuffered even thoſe Authors to eſcape me, of whom we have not any entire Diſcourſe remaining. I have made a Catalogue of their Treatiſes, where I cou'd be fully informed of them by any of the Ancients, and I have taken Care to preſerve the Fragments of ſome Writers that are ſtill remaining, and to acquaint the Reader in what Authors and in what Places they are to be found. I have referred what I have to ſay of the Rules of Criticiſm to the End of the Preface, where I ſhall examine them more particularly.

One would imagine that a Summary or Abridgment of theſe Books would prove a long Work, and ſwell the Volume to a mighty great Bulk; yet I have reduced it into very narrow Bounds, and have ſuffered nothing that was of conſiderable Moment, to eſcape me. I have contrived to make it as little troubleſome and tedious as was poſſible, by not always confining my ſelf to the Formality of an exact Method, and without making a ſcrupulous Analyſis of their Propoſitions and Reaſonings.

I contented my ſelf with delivering the Arguments of their Books in a few Words. When I met with any conſiderable things either for Doctrine, Morality, or Diſcipline, I carefully took notice of them, and I have alſo drawn out of ſeveral Books thoſe Paſſa-ges that appeared to be the moſt Beautiful, and thoſe Thoughts that were the moſt Sublime. For the end which I always propoſed to my ſelf, was to give a true Character of the Author I treated of, and to omit nothing that was remarkable, and yet for the Reader's Eaſe, I have done it as ſhort as I could.

After this Abridgment of their Work, I generally give my Judgment of the Stile, and Genius, and Learning of the Author. I don't in the leaſt queſtion but that ſeveral Perſons will be offended at the Liberty I have taken, and that even thoſe who approve my Deſign in the main, will be of a different Opinion from me; for the Judgments of Mankind are ſo vaſtly divided in nothing as in the Cenſures they paſs upon other Men. Every Man thinks he has ſufficient Authority in himſelf to judge another, and indeed every Man judges after his own Way, led by his own Fancy or Humour, without any certain or ſteady Rules.

Hence it follows, that it is almoſt impoſſible to find two Perſons that agree in their Opinions of a Third Perſon, and indeed this Reflection made me at firſt alter my deſign of drawing up the Characters of my Authors, foreſeeing plainly, that I ſhould hereby draw upon my ſelf a great number of Adverſaries. For though the Perſons of whom I ſpeak, have been long ſince dead, yet they have abundance either of Admirers, or Cenſurers, that will appear either for, or againſt them; ſo that whether I commend or blame them, it's all one, and I muſt expect to be cenſured and ill thought of. But afterwards, when I conſidered with my ſelf, that ſince all the World give themſelves the Liberty to judge the Ancients upon all occaſions, juſt as they pleaſe, I thought that no Man ought to condemn me for doing the ſame, after I had careſully read them over, and particularly in a Book where the Subject and Deſign ſeemed to require it; I reſolved to do it however with Moderation, and yet with a convenient Freedom. I don't pretend to oblige any Man to follow my Judgment; neither do I flatter my ſelf that I have always found out their true Characters; I only deſire my Reader not to condemn me inconſiderately, or upon the Faith of another, without having ſo much as read or ſtudied theſe Authors; and I likewiſe conjure him to reſt ſatisfied, that in paſſing my Cenſures, I have uſed all imaginable Exactneſs and Application, knowing that a Man cannot be too circumſpect when he offers to judge others, and eſpecially thoſe Perſons that have left ſo great a Reputation behind them in the World, and to whom we owe ſo much Reſpect.

I conclude with a Catalogue of the ſeveral Editions of thoſe Books, which I have examined with the utmoſt Care and Diligence. I am not certain that I have ſet down all, yet I am ſatisfied that I have mentioned the beſt, and given my Judgment of each in particular. So that any Man may ſee at firſt ſight, which Edition is moſt uſed, and ought to be moſt valued.

At the End of theſe Three firſt Centuries, I have made an Abridgment of the Doctrine, Diſcipline, and Morality of thoſe Times, that whatever is to be learnt in the Authors of thoſe Ages, may be ſeen at one View. This Summary I have compoſed as faithfully and in as ſhort a Compaſs as I cou'd; however I don't pretend to have taken notice of every thing that is to be found in the Authors of the Three firſt Ages upon theſe Subjects, ſince I only deſigned to ſet down the Principal Points, that I might give my Reader a ſmall Idea of them.

Laſtly, There are ſeveral Tables at the end of each Volume, which will not be wholly uſeleſs. The firſt contains a Catalogue of the Authors, in a Chronological Order, where one may ſee the time of their Birth, and Death, and that wherein they flouriſhed. The Second contains a Catalogue of the ſame Authors, in an Alphabetical Order. The Third is a Catalogue of their Works: The Genuine, the Spurious, and thoſe that are loſt. The Fourth, is a Catalogue of their Works, according to the Matters contained in them. And the laſt, is an ordinary Table of the things contained in the Body of the Book.

I have only now to acquaint my Reader, that at the end of each Author, I have added ſome Annotations, that are merely Critical, to make my Book as plain and eaſie as was poſſible. In theſe Notes you will find ſome Illuſtrations and Proofs of the things that I aſſerted in the Text. I was not willing to reſerve them till the end of the Volume, becauſe generally moſt Men do not look ſo far, and ſo never mind them; nor to charge the Margin with them; becauſe they were too long to be placed there, and conſequently wou'd have interrupted the Series of the Diſcourſe. But I have placed them at the end of each Author, where it is an eaſie Matter to conſult them by obſerving the ſeveral Letters that will conduct the Reader, and yet not detain him too long from the Text. Thoſe that are but indifferently skilled in theſe Matters, may, if they pleaſe, paſs over theſe Notes;

Notes; but I would desire those that have a Mind to examine carefully what I have written, to read them along with the Text, because I have often barely asserted several things in the Text, that are justified and proved by these Notes.

I shall leave the Reader to judge, whether this Book may be of an advantage to the Publick, or no; but I think I ought to acquaint him, that the principal End I proposed to my self, was to excite those that shall peruse it, to read the Works of the Holy Fathers; and that whoever imagines himself dispensed with for consulting the Originals by reading my Book, does manifestly pervert and abuse the Design of it. I published it with an Intention to give them a Taste, and not to make them lose their Appetite for the Fathers; and the Abridgment I have made of their Works, was only designed to inflame those that love these things, to go and refresh themselves at the Fountain head. This work may easily inspire Men with a Desire of reading the Fathers, since it gives them before-hand a general Idea of their Doctrine and Maxims; but here is not enough to save them the labour of reading the Originals: and let a Work of this Nature be never so well written, yet we ought to read these things in their Originals, where only they are to be found in their Purity, and Natural Beauty. This I thought necessary to premise, before I set down the Necessity and the Rules of true Criticism, and the great importance of them, which I am now going to explain.

Criticism is a kind of a Torch, that lights and conducts us in the obscure Tracts of Antiquity, by making us able to distinguish Truth from Falshood, History from Fable, and Antiquity from Novelty. 'Tis by this means, that in our Times we have dis-engaged our selves from an infinite number of very common Errors, into which our Fathers fell for want of examining Things by the Rules of true Criticism. For 'tis a surprizing thing to consider how many spurious Books we find in Antiquity; nay, even in the first Ages of the Church. Several Reasons induced Men to impose Books upon the World, under other Mens Names. The first, and most general, is, the Malice of Hereticks, who, to give the greater Reputation to their Heresies, composed several Books, which they attributed to Persons of great Reputation; in which they studiously spread their own Errors, that so they might find a better Reception, under the Protection of these celebrated Names. And thus the first Hereticks devised false Gospels, false Acts, and false Epistles of the Apostles, and their Disciples: And thus those that came after them published several spurious Books, as if they had been written by Orthodox Authors, that so they might insensibly convey their Errors into the Minds of their Readers, without their perceiving the Cheat.

The Second Reason that inclined People to forge Books under other Men's Names, is directly contrary to the First; being occasioned by the indiscreet Piety of some Persons, who thought they did the Church considerable Service, in forging Ecclesiastical or Profane Monuments in favour of Religion and the Truth. And this Reason prevailed with some ancient Christians, to forge some Testimonies in behalf of the Christian Religon, under the Name of the Sibyls, Mercurius Trismegistus, and divers others; and likewise induced the Catholicks to compose some Books, that they might refute the Hereticks of their own Times with the greater Ease. And Lastly, The same Motive carried the Catholicks so far as to invent false Histories, false Miracles, and false Lives of the Saints, to nourish and keep up the Piety of the Faithful. Now, though the Design of these Persons seems to be commendable, yet we ought not, by any means, to approve of the making use of these sorts of Artifices to defend the Truth; which is well enough supported by real Proofs, without the necessity of inventing any false ones. It would be a Shame to call Lying and Falshood to its Assistance, and we must never use such sort of Methods, which Truth and Sincerity will always condemn, whatever good Effects they may pretend to have.

The Third Reason of the Forgery of some Books, keeps a middle Way between those we have already mentioned; for there have been some Persons in the World, that have been guilty of this Imposture, without any other Design, than to divert themselves at the Expence of their Readers, and to try how nearly they could imitate the Stile of other Men. Hence it is, that some Authors have composed Treatises under St. Cyprian's, St. Ambrose's, and St. Austin's Names. But it must be confessed that this Reason has not been near so common as the other two, and that it very rarely prevailed, especially in the Primitive Times. Only in these latter Ages there have been some, who having Vanity enough to over-value their own Productions, have published them under the Name of antient celebrated Authors; desiring rather (as the Abbot of Bili says) to appear abroad, and be esteemed under other Men's Names, than to continue despised, and be buried in Darkness, by writing in their own. And these are the Reasons that may have occasioned the Forgery of Books, Malice, Indiscreet Piety, and the Humors of Men.

But besides these Reasons that have advanced this Trade of Forgery, there are several others that have occasioned the setting Authors Names to several Books, which they never writ. The first, and the most general, is, the Fault of the Transcribers, or Printers, who have frequently set wrong Names in the Title Pages of their Books. And this has happened several Ways; for either they did it to raise the Price of the Copy, or, because they found these Tracts at the End of some other Author, they therefore concluded too rashly that they were done by the same Hand; or through Ignorance and Negligence; or lastly, some not being able to find out the Name of the true Authors, upon the strength of a few feeble Conjectures, have supposed they had good Reason on their side to change it.

From hence therefore, one Book has often carried the Name of several Authors in Manuscript, and this has principally happen'd to Sermons; either because the Transcribers found it their Interst to publish them under the Names of Great Men, to make them more vendible; or because these Sermons, though of different Authors, by being often inserted into the Office of the Church, and divided into Lessons, were so interwoven and confounded one with another, that it was a difficult matter to distinguish them.

A Second Reason of the giving to some Books the Name of wrong Authors, is, because sometimes Men have written Books by way of Dialogue, or otherwise, to which, in imitation of Tully, they have given the Names of those Persons whom they have introduced there as Speakers. After this manner Vigilius Thapsensis made five Books under the Name of St. Athanasius; and perhaps too under the same Name he composed the Creed that is attributed to that Father: Whence it happened, that those that looked upon the Titles of these Books, attributed them to St. Athanasius, without examining the Reasons why they carried his Name: As if we should attribute Tully's Books to Lælius, Brutus, or Cato.

Lastly, the Ambiguity of Titles, and the Resemblance of Names, have often contributed to the ascribing of Books to those to whom they did not belong. Two Authors were of the same Name, though perhaps they differ'd in every Circumstance beside; and this has given Occasion to several unwary or ignorant Readers, to attribute their Books to the wrong Persons. This has frequently happen'd; and, to give one remakable Instance of it, the Resemblance of the Names of Sixtus the Philosopher, and Sixtus the Pope, caused the Sentences that were written by the former to be attributed to the latter.

Having thus discovered the Reasons why we find so many Books attributed to Authors who have no just Title to them, we ought to establish the Rules of true Criticism. 'Tis equally dangerous to be ignorant of them, as to take them the wrong way and mis-apply them; for if we do not know them, we may be easily imposed upon by false Monuments; and if we do not understand them aright, or if we abuse them by allowing our selves too great a Liberty, we may very often reject the Truth it self. This last Abuse has been frequent with many Criticks of our Time, and particularly Protestants, who, upon very slight superficial Conjectures, have rejected several Books that are unquestionably ancient and genuine, because they contradict their Doctrine or Discipline. Wherefore we may, in the first place, set this down for a general Rule in these Matters, that we ought always to act fairly, and upon the Square; and that we must lay aside our Passions, or our Interests, and hearken only to our Reason, when we pass our Judgment upon Supposititious or Genuine Books. 'Tis very ill done to conclude that such a Book is spurious because it pinches us, and afterwards to search for Reasons why it may be thought so. We ought, on the contrary, when a Book does not please us, to use more than usual Circumspection to examine the Reasons that make us call it into question; since it is to be feared, that unless we take due Care, the Prejudices we have formed against it may cast a Mist before our Eyes, and make us mistake frivolous Conjectures for solid Reasons. We shall now examin the Proofs and Conjectures that a Man may have of a Book's being spurious, one by one, as they lie: They are either External, or Internal; and both one and the other may be convincing or probable.

The Internal Proofs are those that are drawn out of the Books themselves, which we apparently demonstrate to be supposititious, either by the Time there set down, or by some other Sign, or by the Opinions that are there maintained, or by the Stile wherein it is written. Time is one of the most certain Proofs; for nothing more evidently shews that a Book cannot belong to that Time wherein it is pretended to have been written, than when we find in it some Marks of a later Date. These Marks, in the first place, are, False Dates; for 'tis an ordinary thing for Impoſtors, that are generally Ignorant, to date a Book after the Death of the Author to whom they aſcribe it, or of the Perſon to whom it is dedicated, or written; and even when they do fix the Time right, yet they often miſtake in the Names of the Conſuls, or in ſome other Circumſtances: All which are invincible Proofs, that he that Dated this Book did not live at that time. Secondly, Impoſtors very often ſpeak of Men that lived long after the Death of thoſe Perſons to whom they attribute thoſe ſpurious Diſcourſes, or they relate the Hiſtory of ſome paſſages that happened afterwards, or they ſpeak of Cities and People that were unknown at the time when thoſe Authors wrote; or Laſtly, they cite Authors that wrote and lived after thoſe whom they make to mention them.

for

The Opinions or Things contained in a Book, do likewiſe diſcover the Forgery of it: 1. When we find ſome Opinions there, that were not maintained till a long time after the Author, whoſe Name it bears. 2. When we find ſome Terms made uſe of, to explain theſe Doctrines, which were not cuſtomary till after his Death. 3. When the Author oppoſes Errors, as Extant in his own time, that did not ſpring up till afterwards. 4. When he deſcribes Ceremonies, Rites and Cuſtoms, that were not in uſe in his Time. 5. When we find ſome Opinions in theſe Spurious Diſcourſes, that are contrary to thoſe that are to be found in other Books, which unqueſtionably belong to that Author. 6. When he Treats of Matters that were never ſpoken of in the Time when the real Author was alive. 7. When he relates Hiſtories that are manifeſtly fabulous.

In ſhort, Stile is a ſort of Touch-ſtone, that diſcovers the Truth or Falſhood of Books; becauſe it is impoſſible to imitate the Stile of any Author ſo perfectly, as that there will not be a great deal of difference. By the Stile, we are not only to underſtand the bare Words and Terms, which are eaſily imitated; but alſo the Turn of the Diſcourſe, the manner of Writing, the Elocution, the Figures, and the Method: All which Particulars, it is a difficult matter ſo to counterfeit, as to prevent a Diſcovery. There are, for inſtance, certain Authors, whoſe Stile is eaſily known, and which it is impoſſible to imitate: We ought not however always to reject a Book upon a ſlight difference of Stile, without any other Proofs; becauſe it often happens, that Authors write differently, in different Times: Neither ought we immediately to receive a Book as Genuine, upon the bare Reſemblance of Stile, when there are other Proofs of its being ſpurious; becauſe it may ſo happen, that an ingenious Man may ſometimes counterfeit the Stile of an Author, eſpecially in Diſcourſes which are not very long: But the Difference and Reſemblance of Stile may be ſo remarkable ſometimes, as to be a convincing Proof, either of Truth or Falſhood.

The external Proofs are, in the firſt place, taken from ancient Manuſcripts; in which either we do not find the Name of an Author: or elſe we find that of another: The more ancient or correct they are, the more we ought to value them. Secondly, From the Teſtimony or Silence of Ancient Authors; from their Teſtimony, I ſay, when they formally reject a Writing as Spurious, or when they attribute it to ſome other Author; or from their Silence when they do not ſpeak of it, though they have occaſion to mention it: This Argument, which is commonly called a Negative one, is oftentimes of very great weight. When, for example, we find, that ſeveral entire Books which are attributed to one of the Ancients, are unknown to all Antiquity: When all thoſe Perſons that have ſpoken of the Works of an Author, and beſides, have made Catalogues of them, never mention ſuch a particular Diſcourſe: When a Book that would have been ſerviceable to the Catholicks, has never been cited by them, who both might, and ought to have cited it, as having a fair Occaſion to do it, 'tis extreamly probable that it is ſuppoſititious. It is very certain, that this is enough to make any Book doubtful, if it was never cited by any of the Ancients; and in that Caſe, it muſt have very authentick Characters of Antiquity, before it ought to be received without Contradiction. And on the other hand, if there ſhould be never ſo few Conjectures of its not being Genuine, yet theſe, together with the Silence of the Ancients, will be ſufficient to oblige us to believe it to be a Forgery.

Theſe are the Rules of Criticiſm, by which we diſtinguiſh Falſe and Spurious Works from thoſe that are Genuine. As I ſaid before, ſome of theſe Rules are convincing, and ſome are only probable; the Internal Proofs are generally more certain than the External; and amongſt theſe, the poſitive Teſtimony of Authors is the moſt preſumptive and ſtrong. But it may be ſaid, that all of them are ſometimes more, and ſometimes leſs convincing and probable; and that the Sovereign Rule is, the Judgment of Equity and Prudence; according according to which we ought to balance the Reaſons of one Side and the other, and conſider all the Conjectures that can be brought for or againſt it. For it often happens, that although every Conjecture, conſider'd apart, does not ſeem to bear any conſiderable weight, yet when they are all joined together, they make the thing almoſt morally certain. I have brought no Examples to explain all theſe Rules that I have ſet down; for, beſides that they are ſufficiently clear and intelligible of themſelves, it is impoſſible to read in any Pages of my Book, without finding them applied upon all occaſions.

Before I conclude my Preface, I am oblig'd to make ſome kind of Anſwer to thoſe who have been pleaſed to Declare, that they ſhould have been better ſatisfied if I had wrote my Book in Latin. Some Perſons have been of that Mind, becauſe they have a greater Value for Latin, ſince it has laſted longer, and is more currant in Foreign Countries: Others take it ill that I have publiſhed thoſe things in French, which, as they pretend, ought only to be underſtood by Divines. Theſe Men have told me, That they could not endure to ſee Women and ignorant People learn the moſt curious Parts of Divinity: And that it might prove of dangerous Conſequence, to inſtruct them throughly in the Doctrine of the Fathers.

As for the Firſt, I ſhall take care to ſatisfie them, by Tranſlating my Book into Latin ſome time or other, if the Publick ſhall think it worth being preſerved.

For the Others; As their Complaint is unreaſonable, ſo I never ſaw any good Reaſons to hinder my publiſhing it in French: For when the Fathers themſelves wrote, they made uſe of a Language that was underſtood by all the World: and we live at preſent in an Age, wherein great Numbers of their Books have been Tranſlated with applauſe. No Man therefore ought to take it ill, that I publiſh an Abridgment of their Doctrine to all the World: On the contrary, It were to be wiſhed, that every Chriſtian could be inſtructed in theſe Matters, that they might be the better confirmed in their Belief, when they ſee that this Doctrine has been always taught in the Church of JESUS CHRIST, who is the Pillar and Ground of the Truth.

A Preliminary Diſſertation ABOUT THE AUTHORS OF THE BIBLE.

SECT. I.

Of the Authors of the Books of the Old Teſtament.

OF all thoſe (a) Paradoxes, that have been advanced in our Age, there is none, in my Judgment, more raſh and dangerous than the Opinion of thoſe, who have preſumed to deny, that Moſes was the Author of the Pentateuch: For what can be more raſh than to deny Matter of Fact, that has been eſtabliſhed by expreſs Texts of Holy Scripture (b), by the Authority of Jeſus Chriſt (c), by the Conſent of all Nations (d) and by the Authentick Teſtimonies of the moſt Ancient Authors (e)? And what can be more dangerous, than to bid Defiance to Antiquity, and conſequently deſtroy the Authority of thoſe Books, which are, as it were, the very Foundations of our Religion (f)? And yet this they do, who dare affirm that the Books of the Pentateuch are not written by Moſes, and endeavour to prove it by ſuch weak Conjectures, that 'tis impoſſible for a Man of tolerable ſenſe to be convinced by them (g). For, allowing all that they alledge were true, (h) they could only prove, the ſame thing has happen'd to the Books of Moſes, which has happen'd almoſt to all the Books of Ancient Authors, viz. That ſome few Words, Names and Terms have been altered or added to render the Narrative more intelligible to thoſe that lived in the following Ages. For example: We find the Ancient Names of Cities are ſometimes changed for thoſe they received afterwards, becauſe they would have been no longer known by their Ancient Appellations. There are likewiſe ſome ſhort Explications inſerted into theſe Sacred Books, to illuſtrate what was ſaid by the Author: And, in ſhort, ſome neceſſary Paſſages have been added to compleat the Hiſtory. Theſe things are common, and we find Examples of it in the Books of Homer, Herodotus, and almoſt all the Ancient Hiſtorians, and yet no Body is inclined for all this to reject their Books, as if they did not belong to thoſe whoſe Names they bear. Why then ſhould we not ſay the ſame thing of the Books of the Pentateuch, which have been more conſtantly aſſigned to Moſes, than the Poems of the Iliads or the Odyſſes to Homer, or the Hiſtories of Herodotus and Thucydides to thoſe by whoſe Names they are known? Let us examine all the Reaſons that are alledged againſt the Antiquity of the Pentateuch, ſince they imagine they are unanſwerable, (which yet is very falſe, as we ſhall make appear in theſe following Diſcourſes) and we ſhall ſee they only prove that ſome Names of Cities or Countries are changed, ſome few Words inſerted to explain ſome Difficulties; and laſtly, that the account of Moſes's Death has been put in ſince, which was but neceſſary to finiſh the Hiſtory of the Pentateuch. We ought therefore

therefore to affirm it for a certain Truth, That Moſes was the Author of the firſt Five Books of the Bible, called the Pentateuch.

There are given to each of theſe Five Books, (which have their Names in Hebrew from the firſt Word in each Book) there are given 'em, I ſay, ſuch Names as have a relation to the Subject. The firſt is called Geneſis, becauſe it begins with the Hiſtory of the Creation of the World. It contains beſides that the Genealogy of the Patriarchs, the Hiſtory of the Flood, a Catalogue of the Deſcendants of Noah down to Abraham, the Life of Abraham, of Jacob and Joſeph, and the Hiſtory of the Poſterity of Jacob down to the Death of Joſeph. So that this Book comprehends the Hiſtory of 2369 Years, or thereabouts, following the account of the Years of the Patriarchs, as we find them in the Hebrew Text.

The Second is called Exodus, becauſe the principal Subject of it is the Departure of the Children of Iſrael out of Egypt, and all that paſſed in the Wilderneſs under Moſes's Conduct, for an Hundred forty five Years, viz. from the Death of Joſeph, to the Building of the Tabernacle. We find there a Deſcription of the Plagues wherewith Egypt was afflicted; an Abridgment of the Religion and Laws of the Iſraelites; together with the Admirable Precepts of the Decalogue.

The third is called Leviticus, becauſe it contains the Laws, the Ceremonies, and Sacrifices of the Religion of the Jews: All which has a particular Relation to the Levites, to whom God gave the charge of all thoſe things that concern'd the Ceremonial part of that Religion.

The fourth is called Numbers, becauſe it begins with the Numbring of the Children of Iſrael that came out of Egypt, and concludes with the Laws that were given the People of Iſrael during the Thirty nine Years of their ſojourning in the Wilderneſs.

Deuteronomy, that is to ſay, the ſecond Law, is ſo called, becauſe it is, as it were, a Repetition of the firſt: For after Moſes has deſcribed in a few Words the principal Actions of the Iſraelites in the Wilderneſs, he recites abundance of the Precepts of the Law.

(i) We don't certainly know when theſe Books were compoſed by Moſes, or which was firſt written: However, 'tis very certain, that Deuteronomy was written laſt, in the Fortieth Year of the Departure out of Egypt, and a little before the Death of Moſes.

We can't ſo certainly tell who are the Authors of the other Books of the Bible: Some of 'em we only know by Conjecture, and others there are of which we have no manner of Knowledge.

It is not certain that the Book of (k) Joſhuah was written by himſelf; for as it is obſerved by the Author of the Abridgment of the Scripture attributed to St. Athanaſius, this Title is ſet at the Head of that Books not ſo much to diſcover the Author, as to make the Subject of it known; becauſe it treats of War, and other things that happen'd under the Conduct of Joſhuah, after the ſame manner as the Books of Judges, of Kings, of Tobit, of Judith, are ſo called, becauſe they give an Account of the Lives and Actions of thoſe whoſe Names they bear. But though 'tis commonly believed that this Book was written by Joſhuah, and this Opinion ſeems to be countenanced by ſome Words of the laſt Chapter, where it is ſaid that Joſhuah wrote all theſe things in the Book of the Law: Nevertheleſs we muſt affirm, that 'tis certain, that Theodoret, and ſome others among the Ancients, are not of this Opinion, and that we have Reaſons ſtrong enough to make us doubt whether he is the Author or no. However it is, 'tis a moſt unqueſtionable Truth, that this Book is ancient, and that if it is not Joſhuah's, it was written either by his particular Order, or a little after his Death. It carries the Hiſtory of the People of Iſrael Seventeen Years beyond the Death of Moſes, or thereabout.

We yet know leſs of the Author of the Book of Judges. Some with the Talmudical Doctors attribute it to Samuel, ſome to Hezekiah, others to Ezrah. In ſhort, ſome Perſons are of Opinion, that every Judge wrote his own Memoirs, which were afterward collected by Samuel or Ezrah. Be it as it will, the Book is certainly ancient, and (l) admit it was put into the condition we now find it by Ezrah, yet we cannot reaſonably queſtion its being compoſed from ancient Memoirs. It contains the Hiſtory of what happen'd to the Iſraelites from the Death of Joſhuah, to that of Sampſon. We cannot preciſely tell what Number of Years it takes in, though 'tis commonly fixed to ſomething above 300 Years.

The Book of Ruth is a kind of an Appendix to the Book of Judges, which is the reaſon why the Jews made but one Book of theſe two, and for the ſame reaſon 'tis commonly believed that one Author compoſed both. 'Tis certain, that the Hiſtory of Ruth comes up to the times of the Judges, but we don't know the time exactly. We may aſſign it to the time of Samgar, Eight and twenty Years, or thereabouts, after the Death of Joſhuah.

The two firſt Books of Kings are called by the Hebrews the Book of Samuel, which has occaſioned the Opinion that they were in part written by that Prophet (m); that is to ſay, that he compoſed the Four and twenty firſt Chapters, and that the Prophets, Gad and Nathan afterwards compleated the Work. This is the Opinion of the Talmudiſts and Iſidore, and is founded upon theſe Words of the Chronicles, 1 Chron. 29.29. Now the Acts of David the King, firſt and laſt, behold they are written in the Book of Samuel the Seer, and in the Book of Nathan the Prophet, and in the Book of Gad the Seer. Theodoret and Diodorus of Tarſus ſeem to be of this Opinion, when they ſay, that it was the cuſtom of all Prophets amongſt the Hebrews to write down whatever happen'd in their time; and that upon this ſcore it is, that the firſt Book of Kings is called the Propheſie of Samuel. Others pretend that theſe Books are of a later date, becauſe we find ſome ways of ſpeaking there which don't belong to that time, but perhaps they were added ſince; and it is very probable that both theſe Books are very ancient.

However, 'tis certain that they were written before the Chronicles. The firſt of theſe two Books of Kings contains that which paſſed under the Government of Eli of Samuel, and under the Reign of Saul:

The

The ſecond, is the Hiſtory of David's Government. The two laſt Books of Kings, contain the Hiſtory of the Reign of Salomon Son of David, and afterwards the Reigns of the ſeveral Kings of Iſrael, and Judah, down to the Deſtruction of Iſrael, and the Captivity of Judah. We don't know who is the Author of theſe two Books. Some, as the Talmudiſts for inſtance, attribute them to Jeremiah, others to Iſaiah, and the greateſt part to Ezrah. 'Tis a Collection, or an Hiſtorical Abridgment drawn out of ſeveral Memoirs and Books of the Prophets, which are there frequently quoted. Theſe Four Books of Kings contain the Hiſtory of almoſt Six hundred Years.

The two Books of Chronicles are called Paralipomena by the Greeks, becauſe they contain ſome Circumſtances that were omitted in the other Hiſtorical Books. The Hebrews call them Diaries, and St. Jerom Chronicles. 'Tis commonly believed that Ezrah wrote them, and that he drew this Abridgment partly from thoſe Books of the Bible which we have, and partly from other Memoirs that he had at the time of his writing. St. Jerome thinks that this was the Book that is cited in the Book of Kings, under the Name of The Book of the Sayings of the Kings of Judah. But 'tis evident that it is not, and that the Book of Chronicles was written ſince that of Kings, as we prove by the laſt Words of that Book, where mention is made of the Deliverance of the Jews by Cyrus.

'Tis commonly believed that it was Ezrah, who compoſed the firſt Book of thoſe that carry his Name; and indeed Ezrah ſpeaks there in his own Perſon (n) Huetius pretends that the firſt Chapters of that Book were written by another Author, but his Conjecture is not ſtrong enough to make us quit the common Opinion (o). The ſecond Book belongs to Nehemiah without queſtion (p), for he declares himſelf the Author of it in the beginning of the Book, and always ſpeaks of himſelf in the firſt Perſon. The firſt of theſe two Books contains the Hiſtory of the Deliverance of the Jews from their Captivity, and their Re-eſtabliſhment in Judea from the firſt Year of Cyrus, to the twentieth of Artaxerxes Longimanus, for 82 or 83 Years. And the ſecond begins from the twentieth Year of the aforeſaid Artaxerxes, and reaches to the Reign of Darius his Son, Sirnamed the Baſtard, which comprehends the Hiſtory of the Jews for thirty or one and thirty Years.

'Tis commonly believed, that Tobit and Tobias wrote their own Hiſtory themſelves (q): But this Opinion is very uncertain. 'Tis generally believed that this Book was at firſt writ in Chaldee, that Saint Jerom tranſlated it into Latin, and that this Hiſtory was afterwards put into Hebrew. There are two different Hebrew Editions of it, one ſet out by Munſter, and the other by Fagius. There is alſo an ancient Greek Edition, out of which the Syriac Verſion was compoſed. Tobit was one of the Iſraelites that were carried out of Samaria by King Shalmanezer.

The Author of the Book of Judith is yet leſs known, as Iſidore has obſerved. Some believe it was written by Eliachim, or Joachim High Prieſt of the Jews, of whom mention is made in that Book: Others ſay it was Joſhuah the Son of Joſedec, the Companion of Zorobabel: Others in ſhort, maintain that it was not written till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, before the Maccabees time. 'Tis written in Chaldee, and that has made Huetius think that it was written during the Babylonian Captivity. Saint Jerom tranſlated it into Latin, rather following the Senſe, as he tells us, than the bare Letter. The Greek Verſion which we have is very different from the Latin, and ſeems to be more literal. The time wherein the Hiſtory mention'd in this Book did happen, is no leſs uncertain (r). Some place it before the Captivity, others after, and ſome have the boldneſs to ſay, That whatever is in this Book, is only a Parable and Allegory, that has nothing of Hiſtorical Truth in it.

The time, and the Author of the Hiſtory of Heſter, are alſo very uncertain (ſ). St. Epiphanius, St. Auſtin, and St. Iſidore, attribute this Book to Ezrah. Others to Joachim High Prieſt of the Jews, Grand-Son of Joſedec. Moſt Men ſay that Mordecai wrote it (t), who is ſo often mentioned in it. The Talmudiſts attribute it to the Synagogue. The ſix laſt Chapters, that are found in the Greek, are not in the Original Hebrew. Origen, in his Letter to Africanus, believes it was loſt. Grotius pretends that theſe Chapters were compoſed by the Greek Proſelytes. Sixtus Sinenſis ſays they were taken out of Joſephus. Bellarmine, and ſome others, maintain, that there are two Hebrew Editions of this Book, one larger than the other, where theſe laſt Chapters are found, and the other the ſame with what we have. Some ſay the Hiſtory of Heſter happen'd under Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes; others place it under Xerxes; and laſtly, there are ſome who place it under Ciaxares King of the Medes. The firſt Opinion ſeems to be moſt probable.

The time wherein Job lived, is yet more difficult to diſcover; and the Author of the Book, who has compiled his Hiſtory, is no leſs unknown (u). Some, as Origen, St. Gregory, and Suidas, attribute it to Job himſelf: Others believe that Moſes was the Author of it, or that he tranſlated it into Hebrew. St. Gregory Nazianzen attributes it to Salomon; others to Iſaiah, or to ſome one of the Prophets. All theſe Opinions are built but upon very ſlight Conjectures. Wherefore 'tis better in my Opinion, to ſuſpend ones Judgment, than to aſſert any of the above-mentioned Opinions that are equally uncertain. But at the ſame time we muſt not fall into the oppoſite Error, by ſaying with the Talmudiſts, and ſome other Criticks, that the Hiſtory of Job is an entire continued Fiction (x). The Perſons and Nations that there are called by their proper Names, the Teſtimonies of Tobit, of Ezekiel, and St. James, with the Opinions of the Ancient Fathers, ought to convince us that the Foundation of this Hiſtory is real and true. But the manner wherein 'tis related, the Converſation that is held with the Devil, the Prolixity of the Diſcourſes of Job's Friends, and of what Job himſelf delivered in his miſerable eſtate, ought to make us acknowledge, that this Hiſtory is mightily amplified and adorned with ſeveral feigned Circumſtances, to render the Story more uſeful and agreeable. 'Tis commonly believed that Job lived before Moſes, or at leaſt in his time, and that the Hiſtory related in this Book happen'd during the time when the Iſraelites were in the Deſert, becauſe there is not a Word ſpoken there about the Written Law. Some there are who make Job to deſcend from Nahor, the Brother of Abraham, but (yy) others from Eſau. The laſt Opinion ſeems to me to be the moſt probable, becauſe 'tis ſupported by the Authority of a very ancient Addition, which is to be found at the end of the Greek Edition of the Book of Job.

Though the Pſalms are commonly called The Pſalms of David, or rather The Book of the Pſalms of David; yet 'tis certain, as St. Jerom has obſerved in many places, that they are not all of 'em his (aa), and that there are ſome of them which were written long after his Death. 'Tis therefore a Collection of Songs that was made by Ezrah. It is a difficult matter to ſay who are the Authors (bb), and to diſtinguiſh thoſe that were made by David, from thoſe that were compoſed by others. But whoever were the Author, 'tis certain, as Theodoret has judiciouſly obſerved, that they were compoſed by Perſons inſpired by God, and that they are cited under that Character both in the Old and New Teſtament (cc).

The Authors of the following Books are better known; the Proverbs or Parables belong to Salomon, whoſe Name is written in the beginning of that Book, The Proverbs of Salomon the Son of David. 'Tis obſerved in the 25th Chapter, that the following Parables are ſtill Salomon's, but that they were collected by ſome Perſons choſen by the King Hezekiah. Theſe are alſo the Proverbs of Salomon, which the Men of Hezekiah King of Judah copied out. The 30th Chapter begins with theſe Words. The Words of Agur the Son of Jakeh, which ſhew that this Chapter is an Addition made to the Proverbs of Salomon by one Agur, as is eaſie to be proved, becauſe this Chapter is entirely ſeparated from the reſt, and beſides is written in another Style. In ſhort, the laſt Chapter is entituled The Words of King Lemuel. We ought therefore to conclude, from what has been ſaid, that the 24 firſt Chapters are Salomon's Originally, that the five following ones are Extracts or Collections of his Proverbs, and that the two laſt Chapters were added afterwards.

The Book of Eccleſiaſtes is aſcribed to Salomon by all Antiquity: And yet the Talmudiſts have made Hezekiah the Author of this Book, and Grotius, upon ſome ſlight Conjectures, pretends it was compoſed by Zorobabel. It begins with theſe Words, The Words of the Preacher, the Son of David, King of Jeruſalem: Which may be applied to Hezekiah as well as to Salomon: But what is ſaid of that Wiſdom in ſeveral places, which was peculiar to him, and in the ſecond Chapter of his Riches and Power, determines that we ought rather to underſtand it of Salomon.

The Song of Songs, that is to ſay, a Song by way of Excellence, is allowed to be Salomon's by the Conſent of the Synagogue and the Church. The Talmudiſts attribute it to Ezrah, but without any Grounds.

The Book of Wiſdom is commonly ſaid to be Salomon's (ee), but this Opinion is not very probable. For, 1. This Book is not to be found in the Hebrew. 2. It was never received into the Hebrew Canon, 3. 'Tis evident, as St. Jerome has obſerved, that the Style is extreamly different from that of Salomon, and that it was compoſed by a Greek. The ſame St. Jerome obſerves, that it was commonly attributed to Philo, which we are to underſtand of an older Philo than him whoſe Works we have, However it appears plainly, that it was compoſed by a Helleniſt Jew, who had a mind to imitate the Books of Salomon, from whom he has borrowed abundance of Thoughts.

The Preface which is before the Book of Eccleſiaſticus, and the Fifth Chapter of that Book, inform us, that the Author thereof was a Jew, named Jeſus the Son of Syrach, who compoſed it in Hebrew, and which was tranſlated into Greek by his Grand-Son. St. Jerome tells, he ſaw in his time an Hebrew Copy of it (ff). Some of the Ancients attribute it to Salomon (gg), perhaps becauſe of the reſemblance of the Subject, and the Thoughts, which is ſo great, that 'tis viſible he deſigned to imitate him, and that ſeveral Thoughts are taken from him.

The Books of the Prophets carry the Names of their Authors undiſputed. Iſaiah is the firſt and moſt excellent of the Prophets. He was the Son of Amos, whom we are by no means to miſtake for the Prophet of the ſame Name (hh). He Prophefied from the end of the Reign of Uzziah, to the time of Manaſſes, by whoſe Command, they ſay, he was cruelly ſlain, and ſawn aſunder with a Wooden Saw (i). He himſelf collected into one Volume all thoſe Prophecies which he delivered under Uzziah, Jotham, Ahas and Hezekiah, Kings of Judah. Beſides theſe, he wrote a Book of the Actions of Uzziah, which is mention'd in the 2d of Chron. Chap. 26. Verſe 22. Some Apocryphal Books are aſcribed to him; amongſt others, that famous one ſo often quoted by Origen; and another, intituled, The Aſcenſion of Iſaiah, which St. Jerome, and St. Epiphanius mention; and a later one likewiſe, called, The Viſion of Iſaiah. Some have pretended that this Book of Iſaiah which we have, is only compiled out of the Works of Iſaiah; but the Conjectures which they bring to prove it, are extreamly frivolous (kk).

Jeremiah, born in a Village near Jeruſalem, of Sacerdotal Extraction, began to Propheſie about the end of the Reign of Joſiah, when he was very young, and continued his Prophecies till after the Captivity of the Jews in Babylon. He was not carried away with the other Jews into that City; but tarrying in his own Country to lament its Deſtruction, he was afterwards taken Priſoner, and carried into Egypt along with his Diſciple Baruch; where, as 'tis commonly believed, he was ſtoned to Death. The Fathers think that he always lived in the ſtate of Celibacy, We are told in the beginning of the 36 Chapter, that King Jehoiachim having burnt the Book of his Prophecies, this Prophet compoſed a new Volume larger and ſtronger than the former. He afterwards added thoſe Propheceis, which he made till the Babylonian Captivity, and thoſe which he delivered in Egypt. In the 50th and 51 Chap. he foretels all that was to come to paſs in Babylon, and theſe he tranſmitted thither by Saraiah the Son of Neriah. The 52d Chapter does not belong to him, for his Prophecies terminated at the end of the 51 Chapter, as appears by theſe Words, Thus far are the Words of Jeremiah. It was rather written by Baruch, or Ezrah, and contains an Account of taking Jeruſalem, and of what happen'd during the tivity of the Jews in Babylon, after the Death of Iſaiah. It ſerves to illuſtrate the Prephecies of Jeremiah, and particularly his Lamentations, which follow in order, and make another part of the Works of Jeremiah. In this laſt Book one ſees the Ruin and Deſolation of Jeruſalem painted in lively Colours, and eſpecially the Grief and Concern of the Prophet upon occaſion of that mournful Scene. It has a Preface in the Greek and Vulgar Latin, which is to be found neither in the Hebrew, nor in the Chaldee Paraphraſe, nor in the Syriac, and ſeems plainly to have been added to explain the Argument of the Book. In ſhort, theſe Lamentations end with a Prayer to God. The Style of Jeremiah, if we may be determined by St. Jerome's Teſtimony, is Simple in its expreſſions, and Majeſtick in its Senſe. But this Simplicity of Language does not appear to us at preſent. On the contrary, we find him Elevated and Sublime, both in his Senſe, in the Turn, and the Majeſty of his Expreſſion.

The Propheſie of Baruch, who was the Diſciple and Secretary of Jtremiah, formerly made up but one Book with that of this Prophet. Joſephus reports that Baruch was deſcended of an Illuſtrious Family, and that he perfectly underſtood the Language of his own Country. We are told in the Firſt Chapter, Verſe the Firſt, That he wrote this Propheſie in Babylon, but we don't certainly know the time (ll.) The Hebrew Coppy of Baruch is loſt, though we need not doubt but it was written in that Tongue. There is a Letter in the Syriac, which by ſome is attributed to Baruch, but 'tis very clear that it is written by a Chriſtian. The Epiſtle to the Captives of Babylon, which we find in Baruch, belongs to Jeremiah. The Author of the Second Book of the Maccabees has mention'd it; it is exactly the Style of that Prophet, and contains nothing but what is very agreeable to the time in which it was written.

Ezekiel the Son of Buzi the Prieſt, having been carried away into Babylon under Jeconiah, began to Propheſie in the fifth Year of the Captivity, and was ſlain, as 'tis commonly believed, by a Prince of that Nation, whom he reproved for his Adoration of Idols. His Propheſies are dark and obſcure. St. Jerome ſays, his Style is neither very eloquent nor very mean, but between both.

Daniel one of the Royal Family, was ſent Captive into Babylon, when he was but an Infant. The Jews don't reckon him amongſt their Prophets: But the Chriſtians, following the Authority of Jeſus Chriſt, who gives him that Title in St. Matthew, Chap. 24. Verſe 15. look upon him under that Quality and Character: And indeed there is no diſpute, but what he has wrote, deſerves the name of Propheſie, as the Jews themſelves are obliged to confeſs. But they don't give him the name of a Prophet, becauſe he lived a Life extreamly different from that of the other Prophets, and rather like one of the Great Men of Babylon: beſides, they think that he was an Eunuch, and there is a paſſage in his Book ſeems to confirm it (mm.) 'Tis certain that the firſt Chapters of Daniel's Propheſies are undoubtedly his, though we have reaſon to doubt of the Antiquity and Truth of the two later, which contain the Hiſtory of Suſanna, and Bel and the Dragon (nn.) The four firſt Chapters in Daniel are written in Hebrew, the following ones, as far as the 18th Chapter in Chaldee, and were afterwards Tranſlated into Hebrew. The laſt are written orignally in Greek.

The Twelve leſſer Prophets compoſed but one Book among the Hebrews. Hoſea the Son of Beeri is the firſt (oo.) He Propheſied in the Days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, Kings of Judah; and 'tis very plain, that he wrote this Propheſie, becauſe he frequently ſpeaks of himſelf in the firſt Perſon. There is one paſſage in his Book that appears very extraordinary, and that is, God's commanding him to take a Wife of Whoredoms, and Children of Whoredoms. But either this ought to be ſimply underſtood of a Viſion, as St. Jerome pretends, or we are to ſuppoſe that God did not command him to commit Adultery, but only to eſpouſe a Proſtitute, as St. Baſil and St. Auſtin have explain'd this place. The Style of this Prophet is very pathetick, and full of ſhort lively Sentences, as St. Jerome has obſerved.

The Prophet Joel follows Hoſea (pp.) in St. Jerome's Edition; but we don't certainly know the time when he Propheſied (qq.) Some Perſons believe that he is more ancient than Amos; others ſay that he did not write till after the Captivity of the Ten Tribes; and there are plauſible conjectures both of one ſide and the other. According to ſome he was of the Tribe of Gad, but others place him in the Tribe of Reuben.

Amos, a Herdſman of Tekoah, a Village two Leagues from Bethlehem to the South, was choſen of God to be a Prophet in the time of Uzziah King of Judah, and of Jeroboam the Son of Joaſh King of Iſrael, two Years before the Earthquake, which happen'd in the 24th or 25th Year of Uzziah.

The time of Obadiah's Propheſying is altogether unknown (rr.) St. Jerome, with the Jews, believes that this Prophet was he, that was Governor of the Houſe of King Ahab, who is mentioned in the firſt Book of Kings, Chap. 18. Verſ. 4. he that fed the Hundred Prophets. Others believe he is the ſame with that Obadiah, whom Joſiah made Superviſor of the Building of the Temple, who is mentioned in the Second Book of Chronicles, Chap. 34. Verſ. 12. Moſt People make him Contemporary with Hoſea, Amos and Joel. Some after all, believe that he lived in the time of Jeremiah, after the taking of Jeruſalem.

Jonah, the Son of the Prophet Amittai (ſſ.) of the City of Gath, near Dioceſarea, of the Tribe of Zabulon in Galilee, Propheſied under King Jeroboam, Uzziah, and Azariah. God ſent him to the City of Nineve to Preach Repentance there, and his Book is an Account of his Meſſage and Journey. He has written another Prophecy mention'd in the Book of Kings. This Book which we have, ſeems to be quoted by Tobit in the 14th Chapter, Verſe the 4th, and is approved by our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt himſelf.

The Prophet Micah, born at Moraſthai, a Village of Paleſtine in the Tribe of Judah, Prophecied under the Reign of Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, after the Prophets of whom we have ſpoken already, but before Jeremiah, who cites him in the 26*th Chapter*. He is a different Perſon from him, who lived in the time of Ahab and Jehoſhaphat, and 'tis commonly believed that he died a Martyr.

but

We don't certainly know the Country of the Prophet Nahum: Nor have we any better aſſurances of the time wherein he lived. His mentioning the Deſtruction of Ninive, makes ſome think that he lived in the time of Sardanapalus under Joaſh and Jehu; which if it were ſo, he would be the moſt ancient of the Prophets. Joſephus is of Opinion, that he lived in the time of Jotham, and that he foretold the Ruine of Ninive, which happen'd many Years after the time of Joſiah. St. Jerome, Theodoret and Theophylact ſay, he Prophecied after the Captivity of the Iſraelites; others ſay under Hezekiah, and ſome under Manaſſes. The moſt received Opinion is, that he Prophecied after the Captivity of the Ten Tribes by Shalmanezar, before Sennacherib's Expedition againſt the Tribe of Judah, which is foretold in the firſt Chapter of his Prophecy.

Nor have we any better Information either of the Country or time of the Prophet Habakkuk. The Jews ſay that he Prophecied in the time of Manaſſes, or Jehoiachim, a little before the Captivity. St. Epiphanius, and the falſe Epiphanius, make him Contemporary with Zedekiah and Jeremiah. Others ſay he lived in Joſiah's time, St. Jerome in Daniel's, confounding him with that Habakkuk who is mentioned by that Prophet. The moſt probable Opinion is, that he lived under the Reign of Manaſſes, whoſe iniquities he ſeems to deſcribe in his Firſt Chapter Verſe 13, and 14. and before the Expedition of the Chaldeans againſt the Jews, which he foretells in the Firſt Chapter, Verſe 6. as well as their Deſtruction, Chap. 2. Verſe 3.

The time wherein Zephaniah Prophecied, is exactly marked out to us in theſe Words at the beginning of his Prophecy, The Word of the Lord came unto Zephaniah, the Son of Cuſhi, the Son of Gedaliah, the Son of Amariah, the Son of Hizkiah, in the days of Joſiah the Son of Amon King of Judah. We don't know from what Country he came. St. Cyril makes him to have been of Noble Extraction, becauſe he mentions his Anceſtors.

Haggai, and the two following Prophets, Prophecied not till after the return of the Jews from the Captivity of Babylon. It is ſaid in the beginning of Haggai's Prophecy, that it was written in the Second Year of Darius (tt) the Son of Hyſtaſpes, and the Sixth Month.

Zechariah the Son of Barachiah, Grand-Son of Iddo (uu,) wrote his Prophecy in the ſame Year of Darius, two Months after the Prophet Haggai, as he himſelf has obſerved in the beginning of his Prophecy. He is a different Perſon from that Zechariah, of whom Iſaiah ſpeaks in his Eighth Chapter (xx,) and of him that was ſlain by the Command of King Joaſh between the Temple and the Altar, 2 Chron. 24. 20.

Malachi, whoſe name in Hebrew ſignifies My Angel (yy,) Prophecied ſince Haggai and Zechariah, after the Rebuilding of the Temple; For the two former exhort the People to build the Temple, but he exhorts them to obſerve the Law, and offer their Sacrifices with Purity: which does neceſſarily ſuppoſe that the Temple was already rebuilt. Beſides this, the Diſorders for which he reproves the Jews, are the very ſame with thoſe which Nehemiah lays to their charge, which is a manifeſt Argument that they both lived in the ſame time. Malachi is the laſt of the Prophets; and as there was none other to ſucceed him till the coming of Jeſus Chriſt, ſo he concludes his Prophecy with an Exhortation to the Jews to obſerve the Law of Moſes, and wait for the great and dreadful Day of the Lord, who ſhould turn the Hearts of the Fathers to the Children, and the Hearts of the Children to their Fathers. All which clearly and expreſly ſets before us St. John Baptiſt and Jeſus Chriſt.

The two Books of the Maccabees were not written by the ſame Perſon, as the ſenſible difference of the Style, of the Chronology, and the Hiſtory ſufficiently ſhew (zz,) We don't know who is the Author of the firſt; 'tis indeed very probable that it was Originally written in Hebrew, and afterwards Tranſlated into Greek and Latin. The Second is an Abridgment or Epitome of Jaſon, who was one of the Jews of Cyrene, as it appears by the Preface of that Book, which begins Chap. 2. Verſ. 23. It is preceded by two Letters of the Jews at Jeruſalem to the Jews inhabiting Egypt, added by the Author of this Abridgment which he has made with a great deal of Liberty. Theſe two Books are called The Books of the Maccabees, from the Name of Judas the Son of Mattathias, Sirnamed Maccabeus, becauſe he had placed in his Banner the firſt Hebrew Letters of the Words of a certain Sentence in Exodus (a a a,) which being joyned together make that word. Theſe two Books contain the Hiſtory of the Jews under the Government of the Greeks, from the Reign of Alexander to that of Demetrius Soter, which comprehends the ſpace of Forty Years, or thereabouts, and they conclude an Hundred and Thirty Years before the Coming of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

NOTES.

(a) There is no Paradox more dangerous than the Opinion of thoſe who have preſumed to deny that the Pentateuch was compoſed by Moſes.] I have already obſerved in the Firſt Edition, that this Paradox was ſtarted by Rabbi Aben Ezra, becauſe he is the firſt that raiſed theſe Objections, which have occaſioned ſome Perſons to believe, that Moſes was not the Author of the Pentateuch; and though he durſt not openly Declare his Opinion in this Matter, yet he expreſſes himſelf after ſuch a Manner, that it will evidently appear that he was not heartily perſwaded that the Pentateuch was written by Moſes. For in his Explication of theſe Words in Deuteronomy, Behold what Moſes ſaid ſaid to the Iſraelites that were beyond Jordan, he not only makes uſe of that paſſage to ſhew that this Book was not Moſes's, but he muſters up the moſt terrible Objections he could raiſe for this purpoſe. You will know the Truth, ſays he, if you comprehend the Myſtery of the Twelve: Moſes wrote the Law: The Canaanites were then in the Land: In the Mountain of the Lord it ſhall be ſeen: Behold his Iron Bed: Words which allude to ſome paſſages in the Pentateuch, and which he uſes to prove; that it was not written by Moſes. And 'tis principally upon the Authority and Reaſons of this Rabbi that Hobbs, Peretius, and Spinoſa eſtabliſhed their Doctrine, when they publickly maintain'd, that the Pantateuch was not written by Moſes. To theſe Authors we may add Monſieur Simon, who has wrote a Book, called, A Critical Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament. I was not willing to name him in the Firſt Edition of this Volume, though I took occaſion then to confute his Reaſons; but ſince he has been pleaſed to Declare that he was the Perſon, whom I meant, in a Letter to Monſieur Lalve, a Doctor of the Faculty, he ought not to reſent it as an injury, if I attack him by name, and endeavour to ſhew, that his Hypotheſis about the Book of Moſes is as raſh and dangerous as Spinoſa's.

Monſieur Simon lays down his Opinion in the Firſt Chapter of the Firſt Book of his Critical Hiſtory, p. 3. of Leer's Edition. When we ſuppoſe that there have been ſuch publick Scribes, we aſcribe to them all the Hiſtorical part of the Pentateuch, and to Moſes all that belongs to the Laws and Ordinances; and 'tis this which the Scripture calls the Law of Moſes. And ſo one may ſay in this Senſe, that all the Pentateuch is really and truly written by Moſes, becauſe thoſe Perſons that made the Collection lived in his time, and what they did was by his particular Direction. He ſays the very ſame thing in his 2 Chap. p. 17. 'Tis therefore not improbable that there were in Moſes's time ſuch ſort of Prophets, who were neceſſary to the State, becauſe they preſerved the moſt conſiderable Actions that paſſed in their Common-wealth. This being granted we ſhall diſtinguiſh in theſe Five Books of the Law that which was written by Moſes, from what was written by the Prophets and publick Scribes: We may attribute to Moſes the Commandments and Ordinances which he gave the People, in lieu of which we may ſuppoſe theſe ſame publick Scribes to have been the Authors of the greateſt part of this Hiſtory. In the Seventh Chapter, p. 50. he adds: As for what concerns the Book of Moſes, ſuch as they now are in the Collection which we have, the Additions which have been made to the ancient Acts hinder us from diſcerning what is truly his, and what has been added by thoſe who ſucceeded him, or by the Authors of the laſt Collection. Beſides, this Compilation being now and then Epitomized out of the ancient Memoirs, one cannot be aſſured, that the Genealogies there are ſet down in their full length and extent.

From theſe Principles of Monſieur Simon, it follows in the firſt place, that Moſes is not the Author of the greateſt part of the Pentateuch, for the Controverſie here is not about ſome few Paſſages that are of ſmall conſequence, but even thoſe that make up the Body and principal Part of the Pentateuch; Moſes according to his Notions, being only concerned about the Laws and Ordinances, has no ſhare in any thing beſides, and ſo the Hiſtory of the Creation, and of the Deluge, in a word, all Geneſis, and whatever has a relation to the Hiſtorical part, is taken away from Moſes. It is to no purpoſe to ſay, as he has done already, p. 3. That one may ſay, that all the Pentateuch is Moſes's becauſe they that made the Collection lived in his time, and did nothing but by his Order. For would it not be a Jeſt to aſcribe to Moſes the Works of the publick Scribes of his time? If this were really true, a Man might aſcribe all publick Regiſters to thoſe Kings and Princes, in whoſe time, and by whoſe Order, they were compiled: But what is a great deal more ſurprizing, Monſieur Simon, or at leaſt one of his zealous Defenders, abandons this Hypotheſis as not to be maintained, and acknowledges that there is no convincing proof to make us believe there were ſuch publick Scribes divinely inſpired in the time of Moſes. This is taken notice of in the Marginal Note of the 17*th* Page of his Critical Hiſtory, and the ſame Edition that we cited before. We find in truth, ſays the Author of that Remark, this ſort of publick Scribes in the time of the Kings amongſt the Hebrews. .... but we find no Foot-ſteps of them in the Book of Moſes. The Author of the Anſwer to a Letter which Monſieur Spanheim wrote againſt F. Simon confeſſes the ſame thing. If you now demand of me, what is my Opinion concerning theſe publick Scribes; I anſwer, That it would be very hard to reject 'em totally .... In the mean time I don't altogether agree with him as to the time, wherein he pretends, that theſe Prophets were Eſtabliſhed in the Jewiſh Commonwealth for the Reaſons he brings, and indeed the greater part of his Authorities clearly ſuppoſe, that this happened after Moſes. If this Letter was Monſieur Simon's, as the World was inclined to believe, he cannot poſſibly excuſe himſelf from having dealt very treacherouſly in a matter of the higheſt conſequence about Religion, ſince he has eſtabliſhed the Truth of the Pentateuch upon a ſuppoſition, which he himſelf acknowledges to be either falſe or uncertain. But ſuppoſe this Letter was not his, it ſhows at leaſt, that thoſe Perſons who are the moſt favourable to his Hypotheſis, freely own 'tis impoſſible to prove there were any of theſe publick Scribes Divinely inſpired in Moſes's time; and conſequently that Monſieur Simon, who has grounded the validity of the Pentateuch upon this Hypotheſis, has done it upon a very weak Foundation, even in the judgment of thoſe Criticks who ſtand up the ſtrongeſt for him. Thus Monſieur Simon alledges this Conjecture as only a matter of probability. In the Second place, Monſieur Simon has of himſelf ruined whatever he ſays of the Antiquity and Authority of the Pentateuch, by confidently aſſerting, as he has done in the Third paſſage we quoted, that the Pentateuch, in the condition we find it in at preſent, is only an Abridgment of the Ancient Acts that were made in the time of Moſes, and that 'tis impoſſible to diſcern what is ancient, and what is not. Is not this formally to deny that Moſes was the Author of the Pentateuch, and that the Books which we now have are not ſo ancient, as is pretended?

In a word, he eſtabliſhes the Authority of the Books of Scripture upon the pretended Inſpirati-on of certain Scribes or Keepers of the publick Regiſters, whom he believes to have been from time to time among the Jews. Now nothing is more uncertain than the Exiſtence or Inſpiration of theſe publick Scribes, as we ſhall ſhew in the following Pages.

(b) By expreſs Texts of Holy Scripture.] It is very certain that Moſes wrote the Law, and that in Scripture we are to underſtand the Pentateuch by the Law. Exod. 24. v. 4. and 7. Moſes wrote all the Words of the Law, and took the Book of the Covenant, and read it in the Audience of the People. Deut. 31. v. 19. and 22. Moſes therefore wrote this Law, and gave it to the Prieſts the Sons of Levi .... and to all the Elders of Iſrael. In Exodus, chap. 17. v. 14. God commanded Moſes to write the Law, and give it to Joſhuah. And in the Book of Joſhuah, ch. 1. v. 7 and 8. God tells him, That the Volume of the Law which he received from Moſes ought to be always in his mind; This Book of the Law ſhall not depart out of thy Mouth, but thou ſhalt meditate therein day and night ..... that thou mayſt obſerve to do according to all the Law which Moſes my Servant commanded thee. Now thô the Word Law may indeed be applied to one part of the Pentateuch, yet we ought to take notice, that it is generally taken in Scripture for the whole Pentateuch. And 'tis certain, that in the 31ſt Chapter of Deuteronomy, where it is ſaid, Moſes therefore wrote this Law, it is meant of all this Book, and the Paſſage of Joſhuah ought likewiſe to be underſtood of the whole Law. To this may be added, that in the other Books of the Old Teſtament, they always conſider the entire Pentateuch as the Work of Moſes. In the Firſt of Kings, Chap. 2. v. 3. David ſpeaking to Salomon, tells him, That the Ceremonies, Precepts, and Laws of the Jews, were written in the Law of Moſes; Keep the Charge of the Lord thy God to walk in his Ways, to keep his Statutes and Commandments, and his Judgments, and his Teſtimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moſes. It is therefore believed, that all the Pentateuch, which contains theſe Ceremonies, Precepts, and Judgments, was the Law of Moſes. All the Law is likewiſe attributed to Moſes in the Second Book of Kings, ch. 21, and 23. v. 8. v. 25. If they obſerve all the Law of Moſes in the Second Book of Chronicles, Chap. 23. v. 18. To offer the Burnt-Offerings of the Law as it is written in the Law of Moſes. Is not Leviticus therefore Moſes's Book? That which is delivered in the 30*th*, 31*ſt*, and 35*th Chapters* of the ſame Book, is taken out of Leviticus and Numbers; Are they not therefore the Books of Moſes? In the 25*th Chapter*, Deuteronomy is cited as one of Moſes's Books; As it is written in the Law in the Book of Moſes, the Father ſhall not die for the Children: Which Words are to be found in the 24*th Chapter* of Deuteronomy. Leviticus quoted by Baruch, Chap. 2. as a Book that was written by Moſes; As thou ſpeakeſt by thy Servant Moſes, in the day when thou didſt command him to write thy Law, before the Children of Iſrael, ſaying, If ye will not hear, &c. Which Words are in the 26*th Chapter* of Leviticus, v. 14. In the Second Book of Kings, Chap. 22, and 23. as alſo in the ſecond Book of Chronicles, Chap. 34. it is ſaid, that Hilkiah found a Book of the Law of Moſes's written, perhaps, with his own hand, as theſe Words ſeem to imitate, Per manum Moyſi. This Book of the Law, according to Joſephus, is all the Pentateuch, according to others Deuteronomy. However it is, yet it follows from hence at leaſt, that Deuteronomy is his. Now Deuteronomy ſuppoſes, that the other Books of the Law were written, becauſe it is as it were an Abridgment, and upon that account is called Deuteronomy, or The Second Law. In the Ninth Chapter of Daniel, it is ſaid, that the Curſe, which is written in the Book of Moſes, is fall'n upon the Jews, and in the Tenth Verſe the words of Deuteronomy and Exodus are particularly cited. The Prophet Malachi, chap. 4. exhorts the Jews to remember the Law of Moſes. Raguel, in the 7*th Chapter* of Tobit, ſays, He will give his Daughter in Marriage to Tobias, to obey the Law of Moſes. The Law of Moſes is frequently repeated in the Pſalms; the 77*th*, 104*th*, 105*th*, 135*th Pſalms*, contain the Hiſtory of the Iſraelites, which is plainly taken out of the Pentateuch. The Law of Moſes is often cited in Ezrah; (Ez. 9. 10. 23.) the Paſſages cited in theſe places are to be found in the Books of the Pentateuch. In the 10*th. Chapter* of Nehemiah, Ver. 29. the Iſraelites oblige themſelves by a new kind of an Oath, to keep the Law and Precepts of Moſes. Now among theſe Precepts, there are ſeveral that are taken out of the Books of the Pentateuch. In the Second Book of Maccabees, Chap. 7. Eleazar ſaith, I will not obey the King's Commandment, but that of the Law, which was given unto Our Fathers by Moſes. Laſtly, whatever is taken out of the Pentateuch in the New Teſtament, is always cited under the name of the Law of Moſes. St. James in the 15*th Chapter* of the Acts, ſays, The Jews read Moſes every Sabbath-day in their Synagogues; Moſes of old time hath in every City them that Preach him, being read in the Synagogues every Sabbath-day. And St. Paul in his Epiſtles, ſays, That the Jews did not underſtand Moſes, although they read him; Uſque in hodiernum diem cum legitur Moſes. Therefore they did not in the leaſt doubt, that the Pentateuch was written by Moſes, ſince they tell us, that thoſe who read that Book, read Moſes. All theſe Paſſages make it very evident in the firſt place, that Moſes wrote the Law of the Jews. Secondly, That by the name of the Law we ought to underſtand, the Pentateuch. Thirdly, That not only Deuteronomy, but alſo all the other Books of the Pentateuch, have been cited in Scripture for the Books and Law of Moſes. Fourthly, That this has ever paſſed for a conſtant Truth, of which no body doubted. Fifthly, That they not only believed Moſes to be the Author of the things contained in theſe Books, but of the Books themſelves, ſo that when they read them, one might ſay, they read Moſes; as when we read the Æneids, we ſay, we read Virgil.

(c) By the Authority of Jeſus Chriſt.] In St. John, chap. 5. There is one that accuſeth you, (ſaith our Saviour) even Moſes in whom ye truſt: For had you believed Moſes, you would have believed me, for he wrote of me. 'Tis plain therefore that Moſes wrote, and that he wrote thoſe Books, which the Jews read for his. Now who doubts that theſe Books were the Pentateuch. And indeed ſince our Saviour does always diſtinguiſh the Prophets from the Law of Moſes, by the Law he can mean only only the Pentateuch. In the first Chapter of St. John, Philip saith to Nathaniel, We have found him, of whom Moses in the Law, and the Prophets did write. There are many other places where our Saviour cites the Books of the Pentateuch under the name of the Law, and consequently we ought not to doubt, that he has assured us that these Books were written by Moses.

St. Luke, in the 24th Chapter of his Gospel, saith, That our Saviour beginning with Moses, and continuing with the Prophets, Expounded to his Disciples, who were going to Emmaus, the Things that were said concerning himself in the Scriptures. Therefore Moses was the most ancient Author of the Jews, and the Pentateuch was acknowledged to be written by him, as they owned the Books of the Prophets to be written by the Prophets.

(d) The Consent of all Nations.] 'Tis certain, that not only the Jews were always of opinion, that these Books were written by Moses, but also that all People have considered Moses as the Author of the Law and Religion of the Jews. 'Tis the unanimous Consent of all Nations, and all Men, no one ever questioning the Truth of it before these last Ages. Huetius maintains, that all Religions have borrowed their Theology out of the Books of Moses, whose History they have purposely altered and disguised, to accommodate it the better to their Fables. He pretends, for Instance, That Adonis of the Phœnicians; that Mercury, Osiris, Serapis, Anubis, and the other Gods of the Ægyptians; that Zoroaster of the Persians, and the Divinities of the Western Nations; that Cadmus, Apollo, Priapus, Æsculapius, Prometheus, and the other Gods of the Græcians; that Janus, Faunus, Vertumnus, Evander of the Latins; in a word, that all these Fabulous Deities, were taken out of the Books of Moses, but disguised according to the Pagan manner, and put into a new Dress. But these Conjectures being only Probabilities, and no more, cannot serve to demonstrate a Truth, which does not need such Supports, as being clearly established upon indisputable Principles.

(e) And by the Authentick Testimonies of the most ancient Authors.] That is, a continual Tradition of Authors from the Times that came nearest to Moses down to ours; and as we cannot doubt that Homer's Poem is his, because all Writers that have appeared since his Age have attributed it to him; so neither can we reasonably doubt, that these Books were written by Moses. They commonly produce the Authority of Sanchoniathon, who, as they give out, lived before the Trojan War, and wrote the History of the Phœnicians, Translated afterwards into Greek by Philo Byblius, where he has borrowed several Passages out of the Books of Moses. But 'tis not certain that this Author is so ancient as they pretend. They likewise affirm, that Homer and Hesiod have taken many things out of him, and 'tis indeed extreamly probable. The same thing has been observed of the Philosophers, as Thales, Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, Socrates, and Plato, but all this is said by Conjecture. We ought therefore to rely principally upon the Testimony of those Authors, who tell us positively, that Moses was the Chief-Leader and Law-giver of the Jews, such as Manetho, cited by Josephus in his first Book against Appion, Philochorus the Athenian, whom the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles, commonly said to be St. Justin, mentions; Eupolemus, cited by the same Author; Eupolemus, cited by Alexander Polyhistor, mentioned by Eusebius; Apollonius Molo, cited by Josephus; Castor, cited by the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles; Diodorus Siculus, produced by the same Authors, and by St. Cyril in his first Book against Julian, though in our Copies he does not make mention of Moses, but of Mnues, who is the Osiris of the Ægyptians; Chæremon Author of the Ægyptian History, cited by Josephus; Tregus Pompeius, Epitomized by Justin, who makes Moses the Author of the Jewish Laws; Nicolaus Damascenus, cited by Josephus; Mendesius, cited by the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles, by Tatian, by Eusebius, and by St. Cyril. Strabo, who makes Moses the Author of the Religion and Laws of the Jews; Appion, who although an Enemy to the Jews, yet supposes that Moses gave 'em their Laws; Juvenal, who speaks of the Volumes of Moses, Sat. 14. Tradidit arcano quodcunque volumine Moses. Ptolomy of Alexandria, who calls him the Legislator of the Jews; Pliny, Tacitus, and Justin, who have observed the same thing; Numenius, who has taken notice that Plato was a Grecizing Moses; Longinus, who commends the beginning of Genesis, and produces a Passage in it as an Example of Sublimeness, calling the Author in these words, The wise Law-giver of the Jews; Porphyry and Julian, who wrote against the Christian Religion, yet acknowledged that the Books of the Pentateuch were written by Moses. To these we may add several Authors, who have delivered Histories down to Posterity, that were undeniably taken out of the Pentateuch, such as Hecatæus, Berosus, Abydenus, Manetho, Eupolemus, Alexander, Polyhistor, Artapanus, Demetrius the Jew, and many others, cited by Josephus in his first Book against Appion, by the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles, by Clemens Alexandrinus, by Eusebius in his Books De Præp. Evang. I have not mentioned Philo, Josephus, and the other Jews, because they all take it for granted that Moses is the Author of the Jewish Laws, meaning by these words, the five Books of the Pentateuch. The Samaritan Pentateuch affords us yet more convincing Proofs; for after the division of the People of Israel, which happen'd under Roboboam the Son of Salamon, the ten Tribes preserved the Pentateuch written in the Samaritan Character, which is the ancient Character of the Hebrews, from whence we may rationally conclude, that at that time they had the Pentateuch in the same condition, as it is in at present, which they constantly ascribe to Moses. One cannot with any tolerable pretence question the Antiquity of the Samaritan Pentateuch, since it is written in Characters, which were not in use after the Babylonish Captivity. The Version of the Septuagint, which is assuredly very ancient, is likewise another Proof that the Books of the Peutateuch are written by Moses. In a word, all those who have spoken of the Pentateuch, whether Jews, Chriſtians, or Pagans, have taken it for granted, that theſe Books were written by Moſes. And certainly 'tis extravagant raſhneſs to oppoſe a few weak ill-grounded Conjectures to the Univerſal Conſent of all Mankind.

(f) And conſequently Ruine the Foundation of our Religion.] One of the great Proofs of the Truth of our Religion, is its Antiquity, which is principally ſupported by the Antiquity of the Books of the Law. Now if they are not Moſes's and if they carry a falſe Name, what Proof can we give of their Antiquity? This is the ready way to give occaſion to Libertines to Ridicule 'em, and conſider 'em only as Fabulous Books, compoſed at pleaſure by the later Jews after the Captivity.

(g) If what they alledged were true, yet they could only prove] Here are the Objections which Rabbi Aben-Ezra, Spinoſa, the Author of the Book of the Præadamites, F. Simon, and ſome others, propoſe againſt the Antiquity of the Books of Moſes, and the Anſwers to them, from which we ſhall better diſcern their Weakneſs.

The firſt Objection is drawn from theſe words of Deuteronomy; Behold the Words which Moſes ſpoke before all the Congregation of Iſrael beyond Jordan. This could not be written, ſay they, by Moſes, who never paſſed the Jordan no more than the Children of Iſrael did, while he was alive. Anſwer. The Hebrew word, as Vatablus obſerves, may ſignifie on this ſide, as well as on the other ſide. Pigninus, Buxtorf, and all Perſons that are converſant in Hebrew are of the ſame opinion. It literally ſignifies, In tranſitu, in tranſeundo; In their paſſage, being ready to paſs. Thus this Objection that appeared ſo terrible at firſt ſight, carries indeed no difficulty with it.

Second Objection. In the Pentateuch, Moſes is always ſpoken of in the third Perſon. He is commended there in ſeveral places, as in Numbers, ch. 12. where he is called, The meekeſt man upon earth; as alſo in Deuteronomy, ch. 34. And there aroſe not a Prophet ſince in Iſrael like unto Moſes. And is it credible that Moſes would have thus commended himſelf? Anſwer. 'Tis ordinary for thoſe who compoſe a Hiſtory, where themſelves are concerned, to ſpeak of themſelves in the third Perſon. Cæſar in his Commentaries always ſpeaks of his own Actions in the third Perſon. Joſephus does the ſame thing in his Hiſtory of the Wars of the Jews. St. John in his Goſpel ſpeaks likewiſe of himſelf in the third Perſon; The Diſciple, ſays he, whom Jeſus loved. And in another place, If I will that he tarry, what is that to you? St. Matthew relating his own Converſion, ſpeaks of himſelf in the third Perſon, and ſome ſay, that St. Luke was one of the two Diſciples, whom our Saviour met going towards Emmaus. The Praiſes which Moſes gives himſelf are not exceſſive. It was neceſſary that in his own Books he ſhould take notice of the ſignal Favours which God had conferred upon him, as well as conceal none of his own Miſcarriages. Joſephus and Cæſar often commend themſelves after the ſame manner.

Third Objection. In the 12th Chapter of Geneſis the Author has this remarkable Parentheſis, And the Canaanite was then in the Land. Which makes it evident, ſay they, that this was written when the Canaanites were no longer in Paleſtine, otherwiſe this Advertiſement had been impertinent. Now 'tis plain, they were not chaſed out of that Land till a long time after Moſes's death, and conſequently he is not the Author of this Book. Anſwer. Since theſe words, Cananæus erat in terrâ illâ, bear this ſenſe, it may be reaſonably ſuppoſed, that this Parentheſis was inſerted after Moſes's time. This is an uſual thing, and it often happens that theſe ſorts of Explications, which at firſt were written in the Margin, to illuſtrate the Text, afterwards were inſerted into the Text by way of Parentheſis. But one may likewiſe ſay, that theſe words Cananæus autem erat in terrâ, don't ſignifie Olim erat in terrâ, but Jam tum erat in terrâ, i. e. That Moſes ſpeaking of the paſſage of Abraham through the Land of Sichem, obſerves, that the Canaanites were then in the Land. Thus the ſenſe is natural, and no ways forced.

Fourth Objection. In Geneſis, ch. 22. v. 14. the Mountain Moria is called The Mountain of the Lord, who will provide; Appellavitque Abraham nomen loci illius, Dominus videt. Now, ſay they, it had not this Name, till after it was ſet apart to make a Temple there. Anſwer. But how do they know this? For is not the contrary expreſly atteſted in that place of Geneſis? And does it not appear, that this Mountain received the name of The Lord will provide, becauſe of Abraham's Anſwer to his Son, My Son, God will provide?

Fifth Objection. In Deuteronomy, ch. 3. v. 10. and 11. where mention is made of Og, King of Baſan, 'tis ſaid, That he alone was remaining of the Race of the Giants. Behold his Bedſtead was a Bedſtead of Iron, is it not in Rabbath of the Children of Ammon? Nine Cubits was the length thereof, and four Cubits the breadth of it. They ſay, theſe words make it evident, that the Author of Deuteronomy was of a later ſtanding than Moſes. For in the firſt place, why ſhould Moſes ſpeak of this Bed, to prove the Greatneſs of this Giant, ſince all the Iſraelites might have beheld it themſelves? 'Tis more probable to ſay, That this was written by an Author, who lived in a time when they had no knowledge of this King. Secondly, Why was not this Bed any longer in the Land of Baſan, but in Rabbath of the Children of Ammon? In ſhort, ſay they, this Bed was not diſcovered till the time of David, who ſubdued the Ammonites, and took Rabbath, as we find it related in the ſecond Book of Samuel, ch. 12. v. 13. Anſwer. Suppoſing all this to be true, 'tis eaſily anſwered, by ſaying that, as for what has a relation to Og's Bed, it was added in a Parentheſis. But why might not Moſes give an account of that Bed, to prove the Greatneſs of that Giant, even when he addreſſed himſelf to the Iſraelites, ſince perhaps he was writing this Relation ſome conſiderable time after the King was ſlain, and 'tis not to be imagined that all the Iſraelites had ſeen the Bed? But admit the Matter was not ſo, yet Moſes might very well make uſe of this Proof to make the Matter of Fact credible to Poſterity. Thus the Hiſtorians of our Time, when they occaſionally diſcourſe of any extraordinary Thing, although it is never ſo well known to the World, yet they frequently ſay, We have ſuch and ſuch Proofs of it, the Monſter is ſtill kept in ſuch a, place, &c. As for what follows, that this Iron Bed was in the Land of Baſan, and not in Rabbath this is all taken upon ſuppoſition, for why might not the Ammonites poſſeſs it in the time of Moſes?

Sixth Objection. The Author of the Pentateuch, ſay they, give ſuch Names to ſeveral Cities and Countries as they had not, till a long time after the Death of Moſes. In Geneſis, ch. 14. 'tis ſaid, That Abraham purſued the Kings, who had carried away his Nephew Lot, as far as Dan. Now the Name of Dan was not given to this Country till a long time after, when ſix hundred Men of the Tribe of Dan took the City of Laiſh, and, after they had taken it, gave it the Name of their Tribe, as we read in the Book of Judges, ch. 18. The ſame Author likewiſe ſpeaks often of the City of Hebron, which was not ſo call'd, till after the Death of Moſes, from Hebron the Son of Caleb, to whom Joſhuah gave it; formerly it was called Kirjath-Arba, as we are particularly informed in Joſhuah, ch. 14. v. 15. In Deuteronomy, ch. 3. v. 14. it is ſaid, That Jair the Son of Manaſſeh took all the Country of Argob unto the Coaſts of Geſhuri, and Maachathi, and called them after his own name Baſhan-Havoth-Jair unto this day. Anſwer. We may generally anſwer theſe Objections thus, by ſaying, That theſe Names were changed after Moſes's time, to render the Hiſtory more intelligible to thoſe, to whom the ancient Names of thoſe Cities and Countries that Moſes uſed, would be altogether unknown. But the firſt Difficulty may be cleared otherwiſe, by ſaying, That the Name of Dan is more ancient than they pretend: That the River Jordan was ſo called, becauſe it had its Original from two Springs Jor and Dan. So we may ſay there was another City of that Name, called Dan or Danna, whereof mention is made in the 15th Chapter of Joſhuah, Verſe 49th, which was in the Tribe of Judah, in the Country of Sodom. To the ſecond Inſtance we may return this anſwer, That it is not clearly ſaid in the Book of Joſhuah, that Hebron gave his Name to the City of Kirjath-Arba, but only that the City of Hebron was formerly called by that Name. Which may be well enough underſtood of an ancient Name, which it had heretofore. The laſt Difficulty is not conſiderable, 'tis only in theſe Words, Uſque in præſentem diem. Now Moſes might uſe this Expreſſion to demonſtrate that Country more clearly, or perhaps it might be added after him.

Seventh Objection. The Author of the Pentateuch ſpeaketh of things that happen'd after the Death of Moſes, in Exodus, Chap. 16. Verſe 35. it is ſaid that the Children of Iſrael did eat Manna, Forty Years, until they came to a Land inhabited; they did eat Manna, until they came to the Borders of the Land of Canaan. Now this could not be written by Moſes, who died before the Forty Years were accompliſhed. After the ſame manner 'tis written in the 36th Chapter of Geneſis, Verſe 31. And theſe are the Kings that reigned in the Land of Idom, before there reigned any King over the Children of Iſrael. Which words put it beyond controverſie, that he who wrote this, was alive after the Iſraelites had Kings ſet over them. To this we may add, that after this Author has given us a Catalogue of the eight Kings of the Edomites, he ſpeaks of their Dukes. Now they had not Dukes in the place of their Kings till a long time after, as we may obſerve in the firſt Book of the Chronicles, Chap. 1. Verſe 5. In ſhort, 'tis ſaid in Deuteronomy, Chap. 2. Verſe 12. that the Sons of Eſau dwelt in Seir, after they had driven out and deſtroyed the ancient Inhabitants called Horims, as the Children of Iſrael did unto the Land of their poſſeſſion. Which paſſage, ſay they, ſeems to intimate, that the Iſraelites had ſubdued the Edomites when this was written. Anſwer. If all theſe places were to be taken in the ſenſe that is given them, yet we might anſwer, that ſome of them have been ſince added, or that Moſes ſometimes ſpoke by a Prophetick Spirit. But we need not run to ſuch Solutions. Moſes might ſay, that the Iſraelites ſhould eat Manna Forty Years, knowing, as he certainly did, that they were to tarry ſo long in the Deſart, as it appears in the 14th Chapter of the Book of Numbers. Moreover, God had revealed to Moſes, that the Iſraelites ſhould afterwards have a King, as is clearly foretold in the 17th Chapter of Deuteronomy, Verſe 14. The eight Kings of the Edomites there mentioned, might have reigned from Eſau to Moſes; and the Dukes, of whom he ſpeaks, did not ſucceed the Kings, but govern'd at the ſame time. Laſtly, theſe Words, As the Iſraelites did to the Land in their poſſeſſion, don't at all ſignifie or intimate the Land of the Edomites, but the Land which was promiſed to the Iſraelites. And let not any one ſay, that the Iſraelites were not as yet in poſſeſſion of the Land of Promiſe in Moſes's time, ſince 'tis certain that the Tribes of Reuben and Gad, with a great part of that of Manaſſeh, had poſſeſſed themſelves of the Country of the Amorites, and of the Men of Baſan, after they had put 'em to the Sword.

Eighth Objection. The ſtrongeſt Argument at firſt view is the Death and Burial of Moſes, which is deſcribed at the end of Deuteronomy. To this there are two Anſwers. The firſt of thoſe, who ſay with Philo and Joſephus, That Moſes wrote it himſelf by a Spirit of Prophecy. The ſecond, which is the more common and ſolid of the two, That this Account was added either by Joſhuah, or by Ezrah; or laſtly, by the Synagogue of the Jews, to make the Hiſtory of the Pentateuch more perfect.

Ninth Objection. They ſay, That Moſes is ſo far from being the Author of the Pentateuch, that the Author there cites Books that were compoſed by Moſes; as The Book of the Covenant, Exod. 24. The Book of the Wars of the Lord, Numb. 21. 14. in which there was likewiſe written the War againſt Amelek, which is mentioned in Exodus, Chap. 17. Verſe 14. The Book of the Law of the Lord in Deuteronomy, Chap. 31. Verſe 9. And laſtly, a Song, which is referred to, in the two and thirtieth Chapter of Deuteronomy. From whence they coclude, that the Pentateuch was compoſed out of the ſeveral Books of Moſes. Anſwer. This Objection carries no force with it; for what ſhould hinder Moſes from citing the Books which he had formerly compoſed? Beſides, ſhould we grant that all theſe paſſages are to be underſtood of thoſe Books that were written by Moſes, it would not invalidate our Opinion. But this cannot certainly be proved. For in the firſt place, we don't know, whether there was any ſuch Book or no that was intituled, The Battels of the Lord; for the Hebrew Text does not intimate that it was already written, but that it might be. Neither is it evident whether there is any Book mentioned: For the Hebrew Word may ſignifie any manner of Narrative, and ſo the Words that are cited may bear this ſenſe, As it will be related when the Iſraelites deſcribe the Battels of the Lord. Mr. Simon quarrels with this Interpretation, which, I ſay, theſe Words will naturally bear; but however, he does not demonſtrate that they cannot be thus applied. Others underſtand this place of a certain Song, which they uſed to ſing in honour of their Victories. It is not ſaid in Exodus, Chap. 17. that the War of Amalek was written in the Book of the Battels of the Lord, but only God commanded Moſes to write it, and 'tis that which he did in that Place. That paſſage in Exodus, Chap. 24. does not prove that Moſes wrote a Book of the Covenant, but only that being come down from the Mountain, he recited to the People the Laws which God had given him in the Mountain, which are ſet down in the preceding Chapters. And this it is which is called in that place, The Book of the Covenant. The Book of the Law, of which mention is made in Deuteronomy, is not different from Deuteronomy it ſelf. And after all, it is not improbable that Moſes referred to a Song, which he himſelf had compoſed.

Tenth Objection. There were (ſays Mr. Simon) amongſt the Hebrews, Prophets inſpired by God, who had a particular Charge given 'em to preſerve in Writing the moſt important Actions that happened in that Government. 'Tis probable, there were ſeveral of theſe Prophets in the time of Moſes, and then we may rationally ſuppoſe, that Moſes, as a Legiſlator, wrote only the Edicts and Commandments which he gave to the People, and that he left the care of collecting and tranſmitting to Poſterity the moſt conſiderable Paſſages of State to theſe above-mentioned Scribes or Prophets. Anſwer. This Suppoſition is founded upon very uncertain Conjectures, and precarious Principles. The Egyptians, ſay they, had ſuch Scribes or Regiſters to write down their Sacred Tranſactions, and therefore there were ſuch alſo amongſt the Jews. A very fine Conſequence this! 'Tis credible however, that Moſes eſtabliſhed ſuch an Order of Men. But what Proofs have they to ſupport this tottering Suppoſition? Why, Joſephus and Euſebius tell us, that amongſt the Hebrews, it was not lawful for every one to write their Hiſtory, but only for the Prophets who were inſpired by God. All this may be very true; but then Joſephus and Euſebius underſtand by theſe Prophets no other Perſons but Moſes, and thoſe after him, who wrote the Books of the Old Teſtament down to the Reign of Artaxerxes. We muſt paſs the ſame Judgment of Theodoret, ſay they, and the other Fathers: Now this, in my Opinion, is to make 'em ſpeak things they never thought of, and not to underſtand them aright. As for what they add farther concerning theſe Prophets, whom they have inveſted with an Authority to add or diminiſh from the Books of Scripture, this is ſtill more improbable than the other. They barely tell us inſtead of proving it, that in the Books of Kings ſeveral other Memoirs are quoted, from whence they draw this Concluſion, that all the Books of the Bible, which have come down to our Hands, are only Abridgments and Summaries of the ancient Acts. But does it follow from hence, that all the other Books of the Bible were uſed after this rate? Does it follow that they added to, or retrenched from them, after they were once made? Or laſtly, that they were compoſed by theſe Prophets? They would have it proceed from this Reaſon, that there are ſo many Contradictions in the Books of the Holy Scripture. They ſay that this is the Reaſon of the Differences between the Chronicles and other Hiſtorical Treatiſes of the Bible, of that variety of falſe Conjectures that ruine the Authority of the Scriptures; and what is yet more material, that 'tis not impoſſible to reconcile theſe ſeeming Contradictions. To this purpoſe they amaſs together a great quantity of other Conjectures of this Nature, very ſubtilely invented, but weak and ill-grounded, and yet upon the ſtrength of theſe, they make the Authority of the Bible to depend, after they have endeavoured to undermine the ſolid Foundations which bear it up. Thus by pretending to advance Criticiſm, they forſake the Rules of true Judgment, and follow the Fantaſtick Chimæra's of their own Imaginations. There is no weight in what they have invented themſelves, or what they have found ready invented to their Hands by ſome Rabbies; and yet at the ſame time they ſcruple and doubt of ſeveral things that are clearer and better eſtabliſhed.

Although I did not name Mr. Simon in my firſt Edition, yet he very well perceived that this reproach was addreſſed to himſelf. The manner wherein he anſwered me, ſufficiently ſhewed, that he was ſenſibly touched, however this his Carriage does not in the leaſt juſtifie him. For inſtead of demonſtrating by ſolid Reaſons, that the Reproaches I faſten'd upon him, weere undeſerved and ill-grounded, he has filled his Letter with nothing but Contumelies and ſcornful Reflections, which ſhews how heinouſly he reſented the Liberty I took in examining his Hypotheſis; and this all ſenſible Men obſerved as ſoon as ever his Letter appear'd in publick. But now to make it evident to the whole World, that I have Reaſon on my ſide, viz. that Mr. Simon is in the wrong for quarelling with me upon this occaſion, I ſhall only caſt my Eyes on the Preface of his Book, where he ſets down the Principles of his Work at length: The World will obſerve, (ſays he) that having conſidered nothing in this Eſſay but the Profit of thoſe who have a mind to know the Grounds of the Holy Scriptures, I have inſerted abundance of Principles, very uſeful to reſolve the moſt weighty Difficulties of the Bible, and at the ſame time to anſwer thoſe Objections which are uſually made againſt theſe Holy Books. Theſe Principles are reducible to three Heads: The firſt is, That there were always amongſt the Hebrews a ſort of Prophets, or Publick Regiſters, Divinely inſpired, who made what Alterations or Additions they thought fit, in the Books of the Old Teſtament. The ſecond is, That they heretofore wrote their Books upon little little Leaves, which they rowled one over another, round a ſmall piece of Wood, without ſtitching them together; whence it happen'd ſometimes, that not taking ſufficient care to preſerve the order of theſe ancient Leaves or Volumes the things themſelves treated of, have ſometimes been miſplaced. The third is, That there is a great deal of Reaſon to believe, that thoſe Perſons who joyned theſe old Memoirs together, to keep up the Body of thoſe Canonical Books which are now remaining, made no ſcruple at all to cut off ſeveral Synonymous Terms, which were found in their Copies, and were perhaps inſerted only for a fuller Illuſtration. Theſe are the great and admirable Principles of Mr. Simon, his publick Regiſters, his Rolls and Synonyma's. Here is, according to him, a way to reſolve the moſt perplexed Difficulties of the Bible, and to defend its Authority againſt the Diſciples of Spinoſa. Here is an infallible Expedient whereby we may confound the Socinians and Proteſtants, and invincibly prove the Inſpiration of the Holy Books. And laſtly, here is a never-failing Salve to ſilence all the Objections that can be urged againſt the Scripture. I am of Opinion that Mr. Simon will find very few People who will be inclined to ſubſcribe to the Uſefulneſs of theſe Principles. But this is not the Buſineſs I deſign to examine, 'tis their Solidity I deſire to ſee, upon which he values himſelf ſo exceedingly. For if it be made evident, that theſe Principles are only eſtabliſh'd upon weak frivolous Conjectures, then adieu to all thoſe Advantages, ſay I, that may be drawn from thence. Let us therefore examine all the Proofs that Mr. Simon has brought together in his Critical Hiſtory, and other Books.

The firſt of his Principles, is that about the Scribes or Regiſters that were divinely inſpired. But he gives us no Proofs of this matter in his Preface; it ſeems that was not the proper place. In the firſt Chapter of his Critique, which is a ſort of a ſecond Preface, he contents himſelf with ſaying, That he gives the name of Prophets to the Authors of the Books of the Bible, and with repeating what he ſaid before in his Preface concerning the great advantage of theſe publick Scribes; as if it were enough for him barely to aſſert theſe things, without giving himſelf the trouble of proving them. But in the ſecond Chapter he endeavours to make this whole matter evident, and therefore let us conſider by what Reaſons he offers to do it. In the firſt place he obſerves, that the Jewiſh State acknowledged no other Chief or Head, but God. From this Principle he concludes that God himſelf gave 'em Laws by the Miniſtry of Moſes, and of the other Prophets who ſucceeded him. This Concluſion is undeniable, but it was not neceſſary to prove it by a Principle more obſure than the Concluſion that is drawn from thence. But we are not concerned to know, whether there were any of theſe Prophets amongſt the Hebrews, for that is a conſtantly received Truth; but 'tis our buſineſs to know, In the firſt place, Whether there were in all Ages amongſt the Jews thoſe Scribes or Regiſters whom he talks of, who looked after the Records and Hiſtories of the Affairs of that Nation. Secondly, Whether they were divinely inſpired. Thirdly, Whether they are the Authors of the Books of the Bible. 'Tis Mr. Simon's buſineſs to prove theſe three Propoſitions, and not barely to tell us in general, that there were Prophets amongſt the Jews. The ſecond Remark made by Mr Simon, is this. That in all well-regulated Kingdoms, and eſpecially in the Eaſtern Nations, they had always certain Perſons, who tooke care to ſee, that the moſt important Occurrences of State were preſerved in Writing. I thought indeed that Mr. Simon would have concluded from this Obſervation, that they had ſuch Perſons likewiſe amongſt the Jews. He diſowns this Conſequence, and therefore this can only paſs for a Compariſon, and ſo we muſt look for other Arguments to ſhew there were ſuch publick Scribes amongſt the Jews. It carries a great deal of Probability with it, continues he, that Moſes, upon the firſt eſtabliſhment of that State, ſet up this ſort of Scribes, whom we may call Publick or Divine ones, to diſtinguiſh 'em from particular Writers, who uſually engage to write the Hiſtory of their own Times from no Motives but thoſe of Intereſt. However, 'tis not certain that Moſes ever did inſtitute theſe Scribes, 'tis a mere Conjecture and nothing elſe. But how does Mr. Simon endeavour to prove it? He gives us two Reaſons in a Parentheſis; the firſt is, Becauſe Moſes was bred up in the Ægyptian Court, where they had Prieſts, to whom they gave the name of Scribes or Regiſters, of Sacred Things. As if it were neceſſary, or indeed probable, that Moſes would appoint amongſt the Children of Iſrael whatever he ſaw practiſed by the Ægyptians. He ought to have produced ſome Reaſon, or at leaſt ſome Conjecture, to prove that Moſes imitated them in this. But Mr. Simon omits to do it. The ſecond Reaſon which he alledges to prove that Moſes eſtabliſhed this ſort of Scribes amongſt the Jews, is, Becauſe he was a perfect Law-giver; as if it was neceſſary for a perfect Law-giver to inſtitute ſuch a Cuſtom. Was not Lycurgus a perfect Law-giver? And yet, by the acknowledgment of Mr. Simon himſelf, he did not appoint any of theſe publick Scribes in his Commonwealth. But for what purpoſe I wonder ſhould Moſes ſet 'em up amongſt the Jews, when he himſelf had written their Laws and Hiſtory. Beſides, could Mr. Simon undeniably prove, that there were theſe publick Scribes in the time of Moſes, yet it would not follow from thence, that they were the Authors of the Pentateuch. And thus we ſee that all Mr. Simon's admirable Conjectures to ſhew, that the Books of the Pentateuch were written by the Scribes divinely inſpired, fall to the ground, without doing what they were produced for.

Let us now ſee if he is more fortunate in his Citations. The firſt is from Joſephus, who tells us That amongſt the Jews it was not lawful for every one to write their Annals but that this Province was only reſerved for the Prophets, who knew remote and future Things by Divine Inſpiration, and committed to Writing all the remarkable Paſſages of their time. Now to this I formerly anſwered, That Joſephus by the Prophets underſtands no more than Moſes, and thoſe that wrote the Books of the Old Teſtament after him. Mr. Simon anſwers, That the Reaſons of Joſephus are too general to be explained by ſuch a Reſtriction. But this is a matter where we need not wholly depend upon Conjectures: tis but reading the whole paſſage in Joſephus, and it will evidently appear, that in this place he only ſpeaks of thoſe Books that were received by the Jews for Canonical. The Words faithfully Tranſlated are theſe; It is not lawful for every body amongſt us to write Hiſtory, there is no contrariety at all in our Hiſtories. They are the Prophets who write, either about ancient Things that happened along time ago, and which they learn by Divine Inſpiration, or about Things that happened in their own time, and thoſe they ſet down in order as they were Tranſacted. We have not Millions of Books that contradict one another, and only ſerve to perplex the Reader. We have only Twenty two, which contain the Hiſtory of all times, and to which we reſign our Belief with a great deal of Juſtice. Of theſe Books there are five by Moſes .... From Moſes down to Artexerxes King of Perſia, who lived after Xerxes, the Prophets in thirteen Books wrote the Hiſtory of their Times. The four following contain Hymns in praiſe of God, and ſeveral Moral Precepts. In ſhort, from Artaxerxes down to our Times we have our Hiſtory very well written, but theſe Books are not of the ſame Authority with the former, becauſe there has not been a continued and regular Succeſſion of Prophets. Nothing in the whole World can be more directly oppoſite to Mr. Simon's Hypotheſis than this paſſage of Joſephus. Mr. Simon ſuppoſes, that in Moſes's time there were publick Scribes, who cited the Memoirs from whence they compoſed the Pentateuch; and Joſephus expreſly tells us, that theſe five firſt Books were written by Moſes. Mr. Simon ſuppoſes, that the following Books are only Abridgments of thoſe Ancient Memoirs, that were from time to time written by the publick Scribes, and afterwards collected together by others of the ſame Character; and Joſephus ſuppoſes they were written in the ſame manner as we now find 'em, by the Prophets that lived upon the ſpot when theſe things which they have delivered were tranſacted. Mr. Simon would needs have it, that in the Jewiſh Nation there were always publick Scribes divinely inſpired; and Joſephus plainly tells us, that the Succeſſion of Prophets failed after Artaxerxes. Now what can be more irreconcileable than all this? Beſides, 'tis obſervable that Joſephus's Prophets are different from Mr. Simon's publick Scribes. They were not Men intruſted with the Regiſters, and appointed to write Hiſtory: But Prophets, whom from time to time we find amongſt the Jews who took care to tranſmit the paſſages of their time to Poſterity; and their Books are not at all different from thoſe, which the Jews, acknowledged for Canonical in the time of Joſephus. From all which it neceſſarily follows, that this paſſage confirms my Hypotheſis, and utterly deſtroys Mr. Simon's: For we maintain with Joſephus againſt Mr. Simon, That Moſes is the Author of the Pentateuch, and that the other Authentick Books of the Old Teſtament were written by Men Divinely inſpired, or by Prophets who lived near the times wherein thoſe Occurrences happened which they delivered, though we do not certainly know their Names: 'Tis to theſe Books, and not to the Pentateuch, that we are to apply the Words of St. Gregory upon Job, which Mr. Simon manifeſtly perverts and abuſes in his firſt Chapter, Quis hæc ſcripſerit valde ſupervacue quæritur, cum tamen Auctor Libri Spiritus Sanctus fideliter credatur. For this Father ſpeaks this only with relation to the Book of Job, whoſe Author is unknown to us.

The Second Author that Mr. Simon alledges in his Critical Hiſtory to prove theſe Scribes divinely inſpired, is Euſebius: Euſebius, ſays he, confirms this Opinion, when he takes notice, that amongſt the Jews it was not allowed for all ſorts of People to paſs their judgment upon thoſe Men that were inſpired by the Holy Spirit to write Holy Books. He cites in the Margin, Euſebius de præparatione Evangelicâ; that is to ſay, a great Book in Folio; I have diligently hunted after this paſſage there, but have not been ſo happy as to meet with it. But let the matter be how it will, I don't ſee what Aſſiſtance it brings to Mr. Simon's Hypotheſis; The Jews had Writers that were divinely inſpired; Who queſtions it? As alſo, That it did not belong to all the World to judge who they were, that were thus divinely inſpired; but this Province was reſerved for thoſe Perſons, who had the ſame Inſpiration themſelves. Well then, ſuppoſe it were ſo, does it therefore follow that the Books of Moſes were compoſed by the Keepers of Regiſters? Does it follow that thoſe who were appointed to write Hiſtory, and that too out of the publick Memoirs, were divinely Inſpired? Or laſtly, That all the Books of Scripture which we now have, are but ſo many Abridgements extracted out of theſe Memoirs. As for what remains, Mr. Simon could not have cited any Author more contrary to his own Hypotheſis, than Euſebius, and that even in this very Book De Præpartione Evangelicâ. For one of the great Principles, which he there eſtabliſhes in ſeveral places, is the Authority and Antiquity of the Books of Moſes, which he always ſuppoſes to have been written by that Prophet in the ſame manner as we have 'em at preſent. The Truth of this Aſſertion he confirms by theſe three Propoſitions which he lays down in the beginning of the 14th Book. The firſt is, That Moſes is ancienter than any Greek Author. The ſecond, That he has written what he had learned of his Anceſtors. The third, That the Jews have neither added nor diminiſhed from the Writings which he left them. And now I'll leave the World to judge whether theſe Principles of Euſebius agree with thoſe of Mr. Simon.

The third Author cited by Mr. Simon is Theodoret. It muſt be confeſſed, that this Father owns, (as well as ſeveral other Authors have done) that the Books of Kings and Chronicles were compoſed from very ancient Memoirs. But this is not the point in Queſtion. We confeſs, we are not aſſured of the Authors of theſe Books. We acknowledge they are a Collection drawn out of old Memoirs. But we demand of Mr. Simon, whether it follows from hence, that the Pentateuch, and other Books of the Bible, are of the ſame Nature. This is a thing which Theodoret wou'd beware of ſaying, becauſe he owns Moſes to be the Author of the Pentateuch. 'Tis with with this Aſſertion he begins his Preface to the Books of Kings, from whence Mr. Simon has drawn theſe paſſages which he quotes. After having explained the Books of Moſes, &c. To theſe three Authors has Mr. Simon in his Letter to Monſieur L'Abbe, added the Author of the Synopſis, attributed to St Athanaſius. This Author follows the Opinion of Joſephus, and after having obſerved that the five firſt Books of the Bible do without diſpute belong to Moſes, he ſays, that all the following Books are not written by thoſe whoſe Names they bear, but that they were compoſed by Prophets who lived from time to time. Laſtly, he obſerves, when he is ſpeaking concerning the Chronicles, that one finds ſeveral Hiſtorical Books of the Prophets quoted there. And what does all this make for Mr. Simon's Hypotheſis? Have not we ſaid the very ſame thing? Does not all the World agree as to this particular? Had Mr. Simon kept himſelf here, no body would have fell upon him.

The laſt Author whom Mr. Simon cites to juſtifie his Hypotheſis, is the Author of the Chronicon Alexandrinum. This Author in the place tranſcribed by Mr. Simon tell us, that there were ſome Prophets who wrote their own Prophecies themſelves, as David the Book of Pſalms, and Daniel his Prophecy; and that there were others who did not write themſelves, but that they had Scribes in the Temple, who wrote down, as it were in a Journal, the Words of each Prophet ..... That the Books of Kings were thus compoſed by Parts, that under Saul's Reign they wrote whatever paſſed in his time, and ſo likewiſe in David's time, and the other Kings; That the Chronicles are but a Collection of Regiſters, and ſeveral Papers of their Kings; That Moſes wrote the Pentateuch; That Joſhuah is the Author of the Book which bears his Name; That the Book of Judges was written by the Scribes in the Temple from time to time, as well as that of Ruth; That Solomon compoſed the Proverbs the Canticles, and Eccleſiaſtes. This Author's Hypotheſis is extreamly different from that of Mr. Simon. 1. He ſuppoſeth for a certain truth, that Moſes was the Author of the Pentateuch, and does not attribute his Works to the Publick Scribes or Abbreviators. 2. He does not ſay, that theſe publick Scribes were inſpired by God, or that they wrote the Hiſtory of themſelves. He ſuppoſes the Prophets dictated that to them as well as their Prophecies. 3. He believes that the Books of Kings and Judges were the very Originals from the Prophets, which were joyned together. Inſtead of which Mr. Simon believes, that theſe Books are Abridgments. I won't loſe ſo much time as to anſwer the Rabbi's, and other Authors of that ſtamp, whom Mr. Simon has muſtered up in his laſt Letter. 'Tis viſible there's not one ſingle Author he quotes that is of the ſame Opinion with himſelf. For, In the firſt place they all of 'em acknowledge, That the Books of the Pentateuch ought not to be attributed to Scribes or to Prophets Divinely Inſpired, but to Moſes himſelf. Secondly, they ſay, That the following Books were written by Perſons divinely Inſpired, to whom they gave the name of Prophets, but they don't tell us, that theſe Prophets were Superviſors of the Regiſters, or publick Scribes. Thirdly, they acknowledge, that there were ancient Memoirs, or ancient Hiſtories often quoted in the Books of Kings, and the Chronicles. No body doubts this, I have frequently obſerved it, and have made a Catalogue of the Books that are quoted in the Old Teſtament. But it does not follow from hence, that all the Books of the Bible are extracted from theſe Memoirs, and Compiled a long time after. Mr. Simon has given theſe publick Scribes authority to change, to enlarge, and abridge theſe Sacred Books as they ſee convenient. To prove this, he quotes Don Iſaac Abarinbel, a Learned Spaniſh Jew, as if we were obliged to take all for Goſpel that theſe Rabbi's have been pleaſed to deliver. He joyns Procopius and Theodoret to this Jew, as Men that have obſerved, that the Books of Kings and Chronicles were drawn out of ſeveral other Hiſtorical Books. Not to diſpleaſe Mr. Simon, he has mightily altered the Point, for this is not the Queſtion under debate. We agree with him, that the Authors of the Books of Kings and the Chronicles, compiled their Hiſtories out of Memoirs and particular Hiſtorians whom they found, as Livy and Mezeray made uſe of the ancient Hiſtorians to compoſe their Hiſtories: But for all this, we dare not ſay, they have changed or diminiſhed the ancient Hiſtories, that always continued in the ſame condition they were in, nor that they had a Priviledge to do this, much leſs that they have made any conſiderable Alterations or Additions to the Books of Moſes. Mr. Simon at laſt brings in a very dangerous Maxim, though he covers it under a ſpecious appearance of Uſefulneſs: It would be dangerous, ſays he, to pretend to Correct one Book of Scripture by another, becauſe they don't agree altogether themſelves. 'Tis very truly ſaid, that we ought not to Correct one Book of Scripture by another: But it is not true, that two Books of the Scripture don't altogether agree with each other. There is not any real Contradiction between the Books of the Bible; if there are any apparent ones, the fault does not lie in the Authors but in our want of Underſtanding them. 'Tis a piece of extraordinary Raſhneſs and Preſumption to ſuppoſe with Mr. Simon that there are real Contradictions in the Books of the Bible, that the Author of the Chronicles has reported Matter of Fact otherwiſe than it is in other places, or that the Genealogies and Chronology of the Scriptures are faulty, and the like, I know, ſays Mr. Simon, that it is expreſly forbidden in Deuteronomy to add or diminiſh a Tittle from the Word of God. Here then there is an expreſs Text againſt Mr. Simon's Hypotheſis. Now to anſwer this Paſſage, he ought to alledge ſome other place of Scripture, which reſtrains and limits this Prohibition to private Perſons, or gives Permiſſion to the Prophets and publick Scribes to do the contrary. But Mr. Simon thinks it enough to quote the Author of the Book Cozri, who is of the ſame Opinion; but by a peculiar Misfortune that attends him, we find, that a certain Commentator towards the bottom of the Page, where this Book is quoted, obſerves, That the Author of the Book Cozri does not ſpeak of the Scripture in that place, but only of the Explication of the Commandments, which depended upon the Judges of the Sanedrim.

Sanedrim, who had power to extend or limit them according to the circumſtances of Time and emergent Occaſions. What becomes then of Mr. Simon's Anſwer? It ſtood only upon the Authority of the Author of the Book Cozri, and now we ſee, that this very Author will not be brought to ſay what he would have him. After all, Mr. Simon quotes the Common Opinion of the Fathers, who believe, that the Collection of the Old Teſtament, ſuch as it now is, was compoſed by Ezrah, which confirms, ſays he, what I am now maintaining; for Ezrah could not correct and reſtore theſe Books, which, according to them, had been corrupted during the time of the Captivity, but in the Quality and Character of a Prophet and publick Scribe, and therefore he is called a Scribe by the way of Excellence in the Bible. I would willingly know what neceſſity there was, that Ezrah ſhould reſtore the Holy Scripture in quality of Publick Scribe, or Maſter of the Rolls. Is it not infinitely more probable to imagine he did it, becauſe he was commanded to reſtore the Religion and Laws of the Jews in their ancient Purity, as being their Chief and High-Prieſt. Whenever he is called a Scribe in Scripture, 'tis not in Mr. Simon's Senſe, but becauſe he was well skill'd and knowing in the Law of the Lord. We need only give our ſelves the trouble to read this paſſage, Ezra 7. v. 6. Ezra went up from Babylon, and he was a ready Scribe in the Law of Moſes, which the Lord God of Iſrael had given. That is to ſay, he perfectly nnderſtood the Law, the Word Scribe being taken in the ſame Senſe in Jeremiah, Ch. 8. v. 8. And it does not ſignifie any thing elſe in the New Teſtament, where this Name is given to all the Doctors of the Law.

The Second Principle of Mr Simon depends upon the changing of the Rolls or Volumes in which theſe Sacred Books are written. I ſaid before, that this Conjecture is only pleaſant becauſe it is new, and that it was a Chimæra, that had nothing at all to do with the Argument in hand. Mr. Simon anſwers me immediately, That what I call a Chimæra, was a very ancient Opinion, and likewiſe taken notice of by the moſt ancient Criticks. It was therefore his buſineſs to look after his Proofs. But I have no Exceptions to make to the Antiquity of Rolls, (for 'tis very plain that they formerly wrote upon Leaves which they Rolled together) but only to the ill uſe he makes of 'em. He ought to have ſhewn by convincing Inſtances, that theſe Rolls frequently occaſioned Tranſpoſitions, and he ought likewiſe to have applied this Conjecture to ſome Examples in Scripture which had ſuffered by this diſorder. But this I defie him to do after all his attempts, he dares not undertake any thing of that nature, but contents himſelf to ſay in general terms, That it may be ſo. I ſaid alſo, That this Conjecture had nothing to do with the Subject, becauſe if we ſuppoſed, that ſome little confuſion might accidentally happen in the Rolling of theſe Leaves, yet the Abridgers might eaſily rectifie 'em and ſet 'em in order. To this Mr. Simon replies, that 'tis to no purpoſe to talk of the Abridgers, becauſe theſe Leaves were diſordered long after the Collection of the Abridgments I did indeed believe Mr. Simon had ſpoken of the Leaves of the Originals or Memoirs, out of which, as he pretends, they made an Abridgment of the Bible, and I am ſtill of Opinion, that he is thus to be underſtood, where he ſays, pa. 35. I much doubt whether we are to attribute to Moſes and the publick Scribes, that lived in his times, the diſorder and confuſion which we find in ſeveral places of the Pentateuch: There is great probability for us to believe, that as they wrote their Books then upon little Rolls, or ſingle Leaves, which they rolled one upon another, the order of theſe Leaves has been changed. Now it was very probable, that this then had a relation to Moſes, and the publick Scribes: But ſince Mr. Simon is willing to have it underſtood of the Times that followed theſe Abridgments, he ought to inform us, that the little Order which we find, as he pretends in the Pentateuch, proceeded from the changing of theſe Rolls. But this he can never be able to do, and I challenge him to apply this Conjecture to the Examples which he produces; as one may readily rectify a printed Sheet of Paper which was tranſpoſed in binding a Book. Hence it follows that this ſecond Principle of Mr. Simon is ſo very far from being well grounded, that 'tis indeed wholly uſeleſs. As for what concerns his third Principle, which is the Repetition of the Synonymous Terms, from whence he pretends to conclude, that the Books of the Bible are compoſed from ſeveral ancient Memoirs, 'tis a falſe and frivolous Conjecture; for there is much greater reaſon for a Man to believe, that theſe Repetitions came from one Author, who wrote theſe Things as Memoirs at firſt, than from an Epitomizer, who has weaved one continued Hiſtory without making any repetition of the ſame Things, or the ſame Words: Beſides, that theſe Repetitions which Mr. Simon produces as Examples, are not abſolutely needleſs, but ſerve either to Illuſtrate what has been ſaid, or elſe to Corroborate ſome Circumſtance or other, or laſtly, to give more Force and Efficacy to what is written. 'Tis no unuſual thing to meet with Repetitions of that nature in moſt Authors, and principally in thoſe, that write the Hiſtory of their own times with an air of Simplicity and Unaffectedneſs.

Eleventh Objection. 'Tis pretended that the Repetitions, which we meet with in the Pentateuch, were not in all probability made by Moſes, but rather by them who made a Collection of the Holy Books, and have joyned together ſeveral Precepts or Explications of the ſame Words. There are abundance of theſe Repetitions which they produce. They ſay moreover, that there are many Repetitions of the ſame thing differently related, and this makes it appear, that this Hiſtory is drawn from ſeveral different Memoirs. They add, That we cannot rationally attribute them to Moſes, becauſe of the little Order or Regularity we find them in. They produce upon this occaſion a Conjecture that is pleaſant enough, becauſe new. There is reaſon to imagine, ſay they, that as they wrote their Books in thoſe times upon Rolls, or ſeparate Leaves, which they rolled one upon another, the order of the Leaves has been changed and inverted. And ſo they pretend, that the diverſity of Style, which is to be found in the Books of the Pentateuch, is a ſatisfactory Proof, to ſhew that the ſame Writer was not the Author. Anſwer. All theſe Objections jections are extremely weak and impertinent, and rather deſtroy, than contribute any thing to the Hypotheſis they are produced to eſtabliſh. For can any Man in the World believe, that an Author, who had abridged any Hiſtory, would ſo often repeat the ſame things, that he would preſerve no order, and not write in the ſame ſtyle throughout. On the contrary, Don't all Abbreviators make it their buſineſs to make their Relations in as few Words as poſſible, regularly, and after an uniform manner? The contrary Faults more frequently belong to the firſt Authors of Hiſtory, who naturally and ſimply recount all Affairs which they know. This ſort of Repetition is very familiar and common among the Ancients, and particularly amongſt thoſe, who wrote an Hiſtory or Fable firſt; and they are rarely found in Hiſtorians, who compile their Works out of the Memoirs of other Men, the reaſon is, becauſe the firſt write naturally, juſt as they ſpeak, without Meditation and Study, and the others on the contrary, having all their Matter ready fitted to their hands, are only at the Expence of ranging, and digeſting it Methodically. The Repetitions, which we find in the Pentateuch, are often neceſſary to explain the Particularities of thoſe Things, which at firſt they were forced to relate in general; for this reaſon it is, that the particular Circumſtances of the Creation of the World, which were ſet down in the firſt Chapter of Geneſis, were afterwards told over again, more particularly in the ſecond. 'Twas the Genius and Cuſtom of the Hebrews to repeat the ſame Words, as it was indeed the faſhion of all the Ancients.

But we are not to believe, that there is ſo little order, as they would make us believe, in the Pentateuch, and if there were leſs than there really is, that would be rather an Argument to ſhow it belongs to Moſes, who wrote without Art, Method, and Affectation, as thoſe People generally do, who leave Memoirs behind them of thoſe Paſſages, wherein themſelves bore a ſhare. The conjecture about the Rolls is an extravagant Whimſie, that makes nothing at all to the purpoſe, for if there were any confuſion of the Leaves, the Abbreviators might without any great difficulty ſet them right in their true order. Laſtly, what they pretend about the conſiderable difference of ſtyle in the Pentateuch, is notoriouſly falſe: On the contrary, a Man may obſerve all along the Genius of the ſame Author; and if he ſometimes does not happen to enlarge upon the Affairs, which he relates, 'tis becauſe his Matter required ſhortneſs, or becauſe he did not judge it convenient to uſe that liberty. Now we cannot in juſtice call this a Difference of Style, when all the reſt is agreeable, and of a piece.

But let us leave Mr. Simon to anſwer his Adverſary, who pretends, as well as himſelf, that the Pentateuch does not belong to Moſes, but to a Jewiſh Prieſt ſent from Babylon to inſtruct the Chriſtians. His Conjectures, which are eaſily anſwered, are theſe:

In the firſt place, he ſays, That the 11th and 12 Verſes of the ſecond Chapter in Geneſis could not be written by Moſes. The name of the firſt is Piſon, that is it which compaſſeth the whole Land of Havelah, where there is Gold. And the Gold of that Land is good, there is Bdellium, and the Onyx Stone. Theſe Remarks, ſays Mr. Simon's Adverſary, ſeem to proceed from an Author who had been in that Country, that is to ſay, in Chaldea, for Piſon is an Arm of Euphrates, that diſcharges it ſelf into the Perſian Gulf. It is by no means probable, that Moſes, who never went far from Ægypt, ſhould be able to give ſo particular a relation of a Country ſo remote and diſtant, in a time when ſuch Voyages were very rare, and attended with abundance of Difficulties. But I would willingly underſtand what would hinder Moſes from knowing, that this Country was watered with the River Piſon, and how was it poſſible for him to give a Deſcription of the Place, unleſs he had given the moſt publick and commonly known Marks. We ſee plainly, that ſome Countries, though never ſo remote, are yet known well enough for thoſe excellent and precious Commodities that are found there, which are to be met with no where elſe, and which are tranſported from thence to others places. 'Tis not neceſſary for a Man, to go to Potoſi, to be informed, that the Gold of that Country is very fine, and in great plenty; or to make a Voyage to the Indies, to know that Pearls and precious Stones, are found there; nor is there any more ſtrength in the ſecond Reaſon, which ſuppoſeth, that the exactneſs wherewith this Author deſcribes the erecting of the Cities of Meſopotamia and Aſſyria, v. 18. of the 10th Chapter of Geneſis, is a clear indication, that the Writer thereof had been in that Country. For is it neceſſary that an Hiſtorian ſhould have been in all the Places he mentions? On the other hand, Was there ever any Hiſtorian in the World that has ſeen all the Countries which he gives an account of?

Theſe are this Author's private Gueſſes: We have already anſwered thoſe which have been ſtarted by Hobbs, Spinoſa, and Mr. Simon, as well as himſelf, but don't think it worth the while to throw away any time in refuting thoſe extravagant Whimſies he makes ſo much noiſe about, to prove that the Pentateuch was written by a Samaritan Prieſt. They are ſo weak and pitiful that they deſerve no body's Conſideration, and indeed if ſuch Reaſonings were to be allowed, I don't know one ſingle Book in the World which might not upon as good Grounds be taken away from the true Author, and beſtowed upon another. From hence we may ſee, of what ill conſequence it is to give ones Imagination too large a Scope, and miſtake bare Conjectures for eternal Truths.

[h] They would only prove, that the ſame thing has happened to the Books of Moſes, which has almoſt happened to all the ancient Authors, viz. That ſome few Words, Names, and Terms, have been added or altered to render the Narrative more intelligible.] If one examines all theſe Objections that I have already anſwered, he will be convinced they prove no more, and that one might have anſwered almoſt all of them by this very Remark. Mr. Simon, who cannot contradict me in this Point, is mighty deſirous to ſet upon me another way, by objecting, that in my Preface, and other places of my Book, I have laid down Rules which ſeem to prove from theſe Additions, that the Pentateuch is a ſuppoſititious Work: For it ſeems I had affirmed in the firſt part of my Preface, That impoſtors for the moſt part relate Matters of Fact that happened after the Death of thoſe whom they ſpeak of, and they give an Account of Cities and People that were not known in the time of thoſe Authors whoſe Names they aſſume. From whence Mr. Simon draws this Conſequence, that ſince I own there are ſeveral ſuch Additions in the Pentateuch, a Diſciple of Spinoſa may thence conclude, that according to my Rule 'tis a ſuppoſititious Work. To this I anſwer, that this Objection of Mr. Simon ſhews, that he has not ſo great a ſhare of good Senſe, and cloſeneſs of Arguing, as he has Rabbinical Learning For if he had only conſidered the General Remark which I made in my Preface about the Rules of Criticiſm there laid together, he could not have been guilty of ſo manifeſt a Soleciſm as this. I deſire him to mind theſe Words a little: A Man may ſay, that all theſe Rules which I have here laid down, are convincing and probable in different degrees, but that the Sovereign and Principle Rule is the Judgment of Equity and Prudence, which inſtructs us to ballance the Reaſons of this and t'other ſide, in diſtinctly conſidering the Conjectures that are made of both ſides. Now this is the General Rule of Rational Criticiſm, and we abuſe all the reſt if we don't chiefly make uſe of this. Let us now apply it to the preſent Queſtion. There are in the Pentateuch ſome Terms, and Names of Cities, and other Paſſages that could not come from Moſes; muſt we therefore haſtily conclude, that it was not written by Moſes, becauſe 'tis a certain ſign that a Book is ſpurious, when one finds ſuch Occurrences in it, as have happen'd after the Death of the Author to whom it is attributed, and becauſe we there meet with ſome Names of Cities and People that were not known in his time? Or on the other hand, Does it follow, becauſe the Pentateuch was writ by Moſes, notwithſtanding ſome Additions which are there to be found, does it I ſay thence follow, that the above-mentioned Rule is falſe? Theſe two Conſequences are very indiſcreetly drawn, but the Rule is ſtill good, and the Books of the Pentateuch may yet be written by Moſes. The Rule is good, but we ought to make a good uſe of it. When there are no certain Proofs of the Antiquity of a Book, and beſides there are other Conjectures to incline us to doubt of it, we may in purſuance to this Rule, conclude it ſpurious. But when it is paſt Diſpute that ſuch a Book is written by ſuch an Author, and there is an infinite number of evident Arguments to demonſtrate the truth of it; then we are neceſſarily to conclude, that theſe Words, and Terms, and Names, were afterwards added. After all, where there are Reaſons on one ſide, as well as on the other, we ought carefully to ballance them, to weigh one againſt the other, and at laſt to determine the matter on that ſide, where the greateſt appearance of probability lies. Theſe are the true Rules of Criticiſm, which it ſeems Mr. Simon is ignorant of, or at leaſt does not rightly examine, otherwiſe he could never have forgot himſelf ſo far, as to accuſe me wrongfully for giving favourable Rules to the Diſciples of Spinoſa. The fault is by no means to be imputed to theſe Rules, which almoſt every Critick has given before me, but 'tis his way of Arguing, and drawing of Inferences that has been favourable to the Spinoſiſts. His Conjectures, and Objections, and in ſhort his Hypotheſis, has ſerved to confirm thoſe Perſons in their Errors, beſides that ſeveral places of his Book give the greateſt Blow imaginable to the Authority of the Holy Scripture; When he asks me, What anſwer I will return to a Spinoſiſt, who to prove that the Pentateuch was not written by Moſes, ſhall uſe my own Reaſons to ſhew that the Liturgy of St. James, as 'tis commonly received by the Oriental Nations, was not made by him? I will anſwer him, that there are not the ſame Reaſons to induce a Man to believe that St. James was the Author of that Liturgy, which goes under his Name, as that the Books of Moſes were written by him: That this was never affirmed in any of the Epiſtles of the Apoſtles, that the Ancients never ſpeak of it, that this Liturgy does not agree with the Diſcipline that was in uſe in St. James's time. Whereas the Scripture informs me that Moſes was Author of the Pentateuch, and Jeſus Chriſt and his Apoſtles have aſſured me of the truth of it, and all the ancient Writers have teſtified ſo much, beſides the Univerſal Agreement of all People in this matter. 'Tis therefore a manifeſt Injuſtice and Calumny in Mr. Simon to accuſe me for deſigning to deſtroy the Books of Moſes, under a pretence of defending them againſt the Spinoſiſts.

Nor does Mr. Simon reaſon better in applying what I have ſaid with regard to the Book of Joſhuah, to the Books of the Pentateuch; 'tis but comparing the Arguments I brought to prove that the Books of the Pentateuch belonged to Moſes, with thoſe that are commonly produced to prove that the Book of Joſhuah was written by Joſhuah, and any Man will ſoon perceive the mighty difference between one and the other, and that the Reaſons that are alledged in favour of Moſes, are infinitely ſtronger than thoſe that are urged to prove that Joſhuah compoſed the Book that bears his Name. No Man ever yet doubted that the Pentateuch was written by Moſes, but 'tis not the ſame caſe with the Book of Joſhuah. Mr. Simon ſuppoſeth there is as much evidence for one, as the other; in order to prove this, he imagines that all thoſe former places of Scripture that are produced to ſhew that Moſes was Author of the Pentateuch, reduce themſelves to this Head, viz. That Moſes wrote the Law; and he pretends there is the ſame reaſon to affirm, that Joſhuah added the Book of his Hiſtory to the Books of the Law. But if any one will give himſelf the trouble to conſider the paſſages that are to be found in the Notes (b) and (c), he will be perſwaded that they are very poſitive as well as numerous, and don't lie in ſo narrow a compaſs as thoſe which are brought in behalf of Joſhuah: Beſides, 'tis but reading the 24th Chapter of the Book of Joſhuah, where we find this laſt paſſage, and we ſhall ſee that it may be very well underſtood of the Moral and Ceremonial Precepts that are mentioned in that place. From hence it evidently appears, that there's a vaſt difference between the Reaſons that prove Moſes to be the Author of the Pentateuch, and thoſe that ſeem to intimate that Joſhuah compoſed the Book which contains this Hiſtory; and that a Man without incurring the guilt of raſhneſs, may doubt whether he

he is the Author of that Book; but that he cannot doubt whether Moſes wrote the Pentateuch, without being guilty of that crime to the higheſt degree. At the ſame time I will not abſolutely deny that Joſhuah was Author of the Book that carries his Name; I have only obſerved, that it is not abſolutely certain, and 'tis an eaſie matter to take notice, that I rather incline to that Party which aſſigns it to Joſhuah.

(i) We don't certainly know when theſe Books were written by Moſes.] Some ſay that Geneſis was written by Moſes, after the departure out of Egypt; ſo Pererius and Tena. 'Tis moſt probable, that all of them were written after the departure out of Egypt, and particularly that Geneſis was compoſed after the Promulgation of the Law. This is the Opinion of Euſebius and the Ancients, and indeed we find in Geneſis ſeveral Alluſions to the Law; as for example, in Chap. 2. there is mention made of the Law of the Sabbath; and in the 7th and 8th Chapters of clean and unclean Beaſts: Which are ſufficient Intimations that Moſes wrote thoſe things, when his Thoughts were full of the Law then newly made. Deuteronomy is the laſt, for beſides that it is a Repetition of what we find in the Law, it plainly tells us, that Moſes ſpoke thoſe things to the People of Iſrael when they were ready to go over Jordan. To this we may add, that he there relates whatever happen'd towards the end of his Life; and laſtly, that the Account of his Death is inſerted there, as being his laſt Work.

(k) Though 'tis commonly believed that this Book was written by Joſhuah.] Moſt of the Modern Writers are of this Opinion, as was alſo Iſidore in the 6th Book of his Origines, Junilius, and Dorotheus, Vatablus, Abulenſis, Driedo, and Bellarmine ſay the ſame, as do likewiſe the Talmudiſts Babatra, c. 1. This Opinion is chiefly ſupported by theſe Words in the laſt Chapter, Verſ. the 26th, where it is ſaid, that Joſhuah wrote all theſe things in the Book of the Law of God. However, this paſſage may have a relation only to what is written in this Chapter, or elſe perhaps Joſhuah might have written another Book, of which this was an Abridgment. 'Tis ſaid in Eccleſiaſticus, Chap. 46. that Joſhuah was the Succeſſor of Moſes in Prophecies; But this does not prove that he wrote any thing. Theodoret aſſures us, that the Book of Joſhuah is nothing elſe but an Extract out of the Book of Jaſher, which is mention'd in the 10th Chapter, Verſe 13.

The Reaſons that are brought to prove that this Book was not written by Joſhuah, are generally theſe. In the firſt place, ſay they, it is obſerved there in the 10th Chapter, Verſe 13. that the Book of Jaſhar, where the Wars of Joſhuah were written, is quoted, therefore the Book of Joſhuah is later. 2. We meet there this faſhion of ſpeaking, Uſque in præſentem diem, unto this day, frequently repeated: As for inſtance, when it's ſaid in the 4th Chap. Verſe 9. That the twelve Stones which Joſhuah took out of the midſt of Jordan, continue there unto this day. And in the 5th Chap. Verſe 9. The name of the place is called Gilgal, unto this day. 3. The taking of the City of Lachiſh is related Chap. 10. Verſe 35. thô it happen'd not till after the Death of Joſhuah, as we may ſee, Judges, Chapter 18. Verſe 19. So likewiſe, Chap. 11. Verſ. 14. and the following, there is an account of Caleb and his Daughter Achſah, which paſſage did not fall out till after the Death of Joſhuah, as it is written in the firſt Chapter of the Book of Judges. In the ſame Chapter, Verſe 28. there is mention made of the Land of Cabul, which received this Name from Hiram King of Tyre, as we may find it in the 9th Chapter of the firſt Book of Kings. Laſtly, in the 9th Chapter, Verſe 23. and the laſt, it is ſaid, That Joſhuah made the Gibeonites Drawers of Waters and Hewers of Wood in the Houſe of his God, which is probably to be underſtood of the Temple, that was not built long after the death of Joſhuah. Theſe Arguments are not wholly unanſwerable. Firſt, We don't know what manner of Book the Book of Jaſher was; 'tis not ſaid that all the Wars of Joſhuah were ſet down there, but only the relation of the Sun's ſtanding ſtill. Some think that Geneſis is there called the Book of Jaſher, where, as they pretend, this memorable Event was foretold. Others believe 'tis the Pentateuch; Grotius ſays, it was a Song compoſed upon that occaſion. Huetius ſuppoſes that it is a Book of Morality. Laſtly, others imagine it to have been a Book of Annals. If this laſt Opinion were the only true one, yet it by no means follows, that Joſhuah was not Author of that Book where theſe Annals are quoted. Secondly, Suppoſing that Joſhuah wrote this Book towards the end of his Life, as is moſt reaſonable to think he did, when he had occaſion to ſpeak of thoſe things that happen'd at the beginning of his Miniſtry, he might very well make uſe of that Expreſſion, Uſque in præſentem diem, unto this day, even as St. Matthew himſelf, who wrote a little after the Death of our Bleſſed Saviour, tells us, that the Field Aceldama was called, The Field of Blood unto this day. Theſe, and the following Objections, may be anſwered, by ſaying, that theſe things have been added ſince, and particularly the taking of the City of Lachiſh by the Danites: Or at leaſt we may ſay that the City of Lachiſh, mentioned in Joſhuah, is a different place from Laiſh in the Book of Judges. The ſecond Objection may be anſwered by ſaying, That whatever is ſaid concerning Othoniel and Achſa in the Book of Judges, is only a Recapitulation of what happened in the time of Joſhuah. The Land of Cabul, mentioned in Joſhuah, is different from that in the Book of Kings: Joſephus has diſtinguiſhed them; one is a Country, the other a Village. The Houſe of God, mentioned in the Ninth Chapter, may be underſtood well enough of the Tabernacle and Ark, which was in the time of Joſhuah.

(l) Be it as it will, the Book of Judges is ancient.] To prove that this Book was not compoſed till after the Captivity, they commonly inſtance in theſe words in Chap. 18. Verſe 30, 31. Until the day of the Captivity of the Land; and in theſe, In thoſe days there was no King in Iſrael. Words, ſay they, which demonſtrate that this Book was written after the Captivity, and in the time when they had Kings in Iſrael. But the Captivity ſpoken of in this place, is not that of Babylon, but the Captivity that happened in the time of Heli, when the Ark was taken by the Philiſtines, and the Idol of Micah was deſtroyed, as it is obſerved in this place of the Book of Judges. And as for theſe words, In thoſe days there was no King in Iſrael, they don't neceſſarily ſuppoſe that there were any when this Author lived, and perhaps they were added by Ezrah.

(m) Which has made Men think, that the Books of Samuel were written by that Prophet.] This Opinion is not certain, becauſe Chap. 9. Verſe 9. it is ſaid, That he that is now called a Prophet, was before-time called a Seer, which Samuel could not ſay. In the fifth Chapter, Verſe the fifth, the Author of this Book, relating the Hiſtory of the taking of the Ark, tells us, that the Prieſts of Dagon did not tread upon the Threſhold of Dagon unto this day. But this might well enough be ſaid by Samuel, becauſe that happen'd when he was young, and he wrote not this Book till towards the end of his Life.

(n) Ezrah ſpeaks there in the firſt Perſon.] He ſpeaks of himſelf in the firſt Perſon, Ezrah, Chap. 7. Verſe 27, and 28. God hath extended his Mercy towards me before the King, and I, &c. And Chap. 9. Verſe 5. I fell upon my Knees, and ſpread out my Hands.

(o) The Conjecture of Huetius is not ſo ſtrong as to make us quit the common Opinion.] He ſays, that the Author of the ſix firſt Chapters was at Jeruſalem in the time of Darius, as it appears by theſe words in the fifth Chapter, ad quod reſpondimus eis quæ eſſent nomina. Now Ezrah came not to that City till after Darius's Reign under that of Artaxerxes, as is eaſily proved by the beginning of the ſeventh Chapter. But 'tis no hard matter to refute this Conjecture, by obſerving that when Ezrah ſaid, Reſpondimus eis, he only ſpoke in the Name of the Jews; and 'tis an uſual thing with the Hiſtorians of any Nation to cry, We did ſuch or ſuch a thing, although the Hiſtorian had no ſhare in the doing it.

(p) The ſecond Book is conſtantly attributed to Nehemiah.] He begins thus, The Words of Nehemiah; and after the ſame manner, Herodotus, Thucydides, and Timæus, &c. begin their Works, not to mention the Prophets. The Author of Eccleſiaſticus ſpeaks of the Actions of Nehemiah, Chap. 40. and the Author of the ſecond Book of the Maccabees commends his Writings.

(q) 'Tis commonly believed, that Tobit and Tobias wrote their own Hiſtory.] This Opinion is principally founded upon the Angels commanding them in the 12th Chapter, Verſe 20. Narrate omnia mirabilia ejus. In the Greek Interpreter it is γεγράπται, that is, Write all his wonderful Works. Secondly, becauſe in the Greek and Hebrew Editions they ſpeak of themſelves in the firſt Perſon.

(r) The time wherein the Hiſtory of Judith happen'd is no leſs uncertain.] Some ſay this Hiſtory happen'd before the Captivity, and prove it, firſt, becauſe it is ſaid in this Book, that it happen'd a little after the City of Ecbatana was built by Arphaxad King of the Medes. Now that City, according to Euſebius and Herodotus, was built by Dejoces, who lived a long time before the Captivity. Secondly, King Nebuchadnezzar, who ſent Holofernes into Judea, reigned in Ninive, which City was deſtroyed before the Captivity of Babylon. Thirdly, This Nebuchadnezzar, they tell us, is Saoſduchinus, Grandſon of Sennacherib, and Son of Aſſaradon King of the Babylonians, who gave the Name of Nebuchadnezzar to their King. Fourthly, They ſay that Eliachim, or Joachim, was High-Prieſt under Manaſſes, as we may ſee in the 22d Chapter of Iſaiah. Thoſe who are of the contrary Opinion, return the following Anſwers to theſe Conjectures. To the firſt they reply, That Ecbatana was ſeveral times rebuilt. To the ſecond, That Ninive was reſtored to its ancient Splendor by the Kings of Perſia. To the third, That the Name of Nebuchadnezzar was common to the Kings of Babylon and Aſſyria. To the fourth, That Eliachim, of whom mention is made in Iſaiah, and in the ſecond Book of Kings, Chap. 18. was not High-Prieſt. The Reaſons which they alledge for this Opinion are as follows: Firſt, That this Hiſtory happen'd at a time when there were no Kings at Jeruſalem, and the High-Prieſts had the whole Authority in their Hands: Now this was not before the Captivity. Secondly, We read that there was one Eliachim, or Joachim, High-Prieſt after the Captivity. Thirdly, Achior, Prince of the Edomites, being ask'd by Holofernes, Chap. 5. Verſe 3. Who the People of Iſrael were? He tells him, That they were lately carried away Captives into a ſtrange Land, but now poſſeſſed the City Jeruſalem. Et plurimi eorum captivy abducti ſunt in terram non ſuam, nuper autem reverſi ad Dominum Deum ſuum, ex diſperſione quâ diſperſi erant adunati ſunt, & aſcenderunt Montana hæc omnia, & iterum poſſident Jeruſalem. And in the Greek it is added, Καὶ ὁ ναὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀυτῶν ἐφωδιάσθη εἰς Ἐδαφος. Et Templum Dei eorum factum eſt in ſolum. Words that ſhew, that this paſſage ought to be underſtood of the Captivity, and Deſtruction of the Temple. Laſtly, They add, that it is ſaid in the 16th Chapter that Judith, who lived an Hundred and five Years, ſaw no more War in Iſrael; and in the 8th Chapter, that when ſhe went to find out Holofernes, ſhe was young and beautiful. Hence they ſay it evidently follows, that this Hiſtory did not happen during the Reign of Manaſſes, becauſe from the War which Pharoah Necho made in the time of King Joſiah, it was but Forty five or Forty ſix Years to the Captivity, ſo that by this account ſhe muſt have been Sixty four Years old, when ſhe went to meet Holofernes, which is by no means probable. Theſe Reaſons, I confeſs, are not unanſwerable; but however, this Opinion ſeems to me to be moſt agreeable to Truth. The greateſt part of the Proteſtant Criticks, as Luther, Chytræus, Beroaldus, Scaliger, and Grotius, believe that this Hiſtory is a Fiction, or Allegory, which Grotius has very handſomely explained; but this is a raſh Opinion, and ought not to be followed.

(ſ) The time and Author of the Hiſtory of Heſter are ſtill uncertain.] Scaliger aſſures us that it happened under Xerxes. Firſt he ſays, that the Name of Aſſuerus, in Greek Ὀξυάρης, reſembles that of Xerxes: That Xerxes's Queen, whoſe Name is Ameſtris according to Herodotus, is the ſame with Heſter: That the Feaſt whereof mention mention is made in this Book, is that which is related by the ſame Hiſtorian, which Xerxes made before his Expedition againſt Greece. This Opinion is eaſily confuted, becauſe from hence it would follow, that Heſter was very old when ſhe was married to Xerxes, and that her Uncle Mordecai was an Hundred and ſixty years old; for being one of thoſe who were carried away Captives into Babylon in the time of King Jeconiah, when he was Ten Years old, if we thereto add the Seventy Years of Captivity, and the Years of the Kings of Perſia after Cyrus, it will by the leaſt Computation make up an Hundred and fifty Years. Secondly, Ameſtris was Married to Xerxes a long time before his Expedition into Greece, as it appears by the joint Teſtimonies of Herodotus and Cteſias. The Father of Ameſtris was Onophes a Perſian, and no Jew. In ſhort, that Queen was ill-natured and cruel. The Opinion of thoſe, who place this Hiſtory under Artaxerxes, is confuted by the ſame reaſon that is urged againſt the former; for 'tis preciſely ſaid in the ſecond Chapter, Verſ. 6. that Mordecai was of the number of thoſe who were carried away by the King of Babylon along with Jeconiah. The third Opinion of thoſe, who believe it was Cyaxares, is no leſs improbable. For firſt of all, the King who is mentioned in that Book, is called King of the Perſians, and not of the Medes. Secondly, It is ſaid that he Ruled from India to Æthiopia; now the Medes were never ſo powerful. Thirdly, Ahaſuerus commonly reſided in the City of Suſa, which as Solinus, Diodorus, and Plutarch teſtifie, was the place of reſidence of the Kings of Perſia, and not of the Median Kings. Laſtly, it could not happen under Cyaxerxes the Father of Aſtyages, as the Authors of this Opinion are agreed. As for Cyaxaris, who is ſuppoſed to be the Son of Aſtyages, he is altogether unknown to Herodotus, and other ancient Hiſtorians. None mention him but Xenophon, and all the World knows he is no exact Hiſtorian in his Cyropædia. So that after all, the Opinion of thoſe who believe that Ahaſuerus was the ſame with Darius the Son of Hiſtaſpes, as it is by far the moſt probable, ſo it carries no difficulty with it. The firſt Reaſon alledged againſt the other Opinions, makes it evident that it could not be any of the Perſian Kings after Darius; and as for what is ſaid of him in this Book, that he Ruled from India to Æthiopia, it excludes all the Kings before Cambyſes, and at the ſame time excludes Cambyſes himſelf, who never conquered Egypt, and conſequently belongs to none but Darius. It is ſaid there that Ahaſuerus reſided in the City of Suſa, which agrees very well with Darius the Son of Hiſtaſpes, becauſe as Ælian has obſerved, that King built himſelf a Palace in that City; and beſides Herodotus adds, that he kept his Treaſure there. The ſame Hiſtorian tells us, that he paſſionately loved one of his Wives, whom he calls Artiſſone, and that he put a Diadem upon her Head. This paſſage ſuits mightily with the Hiſtory of Heſter, and the Name too bears ſome Conformity, for Heſter is likewiſe called Hadaſſa. King Ahaſuerus made all the Iſles of the Sea Tributary to him. Now according to Thucydides, Darius the Son of Hiſtaſpes conquered them, as it is alſo obſerved by Plato in his Menexenus, and after him none of the Perſian Kings brought them under their Command. They object, That Ahaſuerus was deſcended of the Perſian Kings, as it appears in the 16th Chapter, whereas Darius was the Son of Hiſtaſpes, who was no King. But Herodotus aſſures us, that he was of the Royal Family. They likewiſe tell us, that it is witten in the ſame Chapter that Haman would have tranſlated the Empire to the Macedonians. Now, ſay they, the Macedonians were not known till a long while after the time of Darius. Some People ſay, that Haman was no Macedonian, and that in ſtead of Μακεδὼν, we ought to read Ἀμαληκίτην, becauſe he was of the Race of Agag, but this Conjecture is not ſolid. Anſwer, The Hiſtory of Heſter could not happen after this King, as we have already ſhewn, and the contrary Opinion is very weak. It was Natural for Haman, who was a Macedonian, to endeavour to Tranſlate the Empire to his own Nation, which was very Famous and Powerful at this time, as Juſtin has informed us. Laſtly, they ſay, That Ahaſuerus is alſo called Artaxerxes in the 16th Chapter; Now there were but three Kings of that Name, viz. one Sirnamed Longimanus, another Mnemon, and the laſt Ochus. Ahaſuerus therefore was one of theſe three. Anſwer, Artaxerxes is a Name that might perhaps be given to all the Kings of Perſia, as Cæſar to all the Roman Emperors.

(t) The greateſt part make Mordecai the Author of it.] It ſeems that Mordecai was the Author of this Book, by Chap. 9. Verſ. 20. and 23. and by Chap. 12. Verſ. 4. where it is ſaid, That he wrote down all that happened. In the Septuagint, Chap. 9. Heſter is joyned to Mordecai, which made Serrarius, and ſome others, believe, that Heſter and Mordecai compoſed it together. Thoſe that pretend it was done by the Synagogue, draw their Conjecture from hence, becauſe the Original and Ceremonies of the Feaſt of the Jews, called Purim, are there largely deſcribed, upon which occaſion the Book ſeems to have been written.

(u) The Author of the Book, that recounts the Hiſtory of Job, is no leſs uncertain.] Thoſe that attribute it to Job ground their Opinion chiefly upon this, that he twice wiſhes in the 19th and 31ſt Chapters, that his Words were written down: But 'tis eaſie to obſerve, that he does not here ſpeak of an ordinary Book, and that 'tis only a Figure, to ſhew how well he was ſatisfied of the Truth of them. Quis mihi tribuat ut ſcribantur Sermones mei: Quis mei det ut exarentur in libro Stylo ferreo, & plumbi laminâ, vel certè ſculpantur in ſilice? Thoſe that make Moſes the Tranſlator of it, as particularly the Author of one of the Commentaries upon Job, commonly aſcribed to Origen, does ſay, That he Tranſlated it out of the Arabick or Syriack. The Talmudiſts and Rabbins make Moſes the Author of it; and this is likewiſe the Opinion of the Author of the ſecond Commentary upon Job, attributed to Origen, of Methodius in Photius, of Polychronius, of Julianus Halicarnaſſeus in the Catena, and of Nicetas upon Job. St. Jerome alſo ſeems to be of the ſame Judgment. The only

Reaſon

Reaſon they alledge to ſupport this Opinion, is the reſemblance of the Style, but for my part, I profeſs I cannot find it out. The Style of the Book of Job is Figurative, Poetical, Obſcure, and full of Sentences. One finds there an infinite number of Arabick or Syriack Terms, and 'tis extreamly different from the Style of the Pentateuch. Origen rejects the Opinion. Tom. 5. in Johannem, where he formall denies that Moſes wrote any other Books beſides the Pentateuch. St. Gregory, who attributes it to Salomon, brings nothing to prove this conjecture of his. Thoſe that aſcribe it to Jeremiah, juſtifie themſelves by the Conformity of the Style, and the Syriack Words that occur ſo frequently there. Coducus makes an Edomitiſh Prophet Author of it, but upon very frivolous idle Surmiſes. Some attribute it to the Captive Jews in Babylon, without any Foundation, ſo that we can ſay nothing of the Author of this Book, but that he is altogether unknown.

(x) Who ſay that the Hiſtory of Job is wholly feigned.] This is the Opinion of the Talmudiſts, of Maimonides, and ſeveral Rabbins; but Ezekiel, ch. 14. v. 14. Tobit, ch. 2. v. 12. and St. James in his Epiſtle, ſpeaks of him as a Man that really was. The proper Names of Job, of his Friends, of his Country, of the Number of his Children, ſerve to ſhew that it is a true Hiſtory. St. Cyprian in his Treatiſe of Patience, St. Jerome in his Ep. 103. St Baſil, Homily the 4th, St. Auſtin in his Sermon 103. and all the Fathers, ſpeak of him after this manner. 'Tis alledged againſt this Opinion, that the proper Names of this Book have Myſtick Significations; That Job ſignifies a Man in Grief; עץ, Counſel; Zophar, one that is Watchful; Eliphaz, the Law of God; Elihu, God himſelf. To this it is anſwered, That moſt Hebrew Names have ſuch ſort of Significations. All the other Objections only prove, That this Hiſtory is deliver'd Poetically. This is really true in this Hiſtory, that there was a certain great Perſon named Job, who was reduced to the extremity of Miſery, by the loſs of his Goods. and his Children, heighten'd by a very ſevere fit of Sickneſs; that he ſupported himſelf under all theſe Afflictions with incredible Patience; and at laſt was reſtored to a proſperous Condition. Upon the occaſion of this remarkable Event, ſome one or other compoſed the Book of Job, the Diſcourſes of his Friends, the Anſwers of Job, &c.

(yz) Some Perſons make Job to have deſcended from Nahor the Brother of Abraham.) This is the Opinion of Bellarmine, who makes him the Grandſon of Nahor, and older than Moſes. He concludes, that 'tis probable he lived long, and that he lived not in Moſes's time, but he produces no Authorities to back this Opinion. Amongſt the Grand-Children of Eſau there is one called Jobab. which Name is eaſily formed into that of Job. Hence it is, that ſome People believe he was one of the Deſcendants of Eſau, and an Edomite. This is particularly obſerved in the Greek Addition, which is without queſtion very ancient, ſince Theodotion has acknowledged it. Grotius believes, that in Chap. 26. Verſ. 12. there is mention made of the Drowning of the Ægyptians in the Red Sea, but that is not certain. Caſtellio aſſures us, that in Chap. 28. Verſ. 28. there is a paſſage taken out of Deut. chap. 4. verſ. 56. but theſe two paſſages are different. The firſt is, Ecce timor Domini ipſa eſt Sapientia. The ſecond is, Hæc eſt enim vera Sapientia & Intellectus. Grotius adds, That this Book was written after David and Salomon, but before Ezekiel, pretending, that as it is quoted by that Prophet, ſo there are ſeveral paſſages in it drawn out of the Pſalms, and the Books of Salomon; but this is not evident, and it ſhould rather ſeem, that David and Salomon borrowed ſome of their Thoughts out of Job, although it is not neceſſary either to ſay one or the other.

(aa) 'Tis certain, as St. Jerome has obſerved, that all the Pſalms were not written by David.] St. Jerome, Epiſt. ad Cypr. Scimus errare eos qui Pſalmos omnes David arbitrantur, & non eorum, quorum nominibus Inſcripti ſunt. Epiſt. ad Sophronium. Pſalmos eorum Teſtamur Autorum, qui ponuntur in titulis; ſcilicet Aſaph, Idithum, filiorum Chore, Emon Eſraitæ, Moſes, Salomonis, & reliquorum quos Eſdras uno volumine comprehendit. This is alſo the Opinion of Origen, of St. Hilary, and the Author of the Abridgment attributed to St. Athanaſius. St. Auguſtine in his Expoſition of the Second Pſalm ſeems to be of that opinion: But in his Book of Hereſies, Hereſie the 26*th*, he takes the other Opinion to be the more probable of the two. Theodoret alſo is doubtful in the matter, as he teſtifies in his Preface upon the Pſalms. Some others of the Fathers ſeem to have been perſuaded, that they were all compoſed by David, as St. Chryſoſtome, Euthymius, Caſſiodorus, and particularly Philaſtrius, who in Hereſie the 126*th* reckons all thoſe for *Heretick*s that doubt the truth of it. Nevertheleſs it is very certain, that they were not all written by David, for in the firſt place, there are ſome of them that bear other names; and ſecondly, ſome paſſages are to be found there, which happened after David's death, as in Pſalm the 137th, where mention is made of the Captivity of the Jews in Babylon. One may obſerve the ſame thing in Pſalm the 64th and 124th.

(bb) It is difficult to name the Authors of them.] St. Jerome pretends, that theſe Pſalms belong to thoſe whoſe names they carry; but this is not certain. 'Tis believed, that the fifty next immediately after that carries for its Title the return of Haggai and Zechariah, were written by thoſe Prophets. The Author of the Abridgment, commonly attributed to St. Athanaſius, believes, that all the Pſalms entituled to David, ipſi David, are nevertheleſs done by ſome other hand. Our Bleſſed Saviour cites the hundred and tenth, Dixit Dominus, which is found to have that Title under the name of David, Matt. 22. v. 42. The hundred and thirty ſeventh Pſalm carries the name of David and Jeremiah, τω Δαβιδ Ιερεμιε, which makes it apparently thus to be underſtood. A Pſalm of Jeremiah compoſed in imitation of David. The 64th Pſalm, in the Vulgar Tranſlation, bears the name of Iſaac and of Ezekiel; the 70th that of the Sons of Jonadab dah, and the chief Captives. The Jews make Salomon the Author of the 92d, and of ſeveral others. Origen ſays, that the 90th was compoſed by Moſes, whoſe name it bears; and the Jews tells us, he made it upon the occaſion of a Sedition that happened amongſt the Children of Iſrael, upon the return of thoſe that were ſent to diſcover the Land of Promiſe. St. Jerome is of the ſame opinion. The ten following Pſalms are alſo attributed to Moſes, not only by the Jews, but even by St. Hillary and Jerome. This cannot poſſibly hold true of the 99th, where mention is made of Samuel. Some of the Rabbies attribute the 92d, to Adam, as the Talmudiſts do ſome to ſeveral of the ancient Patriarchs. There is a Greek Pſalm, which is not of the number of the 150 attributed to David, but written by ſome Helleniſt who has borrowed it out of David, Iſaiah, and Ezekiel.

(cc) They have been cited as Books inſpired by God both in the Old and New Teſtament.] The 105th, the 96th, and the 136th Pſalms are to be found in the 16th Chapter of the Firſt Book of Chronicles, and in the 7th of the Second Book it is ſaid, that the Prieſts did ſing the Pſalms which David had compoſed for the Lord, ſinging, For his mercy endureth for ever. This is the 136th Pſalm, which is yet to be found quoted in Chapters 5, and 20, of the ſame Book, in the 3d of Ezrah, in the 13th of Judith, in the 33d of Jeremiah, and the 3d of Daniel, [according to their Computation, who eſteem the Song of the Three Children to be part of the Canonical Scripture.] In Eccleſiaſticus, Ch. 47. v. 9. it is ſaid that David praiſed God with all his Heart, and ſet Singers before the Altar, In quorum ſono dulces fecit modos. I have not leiſure to ſpeak of thoſe many paſſages in the Prophets which allude to ſeveral places in the Pſalms. In the Second of Maccabees, Ch. 2. v. 13. there is mention made of the Pſalms of David; St. Matthew, Ch. 13. v. 35. and 27. v. 35. recites the Prophecies about our Bleſſed Saviour, contained in the Pſalms. Jeſus Chriſt himſelf cites the Pſalm Dixit Dominus, &c. under the name of David; and in St. Luke, Ch. 24. it is ſaid, that all things muſt be fulfilled which were written in the Law of Moſes, and in the Prophets, and in the Pſalms concerning him: The Acts, and the Epiſtles of the Apoſtles, are full of Citations out of the Pſalms.

(dd) Grotius has pretended upon ſlight conjectures it was compoſed by Zorobabel.] This Opinion is not ſupported by any ſolid Reaſon. He ſays, that the Shepherd mentioned towards the end of the laſt Chapter is Zorobabel, and his Son Abiud, but he brings no Proofs to recommend this Opinion. They commonly object when they would prove that this Book was not written by Salomon, that there are abundance of Chaldee words to be found in it, that are only to be met in Daniel, Ezrah, &c. but perhaps theſe words might be in faſhion amongſt the Jews towards the end of Salomon's Reign, or it may be they were added ſince. One might alſo object this paſſage of Ch. 2. v. 8. Os regis obſerva, which makes it credible that it is not a King that ſpeaks; but we ought to read obſerva, as it is in the Septuagint. [It looks alſo a little ſtrange that Salomon ſhould ſo often ſay, that he did ſo or ſo, above all that were before him in Jeruſalem (Eccleſ. 1. 16. 2. 7. 9.) ſince his Father David was the firſt King that ever Reigned in Jeruſalem.]

(ee) This Book of Wiſdom is commonly attributed to Salomon.] This is St. Cyprian's Opinion in his Book of Morality, of St. Auguſtine in his ſecond Book of the Chriſtian Doctrine, Ch. 8. The ancient Verſions, the Rabbins, Origen, St. Chryſoſtome, St. Clement of Alexandria, St. Cyprian have likewiſe attributed it to Salomon. The moſt ancient Fathers call the Proverbs, The Wiſdom of Salomon.

(ff.) St. Jerome ſays, he ſaw in his time an Hebrew Copy.] Munſter and Fagius ſtill make mention of an Hebrew Copy of this Book: Buxtorf tells us, he ſaw one that was Printed at Conſtantinople, but 'tis probable that that Text was made upon the Greek.

(gg) Some of the Ancients have attributed this Work to Salomon.] St. Cyprian and St. Ambroſe have cited it under his name. St. Hilary teſtifies, that ſeveral Perſons in his time attributed it to him. This Opinion is impoſſible to be maintained, not only becauſe we know who is the Author, but alſo becauſe in Ch. 47. there is mention made of the Prophets that lived after Salomon. Euſebius, St Jerome, the Author of the Abridgment attributed to Athanaſius. St. Epiphanius, St. Chryſoſtom, St. Auſtin, Cæſarius of Arles, and many others, have acknowledged the true Author of it, who was Jeſus the Son of Syrach. St. Jerome ſays, he lived under the High Prieſt Simon the Son of Onias the Second, and that he wrote this Book after the Verſion of the Septuagint, or at leaſt, that he lived in their time: And firſt he proves it by the Preface of his Grandſon, who ſays he collected theſe Books of his Grandfather in the time of Ptolomy Euergetes, who immediately ſucceeded Ptolomy Philadelphus. Secondly, becauſe he commends the High Prieſt Simon the Juſt, Son of Onias the Firſt, Ch. 50. and afterwards the Tranſlator praiſes Jeſus the Son of Sirach, as one that lived in the time of that High Prieſt. Thirdly, becauſe, Ch. 2. he ſeems to ſpeak of the Perſecution, which the Jews ſuffered under Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, and in the firſt year of Ptolomy Philadelphus. Huetius believes, that Joſeph the Son of Syrach is the ſame with a certain Jew named Ben Sira, who has written the Proverbs in Hebrew, but this Opinion does not appear to be well grounded.

(hh) The Son of one Amos, whom we muſt not confound with the Prophet that bears this name.] The name of the Prophet is Amos, and that of the Father of Iſaiah, is Amots. The firſt was a Shepherd, the ſecond was of Royal Extraction. The firſt lived in the time of Uzziah King of Judah, the later is more ancient. St. Jerome in Ch. 1. Iſaiæ, St. Auſtin in the 18th Book De Civitate Dei, Ch. 27. St. Cyril in his Preface upon Amos, and others, have diſtinguiſhed between theſe two. Clemens Alexandrinus, l. 1. Strom. the Author of the Life and Death of the Prophets, attributed to St. Epiphanius, and the Rabbins, have confounded them. St. Jerome tells us, that the Father of Iſaiah was Father-in-law to Manaſſes.

(ii) By whoſe Command, they ſay, he was cruelly put to death, and ſawn aſunder with a Wooden Saw.] This is a common Tradition amongſt the Jews, and is confirmed by the Teſtimonies of Tertullian. St. Jerome, and St. Baſil.

(kk) The

(kk) The Conjectures they bring to prove it are very frivolous.] They ſay, that the Prophecy of Iſaiah does not begin before the 6th Chapter, when, after he has ſaid that he held his Tongue, he ſays, I heard a voice of the Lord, ſaying, whom ſhall I ſend? In the ſecond place they pretend, that what he ſays in the firſt Chapter concerning the deſolation of Judah, does not at all agree with the Reign of Uzziah, and therefore 'tis not the beginning of his Prophecy. Thirdly, we don't find, ſay they, in this Book, the Life and Actions of Uzziah that were written by Iſaiah, as we are informed in the Chronicles. Fourthly, Iſaiah propheſied alſo under Manaſſes, but there are no Prophecies under his Name, that have any Relation to the Reign of that King. Fifthly, the order of things frequently reverſed as well in Iſaiah, as in the other Prophets. Anſwer. To the firſt Objection we return this anſwer, That the Prophet does not ſay, he had as yet wrote nothing, but only that he tarried a long time without writing, and at laſt God commanded him to write. 'Tis believed, he wrote this in the laſt year of King Uzziah. To the ſecond we reply, That he might foretel a future deſolation, even at a time before it happened. Tis an eaſie matter to anſwer the Third, by ſaying, that the Book of the Actions of Uzziah mentioned in the Chronicles, is different from that of his Prophecies. In order to anſwer the fourth, it ſufficeth to obſerve, that it is no where ſaid, that Iſaiah wrote thoſe things which he propheſied under Manaſſes. Laſtly, as for the fifth, we ſay, that we ought not to expect a continued Hiſtorical ſtyle from the Prophets. On the contrary, their Prophecies are generally written without connexion and order. There was formerly another Prophecy of Jeremiah mentioned by Origen, where theſe words were to be found, Appenderunt mercedem meam, &c, The Nazarens made uſe of it, as St. Jerome teſtifies in cap. Matth. 27.

(ll) We don't certainly know at what time.] Some are of Opinion, that Baruch went not to Babylon till after the death of his Maſter Jeremiah, to whom he was too far engaged ever to quit him, and they confirm this Opinion by the 2d Verſe, where mention is made of the burning of Jeruſalem. Others ſay, he wrote his Book before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, becauſe he there ſpeaks of Sacrifices and Conſecrated Veſſels, which makes them believe, that he was one of thoſe that were deputed in the fourth year of Zedekiah, of whom Saraiah the Brother of Baruch was chief. They affirm therefore, that having carried the Book of Iſaiah thither, he compoſed his Prophecy the year following to comfort the Captives, and that the fifth year after the taking of Jeruſalem, which is mentioned in the ſecond Verſe, ought to be computed from the Captivity of Jechoniah.

(mm) Which ſeems to be confirmed by a certain paſſage in his Book.] In the firſt Chapter, verſe 3. Et ait rex Aſphenes præpoſito Eunuchorum ··· fuerunt ergo inter eos Daniel, &c. Origen and St. Jerome are of this Opinion. The Author of the Life and Death of the Prophets attributed to St. Epiphanius, and the falſe Dorotheus, are of the contrary opinion.

(nn) The truth and antiquity of the two laſt Chapters, that contain the Hiſtory of Suſanna and of Bel, are mightily doubted.] Africanus, Euſebius, and Apollinarius, reject both theſe Stories as fabulous, and maintain, they were not written by Daniel, but that they make a part of the Prophecy of Habakkuk. St. Jerome ſeems to be of this opinion in his Preface upon Daniel. Origen has defended the truth of this Hiſtory, without being willing to affirm that it was Canonical. The Author of the Book of the Wonderful things in Scripture attributed to St. Auſtin, Tom. 3. lib. 2. chap. 32. does not mention the Hiſtory of Suſanna, and rejects that of Bel. Theodoret in his Comments upon Daniel ſpeaks not a word of theſe Hiſtories. Nicephorus places the Hiſtory of Suſanna amongſt the Apochryphal Books. The Action of Suſanna is related and commended by Clemens Alexandrinus, l. 4. Strom. by Tertullian, libr. de Corona, c. 4. by St. Cyprian, Ep. 4. by St. Auſtin in his 18th Sermon, and in ſeveral other places; by St. Baſil, lib. 3. de Spir. ſancto. cap. 7. by St. Ambroſe, lib. 2. de Spir. Sancto; by St. Chryſoſtome in an Homily which is in Tom. 5. by Gregory Nazienzene in his 29th Oration; by Avitus in his Epiſtle to his Siſter; by St. Fulgentius in his Anſwers to Ferrandus; and by Bede. The Author of the Abridgment attributed to S. Athanaſius, and Ruffinus, ſeem to own it for a Canonical Book, as well as St. Ambroſe, and Sulpitius Severus. The Objections that are urged againſt this Hiſtory are theſe. In the firſt place they tell us, that the Hiſtory of Suſanna could not happen when Daniel was a youth, as he is called in that Story. For in the 13th Chapter, Verſe 65. it is obſerved, that Aſtyages was dead, and Cyrus reigned in his place. Now Daniel was then well in years. Anſwer. This Hiſtory happened a long time before, and as for the above-mentioned paſſage it is put out of its place. For in the ancient Verſions it is placed at the beginning of the Book of Daniel, and 'tis therefore ſet at the end of it in the Vulgar Edition, becauſe it is not to be found in the Hebrew Text. Wherefore theſe words of the 13th Chapter, verſe 65. And King Aſtyages was gathered to his Fathers, do not at all concern the Hiſtory of Suſanna, but that of Bel, which immediately follows, and accordingly in the Edition of Sixtus Quintus it is joyned to it.

Africanus objects, that it is not credible that Joachim the Husband of Suſanna was ſo rich and powerful in the Captivity, as he is ſaid to be in that Book; nor that the Captive Jews had authority to condemn their own Criminals. To this Origen anſwers, That the Jews that were carried away Captives into Babylon were not plundered, but that they were both rich and powerful, and that there is a great deal of reaſon to believe they had authority to judge and condemn their Malefactors by their own Laws, as they had afterwards, when they were conquered by the Romans. In the ſecond place, Africanus raiſes an Objection about an alluſion that is to be found in this Hiſtory, where Daniel is introduced diſcourſing to the Elders in certain words, that allude to the Greek names of the Trees, under which they found Suſanna committing wickedneſs. For the firſt of them having ſaid, that it was under a Maſtick Tree, in Greek σχῖνος, he anſwer'd him, that an Angel ſhould cut him in two, becauſe the word πρῖνον ſignifies in Greek to cut aſunder; and the other having ſaid, that it was under a Holm-Oak πρῖνος, he makes uſe of the word πρίζειν which alluſions, ſays Africanus, makes it appear, that it was a Greek that wrote theſe things. On the other hand Origen anſwers, that Daniel never made uſe of theſe terms, or names of Trees, but of ſome other Hebrew or Chaldee word, to which the Verb that ſignifies to cut aſunder, anſwered, and that the Greek Interpreter endeavoured to render this ſenſe by finding out ſome names of Trees, which alluded to thoſe Greek Verbs that ſignifie to cut aſunder: And thus in Geneſis, when it is ſaid in the Hebrew, that a Woman is called Iſha, the feminine of the word Iſh that ſignifies a Man, the Latin Tranſlation has render'd it hæc vocabitur virgo, and in the Greek, Symmachus has tranſlated it ἀνδρὶς, which is a better word than γύνη that the Septuagint have uſed.

'Tis commonly objected againſt the Hiſtory of Bel, that the ancient Title in the Septuagint attributes it to Habakkuk, and that the Daniel mentioned in that Hiſtory was a Prieſt; 'tis therefore another Daniel to whom all this happened. Anſwer. St. Jerome obſerves, that the Greek Interpreter of Daniel, whoſe Verſion goes under the name of the Septuagint, has allowed himſelf a great deal of liberty. Secondly, 'tis ſaid, that Habakkuk, who lived in the time of Manaſſes, was dead about that time. Likewiſe 'tis replied by way of anſwer, that we ought to diſtinguiſh between the two Habakkuks, one that was a Prophet and lived in the time of Manaſſes, and the other who is ſpoken of in this place of Daniel, the laſt was of the Tribe of Levi, the former of Simeon. Laſtly, they tell us, that in the Hiſtory of Bel and the Dragon it is ſaid, that Daniel was ſix days in the Lions Den, whereas in the ſixth Chapter, *v.*19. we are told that he continued there but one Night. But to this they anſwer, that Daniel was twice caſt into the Lions Den, under Darius, becauſe he prayed to his God contrary to the expreſs command of that King, and under Cyrus upon occaſion of the Dragon. The Prophecy of Daniel is quoted by Ezechiel, *ch.*14. *v.*14. in the firſt Book of the Maccabees, ch. 2. *v.*59. and 60. Matth. 24. *v.*15.

(oo) Hoſea the Son of Beeri is the firſt.] 'Tis believed, that he is the moſt ancient not only of the twelve Minor, but alſo of all the Prophets. The falſe Epiphanius, and falſe Dorotheus report, that he was of the Tribe of Iſſachar, and the City of Balenor, but theſe two are not very credible Authors.

(pp) The Prophet Joel follows Hoſea.] This order is obſerved in the Hebrew Text, but the Greeks place Amos and Micah between them.

(qq) 'Tis not certainly known at what time Joel propheſied.] Huetius pretends, that he propheſied after the Captivity of the ten Tribes, becauſe it is ſaid, chap. 3. v. 2. that they have ſcattered the People of Iſrael amongſt the Nations. But why might not he ſpeak of a future thing, as if it were already done? He likewiſe ſays, that there is not a word ſpoken of the Kingdom of Iſrael in the whole Prophecy, but this is not certain. Thoſe Perſons that ſay he propheſied before Amos ground themſelves principally upon his prediction of a Famine towards the end of the firſt Chapter, whereof Amos ſpeaks as of a thing already paſt in the 4th Chapter of his Prophecy. But Huetius thinks, that theſe are two ſeveral Famines, that the Famine mentioned in Amos happened naturally, whereas the other, which Joel foretold, was to be occaſioned by the incurſions of Enemies.

(rr) The time of Obadiah is uncertain.] 'Tis not probable, that this Prophet was he, of whom mention is made in the Book of Kings, for he is only called there one that feared God. 'Tis more probable, that he lived in the time of Ahaz, when the Edomites, in conjunction with the Iſraelites, made War upon the Tribe of Judah, becauſe he perpetually declaims againſt the Edomites.

(ſſ) Jonah the Son of the Prophet Amittai.] The Hebrews ſay, he was the Widows Son of Sarepta, but this is only a groundleſs fancy.

(tt) He that was the Son of Hiſtaſpes.] This is the opinion of Joſephus, of Clemens Alexandrinus, of St. Jerome and Theodoret. Scaliger thinks, that it was Darius Nothus, becauſe there is mention made here of Ahaſuerus and Artaxerxes his Predeceſſors, whom he takes to be Xerxes and Longimanus; but it is an eaſie matter to anſwer him, by ſaying, that theſe names are given in Scripture, without any diſcrimination, to all the Kings of Perſia; and that by them we may underſtand Cyrus and Cambyſes the Predeceſſors of Darius the Son of Hiſtaſpes, or Cambyſes and Smerdis, or, if we pleaſe, Cambyſes himſelf, to whom the Scripture gives two Names. Scaliger's others Argument is ſtronger; he ſays that Zechariah and Haggai Propheſied at the ſame time. And Zechariah in the firſt Chapter, verſ.12. and in the 17, verſ.5. teſtifies, That when he wrote, the People of Iſrael had been Threeſcore and Ten years in Affliction, and that God was Angry with them. Now the Second year of Darius, the Son of Hiſtaſpes, is not the 70th year of the Captivity. To this it is anſwered, That the Prophet Zechariah does not ſay, that it was 70 years ſince the Children of Iſrael were in Captivity; neither that they were then in Captivity, but he only ſays in general Terms, that they had been in Affliction, and that God had poured down his Indignation upon them for the ſpace of Threeſcore and Ten years, which ought to be underſtood of the 70 years of the Captivity, although it was already paſt. The Hebrew and Greek Phraſe in this paſſage no more denotes the preſent time, than the paſt. One undeniable Argument to prove, that Haggai wrote in the time of Darius, the Son of Hiſtaſpes, is this, that ſpeaking of the ſecond Temple, in ch. 2. ver. 3. he ſays, Who is left amongſt you that ſaw this Houſe in her firſt Glory? Quis in vobis eſt derelictus, qui vidit Domum iſtam in Gloriâ ſuâ Primâ? Now if this had been Written under Darius Nothus, theſe Perſons ought to have been 176 years old, or thereabout; and it wou'd follow, that Ezrah was 100 years old, Zorobabel and Joſhua 140, for ſo great a ſpace of time there is from the firſt year of Cyrus down to the time of Darius Nothus.

(uu) Grandſon of Iddo.] He is called in Ezrah the Son of Iddo; in the Septuagint; and St. Jerome's Verſion, the Son of Barachiah, the Son of Iddo. St. Jerome is of Opinion, that he was the Natural Son of Barachiah, and the Son of Iddo by Imitation; Others ſay he was the Son of the latter, according to the Law, but 'tis far more probable that he was his Grandſon, as it is obſerved in our vulgar Tranſlation. St. Jerome is miſtaken in confounding this Iddo with him, that was ſent to Jeruſalem in the time of Jeroboam, ſince there were 240 years from Jeroboam to Darius, a time too long to allow between Grandfather and Grandſon.

(xx) He is different from Zechariah, mentioned by Iſaiah.] By Chronology it appears, that this was not the Prophet, no more than he who is mentioned in the Chronicles, and died in the time of Joaſh. The Firſt was the Son of Barachiah, the Second of Jehoiada. That which has occaſioned this difficulty, is the ſaying of our Saviour, in St. Matthew, chap. 25. That Zechariah the Son of Barachiah was Slain between the Temple and the Altar; which agrees with what is related in the Chronicles, with Zechariah the Son of Jehoiada; and this introduced St. Jerome to believe that our Bleſſed Saviour ſpoke of him, and that we ought to Read, as we find it in the Goſpel of the Nazarens, the Son of Jehoiada, and not of Barachiah. Origen on the contrary, and ſeveral others, underſtand this place of the Prophet, who, they ſay, was Slain after the ſame manner. They have this Text of the Goſpel on their ſide; and beſides our Saviour ſpeaks of a Prophet, which cannot be underſtood of the Son of Jehoiada.

(yy) Malachi, whoſe Name in the Hebrew, ſignifies, My Angel.] And this has made Origen and Tertullian believe, that he was an Angel Incarnate. He is called an Angel by the greateſt part of the Fathers, and in the Verſion of the Septuagint, but he was Angel by Office and not by Nature, as he himſelf calls the Prieſts Angels. Some Perſons, as Jonathan the Chaldee Paraphraſt, St. Jerome, and ſeveral Jews believed, that it was an Appellative Name which Ezrah aſſumed, and that he was Author of this Book, but this Opinion is eſtabliſhed upon very weak Conjectures; and beſides, Ezrah is no where in Scripture called a Prophet. St. Jerome proves his Opinion in this firſt place, becauſe Malachi and Ezrah lived at the ſame time; Secondly, Becauſe what is in Malachi is very like what we find in Ezrah; And laſtly, Becauſe in chap. 2. verſ. 7. he ſeems to point at Ezrah by theſe Words, Verba Sacerdotis cuſtodiunt Scientiam, &c. But theſe Conjectures are light and frivolous. For the firſt only proves that Malachi and Ezrah lived at the ſame time, not that they were one and the ſame: The ſecond is not true, and if it were, it would prove juſt nothing. The Words quoted in the third ought to be underſtood of Levi, and all the Prieſts of the Law. He adds, that in Eccleſiaſticus, chap. 49. where mention is made of all the Prophets, the Name of Malachi is not to be found. To this it is anſwered, That we ought not to be ſurprized, becauſe he is not Named there, ſince in the ſame place there is no mention made of Daniel, and ſeveral others.

(zz) The difference of the Style, of the Chronology, and of the Hiſtory make it appear.] The firſt Book of Maccabees was written by an Hebrew, the ſecond by a Greek; the ſecond begins the Hiſtory a great deal higher than the firſt. One follows the Jewiſh Account, the other that of Alexandria, which begins Six Months after. Some Perſons attribute the firſt to Joſephus, others to Philo, others to the Synagogue, and others to the Maccabees. The Phraſe of the firſt is Jewiſh; and St. Jerome tells us, he had the Hebrew Copy of it. It was Intituled, The Scepter of the Rebels againſt the Lord, or rather, The Scepter of the Prince of the Children of God. The ſecond was Written by Jaſon, as it is obſerved in the Preface. Huetius believes, that the third and fourth Chapter, as well as the two laſt, don't belong to Jaſon, becauſe it is ſaid in chap. 2. verſ. 20. that he wrote down all that paſſed under Antiochus and Eupator, but then the remainder, which is the end and the beginning of that Hiſtory, ought to be underſtood.

(aaa) From a Sentence in Exodus.] This Sentence is in Hebrew, Mi Camacha Be Elim Jehovah: Who is like to the Lord amongſt the Powers? Now taking the firſt Letters of each Word we make Maccabee: Others give a different Etymology of this Name, but this is the moſt probable.

SECT. II.

The Canon of the Books of the Old Teſtament, of Books Doubtful, Apocryphal, and Loſt, that belonged to the Old Teſtament.

WE call the Books of the Bible Canonical Books, becauſe they are received into the Canon, or the Catalogue of Books, that we look upon as Sacred (a). Oppoſite to theſe are thoſe Books, we uſually call Apocryphal (b), which are not acknowledged as Divine, but rejected as ſpurious. The firſt Canon or Catalogue of the Holy Books was made by the Jews; 'tis certain they had one, but 'tis not ſo certainly known who it was that made it. Some Perſons reckon upon three of them, made at different times by the Sanedrim, or the great Synagogue of the Jews (c); But 'tis a great deal more probable, that they never had more than one Canon (d), or one Collection of the Holy Books of the Old Teſtament, that was made by Ezrah after the rebuilding of Jeruſalem, and was afterwards approved proved and received by the whole Nation of the Jews, as containing all the Holy Books. Joſephus, ſpeaking of this buſineſs, in his firſt Book againſt Appion, ſays; 'There is nothing in the World that 'can boaſt of a higher degree of certainty, than the Writings Authorized amongſt us, for they are not 'ſubject to the leaſt Contrariety, becauſe we only receive and approve of thoſe Prophets, who wrote 'them many years ago, according to the pure Truth, by the Inſpiration of the Spirit of God. We 'are not therefore allowed to ſee great numbers of Books that contradict one another. We have 'only Twenty two that comprehend every thing of moment that has happen'd to our Nation, from 'the beginning of the World till now, and thoſe we are obliged firmly to believe. Five of them 'are Written by Moſes, that give a faithful Relation of all Events, even to his own Death, for about 'the ſpace of Three Thouſand years; and contain the Genealogy of the Deſcendants of Adam. The 'Prophets that ſucceeded this admirable Legiſlator, in Thirteen other Books, have Written all the 'memorable Paſſages that fell out, from his Death until the Reign of Artaxerxes, the Son of Xerxes, 'King of the Perſians. The other Four Books contain Hymns, and Songs, compoſed in the Praiſe 'of God, with abundance of Precepts, and Moral Inſtructions, for the regulating of our Manners. 'We have alſo every thing Recorded that has happen'd ſince Artaxerxes down to our own Times; 'but becauſe we have not had, as heretofore, a Succeſſion of Prophets, therefore we don't receive 'them with the ſame Belief as we do the Sacred Books, concerning which I have diſcourſed already: 'and for which we preſerve ſo great a Veneration, that no One ever had the boldneſs to take away, 'or add, or change, the moſt inconſiderable thing in them. We conſider them as Sacred Books, and 'ſo we call them; we make ſolemn Profeſſion inviolably to obſerve what they Command us, and to 'die with Joy if there be occaſion, thereby to preſerve them. Origen, St. Jerome, the Author of the Abridgment attributed to St. Athanaſius, St. Epiphanius, and ſeveral other Chriſtian Writers do teſtifie, that the Jews received but Twenty two Books into the Canon of their Holy Volumes. The Diviſion that St. Jerome has made of them, who diſtributes them into three Claſſes, is as follows. The firſt comprehends the Five Books of Moſes, which is called, The Law; The ſecond contains thoſe Books that he calls the Books of the Prophets, which are nine in number; namely, the Book of Joſhuah, the Book of Judges, to which, ſays St. Jerome, they uſe to joyn the Book of Ruth; the Book of Samuel, which we call the firſt and ſecond Book of Kings; the Book of Kings, which contain the two laſt. Theſe Books are followed by Three great Prophets, viz. Iſaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, which are three different Books, and by the twelve Minor Prophets, which make up but one Book. The third Claſs comprehends thoſe Books that are uſually called, the Hagiographa, or Holy Scriptures; the firſt of which is the Book of Job; the ſecond the Pſalms of David; the three following are the Books of Salomon, which are, the Proverbs, Eccleſiaſtes, and the Canticles; the ſixth is Daniel, the ſeventh the Chronicles, the eighth Ezrah, which is divided into two Books by the Greeks and Latins, and the laſt is the Book of Eſther. 'Thus, ſays St. Jerome, all the Books of the Old Teſtament 'amongſt the Jews, juſt make up the number of Twenty two, five whereof were Written by Moſes, 'eight by the Prophets, and nine are the Hagiographa. Some Perſons make them Twenty four in 'number, by ſeparating Ruth, and the Lamentations of the Prophet Jeremy, and placing them amongſt 'the Hagiographa. This Prologue to the Bible, continues he, may ſerve as a Preface to all thoſe Books, 'that we have Tranſlated out of the Hebrew; and we ought to underſtand, that whatſoever Book 'is not to be found in this number is Aprocryphal. From hence it follows, that the Book of Wiſdom, 'commonly attributed to Salomon, the Eccleſiaſticus of Jeſus the Son of Syrach, Judith, Tobit, and the 'Paſtor, don't belong to the Canon no more than the two Books of Maccabees do; one of which was 'originally Written in Hebrew, and the other in Greek, as the ſtyle ſufficiently ſhews. Thus we ſee how St. Jerome has clearly explained the Canon of the Scriptures, as they are received by the Jews; yet we have reaſon to doubt, whether he has been very exact in this Catalogue, ſince in ſome particulars it does not agree with Joſephus. For although they are agreed about the number of the Books, yet they notoriouſly differ in the manner of diſtributing them. Joſephus places all the Hiſtorical Books, to the number of Thirteen, amongſt the Prophets, adding to St. Jerome's nine, Daniel, the Chronicles, Ezrah, and Job. And conſequently he ſets only thoſe in the third rank that are purely Moral Treatiſes, as the Pſalms of David, and the Three Books of Salomon. But beſides this difference, we may probably ſuppoſe, that Joſephus has not reckon'd the Book of Eſther in the number of the Canonical Books. For he is opinion, that they were all written before the Reign of Artaxerxes, but as for the Hiſtory of Eſther, he believed it fell under the Reign of that King, as we may ſee in his Antiquities.

'Tis therefore very likely, that he never conſidered that Book as Canonical, but that to make up the number of the 13 Books of the Prophets, he reckoned the Book of Ruth ſeparately from that of the Kings. 'Tis in purſuance of this Canon, that Melito, and the Author of the Abridgment of the Scriptures, attributed to St. Athanaſius, reject the Book of Eſther, and ſeparate the Book of Ruth from that of the Kings. Some Perſons pretend, that he has not owned the Book of Job, becauſe he makes no mention of that Hiſtory, but we ought not to wonder, that he paſſes it by, ſince it has no relation to the Nation of the Jews, and he only deſigned to ſpeak of them in his Antiquities. Others imagine, that he acknowledged Eccleſiaſticus for a Canonical Book, becauſe he has cited a paſſage out of it in his ſecond Book againſt Appion. But it is viſible, as Pithœus has remarked, that this Citation, which is not to be found in the ancient Verſion of Ruffinus, has been ſince inſerted into the Text of Joſephus (e).

The ancient Chriſtians have followed the Jewiſh Canon in the Books of the Old Teſtament. There are none quoted in the New Teſtament (f), but thoſe that were received into the Canon of the Jews, and the greateſt part of theſe (g) are frequently cited there. The firſt Catalogues of the Canonical Books made by the Eccleſiaſtick Greek and Latin Authors, comprehend no more, but at the ſame time we ought to affirm, that even thoſe Books, that have been ſince added to the Canon, have been often quoted by the Ancients, and indeed ſometimes under the Name of Scripture.

The firſt Catalogue, we find of the Books of Scripture amongſt the Chriſtians, is that of Melito Biſhop of Sardis, ſet down by Euſebius in the 4th Book of his Hiſtory, chap. 26. It is entirely conformable to that of the Jews, and contains but twenty two Books, in which number Eſther is not reckon'd, and the Book of Ruth is diſtinguiſhed from that of the Judges. Origen alſo in a certain paſſage drawn out of the Expoſition of the Firſt Pſalm, and produced by Euſebius in his 6th Book, chap. 25. reckons twenty two Books of the Old Teſtament, but he places the Book of Eſther in this number, and joyns the Book of Ruth with that of Judges. The Council of Laodicea, which was the firſt Synod that determined the number of the Canonical Books, St. Cyril of Jeruſalem in his fourth Catechetick Lecture, St. Hilary in his Preface to the Pſalms, the laſt Canon falſly aſcribed to the Apoſtles, Amphilochius cited by Balſamon, Anaſtaſius Sinaita upon the Hexameron, lib. 7. Saint John Damaſcene in his fourth Book of Orthodox Faith, the Author of the Abridgment of Scripture, and of the Feſtival Letter, attributed to St. Athanaſius, the Author of the Book of the Hierarchy, attributed to St. Dionyſius, and the Nicephori, follow the Catalogue of Melito. Gregory Nazianzen is of the ſame opinion in his Thirty third Poem, where he diſtributes the Books of Scripture into the three Claſſes, viz. Hiſtorical, Poetical, and Prophetical (h). He reckons up twelve Hiſtorical Books, namely, the five Books of Moſes, Joſhuah, Judges, Ruth, the two Books of Kings, the Chronicles, and Ezrah; The five Poetical Books are Job, David, and the three Books of Salomon; and there are likewiſe five Prophetical Books, viz. the four Great, and the twelve Minor Prophets. Leontius in his Book of Sects follows this Catalogue and Diſtribution, only he reckons the Book of Pſalms by it ſelf. St. Epiphanius, in his Eigth Hereſie, counts Twenty ſeven Canonical Books of the Old Teſtament; nevertheleſs, he adds nothing to Origen's Canon, but he ſeparates the Book of Ruth from that of Judges, and divides into two the Book of Kings, the Chronicles, and the Book of Ezrah. Several of the Latines reckon twenty four Books, whether it be that they add Judith and Tobit, as Saint Hilary has obſerved of ſome in his time, or whether they ſeparate Ruth, and the Lamentations of Jeremiah, as St. Jerome has obſerved. Victorinus upon the Apocalypſe, St. Ambroſe upon the ſame Book, Primaſius the Author of the Poem againſt Marcion, Bede, and the Author of the Sermons upon the ſame Book, attributed to St. Auſtin, and ſeveral others, reckon twenty four Books of the Old Teſtament, and ſay, they are repreſented by the twenty four Elders in the Revelations. The firſt Catalogue of the Books of the Holy Scriptures, where they added ſome Books to the Jewiſh Canon, is that of the third Council of Carthage, held Anno Dom. 397. when the Books of Judith, Tobit, the Wiſdom of Salomon, Eccleſiaſticus, and the two Books of the Maccabees were reckon'd in the number of Canonical Books. There is at the end of this Canon a Poſtil that is very remarkable: Let the Church beyond the Sea be conſulted (to confirm, or) before this Canon is confirmed. De confirmando iſto Canone Eccleſia Tranſmarina Conſulatur. This Catalogue of Canonical Books is confirmed by the Authority of Pope Innocent the Firſt, in an Epiſtle to Exuperius, and by that of a Roman Council held under Gelaſius, Anno Dom. 494. (i), and is followed in the Decree of Eugenius to the Armenians, and by the Holy Council of Trent. All theſe Catalogues ſerve to acquaint us in general, what were the Books that were not received to be certainly Canonical, and which they are, whoſe Authority have been queſtioned by Antiquity. But nevertheleſs we ought to ſpeak of them particularly, for although they were not received in the firſt Ages by all Churches, nor reckoned by all Authors in the Canon of the Books of the Bible, yet they were frequently cited by the Ancients, and ſometimes too as Books of Scripture, and for this reaſon were afterwards admitted into the Canon along with the firſt.

The Book of Eſther, according to ſome, was in the Jewiſh Canon, but others ſay, it was not reckoned at all. It is placed in the Canon, as we have already obſerved, by Origen, by the Council of Laodicea, by St. Jerome, by St. Epiphanius, by St. Hilary, by St. Cyril, not to mention the Council of Carthage, or the Deciſions of Pope Innocent and Gelaſius. Joſephus, Melito, St. Athanaſius, and the Author of the Abridgment of the Scripture, Gregory Nazianzen, Leontius, the Author of the Book of the Hierarchy, and Nicephorus, reject it. The Action of Eſther is commended by Clemens Romanus in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, and by Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. 1. Pædag. and l. 5. Strom. which makes it appear, that this Book was known and eſteemed by the firſt Chriſtians. The ſix laſt Chapters of this Book are not to be found in the Hebrew. Origen is of opinion, that it was formerly extant in that Language, and has been ſince loſt. But it is very evident, that they are taken out of ſeveral places, and that they contain ſome Pieces that were probably collected by the Helleniſt Jews. And for this reaſon Dionyſius, Carthuſianus, Nicolaus de Lira, Hugo Cardinalis, and afterwards Sixtus Senenſis, and ſeveral of the Moderns, turn them out of the Canon of the Holy Books.

The Book of Baruch is not to be found by name in the Jewiſh Canon, but perhaps it was joined together with Jeremiah. Melito, Origen, St. Hilary, Gregory Nazianzen, and St. Epiphanius, don't make any mention of it, confounding it perhaps with Jeremiah, but St. Jerome expreſly rejects it out of the Canon in his Preface to Jeremiah. On the contrary, the Council of Laodicea, St. Cyril of Jeruſalem, St. Athanaſius in his Feſtival Letter, and the Author of the Abridgment, annex it to Jeremiah, along with the Lamentations of that Prophet. It is cited under the name of Jeremiah, and as a Book of Scripture by Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. 1. pedag. ch. 2. by St. Cyprian in the Fourth Book of his Teſtimonies to Quirinus, ch. 6. by Euſebius in his Books of Demonſtration; by St. Baſil in his Fourth Book againſt Eunomius; by St. Ambroſe in his Firſt Book of Penance, as alſo in his Firſt

Book

Book of Orthodox Faith, ch. 2. by St. Auſtin. lib. 18. de Civ. Dei; by St. Chryſoſtom in his Homily of the Trinity, and by many other Church-Writers that are more modern. It is not neceſſary to take notice, that it was received by the Council of Carthage, by Pope Innocent, by the Roman Council under Gelaſius, by the Decree of Eugenius, and by the Canon of the Council of Trent.

The Book of Tobit is rejected in all the ancient Catalogues of the Books of the Bible, and not received into the number of the Canonical Books. Origen in his 27th Homily upon the Numbers ſays it is one of thoſe Books that were read to the Catechumens, but that it is not Canonical (k.) St. Jerome, who frequently rejects it as an Apocryphal Book, that was neither to be found in the Jewiſh or Chriſtian Canon, yet gave himſelf the trouble to Tranſlate it, ſpeaks of it very advantageouſly in his Preface, and calls it a Sacred Volume in his Hundred and fortieth Epiſtle. Ruffinus in his Expoſition of the Creed expreſly rejects it as an Apocryphal Book. But beſides that it is received by the Council of Carthage, and by Pope Innocent and Gelaſius, it appears, that in Ireneus's time it was reckoned amongſt the Books of the Prophets, becauſe this Author, l. 1. ch. 34. has obſerved, that the Gnoſticks, who diſtributed the Prophets into ſeveral Claſſes, and attributed them to their pretended Divinities, aſſign the Prophets Haggai and Tobit to Eloi. This Book is often cited by St. Cyprian, who likewiſe calls it Holy Scripture in his Book of Alms and Good Works. It is alſo cited by St. Hilary upon the 129th Pſalm, where he makes uſe of the Authority of this Book to prove the Interceſſion of Angels. The ſame Father making a Catalogue of the Canonical Books, obſerves, that ſeveral Perſons have made the number of them twenty four, by adding the Books of Tobit and Judith. St. Ambroſe explained it throughout as a Book of Scripture, and cited it in his Hexameron, and ſo has St. Chryſoſtome in his 13th Homily to the People of Antioch, and the Author of the Apoſtolick Conſtitutions in the 8th Book, chap. 45.

The Book of Judith is not only rejected in all the ancient Catalogues of the Canonical Books, but it is alſo ſcarcely mentioned by the Ancients, though Clemens Romanus in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, Clemens Alexandrinus, l. 4. Strom Tertullian in his Book of Monogomy, and in his firſt Book againſt Marcion, commend the Heroick Action of Judith, which makes it evident, that they had all of them an eſteeem for that Book. St. Jerome, after having ſeveral times rejected it as an Apocryphal Book, and obſerved in his Preface before it, that we ought not to prove any conteſted Doctrines out of it, adds, that we read, that the Council of Nice reckoned it in the number of the Holy Scriptures; Sed quia hunc librum Synodus Nicæna in numero Sanctarum Scripturarum legitur computaſſe. We ought to believe that St. Jerome reported this paſſage upon the Faith of another, there being not the leaſt appearance of its truth. For beſides, that we find nothing like it in the Creed, in the Canons, and Letters of the Council of Nice, and that it is highly probable, there are no other Acts of that Aſſembly, Is it to be imagined, that if they had made a Canon concerning the Sacred Books, not ſo much as one Man, that aſſiſted in that affair, would make mention of it? Is it to be thought that St. Athanaſius, St. Epiphanius, St. Cyril, who cou'd not be ignorant of the Deciſions of the Council of Nice, wou'd have rejected the Book of Judith as Apocryphal, if it had been reckoned amongſt the Canonical Volumes by the Authority of a Council they ſo highly reverenc'd? In ſhort, wou'd St. Hilary have contented himſelf with ſaying, that ſome Perſons added this Book to the Canon, and not rather have openly declared, when he was ſpeaking of the Canonical Books, that the Church received it? St. Jerome himſelf, if he had been aſſured of this buſineſs, wou'd he have rejected this Book ſo often, and not alledged this Catalogue of the Council of Nice, which ought to have been the infallible rule for him to follow? We muſt therefore ſay, that this Father received this Information from another. But if the Council of Nice reckoned not this Book of Judith in the number of Canonical Books yet the Latine Church has ſince done it by the Council of Carthage, by the Mouth of Innocent the Firſt, by the Roman Council under Gelaſius, and by the Council of Trent, which followed the Decree of Eugenius.

The Book of Wiſdom and Eccleſiaſticus (l,) in the ancient Catalogues are placed in the number of thoſe Books that are very profitable, but not Canonical; Nevertheleſs, theſe Books are cited by St. Barnabas, by Clemens Romanus, by Tertullian in his third Book againſt Marcion, and in his Book of Preſcriptions, by Clemens Alexandrinus, by St. Cyprian in ſeveral places; likewiſe frequently by Origen. by St. Hilary upon the 140th Pſalm; and according to ſome by St. Baſil, by St. Ambroſe, by St. Jerome, and St. Auſtin; but it does not follow, that all theſe acknowledged them for Canonical. On the contrary, Origen, St. Jerome, and St. Hillary, ranked them amongſt the Apocryphal Books; And St. (m) Baſil plainly ſays, in the Preface to his Commentary upon the Proverbs, That there are but three Books of Solomon; and he ſufficiently ſhews in ſeveral other places, that he did not own the Books of Wiſdom and Eccleſiaſticus for Canonical Books. Philaſtrius and Ruffinus reject them as well as St. Hilary, who has written a Letter about them to St. Auſtin. Theodoret is of the ſame Opinion in his Preface to the Canticles. One cannot ſay that of St. Cyprian, St. Ambroſe and St. Auſtin, who ſeem to own them for Canonical, as it has been determined by the Council of Carthage, by Innocent the Firſt, by the Roman Council under Gelaſius, by the Decree of Eugenius, and by the Council of Trent.

To conclude the two Books of Maccabees are not entred into the Canon of the Books of the Holy Scripture in the Catalogues of Melito, of Origen, of the Council of Laodicea, of St. Cyril of St. Hilary, of St. Athanaſius, of St. Jerome, and others whom we have Named. In Euſebius's Chronicon, they are oppoſed to the Canonical Books, in theſe words, That which we have hitherto reported of the Annals of the Jews, is drawn out of the Holy Scripture; that which follows is taken out of the Books of the Maccabees, Joſephus, and Africanus. Tertullian in his Book againſt the Jews, relates the Hiſtory of the the Maccabees, but yet he does not cite the Books of the Maccabees as Books of Scripture. St. Cyprian quotes them very often under that Character, and ſo does St. Ambroſe and St. Chryſoſtome. St. Jerome himſelf, who rejects them in ſeveral places, cites them ſometimes as Books of Scripture. St. Auſtin quotes them in his Book of the concern which we ought to have for the Dead, to prove that we may offer Sacrifice for the Deceaſed; and he aſſures us, *l.*18. de Civit. Dei, that although theſe Books were never received as Canonical by the Jews, yet they were acknowledged for ſuch by the Church. But in his firſt Book againſt Gaudentius, taking occaſion to ſpeak of the action of Razias, who killed himſelf, he thus delivers his Thoughts about the Books of the Maccabees; The Jews don't receive theſe Books of the Maccabees as they do the Law, the Prophets, and the Pſalms; but the Church receives them, and they are not unprofitable, provided one reads and underſtands them with ſome ſort of Moderation, and they deſerve eſteem particularly for the Hiſtory of the Seven Maccabees. In the laſt Canon attributed to the Apoſtles, we find the three Books of Maccabees reckoned amongſt the Canonical Books, but there is reaſon to believe, that this paſſage has been added, becauſe they are not acknowledged for Canonical Books by Nicephorus, Johannes Damaſcenus, and ſeveral others, who have owned the Authority of the Apoſtolical Canons. They are received by the third Council of Carthage, and by Innocent the Firſt. There is but one of them approved by the Roman Council under Gelaſius. It is a very ſurprizing thing, that after all theſe Authorities, St. Gregory the Great ſhould thus ſpeak of them in the Nineteenth Book of his Morals; We don't without Reaſon, ſays he, produce Teſtimonies drawn out of thoſe Books that are not Canonical, ſince they have been Publiſhed for the Edification of the Church. We ought to make the ſame Reflection upon all the reſt of the Greek and Latin Eccleſiaſtical Writers, whom we have cited, and who ſince the Deciſions of the Councils of Carthage and Rome, and the Declaration of Innocent the Firſt, reckon but Twenty two or Twenty four Canonical Books of the Old Teſtament. Which makes it evident, that theſe Definitions have not been followed by all Authors, and all Churches, till at laſt it was intirely determined by the Council of Trent.

I ſhall not ſpeak of the Hiſtory of Suſanna and Bel, that are in Daniel, and have been rejected as falſe, or as Apocryphal, by ſeveral of the Ancients, ſince I have already diſcourſed largely about them.

Beſides theſe Books, that were at laſt received into the Canon of the Books of the Old Teſtament, there are many others, that either were not admitted into the Jewiſh Canon, although they were more Ancient, or that having been compoſed ſince, have been eſteem'd and cited by ſome Chriſtian Authors, but never found any place in the Canon, or thoſe laſtly that were ſuppoſititiouſly obtruded upon the World by Hereticks, and by conſequence were always rejected.

In the firſt place, there are ſeveral Books cited in the Old Teſtament, that have been totally loſt long ſince, and are not Named in the Jewiſh Canon. The firſt of theſe Books, as they commonly pretend, is the Book of the Battels of the Lord, that is cited in the 21ſt Chapter of Numbers, verſ. 24. But it is not certain, as we have elſewhere obſerved, that there is any mention made of a Book in this place: we ought to paſs the ſame Judgment upon the Book of the Covenant, that is mentioned, as they aſſert, in Exodus, chap. 24. but is in reality nothing elſe, but the Body of the Laws which Moſes received from God, and delivered to the People. Neither is there any greater certainty, that the Book of Jaſher, cited by Joſhuah, chap. 10. verſ. 13. and in the ſecond Book of Samuel, chap. 11. verſ. 18. was an Hiſtorical Book, although I confeſs there is ſome reaſon to believe it was. But one cannot hardly doubt, that the Books of Nathan, of Gad, of Shemaiah, of Iddo, of Ahijah and Jehu, cited frequently in the Books of the Chronicles, were Memoirs compoſed in all probability by theſe Prophets. We muſt ſay the ſame thing of the Book of the Sayings and Acts of the Kings of Iſrael, oftentimes cited in the Kings, which is different from the Chronicles, as we have already obſerved. To theſe muſt be added the Book of Samuel, cited in the firſt Book of Chronicles, and the laſt Chapter. The Diſcourſes of Hoſai [or of the Seers] that are mentioned in the ſecond Book of Chronicles, chap. 33. verſ. 19. The Hiſtory of Uzziah, written by the Prophet Iſaiah, and cited in the ſecond Book of Chronicles, chap. 26. verſ. 22. The three Thouſand Parables written by Solomon, as it is ſaid in the firſt of Kings, chap. 4. verſ. 32. The Five Thouſand, or rather the Thouſand and Five Songs, with the ſeveral Volumes concerning all manner of Plants and Animals, that were likewiſe compoſed by Solomon, as we are informed in the ſame place. The Deſcriptions of Jeremiah, that are mentioned in the ſecond Book of Maccabees, chap. 2. verſ. 1. The Prophecy of Jonas that is loſt The Memoirs of Johannes Hircanus, [mentioned 1 Maccab. 16. 23, 24.] and the Books of Jaſon, that are mentioned in the ſecond Book of Maccabees.

'Tis uſually Ask'd, Whether theſe Books cited in the Old Teſtament were Canonical or no? This Queſtion in my Opinion is asked to no purpoſe, ſince we have not any remainders of them at preſent; but however, certain it is, that they are not Canonical in the ſame Senſe as we uſually take the Word; that is to ſay, they were never received into the Canon, either of the Jewiſh or Chriſtian Church; and no body knows whether they ought to have been admitted there, in caſe they had been ſtill preſerved. Neither can we poſitively tell, whether they were written by the Inſpiration of God, or were the mere Works of Men, only the later Opinion ſeems to be more probable. In the firſt place, becauſe the greater part of them having been compoſed before Ezrah, he had without queſtion reckoned them in the Jewiſh Canon, if he had looked upon them to be Divine Books. Secondly, becauſe we muſt otherwiſe be obliged to ſay, that the Church has loſt a great part of the Book of God. Thirdly, becauſe the Apoſtles never cited any other Books, than what we now have, as Books of Scripture. Fourthly, becauſe the Fathers are all agreed, that theſe Books were Apocryphal, phal, and place the Book of Enoch, cited by St. Jude, in the ſame rank. This is the Opinion of Origen, of St. Jerome, St. Auſtin, and indeed of all the Fathers except Tertullian. For although Theodoret, and ſome other Greek Fathers, give the Title of Prophets to the Authors of theſe Books that are cited in Scripture; yet it does not follow from thence, that they compoſed theſe ancient Memoirs by the Inſpiration of God. It is not neceſſary, that all the Writings and Diſcourſes of a Prophet ſhould be inſpired by Heaven. Upon this account St. Auſtin has very Judiciouſly obſerved, cap. 38. l. 18. de Civit. Dei, that although theſe Books cited in the Holy Scriptures, were written by Prophets that were Inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt; yet it is not neceſſary to ſay, that they were Divinely Inſpired: For, ſays he, theſe Prophets might one while write like particular Men, with an Hiſtorical Fidelity, and another while like Prophets that followed the Inſpiration of Heaven: Alia ſicut homines Hiſtoricâ diligentiâ, alia ſicut Prophetas Inſpiratione Divinâ ſcribere potuiſſe.

Let us now go on to the Books that are not in the Canon of the Old Teſtament, and which we have at preſent. The Catalogue of them is as follows. The Prayer of King Manaſſes, who was Captive in Babylon, cited in the ſecond Book of Chronicles, where it is ſaid, that this Prayer was written amongſt the Sayings of Hoſai, who has Tranſlated into Greek the Diſcourſes of the Seers, or Prophets. It is to be found at the end of the ordinary Bibles, there is nothing lofty in it, but it is full of pious Thoughts. The Latin Fathers have often quoted it: It is neither in Greek nor Hebrew, but only in Latin.

The third and fourth Books of Ezrah are alſo in Latin in the common Bibles, after the Prayer of Manaſſes. The third, which is to be found in the Greek, is nothing but a Repetition of what we find in the two former; it is cited by St. Athanaſius, St. Auſtin, and St. Ambroſe, St. Cyprian likewiſe ſeems to have known it. The fourth, that is only to be had in the Latin, is full of Viſions and Dreams, and ſome Miſtakes. 'Tis written by a different Author from that of the third; for beſides the great difference of Style, one of them reckons Nineteen Generations from Aaron down to him, and the other but Fifteen.

The third Book of Maccabees contain a miraculous Deliverance of the Jews, whom Phiſcon had expoſed in the Amphitheatre at Alexandria, to the fury of Elephants. Joſephus relates this Hiſtory in his ſecond Book againſt Appion. This Book of the Maccabees is to be found in all the Greek Editions. It is reckoned in the number of Canonical Books, in the laſt Canon attributed to the Apoſtles, but perhaps that has been added ſince; it's alſo mention'd in the Chronicle of Euſebius, and in the Author of the Abridgment of Scripture, attributed to St. Athanaſius. This Hiſtory, if it be true, happened about Fifty years before the Paſſages that are related in the other two Books, and therefore ought to be the firſt; It is without any Reaſon called the Book of Maccabees, ſince it does not ſpeak of them in the leaſt.

The fourth, containing the Hiſtory of Hircanus, is rejected as Apocryphal by the Author of the Abridgment of Scripture, attributed to St. Athanaſius. It is mentioned by ſcarce any of the Ancients Perhaps it was taken out of the Book of the Actions of Johannes Hircanus, mentioned towards the end of the firſt of Maccabees. Sixtus Senenſis aſſures us, that this account very much reſembles Joſephus's, but that he has abundance of his Hebrew Idiotiſms there.

There is towards the end of Job in the Greek Edition, a Genealogy of Job, that makes him the fifth from Abraham, with the Names of the Edomitiſh Kings, and of the Kingdoms of his Friends. This Addition is neither in the Latin nor in the Hebrew. There is likewiſe in the Greek a Diſcourſe of Job's Wife, that is not in the Hebrew, rejected by Africanus and St. Jerome. Towards the end of the Pſalms in the Greek Editions, we find a Pſalm that is not of the number of the Hundred and Fifty, made in the Perſon of David, when he was yet a Youth, after he had Slain the Giant Goliah. The Author of the Abridgment of Scripture, attributed to St. Athanaſius, cites it, and places it alſo in the number of the Canonical Pſalms. To conclude, at the end of Wiſdom there is a Diſcourſe of Solomon drawn from the eighth Chapter of th. firſt Book of Kings.

We have not the Book of Enoch, ſo celebrated by Antiquity, and cited by St. Irenæus, by St. Clement of Alexandria, by Tertullian, by Origen, by Athenagoras, by St. Jerome, and ſeveral other Fathers: But we learn from thoſe paſſages of it which the Fathers have quoted, and which ſtill remain in the Teſtament of the Twelve Patriarchs, and in the Chronography of Syncellus, that it principally treated of the Stars, and their Virtues, of the Deſcent of Angels to the Earth to entertain a Commerce with the Daughters of Men, of the original of Giants occaſioned by this correſpondence, of Things that were to befall the Jews, of our Saviour, of the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem, of the Diſperſion of the Jews, and the laſt Judgment. It contains a World of Fictions upon theſe Subjects; For which Reaſon all the Fathers, except Tertullian, have look'd upon it as an Apocryphal Book, that does not belong to the Patriarch Enoch. That which has cauſed all the difficulty, is that this Book ſeems to have been cited under Enoch's Name by St. Jude, in his Canonical Epiſtle, verſe 14. And of this, ſays he, Enoch the Seventh from Adam Propheſied? ſaying, Behold the Lord cometh, &c. from whence one may conclude, That we ought either to reject the Epiſtle of St. Jude, or believe that the Book of Enoch truly belonged to that Patriarch. St. Auſtin avoids this difficulty, by ſaying, That the true Book of Enoch, cited by St. Jude, is loſt, and that a ſpurious one has been ſince Father'd upon him. But it is not probable, that the Book of Enoch, cited by St. Jude, is different from that which was known to St. Irenæus, to St. Auſtin, and the other Fathers that lived in the firſt Ages of the Church; And therefore St. Jerome, after Origen anſwers, That St. Jude might cite an Apocryphal Book if he pleaſed, and that this hindered not his Epiſtle from being Canonical, that even in the other Books of the New Teſtament, we find ſome paſſages that are drawn out of Apocryphal Books, which which ought not to diminiſh the Authority of the Canonical Books, or give any new power to the Apocryphal ones. Some of the Modern Criticks have pretended to unravel this difficulty with greater eaſe, by maintaining, that St. Jude does not here ſpeak of the Book of Enoch, but only of a Prophecy of that Patriarch, which he had learnt by Tradition, as St. Paul reports the Names of Jannes and Jambres, the Egyptian Magicians of Pharoah, from the common Tradition of the Jews; but this Opinion being contrary to the Determination of all the Ancients, is in my Judgment very improbable and ill grounded, and we had much better relie upon St. Jerome's Solution.

The Book of the Aſſumption of Moſes, from whence, as they pretend, St. Jude took the Relation of Michael the Archangels Diſputing with Satan about the Body of Moſes, is not ſo famous in Antiquity; nevertheleſs it is cited by Origen, l. 3. Princ. and by St. Clement, l. 3. Strom. who there gives us an account of a Viſion of Joſhuah and Caleb, that was taken out of this Book. Oecumenius in his Commentary upon the Epiſtle of St. Jude, recites theſe words of the Archangel to the Devil, the Lord rebuke the Satan: Increpet te Deus O Diabole; as quoted from hence. St. Jerome tells us, it is an hard matter to ſay from whence St. Jude took this paſſage; only he obſerves, that there is ſomething like it to be found in the Prophecy of Zechariah, chap. 3. verſ. 2.

Origen likewiſe cites a Book, Entituled, The Aſſumption, the Apocalypſe, or the Secrets of Elias. Syncellus after him, pretends, that out of this Apocryphal Book, St. Paul has taken this Sentence in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians; The Eye hath not ſeen, nor the Ear heard the good Things that God hath prepared for them that love him: As alſo that in the Epiſtle to the Galatians; Circumciſion availeth nothing, &c. Moreover he is of Opinion, that this Sentence in the Epheſians, Awake thou that ſleepeſt, is taken out of the Apocryphal Book of Jeremiah. But it may ſo happen ſometimes, that like Sentences may be found in two different Books, and yet it is not neceſſary to ſay, that one Author borrowed them from the other.

Some Jews have Forged and Counterfeited thoſe Books, that are by ſome attributed to the Patriarchs; as for Example, the Books Intituled, The Generations, and the Creation, aſcribed to Adam, The Revelation of the ſame, cited by St. Epiphanius. 'Tis alſo commonly believed, that he compoſed a Book about the Philoſophers Stone; and that there was a Book of Magick extant, ſaid to have been written by Cham, as we find in Caſſian's eighth Conference, chap. 21. The Abridgement of Scripture that goes under the Name of St. Athanaſius, makes mention of the Book of the Aſſumption of Abraham. The Author of the Homilies upon St. Luke, attributed to Origen, in the 15th Homily, and ſome others quote the Book of the Twelve Patriarchs. The ſame Author in the 35th Homily, cites an Apocryphal Book, where Angels and Devils Diſpute about the Salvation of Abraham. The Author of the above-mentioned Abridgment of Scripture, ſpeaks of two Apocryphal Books, one of which is the Prophecy of Habakkuk, from whence, as they pretend, the Hiſtory Bel, that is in Daniel, was taken; and an Apocryphal Book that carries the name of Ezekiel. Hermas, one of the moſt ancient Chriſtian Writers, in his Paſtor, ch. 2. cites the Propheſies of Eldad and Medad, that are mentioned in chap. 11. of Numbers. Origen and St. Ambroſe cite a Book of Jannes and Jambres, the Magicians of Pharaoh, that is rejected by Gelaſius, as an Apocryphal Book. There is alſo a Book of King Og placed in the number of Apocryphal Books by Gelaſius.

The Ebionites have impoſed a Book upon the World, Entituled, Jacob's Ladder, as Epiphanius teſtifies. Manes compoſed a Genealogy of the Sons and Daughters of Adam, as we are informed by St. Auſtin, and Pope Gelaſius. In ſhort, there were abundance of ſuch kind of Books formerly to be found, compoſed either by the Jews, who had an admirable Talent at Fiction, or elſe by the Hereticks, who made uſe of them to give the greater Reputation to their Errors, ſo that it wou'd be an unprofitable, as well a tedious Thing, to make an exact Catalogue. But I ought not to omit two paſſages cited in the New Teſtament, as if they were in the Prophets, which upon ſtrict ſearch are not to be found there, and which have given occaſion to ſome Perſons to imagine they were taken from other Books; The firſt is in St. Matthew, ch. 2. v. 23. Jeſus, ſays he, dwelt in a City called Nazareth, that it might be fulfilled which was ſpoken by the Prophet. He ſhall be called a Nazarene. Now theſe Words, He ſhall be called a Nazarene, are not to be found in any of the Prophets that we now have, which has induced St. Chryſoſtome to imagine, that they are taken out of ſome other Prophet that is loſt. Others pretend, that they are cited out of the 11th Chapter of Iſaiah, verſ. 1. where it is foretold, That a branch ſhall grow out, which they call in Hebrew Netzer. Huetius thinks, that this paſſage is taken from the 13th Chapter of the Book of Judges, verſ. 5. where it is ſaid, that he ſhall be a Nazarite from the Womb. But the moſt probable Opinion is that of St. Jerome, who ſuppoſes, that St. Matthew does not cite any Prophet in particular, but only all the Prophets, who have predicted, that our Bleſſed Saviour ſhould be Holy, and Conſecrated to God, as the Nazarites were.

The ſecond paſſage is cited in the ſame Goſpel, chap. 27. verſ. 9. Then, ſays he, was fulfilled that which was ſpoken in Jeremy the Prophet, ſaying, And they took the Thirty pieces of Silver, the price of him that was valued, whom they of the Children of Iſrael did value, and gave them for the Potters Field, as the Lord appointed me. This Propheſie is not to be found in Jeremiah, but there is ſomething that ſeems to reſemble it in Zechariah, chap. 11. verſ. 13. Origen in his 35th Treatiſe upon St. Matthew, pretends, that it ought to be ſaid, that this paſſage is taken out of an Apocryphal Book called, The Secrets of Jeremiah, or elſe that we muſt affirm, that in this Goſpel, the Name of one Prophet is uſed for that of another. Some other Authors ſay, that this Propheſie has been ſtruck out of the Book of Jeremiah. Others run to Tradition, which, as they give out, preſerved this Propheſie of Jeremiah down to the time of St. Matthew. It is very probable, ſay ſome others, that this Propheſie being compoſed of the Words of Jeremiah, and the Thought of Zechariah, has been cited only under the

Name

Name of Jeremiah, as in another Place a Prophecy of Malachi being joyned to one of Iſaiah, is attributed to the latter: But yet 'tis a great deal more probable, that St. Matthew having only wrote, as it is ſpoken in the Prophet, without Naming any one, they added in the Text of the Goſpel, the Name of Jeremiah, that Evangeliſt not being accuſtomed to Name the Prophets, whom he cites. This is St. Jerome's Solution of the Matter, which ſeems to be by far the Solideſt. +

NOTES.

(a) WE call the Books of the Bible Canonical,&c.] Some Perſons ſay that they are thus called, becauſe they are the Rule of Faith; but the other Opinion is far more probable.

(b) Books that are called Apocryphal.] We don't know well why they are ſo called. This word comes Originally from the Greek, where it ſignifies to hide or conceal. St. Auſtin, L. 15. de Civit. Dei, Ch. 23. ſays, they are ſo called, becauſe the Original of them is not known. Others, as St. Jerome and Gelaſius, believe they had this Name given them, becauſe they contained the hidden Myſteries of the Hereticks. St. Epiphanius imagines this diſtinguiſhing Appellation was ſet upon them, becauſe they were not kept in the Ark. The Signification alſo of this word is doubtful, one while they give this Name to all Books that are not in the Canon, another while only to erroneous or ill Books. Some of the Fathers make three Diſtinctions of Books, viz. The Canonical, the Doubtful, and the Suppoſititious. Conſult Origen upon the 4th Chapter of St. John. St. Athanaſius in his Feſtival Letter, St. Gregory in the Poem to Seleucus. Euſebius, and the other Fathers, divide them but into two ſorts, Canonical and Apocryphal: But then they diſtinguiſh the Canonical into two Claſſes. Indeed generally ſpeaking they are ranged into three Claſſes, the Canonical of the firſt Rank, the Canonical of the ſecond Rank, and the Apocryphal.

(c) Some Perſons diſtinguiſh three Canons made at ſeveral times by the Sanedrim, or the great Synagogue of the Jews.] Serarius makes only two: The firſt made by Ezrah, and the Synagogue in his time: The ſecond, either when they ſent the LXX Elders to Tranſlate the Bible, or when the Diſpute about the Reſurrection was ſo warmly diſcuſſed between the Sadducees and Phariſees: Genebrard ſuppoſes there were three; The firſt, compoſed by Ezrah, and approved of by the Synagogue; The ſecond, appointed by a Grand Aſſembly of the Synagogue, when they ſent the LXX, at which time, as he pretends, Tobit, Judith, Eccleſiaſticus, and the Book of Wiſdom, were added to the Canon; The third, at the time of the famous Controverſie between the Sadducees and Phariſees, when the Books of the Maccabees, according to him, were Solemnly approved and received.

(d) But 'tis a great deal more probable, that they never had but one Canon.] It is unqueſtionably true, that Ezrah received, and collected the Sacred Volumes, and conſequently that he was the Author of the Canon amongſt the Jews. Neither they, nor the ancient Chriſtians acknowledged any other. As for the Books, which, as they pretend, were inſerted into the other Canons, 'tis certain they were never owned by the Jews; and what they talk about the two great Aſſemblies of the Synagogues, that were Convened upon that Occaſion, is all a Chimera and Fiction. The Ancients themſelves never make the leaſt mention of the Approbation of the Synagogue or Sanedrim of the Jews, which our Moderns boaſt of ſo mightily. Some are of Opinion, That Nehemiah added the two Books of Ezrah to the Canon, and found their Notion upon what is ſaid in the 2d. Book of Maccabees, ch. 2. v. 13. that he gathered together the Books of David, and the Prophets, and the Books of the Kings, &c. But this only proves, that he erected a Library, as it is intimated in that place, and not made a Collection of the Sacred Books. Others ſay, that we ought to attribute this Canon to Judas Maccabeus, becauſe it is ſaid in the firſt of Maccabees, Chap. 1. Verſe 56. that Antiochus and his Miniſters burnt and tore to pieces the Books of the Law: And in the ſecond Book, Chap. 2. Verſe 13, 14. the Jews of Jeruſalem acquaint their Brethren that were in Ægypt, that Judas Maccabeus had gathered together all thoſe things that were loſt by reaſon of the War. This does not prove that Ezrah's Canon was intirely loſt, and that Judas compoſed another, but only that he got other Copies of thoſe Sacred Books that were burnt and torn under Antiochus, and made a Collection of ſeveral pieces relating to the Hiſtory of their Wars, which was never received into the Jewiſh Canon. Our Opinion is invincibly proved by the Concurring Teſtimonies of Joſephus and St. Jerome.

(e) But it is viſible, that this Citation has been ſince inſerted into the true Text of Joſephus.] The paſſage which, as they pretend, is cited by Joſephus, is in Chap. 42. of Eccleſiaſticus, Verſe 14. Better is the Churliſhneſs of a Man, than a Courteous Woman. 'Tis beyond diſpute, that it was afterwards added, for Joſephus propoſes in that place to cite the Laws of Moſes, and this paſſage makes nothing at all to the purpoſe. In the Ancient Verſion of Ruffinus this Quotation is not to be found, which makes it evident, that it has been added ſince.

(f) There are no others cited in the New Teſtament, but thoſe that were received into the Canon of the Jew.] Some Perſons ſay, that the Book of Wiſdom is cited by St. Paul, Rom. 11. in theſe words, Who hath known the Mind of the Lord? Or who hath been his Counſellor? Which they ſay are the very ſame in effect with thoſe in Wiſdom, Chap. 9. For what Man can know the Counſel of God? But this paſſage cited by the Apoſtle is to be found word for word in Iſaiah, Chap. 40. Verſ. 13. where the Greek Terms are the ſame that are uſed by St. Paul, St. Baſil, L. de Spir. Sancto, Ch. 5. Tertullian in his fifth Book againſt Marcion, Ch. 14. St. Ambroſe, or rather the Author of the Commentaries upon St. Paul, that are falſly attributed to him, Peter Lombard, and ſeveral others obſerve, that it is taken out of Iſaiah. 'Tis alſo pretended, that the paſſage in his Epiſtle to the Hebrews, where it is ſaid, that Enoch was tranſlated, that he might not taſte of Death, is taken out of that Book. But it is in Geneſis, Chap. 5. Verſ. 25. It is likewiſe ſaid, that there are ſeveral Alluſions in the Goſpel and the Epiſtles of the Apoſtles to ſome places in Eccleſiaſticus, the Book of Wiſdom, Judith, and Tobit. Every one abounds in his own ſenſe, and can find out what Reſemblances or Alluſions he pleaſes; but it is not neceſſary that two Perſons that have happen'd upon the ſame thought, ſhould take it one from the other. S. Juſtin, and the Ancients, don't accuſe the Jews, for not acknowledging all the Books of Holy Scripture for Canonical. Theophilus ſays, that Zechariah is the laſt of the Prophets, and concludes the Holy Scripture with Ezrah.

(g) A great part of theſe are quoted there.] Theſe are all Books that are cited there; Geneſis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joſhua, the ſecond Book of Samuel, the firſt of Kings, Job, the Pſalms, the Proverbs, Iſaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hoſea, Joel, Amos, Jonah, Micah, Haggai, Habakkuk, Nahum, Zechariah, Malachi.

(h) Gregory Nazianzen diſtributes the Books of Scripture into Hiſtorical, Poetical, and Prophetical. This Diſtribution in my Opinion, ſeems to be the juſteſt, and moſt natural.

(i) By that of the Roman Council held under Gelaſius, Anno Dom. 494.] There is mention made in this Catalogue but of one Book of Ezrah, and one Book of Maccabees, although the Number of Books is not exactly diſtinguiſhed in all the reſt. For Example: Regnorum libri quatuor —— —— —— Eſdras liber unus, Maccabæorum liber unus. In ſome Manuſcripts Job is not mentioned there, and they read Maccabæorum libri duo.

(k) St. Jerome, who frequently rejects it as Apocryphal, and puts it out of the Canon, not only of the Jews, but the Chriſtians alſo.] Every time that St. Jerome treats expreſly about the Canonical Books in his Prologue to the Kings, to the Books of Salomon, Ezrah, and Eſther, in his Epiſtles 7 and 103 to Paulinus, in his Commentary upon Ezekiel in l. 17. ch. 43. he always rejects thoſe Books that are not to be found in the Canon of the Hebrews as Apocryphal, and only fit to be conſidered as ſuch. But when he ſpeaks without making any manner of reflection, he frequently cites theſe very Books as parts of the Holy Scripture, and attributes the ſame Character to the Book of the Wiſdom of Salomon, although it is certain, that he believed the contrary. In his Prefaces before Judith and Tobit, as if he had a Mind to reſtore the Reputation of theſe Books, he ſpeaks very advantageouſly of them.

(l) The Book of Wiſdom and Eccleſiaſticus.] Beſides ſeveral Alluſions to the Scripture, which might be produced, but don't prove, that they were cited from thence, St. Barnabas cites a paſſage drawn out of the Book of Wiſdom, Chap. 2. Verſ. 12. and another out of Eccleſiaſticus, Chap. 4. Verſ. 36. Clemens Romanus, in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, has quoted the Book of Wiſdom, Chap. 11. Verſe 22. Tertullian likewiſe has quoted the ſame Author in his Book againſt Marcion, towards the end, and in his Preſcriptions. Clemens Alexandrinus has alſo quoted him frequently. Saint Cyprian very often quotes theſe two Books, and aſcribes them to Salomon. Origen mentions the Book of Wiſdom under the Name of Scripture in Epiſt. ad Hebr. in his third Book againſt Celſus, and in his eighth Homily upon Exodus, as he alſo cites Eccleſiaſticus, Tom. 2. —— upon St. Matthew, Treatiſe the 24th: And Euſebius, l. 6. of his Hiſtory, Chap. 13. ſays, That although St. Clement cites theſe Books, yet they are for the moſt part rejected. St. Hilary cites them upon the Pſalm 104. St. Baſil alſo cites them ſometimes, and particularly in his fifth Book againſt Eunomius. So does St. Jerome frequently, in his Commentary upon Pſalm 73. in his 16th Book upon Iſaiah, and in his 33d Book upon Ezekiel, and in his ſecond Book upon Iſaiah. St. Auſtin does the ſame in abundance of places. They are likewiſe cited by the Author of the Book of Divine Names, and of the Hierarchy, in the laſt Book, Chap. 2. in the firſt, Chap. 4. In the Letter of the Council of Sardica, ſet down by Theodoret, Hiſt. l. 2. c. 8. By Anaſtaſius Sinaita, lib. 9. In Exam. Orat. 2. De incircumſcripto, and Queſt. 8. and 10. By Johannes Damaſcenus, l. 4. Of the Orthodox Faith, Chap. 16. In his third Oration of the Nativity, and in his Sermon of the Dead. But to cite a Book, as Gretzer obſerves, is not to declare it to be Canonical. Theſe Books are thrown out of the Canon by thoſe very Perſons that cite them under the Name of Scripture, and they that attribute them to Salomon, when they cite them, at other times formally deny it. Some ſeem to think, that the Book of Eccleſiaſticus is cited by thoſe who produce this Sentence as from the Scripture, Do nothing without advice. Such as St. Baſil in his ſhort Rules, Queſt. 104. Euſebius de Præp. Evang. Lib. 12. Caſſian, Conference 2. Boniface, Epiſt. 98. The Council of Epheſus, in the Epiſtle to the Synod of Pamphylia. But the ſame Sentence is in ſubſtance in the 13th Chapter of the Proverbs, Verſ. 16. and is word for word in the 24th Chapter, Verſe 13. of the Septuagint Verſion, from whence theſe Fathers quoted it; as well as Iſidore Peluſiota, who frequently uſes it. The Proverbs likewiſe are very often cited by the Ancients under the Name of Wiſdom, by Melito in his Catalogue, Proverbia quæ & Sapientia, for ſo it ought to be tranſlated, and not Proverbia & Sapientia; by Origen, Hom. 17. upon Geneſis, upon Exodus, and Numbers; by the Author who has written under the Name of Dionyſius of Alexandria againſt Paulus Samoſatenus; by the Author of the Conſtitutions, frequently by St. Baſil, Conſt. Monaſt. C. 3. and 16. by Gregory Nazianzen, Orat. 1. and 26. And by Gregory Nyſſene in his 7th Book of The Life of Moſes, and in his 7th Book againſt Eunomius. By the Council in Trullo, Chap. 64. By the ſecond Council of Nice, Act. 6. The Proverbs verbs are alſo called by St. Clement of Alexandria, Stromata. By Hegeſippus, and the Ancients, Παρεμβολαί.

(m) St. Baſil ſufficiently obſerves, that he did not own the Books of Wiſdom and Eccleſiaſticus for Canonical.] In his Epiſt. 406. to Amphilochius, he tells us, that Philo ſpeaking of the Manna, has ſaid according to the Tradition of the Jews, that it had a different Taſte according to the difference of Palats or Appetites. Now this is expreſly ſaid in the Book of Wiſdom. St. Baſil therefore believed it was written by Philo, if this is the Book whereof he ſpeaks, or at leaſt that it was no Book of Scripture, for otherwiſe he would not barely have called an Opinion, that is ſo clearly eſtabliſhed there in the 16th Chapter, by the Name of a Jewiſh Tradition. The ſame St. Baſil, Lib. 2. contr. Eunom. ſays, that this paſſage, Dominus creavit me initium viarum ſuarum, is only to be found once in Scripture. Socrates ſays the ſame thing, Lib. 4. Cap. 7. If they had acknowledged the Book of Wiſdom to be Canonical, they ought to have ſaid that this Sentence is twice to be found in the Bible, becauſe we read it in the Book of Wiſdom, as well as in the Proverbs.

SECT. III.

The Hiſtory of the Hebrew Text. Of the Verſion of the Septuagint, and other Greek Verſions of the Old Teſtament.

THE Books of Moſes, and (a) almoſt all the reſt of the Books of the Old Teſtament, were written in Hebrew. The ancient (b) Characters, which Moſes and the other Authors, that wrote before the Captivity, made uſe of, according to the common Opinion, were the Samaritan. For after the Diviſion of the Ten Tribes under Rehoboam the Son of Salomon, the Iſraelites preſerved the Pentateuch in the ſame form they received it from Moſes. and (c) gave it afterwards to the Men of Cuth, who came to ſettle in their place at Samaria, from whence they were called Samaritans. The Tribes of Judah and Benjamin alſo preſerved the ſame Characters till the Babyloniſh Captivity. But being once carried away into Babylon, they inſenſibly uſed themſelves to write and ſpeak after the manner of the Chaldeans. Therefore it was, that (d) Ezrah, having reviewed, and gathered together the Books of the Bible, uſed the new Chaldee Characters, as being better known to the Jews than the Ancient, which they have uſed almoſt always ever ſince. But the Jews not only borrowed their Characters from the Chaldeans, but they borrowed their Language alſo, which was the ſame with that of the Syrians or Aſſyrians, and came very near the Hebrew (e). It is very certain, that at firſt this Language was not common to all the Jews, that they all underſtood Hebrew, and that there were likewiſe ſome Perſons that ſpoke it ſtill; ſo that the Chaldee and Hebrew Tongue were at the ſame time common in Judea (f). But by little and little they were confounded together, and the Vulgar Language of the Jews became the Syriack, but mixed with ſeveral Hebrew Terms, which was afterwards commonly called Hebrew. Nevertheleſs, the Sacred Books ſtill continued written in Hebrew, and the Jews read them in that Language in their Synagogues; but the ancient Hebrew Language being no longer common, and beginning to be leſs intelligible to all the Jews, they explained the Original Hebrew in their Synagogues, and this perhaps might give the firſt occaſion to the (g) Chaldee Paraphraſes, though thoſe we now have ſeem to be of a later date. The Hebrew Text continued in this ſtate without Points, till about the Year of our Lord 500, at which time the (h) Jews of Tiberias invented the Points, to limit and reſtrain the Reading and Pronunciation of the Hebrew Tongue.

I will not loſe any time in endeavouring to prove all theſe things by any larger Explications, ſince any Man may ſee them more amply handled by thoſe Perſons, who have wrote Volumes of purpoſe upon theſe Subjects; Neither will I diſcourſe of the Oriental Verſions of the Old Teſtament, that are all new, and beſides of a very inconſiderable authority. But I cannot forbear to ſpend ſome time about the Greek Verſion of the Bible made by the LXX, whom we commonly rank in the number of Eccleſiaſtical Authors.

It has been long diſputed, whether there was not a Greek Verſion of the Books of the Bible more ancient than the Septuagint. St. Clement of Alexandria, Euſebius, and ſome other ancient Writers, who pretend, that Plato, and ſeveral other Pagan Philoſophers, have borrowed many paſſages out of the Books of the Bible, were of opinion, that they were Tranſlated into Greek before the Seventy undertook that buſineſs. They that follow this opinion, ſupport it principally by the Teſtimony of Ariſtobulus related by Euſebius, who ſays, that before the time of the Seventy, ſome Perſons had explained, all that concerned the Laws of the Jews, their departure out of Egypt, and whatever happen'd to them after the taking of their Country; words that ſeem to intimate, that the Pentateuch had been Tranſlated before the Verſion of the Septuagint. St. Auguſtin, l. 18. De Civit. Dei, ch. 11. and Baronius after him deny it, and aſſure us, that the firſt Verſion of the Bible was the Septuagint.

Huetius endeavours to reconcile theſe two Opinions, by ſaying, that there were only ſome few fragments of the Old Teſtament tranſlated before the Septuagint, but that theſe LXX Elders were the firſt, that made an entire Verſion of all the Sacred Volumes. He grounds his Opinion upon the above-cited paſſage of Ariſtobulus, which ought to be only underſtood, ſays he, of ſome parts, as the Circumlocution he uſes makes it appear, as well as what he adds, that the Law was firſt entirely tranſlated under Ptolomy Philadelphus. But in caſe this Book of Ariſtobulus ſhould only be the work of an Hellen iſt Jew, as it is exceeding probable, this Opinion would become very uncertain. Let us go on now to the Verſion of the Septuagint.

All the Ancient Fathers have believed after Joſephus and Philo, that the Verſion of the Bible, commonly called the Septuagint, was compoſed by Seventy or Seventy two Jews ſent to Ptolomy Philadelphus, who deſired to have the Jewiſh Books in Greek, that he might place them in the Magnificent Library which he had lately erected at Alexandria by the care and induſtry of Demetrius Phalereus an Athenian. This has gone a long time for conſtant Matter of Fact, nor was it ever queſtioned but in our Age, in which ſome Criticks have been found, that have looked upon this Hiſtory to be fabulous. We ſhall examine the conjectures they generally bring to prove it.

In the firſt place they ſay, that this Story is wholly founded upon the Authority of Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus, from whom Joſephus and Philo have taken all that they ſay in this matter, and that if theſe two Authors ſhould prove ſpurious, as the greateſt part of the Criticks agree they are, then there would be no other credible Witneſs of the truth of this buſineſs, the Fathers having talked of them only upon the relation of theſe Authors. Secondly, theſe Criticks pretend, that this Hiſtory does not in any manner agree with the Chronology of thoſe times, and they demonſtrate it thus: All thoſe Authors, ſay they, who ſpeak of this ſubject, ſuppoſe, that it was Demetrius Phalereus, who had been formerly a great Man at Athens, that took the pains to make the Jews come to tranſlate the Books of the Bible, and in the mean time they pretend, that this Verſion was compoſed under the Reign of Ptolomy Philadelphus. Now Demetrius could not be in reputation under Ptolomy Philadelphus, nor could he be alive at that time, when they ſuppoſe that this Verſion was made. For it is certain, that Demetrius lived in Egypt under the Reign of Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, and that having counſelled this Prince to name for his Succeſſors the Children which he had by Euridice, he incurred the diſgrace of Ptolomy Philadelphus, who baniſhed him the Court immediately after the Death of his Father, and ordered him to be kept cloſe in a certain Province, where he died ſoon after, as Hermippus, cited by Diogenes Laertius, teſtifies. All which makes it evident, that in the firſt place Demetrius was never in any credit with Ptolomy Philadelphus, and conſequently, that he was not Superviſor of his Library, nor ordered to bring the Jews to tranſlate the Bible: Secondly, that the Verſion of the Septuagint being made, as we are obliged to ſuppoſe, ſome years after the beginning of Philadelphus's Reign, Demetrius could not be employed in that affair, ſince he was dead before. 'Tis commonly anſwered, that Ptolomy Philadelphus reigned ſome time along with his Father, as 'tis obſerved in Euſebius's Chronicon, and that in this time he took care of the Library, and got the Verſion of the Bible to be made. 'Tis likewiſe urged, that this is the reaſon why ſome Authors place this Tranſlation in the time of Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, and others in the time of Ptolomy Philadelphus. But in my Opinion, this Anſwer does not clearly remove the difficulty, ſince Ariſteas and Joſephus tell us in expreſs words, that it happen'd under the Reign of Ptolomy Philadelphus, and that he was the King who took ſo much care to compleat his Library, without making the leaſt mention of his Father. 'Twas to him alone that Demetrius addreſs'd himſelf, to procure his Letters to the Jews, he was the only Man that wrote them; In a word, all Authors who ſay this matter happen'd under his Reign, ſpeak not one word of Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, and thoſe that affirm, that it happen'd under the firſt Ptolomy, don't mention a Syllable of Philadelphus. Vitruvius in the Preface to his 7th Book, tells us, that Ptolomy Philadelphus made a Library in imitation of the Kings of Pergamus, and that Ariſtophanes, an Athenian Grammarian was his Library Keeper, from whence it follows, that Demetrius never managed that Office, and that the Library was not begun till after his Death. For that King of Pergamus, in imitation of whom Ptolomy Philadelphus erected his Library, was Eumenes, who could not poſſibly do it till after the Death of Demetrius; and therefore Suidas ſays, the Verſion of the Septuagint was not made till the 33d year of the Reign of Philadelphus, and he obſerves, that Zenodotus was his Library Keeper. This ſtill diſcovers another contradiction in Chronology, that is to be found in Ariſteas's and Joſephus's Narration; for they ſay, that the Seventy came into Egypt when Ptolomy made a Solemn Feſtival, occaſioned by a Naval Victory which he obtained over Antigonus. This Sea-Fight ought to be the ſame, which Diodorus mentions in his 20th Book, and happen'd in the third year of the 118 Olympiad. Now at that time Demetrius was not come into Egypt, where he came not till after the Death of Caſſander, which happen'd in the ſecond year of the 120th Olympiad, according to the Teſtimony of Hermippus. And though one ſhould ſtill maintain, that he came thither at that time, yet it is certain, that Eleazer was not then the High Prieſt, ſince according to Euſebius, he did not begin to be ſo till the 123d Olympiad. They obſerve alſo another Soleciſm in Chronology, and that is in the Epiſtle attributed to Demetrius by Ariſteas: For Hecataeus of Abdera, that was Demetrius's Contemporary, is there cited as a Man that had been dead a long while ago. Thirdly, 'tis urged againſt the Truth of this Story, that it is notoriouſly full of the fictions and inventions of the Helleniſt Jews. It is ſuppoſed there, that Eleazer choſe Seventy two Men, by taking ſix out of every Tribe. Now all the World knows, that at this time ſome of the Tribes were not to be found there, as having been carried away out of Judea, by Shalmanezer after the taking of Samaria. To this it may perhaps be replied, that there were ſtill remaining amongſt the Jews ſome Perſons deſcended from all thoſe Tribes that were concealed in the Tribe of Judah, but that Eleazer ſhould find juſt Six and no more in every Tribe, who were able to do ſuch a buſineſs, ſeems, as they ſay, to look a little too fabulous. 'It is certain, ſays a modern Critick, that if we reflect a little upon the Hiſtory of Ariſteas, and read 'it with never ſo little Application, we ſhall be convinced, that an Helleniſt Jew wrote this Book 'under the name of Ariſteas in favour of his own Nation. The Miracles that are related there, and 'the very manner in which it is written, give us a true Idea of a Jewiſh Genius, which always and 'eſpecially at that time, delighted to publiſh Forgeries, that contained ſcarce any thing but extra-'ordinary things. He tells us, that ſome Perſons having formed a deſign to Tranſlate theſe Sacred 'Volumes, were deterred from their bold reſolution by a ſignal puniſhment from Heaven, that Theo-'pompus having determined to inſert ſome part of their Law into the body of his Hiſtory, became 'mad; That the ſame Theopompus having pray'd to God, during the intermiſſion of his Diſtemper, 'to diſcover to him the cauſe of this unfortunate accident, God anſwered him in a Dream, that it 'happened to him for his great preſumption in endeavouring to make common thoſe ſacred things 'that ought to be kept private, and that he was reſtored to his former health, after having deſiſted 'from this Enterprize. We read in the ſame place, that Theodectus, a Tragick Poet, loſt his ſight, 'for having preſumptuouſly attempted to inſert a paſſage of the Bible into his Works, but that he 'recovered his Sight upon acknowledgment of his fault, and begging pardon of God. After all, the Authors of the Books attributed to Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus ſay nothing but what is great and pompous, and extraordinary. Ariſteas for example does not content himſelf with ſaying, that the Seventy carried a Copy of the Law, but he adds, that they brought one written in Caaracters of Gold. He makes Demetrius give the King a Petition, that they might have the Books of the Jews. He deſcribes the Table, and the other Preſents, which King Ptolomy offer'd to the Temple at Jeruſalem, very fabulouſly. In a word, there is ſcarce one ſingle Circumſtance in the whole Narration, that does not look very like a fable.

Theſe reaſons, and many others which may yet be brought, have made ſeveral Criticks reject theſe Books that are attributed to Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus; and what is yet more material, there are ſome Perſons that doubt, whether there were ever any Verſion compoſed by the 70 Jews that were ſent to Ptolomy Philadelphus. As for my ſelf, although I am heartily perſwaded, that theſe Books of Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus are ſpurious, yet nevertheleſs (i) I am of opinion, that we cannot abſolutely deny, that there was a Greek Tranſlation of the Bible made in the time of Ptolomy Philadelphus: But I dare by no means affirm, that this buſineſs was done perfectly after the ſame manner, as we find it related in the Book attributed to Ariſteas.

Now as the Jews are fruitful in Fictions, ſo they are not content with retailing thoſe, that are to be found in this Author, but they have likewiſe added abundance of more extraordinary paſſages, in ſuppoſing that theſe 72 Perſons were ſhut up ſeverally each Man in a particular Cell, and that they all of 'em Tranſlated the Scripture in the ſame manner, inſomuch that all their Tranſlations were found conformable to each other, not only in the ſame Senſe, but even in the ſame Words and Expreſſions. Upon this foundation they pretend, that they were inſpired by God, and that their Verſion ought to be conſidered, as wholly Divine. Some of the Fathers that were extremely inclined to value the Authority of this Tranſlation, readily believed this Fiction of the Jews (k) but St. Jerom, who had examined theſe things more exactly, and who preferred the Hebrew Text to the Tranſlation of the Septuagint, laughed at this Story with reaſon, ſince neither Ariſteas, nor Philo, nor Joſephus, who were the firſt Perſons that gave us the Hiſtory of this Verſion, ſpoke a word concerning theſe little Cells; but on the contrary Ariſteas, or the Author of the Book that bears his name, tells us, that the Seventy, when they made this Verſion, concerted matters amongſt themſelves, and conferr'd together. 'Tis upon the Teſtimony of the ſame Author, that St. Jerome aſſures us, that the Seventy only Tranſlated the five Books of Moſes. Ariſteas, Ariſtobulus, and Philo, tell us, that they Tranſlated no more than the Law, a word which ordinarily ſignifies the Pentateuch only. And though we might underſtand it of all the Books of the Old Teſtament, which is not true, yet Joſephus utterly excludes this Explication, by telling us, that this Law was that of the Legiſlator of the Jews, which paſſage can only agree to Moſes and his Books. The Talmudiſts are of the ſame Opinion. On the other ſide St. Auſtin, and the greateſt part of the ancient Fathers, believed, that the Seventy Tranſlated all the Bible, becauſe in their time the Greek Verſion of the Books of Scripture, that are joyned to the five Books of Moſes, went under the name of the Septuagint: But it is far more probable to believe, that the Seventy only Tranſlated the five Books of Moſes, and that the following Books were from time to time Tranſlated by other Authors, as the difference of the ſtyle, that is to be obſerved between the ſeveral Verſions, ſufficiently ſhews, ſince we have not the poſitive Teſtimonies of the Seventy to the contrary, But though the Greek Verſion of the other Books of the Bible, joyned to that of the LXX, was not performed by them, yet we muſt acknowledge, that it is very ancient, and that the Jews had no other before our Saviour was born.

But after the Chriſtian Religion was ſetled, as the Chriſtians ſupported themſelves by the Authority of the Verſion of the LXX, ſo ſome of the Jews reſolved to make a new Tranſlation of the Books of the Bible, which as they pretend, ſhould be more conformable to the Hebrew Text, and leſs favourable to the Chriſtians (l) Aquila the Jew, who lived in the time of Adrian, was the firſt Man that thought of this deſign, and after put it into execution, by Tranſlating the Hebrew Text into Greek word for word. Afterwards Theodotion (m,) a Diſciple of Tatian, who after turned Marcionite and at laſt a Jew, and flouriſhed in the time of the Emperor Commodus, made another Greek Verſion of the whole Bible, in which, as he does not confine himſelf ſo cloſely to the Letter, as Aquila did

ſo neither does he depart ſo far from it as Symmachus (n,) the Author of the third Verſion who lived in the time of the Emperor Severus. He had formerly been a Jew, and at laſt went over to the Sect of the Ebionites, which comes up very near to Judaiſm. His Verſion is much freer, and he only concerns himſelf to render the Senſe, without ſticking at the words (o.) In the time of the Emperor Caracalla there was another Verſion of the Books of the Bible found, or at leaſt of one part thereof, and likewiſe a ſixth under Alexander the Son of Mammea, which is called the Nicopolitan. Laſtly, Origen added a Seventh Verſion, but that reached the Pſalms only. The Hexapla, and Tetrapla of Origen were compoſed of theſe Verſions. In the Hexapla, they were joyned to the Hebrew Text written two ways, that is to ſay, in Greek Characters, and in Hebrew Characters, and this compoſed the two firſt Columns of the Work: In the third Column ſtood Aquila's Tranſlation, which was joyned to the Hebrew Text, as following the letter more Religiouſly than any of the reſt. The Verſion of the Septuagint was placed between that of Symmachus and Theodotion, and ſo theſe three Verſions compoſed three Columns: the two other Verſions were ranked in the two laſt Columns, and the Seventh, which was of the Book of Pſalms, in the ninth Column. I think that this Work ought rather to be called Octapla than Hexapla, being compoſed of eight Columns; and therefore ſome have believed, that the Hexapla did not contain the fifth and ſixth Verſion, but only the other four; and that theſe two Verſions having been added ſince Origen, they then made Octapla of them. But Euſebius, and (p) St. Jerome, with ſeveral of the ancient Writers, make no diſtinction at all between the Octapla and Hexapla, but only between the Tetrapla and the Hexapla, and plainly affirm, that both the fifth and ſixth Verſion were in the Hexapla of Origen, and even the ſeventh of the Book of Pſalms. Therefore we muſt either ſay, that they counted not the two Columns of the Hebrew Text, or elſe, that the fifth and ſixth Verſions were only of ſome particular Books of the Bible; and that thus the ſame Work of Origen had ſix Columns in ſome places, in others eight, and even nine in the Pſalms, but that they were called Hexapla, either becauſe there were generally but ſix Columns, or becauſe the fifth and ſixth Columns were afterwards added. And this appears to be the Opinion of St. Epiphanius, which the Learned Huetius has ſo excellently explained. In the Tetrapla, that were made after the Hexapla, Origen has retrenched the fifth and ſixth Verſions, as alſo the two Columns of the Hebrew Text, ſo that they were only compoſed of the Verſions of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion. We muſt ſtill obſerve, that the Verſion of the Septuagint, that was in the Hexapla, and Tetrapla, was corrected and augmented in ſeveral places, yet without being changed. For Origen added there ſome paſſages taken from Theodotion, which he marked with an Aſterisk, and as for thoſe places, that as he ſuppoſed ought to be cut off, and retrenched, he incloſed them between two Hooks. Since that there have been three Verſions of the Septuagint uſed in the Church. The firſt is the ancient or vulgar, and was received by Lucian, it was uſed in Conſtantinople, and in the Eaſt. The ſecond was that of Heſychius, which they uſed in Alexandria, and all over Egypt. Laſtly, the third, which was uſed in Paleſtine, was the ſame with that, which was in the Hexapla of Origen, and which Euſebius and Pamphilus tranſcribed, and publiſhed ſeparately. Here, ſays St. Jerome, are the three different Verſions of Scripture, that divide the whole Earth. Totúſque orbis hac inter ſe trifariâ varietate compugnat. I ſhall not ſay any thing about the Authority of the Verſion of the Septuagint, compared with that Hebrew Text, becauſe it is a great and famous Queſtion that does not in the leaſt concern that deſign I have propoſed to my ſelf.

NOTES.

(a) WERE almoſt all written in Hebrew.] We muſt except Judith, Tobit, ſome Chapters of Daniel, and ſome of the firſt Book of Ezrah, which are written in Chaldee, and ſome other Chapters of the ſame Prophet Daniel, with the Books of the Maccabees that are written in Greek.

(b) The Characters which Moſes made uſe of, &c. were the Samaritan.] This Opinion was taken for granted in St. Jerome's time, as he himſelf obſerves in his Preface to the Kings, and it is confirmed by ancient Medals, where we find this Inſcription, Holy Jeruſalem, written in Hebrew in the Samaritan Characters; and this could not be written after the diviſion of the Tribes, for at that time the Samaritans did not conſider Jeruſalem as an Holy City.

(c) Gave it to the Men of Cuth.] 'Tis far more probable, that the Men of Cuth had the Books of the Law rather from the Iſraelites than the Jews. In the firſt place, becauſe they preſerved them written in the ancient Character, which makes it evident, that they did not receive them after the Captivity, ſince the Jews at that time wrote in Syriack Characters. Secondly, becauſe the Collection of the Sacred Books amongſt the Samaritans only contained the Pentateuch, and conſequently they received them of the Iſraelites, who acknowledged no other Books but theſe to be Sacred, and not of the Jews, who admitted the reſt.

(d) Ezrah having reviewed and gathered together the Books of the Bible.] I have followed the common opinion of the Jews and Holy Fathers, who aſcribe the collecting and reviſing of the Sacred Volums of the Old Teſtament to Ezrah: Others are of Opinion, that it was Nehemiah that took this care, but let the matter be how it will, certain certain it is, that the Jews at their return from their Babylonian Captivity, took care to ſearch after and gather their Books together. The Author of the fourth Book of Eſdras, which is a Book full of falſities and fictions, ſuppoſeth, that all the Copies of the Sacred Books being burnt or loſt, Ezrah dictated them all anew by a Divine Inſpiration. We have this Fable at length in the 14th Chapter of this Book, where, it is tack'd to ſeveral other fooliſh Whimſies. St. Clement of Alexandria, Theodoret, and St. Baſil have followed this Opinion, without reflecting upon it; but others who have uſed more precaution in this matter, are content to ſay with us, that Ezrah collected, review'd, digeſted, and put in order the Books of Holy Scripture, when there were many Copies of it as yet remaining. This is the opinion of St. Irenæus, Tertullian, St. Jerome, St. Chryſoſtom, the Author of the Abridgement of the Bible, commonly attributed to St. Athanaſius, and of ſeveral others. The firſt opinion is not only extremely prejudicial to Religion, but impoſſible to be maintain'd. For firſt, What probability is there, that the Jews during the Captivity, ſhould loſe all the Copies of that Book, for which they always preſerved ſo profound a veneration, and which was the foundation of their Religion? Why ſhould we think, that not one ſingle Man amongſt them kept it by him? Is it credible, that Ezekiel Daniel, and Jeremiah were deprived of reading the Books of the Law? Can one conceive, that Ezrah had no other knowledge of them than by Inſpiration? He, I ſay, that was ſo learned a Doctor of the Law of Moſes at the time when he was in Babylon, as it appears, ch. 7. v. 6. of the firſt Book of Ezrah. 2. We ought to make the ſame reflection upon the Iſraelites of the Ten Tribes. Now it is not probable, that they did not carry the Holy Books along with them. The Book of Tobit informs us, that Tobit read the Prophecy of Amos Tob. c. 2. v. 6. 3. And 3dly, is it not paſt diſpute, that the Men of Cuth preſerved the Pentateuch which the Iſraelites of the Ten Tribes gave them?

4. It appears by the 9th Chapter of Daniel, that the Jews had the Books of Moſes, and read them during the Captivity. All Iſrael, ſays this Prophet, have tranſgreſſed thy Law, even by departing, that they might not obey thy voice, and therefore the curſe is poured upon us, and the oath that is written in the Law of Moſes, becauſe we have ſinned againſt him. And a little lower, All this evil is come upon us, as it is written in the Law of Moſes. 5. It is ſaid in the ſixth Chapter of the Book of Ezrah, that the building of the Temple was finiſhed in the ſixth year of Darius, and that the Prieſts and Levites were eſtabliſhed in their Miniſterial Functions, as it is written in the Law of Moſes. Sicut ſcriptum eſt in lege Moyſis. Now Ezrah was not yet come up to Jeruſalem, for it is related in the following Chapter, that he arrived in Judea in the ſeventh year of King Artaxerxes. 6. In the ſecond Book of Ezrah, ch. 8. the People being deſirous to be inſtructed in the Law of Moſes, did not requeſt him to dictate it to them anew, but only to bring the Book of the Law of Moſes, which the Lord had given to the People of Iſrael. Et dixerunt Eſdræ ſcribæ, ut afferret librum legis Moyſis quam præceperat Deus Iſraeli, And it is ſaid immediately after, that Ezrah brought the Book of the Law, and read it before all the People. It will be ſaid, perhaps, that I have borrowed theſe Reaſons out of another Man's Book; I own it, but I thought they were ſuitable to the preſent occaſion.

(e) It is very certain, that at firſt this Language was not common to all the Jews.] This is abundantly proved againſt the common Opinion, by what is ſaid in the Book of Nehemiah, ch 13. v. 24. that the Children of the Jews who had Married ſtrange Women, ſpoke Aſotice, and not Judaice. In the Hebrew the words are Aſhdodith, and Jehudith, and this laſt word in the ſecond Book of Kings, ch. 18. v. 26. is oppoſed to Aramith, which ſignifies in Syriack, Precamur, loquaris nobis Syriace & non Judaice; in the firſt Book of Ezrah, ch. 4. v. 7. and in the Prophet Daniel, ch. 2. v. 4. Aramith has ſtill the ſame ſignification. On the contrary Jehudith ſignifies the Hebrew Tongue in oppoſition to the Syriack, as we may ſee in the ſecond Book of Chron. ch. 32. v. 18. 2 Kings 18. 26. and in Iſaiah, ch. 36. v. 11. There were ſeveral Jews therefore in the time of Ezrah that ſtill ſpoke Hebrew. And this is evidently proved by the Books of Ezrah that were made ſince the Captivity, and yet were written in Hebrew, and not in Chaldee, except ſome Chapters of the firſt Book of Ezrah, where he tells us of the oppoſition, that the Officers of the King of Perſia, who ſpoke Chaldee, gave to the Jews. From whence it follows, that the Jews both underſtood and ſpoke Hebrew. For otherwiſe why ſhould Ezrah, if he deſigned to have his Books intelligible by all the Jews, write them in a Language, which was not natural to them. The ſame conſideration will hold good as to the Books of the latter Prophets, who wrote in Hebrew after the Captivity, and yet addreſſed their Prophecies to all the People. But laſtly, that which admits of no reply, is a remarkable paſſage in the Book of Nehemiah, ch. 8. and 9. where we find that the Law was read in Hebrew before the People, and all the People hearkened to it, and underſtood it; Theſe Remarks have been lately made by a very Ingenious and Learned Perſon. Mr. Simon indeed brags, that he has invincible Reaſons to overthrow them; When he has Honoured the World with a Sight of them, we ſhall ſee whether they are powerful enough to make us retract this Opinion, as he would willingly perſwade us they are; but in the mean time he ought not to take it amiſs, if till then, we continue in the ſame mind.

(f) The Syriack Tongue mix'd with Hebrew Words became the vulgar Language of the Jews, which was afterwards called the Hebrew Tongue.] The truth of this appears by the Hebrew Words that we find in the New Teſtament, which are all, as St. Jerome obſerves, Syriack Words, and what our bleſſed Saviour ſays, 'That one Iota of 'the Law of God ſhall paſs away, &c. makes it evident, that the Jews at that time uſed the preſent Hebrew Alphabet, and not the ancient, and it is demonſtrated from hence, that the י of the Jews was a little Letter, which is true of the Syriack [and Hebrew] Jod, and not of the Samaritan, which has three Feet.

(g) The Chaldee Paraphraſes which we have ſeen to be of a later date.] The Chaldee Paraphraſe is divided into three Parts: The firſt, that contains the Pentateuch, is attributed to Onkelos; The ſecond, that contains the Prophets, to Jonathan; The third, to one Joſephus the blind. There is likewiſe another Paraphraſe of the Pentateuch, called that of Jeruſalem, and another of the Canticles; but all theſe Paraphraſes are imperfect, as well as new. Since that time the Jews having committed to writing abundance of Traditions in a Book which they call Miſna, they afterwards compoſed Commentaries upon it, whereof the moſt celebrated is called the Gemera. But all theſe Books are full of ridiculous fooliſh Fictions, and have nothing common with the Scripture; The Maſora, that is, a ſort of a Critical Performance upon the Bible, is of more uſe and advantage. The Follies and Whimſies of the Cabala are impertinent and impious.

(h) About the year of our Lord 500, the Jews of Tiberias invented the Points.] Theſe Points were not uſed in St. Jerome's time, as may be eaſily proved from ſeveral Paſſages of this Father drawn out of his 22d Queſtion upon Jeremiah, and out of his Commentary upon Habakkuk, in Chap. 3. Verſ. 20. which abundantly ſhew that in his time the Pronunciation of the Hebrew Words was not determined by the Points, as it has been ſince.

(i) I am of opinion, that one cannot abſolutely deny, that there was a Greek Verſion of the Books of the Bible made in the time of Ptolomy Philadelphus.] It is not credible, that the Authors of the Books attributed to Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus entirely invented the whole Hiſtory, and that there is no part of it true. 'Tis far more probable, that they only added ſeveral Circumſtances to the Matter of Fact, which was aſſuredly certain. Mr. Simon imagines, that this Verſion was called the Septuagint, becauſe it was approved by the Sanedrim, but this is a Conjecture without any Foundation.

(k) Some of the Fathers have believed this Fiction of the Talmudiſts.] The Author of the Diſcourſe againſt the Greeks, attibuted to St. Juſtin, St. Irenæus, and St. Clement, believed it, St. Auſtin queſtioned and doubted the truth of it, St. Jerome laughs at it.

(l) Aquila the Jew.] A certain Syriack Author, cited by Monſieur Le Jai [the Publiſher of the French Polyglot,] tells us, that he was deſcended from Adrian, and adds many other Paſſages that are extremely improbable. St. Jerome aſſures us, that he was a Jew, in his Commentary upon the third Chapter of Habakkuk upon the third of Iſaiah, and in his Epiſtle to Marcellus.

(m) Theodotion the Diſciple of Tatian.] St. Jerom's Teſtimony confirms what we have ſaid here, St. Irenæus names him in his Book againſt Hereſie, from whence it follows, that he lived when Elutherius was Pope, (n) Symmachus, &c.] What we ſay concerning this Man, is taken out of St. Jerom in his Preface upon Job; Euſebius alſo ſays, l. 6. c. 7. that he was an Ebionite; and this is the reaſon why Hilary the Deacon, Author of The Commentary of St. Paul, attributed to St. Ambroſe, calls the Ebionites Symmachians.

(o) We yet find another Verſion of the Bible in the time of the Emperor Caracalla.] St. Epiphanius is of opinion, that this Fifth Verſion was found at Jericho, the Author of The Abridgment attributed to St. Athanaſius is of the ſame opinion: But Euſebius following the Teſtimony of Origen, tells us, that the ſixth was found at Nicopolis; that we don't know where Origen found the fifth: and that the ſeventh, which was only a Verſion of the Pſalms, was found at Jericho. Conſult Euſeb. l. 6. c. 16. St. Jerom aſſures us, that all theſe Tranſlations were made by Jews.

(p) Euſebius, St. Jerom, and ſeveral other Ancients make no diſtinction between the Octapla from the Hexapla.] They place the fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh Verſion, in what they call the Hexapla, St. Epiphanius in his Book of Weights and Meaſures, ſpeaks of the Octapla, but as of a Work which was not diſtinguiſhed from the Hexapla, for after he has deſcribed the Hexapla, he adds, And if we find there the fifth and ſixth Verſion added, it follows that we ought to call them Octapla. Theſe Columns were unqueſtionably written upon different Rolls, that were faſten'd one to the ſide of another.

SECT.

SECT. IV.

Of ſome Authors, whoſe Works have a Relation to the Old Teſtament, viz. Philo. T. Flavius Joſephus, Juſtus, Ariſteas, Ariſtobulus, Joſephus Bengorion; Beroſus, the falſe Dorotheus, Zoroaſter, &c.

THere are ſeveral Authors, whoſe Works, whether Genuine or Spurious, have a Relation to the Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament, whom we think our ſelves obliged to take ſome ſhort notice of.

Philo, a Jew of Alexandria, lived in the time of Caius Caligula, and was the chief Perſon of an Embaſſy, that the Jews ſent to the Emperor. He compoſed ſeveral Works upon the Old Teſtament, a Catalogue of which may be ſeen in Euſebius's Hiſtory, l. 2. ch. 8. and in St. Jerom's Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, as well as at the beginning of the Greek and Latin Impreſſion of his own Writings, printed at Paris 1640. This Author is a Platoniſt, and ſo well imitates Plato's Style, that he has been called by ſome The Jewiſh Plato: He explained the whole Bible by way of Allegory, he is very Eloquent and Diffuſive, his Works are full of Moral Thoughts, and continual Allegories upon all the Hiſtories of the Bible; he approaches very near the Notions of the Chriſtians in his Morals. His Works were publiſhed in Greek by Turnebus, and printed at Paris 1552. and at Francfort 1587. Tranſlated into Latin by Gelenius, and printed at Baſil 1554, and in 1561. at Lyons 1555, in Greek at Geneva 1603. and in Greek and Latin at Paris 1640.

Joſephus was deſcended of the Sacerdotal Race of the Aſmoneans, as we are told in his Life, which he wrote himſelf, where all his Employments and Actions are exactly related. He was born Anno Dom. 37. and died 93. He was Sirnamed Flavius, by reaſon of Veſpaſian. He compoſed the Hiſtory of the Jews, which he took for the moſt part out of the Books of the Bible, and continued it down to the time of the Wars of the Jews, under the Name of The Jewiſh Antiquities. He alſo wrote the Hiſtory of the War againſt the Romans, and the taking of Jeruſalem. He has likewiſe written, beſides his own Life, two excellent Books againſt Appion to anſwer the Objections, which that Heathen had muſter'd up againſt the Antiquity of the Jewiſh Nation, the Purity of the Law, and the Conduct of Moſes; and he has written a Treatiſe concerning the Martyrdom of the Maccabees, which is called by Eraſmus, and not without Reaſon, An exquiſite Maſter-piece of Eloquence. This Author wrote very politely, and the turn which he gives things, is very agreeable. His Hiſtory is beautified with admirable Deſcriptions, very eloquent Harangues, and very ſublime Thoughts; his Style is clear and faithful, he not only diverts his Readers, but he alſo brings them over to what ſide he pleaſes; in one word, he excites and calms the Paſſions as himſelf thinks fit. We may ſay, he is a perfect Hiſtorian, and we may juſtly call him the Levi of the Greeks. The Treatiſe of the Maccabees ſufficiently ſhews the Beauty of his Genius, and the Height of his Eloquence; and his Books againſt Appion demonſtrate his profound Learning, and the exactneſs of his Judgment. The Works of this Author have been printed ſeveral times in Latin, of the Tranſlation partly of Ruffinus, partly of Gelenius, and partly of Eraſmus; and at Geneva in Greek and Latin, Anno Dom. 1611. It were to be wiſh'd that we had a new Edition of it, in a better Letter, and better Paper.

Juſtus of Tiberias wrote alſo an Hiſtory of the Jews, and ſome Commentaries upon the Bible, but Joſephus accuſes him of Falſity and Lying. We had not placed him in the number of the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, if St. Jerom had not done it before us.

The Books of Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus concerning the Verſion of the Septuagint, are manifeſt Forgeries, and impoſed upon the World by ſome Helleniſt Jew, as we have already ſhewn when we were diſcourſing of that Verſion.

The Hiſtory of the War of the Jews by Joſephus Bengorion, was written by an Author that lived ſince St. Jerom's time. He ſpeaks of the Goths as being in Spain, and of the Franks in Gaul. Now theſe People were not ſetled in Spain and in France till about the Fifth Century, and ſo by conſequence this is a ſpurious Writer, who having ſtolen ſeveral things out of the true Joſephus, has mingled them after his manner with Fictions and Fables.

The Teſtament of the Twelve Patriarchs, which is extant in the firſt Volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum, is a Book wholly filled with Trifles and Impertinencies, and deſerves nothing but contempt. Neither ſhould one have a better opinion for the Abridgment of the Lives of the Prophets, the Apoſtles, and the other Diſciples, attributed to Dorotheus of Tyre, who ſuffered Martyrdom in the time of Dioclesian. It is a Book altogether unknown to the Ancients, full of groſs Faults and Miſtakes in Hiſtory, and made up of Fables and Tales to divert the Reader.

There are ſome Books that go under the Name of Beroſus the Chaldean, of Manetho the Egyptian, and of Metaſthenes; but they are altogether unworthy of thoſe great Men, whoſe Names they carry, and the Forgery is plain and manifeſt. All thoſe Paſſages out of the true Beroſus, cited by Joſephus in his Book againſt Appion, are not to be found in this Book that is aſcribed to him, but we find there are ſeveral Things that are clean contrary. He ſpeaks of the City of Lyons, which had not that Name till after Cæſar's time. In ſhort, the Hiſtory of Beroſus went no farther than the time of Nabuchadonoſor, and Nabopalaſſar, and this deſcends much lower.

The Book of (a) Zoroaſter, of The Sacred Hiſtory of the Perſians, a Fragment whereof is cited by Euſebius in his firſt Book De præpar. Evangel. is a ſuppoſititious Work, as well as the other Writings attributed to that fabulous Author. In fine, the Hiſtory of the Phenicians, which is ſuppoſed to be written by (b) Sanchoniathon, and tranſlated into Greek by Philo Biblius (c), who lived in the time of Adrian, is a Romance, wherein there are ſeveral Pages taken out of the Hiſtory of the Bible, and many Circumſtances of the Fables of the Greeks.

NOTES.

(a) Zoroaſter.] There were many of this Name, but 'tis generally held, that the firſt and moſt celebrated of them lived in the time of Nimrod, that he was King of the Bactrians, and that he was overcome by Ninus. They ſpeak wonderful Things of his Knowledge, his Wiſdom, and of the Prodigies which he wrote. They make him the firſt Author of the Perſian Philoſophy, which they called Magick. Plato ſpeaks of Zoroaſter as Inventor of the Science amongſt the Perſians, and obſerves that he was the Son of Oromazes. Eubulus, cited by Porphyry, attributes the Inſtitution of the Myſteries of the Goddeſs Mithra to him. Eudoxus and Hermippus, cited by Pliny, tells us, that he lived Six thouſand Years before Plato. But Cteſias, who has written the Hiſtory of Zoroaſter, teſtifies, that he lived in the time of Cyrus. This is the reaſon why Arnobius diſtinguiſhed the two Zoroaſters. Euſebius alſo makes Zoroaſter as old as Ninus, and St. Epiphanius ſays, that he lived in the time of Nimrod. He is called Zarades by the Perſians, and by the Greeks Zoroaſter. There are ſeveral Explications given of his Name: Some pretend, that it ſignifies a Living Star; others ſay, that he was the Son of Aſter; and laſtly, others tell us, that it ſignifies a Contemplator of the Stars. All that is related of the ancient Zoroaſter is fabulous. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the King of Bactria, that fought againſt Ninus, was named Oxiartes, and not Zoroaſter. Nevertheleſs there is a great deal of reaſon to believe, that there was a Man of this Name amongſt the Perſians, who taught 'em Magick. Hermippus tells us, that he made an infinite number of Verſes. The Fragment, which Euſebius cites in the 7th Chapter of his firſt Book De præparatione Evangelicâ, taken out of the Hiſtory of the Perſians attributed to this Author, has ſo plainly explained all the Attributes of God, that it is viſible, it was compoſed by an Author who was no Stranger to the Chriſtian Religion. Syneſius cites the Oracles of Zoroaſter, upon the Dreams that are taken out of the Works of the later Platoniſts. Theſe Oracles have been publiſh'd by Opſopæus, and printed at Paris 1599. with the Notes of Pſellus and Plato. 'Tis no difficult matter to diſcover, that theſe Writings have been forged by the Platoniſts, that lived ſince our Bleſſed Saviour.

(b) Sanchoniathon.] This Author was unknown to all the Ancients. Porphyry is the firſt Man that cited this Hiſtory, which is full of Fables and ridiculous Fictions. Whatever we there find concerning the Origine of the World, and the firſt Men, is taken out of Geneſis. From thence he has borrowed the Word Bohu to ſignifie Night, and that of Colpia, which is given to the Wind; as for what he ſays of the Æora, and of the Firſtborn, it looks very like the Dreams of the Valentinians. Laſtly, he takes ſeveral things out of the Fables of the Greeks, which evidently ſhew, that the Author of this Book could not live in the time of Semiramis. [Mr. Dodwell has writ an Engliſh Diſcourſe, to prove that this Book could not be older than Philo Byblius, who is ſaid to Tranſlate it out of the Phœnician Language.]

(c) Philo Byblius.] This Man was a Grammarian, of whom mention is made in Suidas, who lived after Nero's time, for 'tis obſerved, that he was 78 Years old, when Serus and Herennius were Conſuls, which was A. D. 137. that is almoſt an hundred Years after the Death of Nero. According to the Teſtimony of the ſame Suidas, he wrote twelve Books, Περὶ Ἑλλήνων, καὶ ἐκλογῆς βιβλίων, and thirty Books, Περὶ πολέων, Et de Claris viris; and one Treatiſe about Adrian's Empire, under which he lived. Suidas does not ſpeak of this Tranſlation of the Hiſtory of Phœnicia, Euſebius and Theodoret cite it after Porphyry. This Philo is probably the Man, of whom St. Clement of Alexandria ſpeaks, lib. 1. Strom. and whom he calls Philo the Pythagorean.

SECT.

SECT. V.

Concerning the Authors of the Books of the New Teſtament.

THE Goſpel in the Greek Language ſignifies (a) Happy Tidings, but now this Word, in the common acceptation of the Church, is taken for the Hiſtory of the Life of Jeſus Chriſt; and the Name of Evangeliſt, that was heretofore given to all thoſe Perſons that preach'd the Word of God, is at preſent only given to the four Saints that writ the four Goſpels, which the Church has always owned for Canonical. We there find two Apoſtles, that were Eye-Witneſſes of the Life and Actions of Jeſus Chriſt; and two Diſciples of the Apoſtles, who wrote their Goſpel upon relation of others.

The firſt of the four Evangeliſts is St. Matthew, who of a Publican became an Apoſtle of our Bleſſed Saviour: He wrote his Goſpel in Jeruſalem ſoon after the Death of Jeſus Chriſt (c), in favour of the Jews that embraced the Chriſtian Faith, as St. Jerome has obſerved. (d) For this reaſon he wrote in Hebrew, or rather in Syriack. according to the Teſtimony of Papias, St. Irenæus, Euſebius, St. Jerome, St. Chryſoſtom, St. Epiphanius, and indeed of almoſt all the Antients, whoſe poſitive Determinations we ought not to reject, unleſs we have convincing Proofs to the contrary.

Therefore the Opinion of Cajetan and ſome others, who pretend, that the Original of St. Matthew's Goſpel was written in Greek, is rejected with reaſon by all the Learned Criticks, as being eſtabliſhed upon very weak Foundations. St. Jerome aſſures us, that in his own time he ſaw an Hebrew Copy of this Goſpel in the Library at Cæſarea, and that the Nazarenes likewiſe had a Copy of it in the City of Beræa, which they gave him the liberty to Tranſcribe; and that it was remarkable, that all the Paſſages out of the Old Teſtament, cited in this Goſpel, were exactly according to the Hebrew, and not according to the Septuagint. Euſebius alſo tells us, that Pantænus found a Copy of it amongſt the Indians, but it is not certain, whether that was not a Copy of the Goſpel of the Nazarenes which was different from that of St. Matthew. However it is, 'tis paſt diſpute, that the Original, Hebrew of St. Matthew's Goſpel is loſt at preſent; and it is equally certain, that the Hebrew Texts, that have been publiſhed in our time, are not the Original of St. Matthew (e), no more than the Syriack Verſion publiſhed by Widmanſtadius: The Greek Verſion, which we have, is very ancient, and was extant even in the time of the Apoſtles, as St. Jerome and St. Auſtin have obſerved. We cannot tell who is the Author of it: Some Perſons, as for inſtance, St. Athanaſius in his Book, Entituled, The Abridgment of Scripture, attribute it to St. James, Biſhop of Jeruſalem, Theophylact to St. John; Papias ſays, that they Tranſlated into Greek, as well as they could, without naming in particular any Author of that Verſion.

(f) The Evangeliſt, St. Mark, the Diſciple and Interpreter of St. Peter, and Founder of the Church of Alexandria, ſeems to be different from that Mark, who is ſo often mentioned in the Acts of the Apoſtles, and in the Epiſtles of St. Paul. (g) He compoſed his Goſpel at Rome with St. Peter, at the intreaty of the Chriſtians reſiding in that City, ſetting down in Writing thoſe things which he had learned from that Apoſtle, who alſo approved of his Goſpel after it was compoſed. (h) Some late Authors imagine, that it was written in Latin, but this Opinion is contrary to St. Jerome's and St. Auſtin's Opinion, and indeed has no tolerable Pretences to ſupport it, for we can no more doubt that St. Mark wrote it in Greek, than that St. Luke or St. John did theirs. He follows St. Matthew in abundance of things, and ſometimes abridges him, nevertheleſs there are ſome Hiſtorical Paſſages which he relates more copiouſly, and with the addition of ſeveral Circumſtances. 'Tis commonly believed, that this Goſpel was written in the Forty third year of our Saviour's Birth, and, according to the common Computation, Ten Years after his Death, but this is not certain. St. Jerome obſerves that the laſt Chapter of this Goſpel is to be found but in very few Copies, and that almoſt all the Greeks reject it. Wherefore, ſays he, one may reject it, particularly becauſe it ſeems to relate ſome things contrary to the account we have of them in the other Evangeliſts. And in his ſecond Book againſt the Pelagians, he cites a Paſſage that was inſerted into this Chapter, and contained the Error of the Manichees: It plainly proceeds from this Addition, that in moſt of the Copies of St. Mark, this Chapter was entirely left out; for as for the reſt, it is cited by St. Irenæus, and ſeveral others, and contains nothing that cannot be reconciled with eaſe to the Accounts given by the other Evangeliſts.

St. Luke was of Antioch, the Metropolitical City of Syria, (i) He was a Phyſician by Profeſſion, and very well skilled in the Greek Tongue; (k) He was not an Apoſtle or Diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt, but was a Diſciple or Follower of St. Paul, whom he accompanied in his Voyages. He himſelf tells us, ſays Euſebius, in the beginning of his Goſpel, the reaſon of his writing, for many Perſons having raſhly undertaken to write the Evangelick Hiſtory, he thought himſelf obliged to reſcue it out of ill Hands, after he had been exactly informed of all the Occurrences by thoſe that were Eye-witneſſes and Miniſters of the Word, that is to ſay, by the Apoſtles, and particularly by St. Paul. 'Tis imagined, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks of this Goſpel, when he ſays, according to my Goſpel, and that he meant St. Luke when he wrote this paſſage. The Brother whoſe praiſe is in the Goſpel in all Churches, Cujus laus eſt in Evangelio per omnes Eccleſias. St. Jerome obſerves, that he wrote his Goſpel travelling along with St. Paul, when he was in Achaia and Bœotia, towards the ſecond year of Nero, and the fifty ſixth of Jeſus Chriſt. The ſame Father aſſures us, that he always continued unmarried, and that he lived Fourſcore and four years. He is alſo the Author of the Acts of the Apoſtles, which Book contains the Hiſtory of the Church from the Aſcenſion of our bleſſed Saviour to the fourth year of Nero, during the ſpace of 29 or 30 years.

St. John the Evangeliſt of the City of Bethſaida in Galilee, was the Son of Zebedee, and was called to the Apoſtleſhip when he was very young. St. Jerome and Tertullian affirm, that he continued in the ſtate of Celibacy all his Life-time. He was the dearly beloved Diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt, and 'tis ſuppoſed, that he ſpeaks of himſelf, when he ſays, the Diſciple whom Jeſus loved: But though this were not to be thus underſtood, yet the tenderneſs which Jeſus Chriſt had for him, ſufficiently appear'd in the laſt Supper, when he placed him in his Boſom, and in his laſt words to his Mother, Woman behold thy Son. After the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt, he went and preached the Goſpel in Aſia, where he founded and governed the Churches for a long time, being Biſhop of Epheſus, the Metropolis of that Province. He was condemned at Rome by the Emperor Domitian to be thrown into a Veſſel of burning Oyl, but he came out, ſays Tertullian, more vigorous and ſtrong than when he enter'd in at firſt. He was baniſhed afterwards into the Iſle of Patmos, where, as 'tis generally ſuppoſed, he wrote his Revelation. After the Death of Domitian he came back to Epheſus, and there wrote his Goſpel, about an hundred years after the Birth of our Bleſſed Saviour. St. Jerome reports, that he was engaged in this Work by the other Biſhops and Chriſtians of Aſia, who obliged him to write his Goſpel, to confound the Errors of Cerinthus and Ebion, who ſaid, that Jeſus Chriſt was a meer Man, and that He had no being before He was born of the Virgin Mary. The ſame Father adds, that he had yet another reaſon to write his Goſpel after others, for having read the Goſpels of St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke, he obſerved, that they only concerned themſelves to write the Hiſtory of one year of our Bleſſed Saviour's Life, namely, from the Impriſonment of St. John, down to the Death of our Saviour, which made him reſolve to give an account of the moſt conſiderable things that occurred in the preceding years. He has likewiſe written three Epiſtles. The firſt, of which no Man ever doubted, is directed to the Faithful, and particularly to the Parthians, if we may believe St. Auſtin, and ſome other ancient Writers, that is to ſay, to all the Faithful diſperſed in Perſia, which at that time was under the Domination of the Parthians. We don't certainly know the time or place where it was written. The two others were directed to particular Perſons, one to a Lady called Electa, the other to Gaius. They only carry the name of an Elder or Prieſt; which has made ſome People of opinion, that they were written by another St. John, as Euſebius and St. Jerome obſerve. But the Stile, the Spirit, and Thoughts of theſe Epiſtles, together with the concurring Authority of moſt of the Fathers, make it evident, that they belong to this Evangeliſt. There is a greater difficulty about the Apocalypſe, the Stile of which Book appears to be different from the reſt, and which ſeveral of the Ancients rejected, or attributed to another St. John: but the moſt received opinion is, that it was written by the Evangeliſt. The Stile of St. John is ſimple, and has little eloquence in it, but his Thoughts are very lofty. He lived till the time of Trajan, not dying till the 68th year after the Paſſion of our Bleſſed Saviour.

St. Paul deſcended of the Tribe of Benjamin, and born in the City of Tarſus, came up to Jeruſalem, and there became the Diſciple of Gamaliel, a famous Phariſee. He was converted to the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt in that miraculous manner which is ſet down in the Acts of the Apoſtles; he afterwards changed his name of Saul into that of Paul, after he had openly Converted and Baptized the Proconſul Sergius Paulus. The Hiſtory of his Travels and Preaching, down to his firſt Impriſonment at Rome, is written by St. Luke in the Acts. We don't certainly know, what he did after his Enlargement; ſome of the Ancients were of opinion, that he went into Spain, but this is very uncertain, and the contrary ſeems to be more probable. Be that as it will, 'tis certain, that he was beheaded afterwards at Rome for his Religion, by Nero's Command, towards the 64th year of the common computation. He has written 14 Epiſtles, all which, Antiquity has own'd to be Genuine and Canonical, excepting the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, concerning which there has been formerly ſome doubt, and ſome Perſons have ſuppoſed, that it was written in Hebrew. They are not rank'd in the New Teſtament according to the order of time, which nevertheleſs is very neceſſary to be known.

The Epiſtle to the Romans was written from Corinth, as Origen proves by ſeveral reaſons; for firſt of all it was ſent by Phœbe Servant of the Church at Cenchrea from Corinth. Secondly, St. Paul calls Caius his Hoſt, with whom he tarried at Corinth, as we may ſee in the Firſt Epiſtles to the Corinthians, chap. 14. Thirdly, in the Salutations, that are to be found towards the end of this Epiſtle, we find the Names of thoſe who departed from Corinth to go to Jeruſalem, as it is ſaid in the 20th Chapter of the Acts. It was therefore written at the time, when St. Paul, having gathered the Contributions of Macedonia, and Achaia, went to viſit Jeruſalem in the 57th year of Jeſus Chriſt. From whence St. Chryſoſtom concludes, that it was written after both the Epiſtles to the Corinthians, in which he exhorts the Faithful to this Charitable Contribution.

Nevertheleſs they were not written much before: For the firſt was written from Epheſus, as it appears, ch. 16. v. 8. (and not from Philippi, as ſome Greek Inſcriptions obſerve) in the abſence of Timothy.

The

The ſecond was written from Macedonia after his return. In ſome Copies it is ſaid, that it was written from Philippi, in others from Nicopolis.

That to the Galatians is yet elder than the two Epiſtles to the Corinthians. It was written from Epheſus, at the time when St. Paul taught in the School of one Sirnamed Tyrannus in the beginning of the year 56. It is obſerved in ſome Greek Copies, that it was written from Rome, but this is not probable, becauſe he does not there ſpeak concerning his Chains, as he does in his Epiſtle to the Epheſians, where he mentions them in three ſeveral places.

This Epiſtle therefore was written towards the 62d year of our Lord, as well as that to the Philippians, and that other which is directed to the Chriſtians of Coloſſæ, a City of Phrygia near Hierapolis and Laodicea.

The two Epiſtles to the Theſſalonians ſeem to be the earlieſt, if we follow the Chronological Order. It is probable, that the firſt was written towards the year 52; for after St. Paul had converted many Chriſtians at Theſſalonica, as it is obſerved in the Acts, ch. 9. v. 7. he ſent Timothy thither, who being come to find him at Corinth, informed him of their Affairs, as it is obſerved in the third Chapter of this Epiſtle, which was conſequently written in the year 52. The ſecond Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians was written ſoon after, and from the ſame place.

The firſt Epiſtle to Timothy was written after he was ordained Biſhop, when St. Paul was freed from his Chains in the ſixty third year of our Bleſſed Saviour. The ſecond Epiſtle was written from Rome, when St. Paul was twice impriſoned there, a little before his Martyrdom. The Epiſtle to Titus was written about the ſame time with the firſt Epiſtle to Timothy. That to Philemon was written at the time of his firſt impriſonment at Rome. And to conclude, the Epiſtle to the Hebrews was written likewiſe about this time, ſince it is there obſerved, ch. 13. v. 23. that Timothy was delivered. Some of the Fathers, as Caius and Hippolytus, and the ancient Church of Rome, have rejected this Epiſtle. Others attribute it to St. Barnabas, ſome to St Clement, and ſome to St. Luke; but however (p) the moſt prevailing opinion is, that it was written by St. Paul. St. Jerome ſeems to accommodate theſe differences, by ſaying, that the thoughts belong to St. Paul, but that the words and compoſition are either St. Barnabas's or St. Lukes, or rather St. Clement's, who diligently collected whatever he learn'd from his Maſter. Thoſe ancient Writers that attribute it to St. Paul, ſay, that it was written in Hebrew, that is to ſay, in Syriack (q,) being written by an Hebrew to the Hebrews. Some of the Moderns pretend it was written in Greek, but to this Authority of the Ancients, they oppoſe nothing but frivolous weak Conjectures, which are too weak to biaſs any Man.

The Epiſtles that follow thoſe of St Paul, are called General, becauſe if we except the two laſt of St. John, they are not directed to the Faithful of one City, as thoſe of St. Paul are, but to Chriſtians diſperſed in ſeveral Countries.

The Epiſtle of St. James was not written by James the Son of Zebedee the Brother of John, but by St. James the Brother of St. Jude the Apoſtle, and (r) Couſin of our Bleſſed Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and Biſhop of Jeruſalem. For it cannot belong to the other St. James, ſince it is directed to Chriſtians out of Judæa, whereas he ſuffer'd Martyrdom before the Goſpel was preached in any other place than Judea.

St. Peter the chief of the Apoſtles has written two Epiſtles; the firſt that has been received as Canonical by all the Ancients (s) was written from Babylon. Some of the Ancients were of opinion, that the City of Rome was meant by this name, but the Senſe is not natural. We cannot preciſely aſſign the time when it was written, but certain it is, that it was ſent, after the Diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt were called Chriſtians at Antioch, that is to ſay, at leaſt nine years after the Death of our Bleſſed Saviour; for the name of Chriſtians is to be found there in the fourth Chapter. Now if thou art called a Chriſtian. Si autem Chriſtianus cognominaris. It is alſo probable, that it was written after St. Peter's being delivered out of Priſon, A. D. 44. for until that time he continued for the moſt part in Judea. Some believe that it was written towards the end of his Life, becauſe it does not ſeem to have been written long before the ſecond Epiſtle, but this is not certain: One may ſay, that it was written at Babylon in the 45th year of Jeſus Chriſt.

The ſecond was probably written towards the end of his Life, becauſe he there teſtifies, that he expected Death very ſuddenly, ch. 1. v. 14. Some of the Fathers have doubted, whether this Letter was written by St. Peter, becauſe the ſtyle of it is ſo extremely different from that of the former, as St. Jerome obſerves, but St. Peter diſcovers himſelf ſo plainly and openly there, that we cannot with the leaſt colour or pretence attribute it to any body elſe.

St. Jude the Apoſtle the Brother of James and Simon the Son of Alpheus, Sirnamed Thaddeus and Lebbeus, wrote the Epiſtle, that carries his Name, after the Death of moſt of the Apoſtles, as he teſtifies when he exhorts the Chriſtians to contend earneſtly for the Faith, which was once delivered to them by the Apoſtles. He imitates and follows the thoughts and deſign of the ſecond Epiſtle of St. Peter, and even inſerts ſome of his words into his own.

NOTES

NOTES.

(a) THE Goſpel ſignifies in Greek, Happy tidings.] Εὐαγγέλιον is derived from the Particle εὖ that ſignifies well, and the Verb ἀγγέλλω that ſignifies to tell. 'Tis to be found in Homer and Xenophon, but in another Senſe, viz. 'tis taken for the recompence which is given a Man for carrying good news. Tully has uſed this term in this Senſe in one of his Epiſtles to Atticus.

(b) The word Evangeliſt, that was heretofore given to all thoſe that preached the Word of God.] Acts 21. v. 18. Philip is called an Evangeliſt. St. Paul in his 2d Epiſtle to Timothy, ch. 4. v. 5. beſeeches that Biſhop to do the work of an Evangeliſt. Opus fac Evangeliſtæ.

(c) Soon after the death of our Bleſſed Saviour.] This is the opinion of St. Jerome, and St. Epiphanius, who ſay, that he compoſed his Goſpel, before he went to Preach to the Gentiles. St. Irenæus, l. 3. c. 1. ſeems to ſay the contrary, when he aſſures us, that St. Matthew wrote his Goſpel for the Jews, and in the Language of the Jews, at the time when St. Peter and St. Paul founded the Church of Rome: But theſe words are not to be underſtood in the literal Senſe.

(d) For this reaſon he wrote it in Hebrew, or rather in Syriack.] Papias cited by Euſebius, l. 3. of his Hiſtory, Chapter the laſt. St. Irenæus, l. 3. c. 1. St. Jerome in his Preface to the Evangeliſts, in his Book of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and in ſeveral other places. Euſebius, l. 3. c. 18. the Author of the Work upon St. Matthew attributed to St. Chryſoſtome, St. Epiphanius, Hæreſ. 29. & 57. The Author of the Abridgment of Scripture, attributed to St. Athanaſius. St. Cyril, Catech. 14. St. Auſtin, l. 1. de Conſenſu Evangel. cap. 2. teſtifie that the Goſpel of St. Matthew was written in Hebrew, that is to ſay in Syriack. St. Irenæus and St. Jerome ſay, that it was written in the Language of the Country, which was the Chaldee or Syriack Tongue mixt with Hebrew words, which is commonly called the Hebrew Tongue in the New Teſtament. St. Jerome tells us plainly, that the Goſpel of St. Matthew was written in this Tongue; for in his Commentary upon the 12th Chapter of this Goſpel, he ſays, that ſome Perſons were of opinion, that the Goſpel of the Nazarenes was the Original Hebrew of St. Matthew; and in his ſecond Dialogue againſt the Pelagians, he ſays, that the Goſpel of the Nazarenes was written in Chaldee or Syriack with Hebrew Characters. Thoſe that are of the contrary opinion, who maintain, that St. Matthew wrote it originally in Greek, as Grotius well obſerves, reject the unanimous Conſent of the Ancients without any appearance of Reaſon. Let us for once examine the Conjectures of a certain Author, that is of this opinion: He ſays, that the words Emanuel, Eli, Lamma Sabacthani, Aceldama, and other Syriack Terms are explained there; but this does not at all prove, that this Goſpel was not written in Syriack, for otherwiſe we ought to ſay, that ſeveral Books of the Old Teſtament were not written in Hebrew, becauſe even in thoſe Books we have the Hebrew Terms explained after the ſame manner; for example, Gen. 31. v. 49. Galaad, id eſt, tumulus teſtis; 35. *v.*18. Benoni, id eſt, filius doloris mei; Exod. 12. v. 11, Peſach, id eſt, tranſitus Domini; and 16. v. 15. Manhu, quod ſignificat quid eſt hoc. Theſe Explications are not to be found in the Hebrews but have been added by the Interpreter; and we ought to make the ſame Judgment of theſe paſſages in St. Matthew. They pretend ſtill, that theſe Fathers never ſaw the Original of St. Matthew, that they ſaid it was Hebrew, only becauſe the Goſpel of the Nazarenes was in Hebrew, which is extremely different from that of St. Matthew. To this it is anſwered, 1. That we cannot ſay this of the moſt ancient Fathers, as Papias, St. Irenæus, &c. 2. That although the Goſpel of the Nazarenes was different from that of St. Matthew, yet it might very well be taken from the Original of St. Matthew, in which the Hereticks had inſerted, and altered abundance of things, (e) No more than the Syriack Verſion.] It is an eaſie matter to ſhew this, becauſe the Hebrew or Syriack words that are cited in the Greek of St. Matthew's Goſpel are different from thoſe of the Syriack, in the 27th Chapter inſtead of Haceldama he has Aguraſcadema; inſtead of Cephos, he has Cepho; for Eli, Il; for Golgotha, Golgoutho; for Jaacob, Jaacoub; for Joſeph, Joouſeph. We likewiſe find there abundance of Greek words terminated after the Syriack manner, which makes it evident, that it was a Grecian that Tranſlated the Greek of St. Matthew into Syriack, and not the Original it ſelf of St. Matthew.

(f) The Evangeliſt St. Mark ſeems to be a different perſon from that Mark, who is ſo often mentioned in the Acts, &c.] He, of whom mention is made in the Acts, ch. 12. v. 12. and in ch. 15. v. 37. and 39. was Sirnamed John the Son of Mary. There is likewiſe mention made of one Mark the Couſin of Barnabas, Coloſ. 4. v. 10. 'Tis very probable he is the ſame with the former, but the Evangeliſt in all appearance is a different Perſon: for beſides that he was not Sirnamed John, he was the Diſciple of St. Peter, and attending upon him, at the ſame time that the other was with St. Paul: he was likewiſe at Alexandria at the time when the other was with St. Paul at Rome. Some think that St. Mark the Evangeliſt was one of the Seventy two Diſciples, but this is not certain enough to be relied upon; It is more probable, that he was converted to the Faith by St. Peter, who calls him his Son, and whoſe Diſciple and Interpreter he was.

(g) He compoſed his Goſpel when he was at Rome.] This is the opinion of all the Ancients.

Papias in Euſebius, l. 2. c. 15. St. Irenæus, l. 3. c. 1. St. Clement cited by St. Jerome, Tertullian, l. 4. Contra Marcionem, Euſebius, St. Jerome, &c. St. Irenæus tells us, that it was written after the death of St. Peter, others on the contrary unanimouſly affirm, that it was written whilſt he was living, and that he approved of it. Upon this account ſeveral Perſons have called it the Goſpel of St. Peter, as Tertullian obſerves.

(b) Some modern Authors imagine, that it was written in Latin.] Baronius ad ann. Chr. 45. n. 14. and thoſe that follow him without farther conſideration are of this opinion, but after all it's a Problem that cannot be maintained. St. Jerome in Epiſt. 125. to Damaſus, expreſly tells us, that all the New Teſtament, except St. Matthew's Goſpel, was written in Greek. And St. Auſtin. lib. de Conſenſu Evang. c. 2. tells us, that all the four Evangeliſts except St. Matthew, wrote in Greek. The Latin St. Mark, which we now have, is certainly a Tranſlation of the Greek.

(i) St. Luke a Phyſician by Profeſſion.] St. Paul in his Epiſtle to the Coloſ. Luke the beloved Phyſician greets you. Nicephorus, l. 2. c. 43. of his Hiſtory affirms, that he was an excellent Painter, and ſome People ſay, that he drew the Picture of the Virgin Mary, but theſe are fictions.

(k) He was neither of the number of the Apoſtles, nor of the Diſciples.] This is certainly true, becauſe he tells us, that what he wrote, he learnt from others. St. Irenæus, l. 1. *c.*2. St. Jerome upon ch. 65. of Iſaiah, St Auſtin and ſeveral others poſitively ſay, that he was not a Diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt. They are only ſome few modern Authors, that are pleaſed to beſtow this Character upon him.

(l) Cujus laus eſt in Evangelio per omnes Eccleſias.] We cannot cetainly tell, whether the word Evangelium in this place ſignifies a Book of the Goſpel, or whether we are not rather to underſtand it thus, The Brother who deſerves praiſe for having preached the Goſpel. That which follows afterwards, and who was ordained to be the Companion of our Travels, made Baronius believe, that it is Silas, of whom we are to underſtand this paſſage. But St. Jerome, and St. Ambroſe in his Preface upon St. Luke do underſtand it of this Evangeliſt.

(m) He afterwards changed his name of Saul for that of Paul, after having converted and baptized the Preconſul Sergius Paulus.] The Author of the One and thirtieth Sermon, attributed to St. Ambroſe, tells us, that he changed his name at his Baptiſm, but this is but a groundleſs fancy, for in his time they gave no name to any body at their Baptiſm. Others ſay, that he changed his name, when he changed his Profeſſion; and ſome pretend to affirm that he had two Names. The moſt probable Opinion is, that he took the name of Paul after the converſion of Sergius Paulus, for till that time he is conſtantly called Saul in the Acts of the Apoſtles, and afterwards he is always called by the name of Paul. It was the cuſtom of the Romans to give their own names to others in teſtimony of friendſhip; Joſephus for example received the name of Flavius from the Emperor Veſpaſian by way of Honour: [Or rather, becauſe having been once his Priſoner, he ſet him at Liberty: it being uſual for freed Men, to take their Patrons Prænomen.

(n) Some Authors pretend, that he went into Spain, but this is very uncertain.] St. Athanaſius in his Epiſtle to Dracontius, St. Cyril, Cat. 17. St. Epiphanius, Hæreſ. 27. St. Chryſoſtome in Ep. ad Hebr. and in Matth. 76. and Homil. de laud. Pauli, Theodoret in Ep. ad Timot. c. ult. Hier. in 11 Iſ. Greg. moral, l. 3. c. 22. Iſidore, Bede, Ado, &c. are of this opinion. All theſe Authors lived after the third Century, but before that time nothing is written concerning it, and beſides they don't ſpeak of it as a certain thing, but only as a probable conjecture. St. Paul in his Epiſtle to the Romans, c. 15. v. 24. promiſes, that he would go into Spain, but though it follows from thence, that he had a deſign of going thither, yet we cannot rationally conclude, that he was ever there. Pope Gelatius and Innocent the firſt tell us, that he did not perform that promiſe, and it is very certain, that the Goſpel was preached ſomewhat later on this ſide the Alpes.

(o) In the year 61, according to the vulgar computation.] All Authors are agreed, that St. Paul was beheaded at Rome, but however, they are not agreed about the year. Some of them tell us, that he ſuffered Martyrdom with St. Peter, others place it a year, and ſome two years, lower; ſome pretend, that this happened in the laſt year of Nero's Reign, which was the ſixty eighth of our Bleſſed Saviour; but moſt Men think, that St. Peter and St. Paul ſuffered Martyrdom at the time of Nero's Perſecution, which began in the fourth year of that Emperor after the burning of Rome, Anno Dom. 63. and therefore according to this account theſe two Princes of the Apoſtles ſuffered Martyrdom in the 64th year of the Vulgar Æra.

(p) The moſt received opinion is, that it was written by St. Paul.] This opinion ſeems to be the moſt probable. The Epiſtle to the Hebrews does not belong to St. Barnabas, having a different Title from that of this Apoſtle. There is no reaſon to attribute it to St. Luke. The ſtyle and the thoughts very much reſemble thoſe of St. Clement in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians: and upon this account I am apt to believe, that we ought to attribute the Compoſition or Tranſlation of it rather to him than any other, although it is written in the name of St. Paul, and by that Apoſtle: for it was written at Rome by a Perſon that enjoyed his liberty, and who had Timothy for his Collegue. Theſe three Characters ſhew plainly, that it was written by St. Paul, who did not put his name to it for fear of offending the Jews, who were prejudiced againſt him. Grotius believes, that it was written after the taking of Jeruſalem, becauſe it is obſerved, ſays he, in the third Chapter, that there were certain Chriſtians, who ſuppoſed the Day of Judgment was very near; an Opinion that was not common till after Jeruſalem was taken, but this is a bare conjecture upon weak grounds. St. Jerome anſwers the uſual Objection about the diverſity of ſtyle, that is alledged to prove, that this Epiſtle was not written by St. Paul, by ſaying, that it was occaſioned either by him that compoſed it under St. Paul,

Paul, or elſe by the Interpreter. [But if Mr. Lowth's Opinion be true, the Controverſy muſt be at an end: For in his Vindicatation of the Authority of the H. Scriptures againſt the five Letters publiſhed by the Anſwers of Mr. Simon, p. 24. He ſays that St. Peter quotes the 37th Verſe of the 10th Chapter of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, in the 15th Verſe of the 3d Chapter of his 2d Epiſtle, where he ſays that St. Paul often ſaid thoſe things which the unlearned and unſtable wreſt as well as the other Scriptures to their own deſtruction.]

(q) In Hebrew to the Hebrews.] St. Clemens Alexandrinus is of another opinion, as alſo St. Jerome, Theodoret, Oecumenius, and ſeveral others. Eſtius and ſome of the Moderns believe, that it was written in Greek. 1. Becauſe the Scriptures there cited follow the Septuagint, and not the Hebrew; 2. Becauſe there is no probability that the Copy ſhould be loſt. Theſe Reaſons are exceeding weak, for ſuppoſe the Citations are not to be charged upon the Interpreter, yet, why might not St. Paul, when he was writing in the Syriack Tongue, Tranſlate the Septuagint into that Language, rather than cite the Hebrew Text, ſince the Septuagint was more familiar to him? This may ſerve by way of Anſwer to the firſt Reaſon. The Second is yet weaker, for why might not the Hebrew Copy of this Epiſtle be loſt, as well as the Original Hebrew of the Goſpel of St. Matthew?

(r) But of St. James the Brother of the Apoſtle St. Jude, and Couſin of our Bleſſed Saviour.] This James is he, that is called in the Goſpel the Son of Alpheus, for there were but two in all: He is called the Brother of our Lord, either becauſe he was the Son of Joſeph by another Wife, or becauſe he was very nearly related to him.

(s) It was written from Babylon.] Euſelius, l. 2. c. 5. of his Hiſtory ſays, that it is Rome that St. Peter calls Babylon in this place. Some have thought that Papias and St. Clement, cited by Euſebius, were of this Opinion, but he does not cite them upon this Subject. St. Jerome received this opinion from Euſebius, and carried it farther with ſtrong Reaſons. Tho' after all, this Interpretation is falſe, and it is more natural to ſay, that he wrote this Epiſtle from Babylon.

(t) St. Peter diſcovers himſelf ſo plainly there, that we cannot with the leaſt colour attribute it to any other Author.] The Author of this Epiſtle tells us, that he was with Jeſus Chriſt upon the Mountain, he calls St. Paul his Brother, and makes himſelf Author of a former Epiſtle written to the ſame Perſons. Now all this agrees very well to St. Peter, and it is viſible, that he who compoſed it, was no Impoſtor. The Character of this Epiſtle is perfectly Apoſtolical, and the Style is not ſenſibly different from that of the firſt.

SECT.

SECT. VI.

Of the Canon of the Books of the New Teſtament, and particularly of thoſe Books that were formerly doubted of.

THE firſt Canon of the Holy Books of the New Teſtament was not compoſed by any Aſſembly, or by any one Perſon in particular, but by the Unanimous Conſent of all the Churches, that were agreed upon the Authority of certain Books, and conſidered them as Sacred and Divine. 'Twas this Conſent of all the Churches, that in the Primitive Times ſerved for a Rule, to diſtinguiſh the Canonical Books from thoſe that were Doubtful and Suppoſititious. 'Tis in purſuance of this Rule that Euſebius, who is the firſt Man that made an exact Enquiry into theſe Matters, diſtinguiſhes three ſorts of Books that belong in ſome manner to the New Teſtament. The firſt Claſs comprehends thoſe, that have been always received by the Unanimous Agreement of all Churches, ſuch as the four Goſpels, the fourteen Epiſtles of St. Paul, if we except that of the Hebrews, (which ſome Authors did not number amongſt the reſt, becauſe they ſuppoſed it was not St. Paul's,) and the Firſt Epiſtles of St. Peter and St. John. The ſecond Claſs comprehends thoſe, that having not been received by the whole Catholick Church, yet nevertheleſs were looked upon by ſome as Canonical Books, and cited as Books of Scripture by Eccleſiaſtical Authors. But this Claſs does yet branch it ſelf into two Diviſions, for ſome of theſe Books have been ſince received by all the Churches, and acknowledged for Genuine, ſuch as the Epiſtle of St. James, the Epiſtle of St. Jude, the Second Epiſtle of St. Peter, the ſecond and third Epiſtle of St. John: The other on the contrary have been univerſally rejected, either as Spurious, or unworthy to be placed in the number of Canonical Books, though they might otherwiſe be uſeful enough, ſuch as the Book of the Paſtor, the Epiſtle of St. Barnabas, the Goſpel according to the Ægyptians, another according to the Hebrews, the Acts of St. Paul, the Revelation of St. Peter. In ſhort, the laſt Claſs contains thoſe Books that were deviſed by the Hereticks, and were always diſowned by the Church, ſuch as the Goſpels of St. Thomas, and of St. Peter, &c. As for what concerns the Apocalypſe, of which we have not as yet diſcourſed, Euſebius obſerves, that ſome Perſons place it in the firſt Claſs, that is to ſay, in the number of thoſe Books that are unqueſtionably Canonical, and that others reckon it amongſt the Books of the ſecond Claſs.

This obſervation of Euſebius, which is confirmed by the Teſtimonies of the Ancients, whom he cites in ſeveral places of his Hiſtory, ſhews, that the Canon of the Books of the New Teſtament was almoſt the very ſame in all Times: For although there were ſome of the Epiſtles of the Apoſtles, that at firſt were not received by an Unanimous Conſent of all Churches, yet they were always conſidered as Books of great Authority, and ſoon after they received the ſame Authority with the reſt. This is confirmed by the ancient Catalogues of the Holy Books of the New Teſtament, where the Books, which we receive at preſent, are compriſed: You will find all of them, except the Revelation, in the Canon of the Council of Laodicea, which St. Cyril of Jeruſalem follows. They are all received by St. Athanaſius, St. Jerome, St. Gregory Nazianzen, by Amphilochius, the Council of Carthage, the Council at Rome, by Pope Innocent, and all the other Greek and Latin Authors ſince Euſebius. They are all cited as Holy Books by thoſe Authors that lived neareſt the time of the Apoſtles. In ſhort, 'tis beyond Controverſie, as we have already demonſtrated above, that theſe Books were written by thoſe Perſons, whoſe Names they bear: The Epiſtles themſelves that were formerly queſtioned, contain nothing diſagreeable to the Faith and Doctrine contained in the other Books, that have been received and acknowledged by all the Churches from the beginning.

The Epiſtle to the Hebrews has been received as Canonical, with the Conſent of almoſt all Churches. They were only a few Latins that queſtion'd its Authority, becauſe they did not believe it to be written by St. Paul: But although it was not compoſed by him, which is not probable, as we have already ſhewn, yet it ought nevertheleſs to paſs for Canonical, it being a conſtantly received Tradition, that it was written by one of his Diſciples, and that it was owned by almoſt all the Churches of the World, as ſoon as it appeared in Publick. It is cited by Clemens Romanus in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, by Clemens Alexandrinus, by Tertullian and Origen, by St. Cyprian, and all thoſe that came after, as a Writing undoubtedly Canonical. We cannot find out the particular Author, that queſtioned the Epiſtle of St. James as doubtful; it is cited by all the Ancients, and placed in the number of Canonical Books in all the Catalogues that we have. The ſame Obſervation may be made upon the ſecond Epiſtle of St. Peter, which was certainly written by that Author.

as we have elſewhere ſhewn. It is cited by St. Auſtin, by Origen, and by many other ancient Writers. The Epiſtle of St. Jude was rejected by ſome, not becauſe they had any lawful Grounds to doubt that St Jude was the Author of it, but only becauſe there is a Citation out of the Book of Enoch to be found there: And yet notwithſtanding that, it was ſet down in the ancient Catalogues of the Books of the New Teſtament, and it has been cited by Tertullian, by Clemens Alexandrinus, by Origen, by St. Cyprian, by St. Gregory Nazianzen, and by ſeveral other Authors. St. Jerome tells us, that although ſeveral rejected it, by reaſon of the Citation out of the Book of Enoch; yet it was received in his time, becauſe it was ancient, and approved by the uſage of the Church, Authoritatem vetuſtate jam, & uſu meruit. The two laſt Epiſtles of St. John being very ſhort, and containing nothing that is diſagreeable to what we find in the firſt, cannot occaſion any difficuly. They are written without queſtion by the Author of the firſt, as may plainly be proved by the likeneſs of Style: The ſecond is cited by St. Irenæus in his firſt Book, ch. 12. and in the third Book, chap. 18. by Tertullian, by Origen, by St. Dionyſius of Alexandria, and by many others. In a word, they are both of them reckoned in the number of Canonical Books in all the ancient Catalogues of the Volumns of the New Teſtament.

Nothing more remains for me to diſcourſe of but the Apocalypſe, which ſome of the Ancients, according to the Teſtimony of Euſebius, placed in the rank of indubitable Books, others in the number of doubtful Books, or rather ſpurious. It was rejected by Caius an ancient Prieſt of Rome, who attributed it to the Heretick Cerinthus, as Euſebius teſtifies in the third Book of his Hiſtory, chap. 28. On the contrary, St. Juſtin, St. Irenæus, Origen, St. Cyprian, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Tertullian, cite it in abundance of places, and attribute it to St. John the Evangeliſt. St. Dionyſius of Alexandria obſerves, that ſeveral Perſons before him diſowned and confuted the Apocalypſe, as a Book full of Fictions and Falſities, but that many others approved of it; that as for himſelf he durſt not preſume to reject it, that he believed it had a hidden Meaning, but that he was fully perſuaded it was not written by St. John, as he endeavours to prove by ſeveral Reaſons. St. Jerome tells us in his 129th Epiſtle, that in his time the greater part of the Greek Churches did not receive this Book, no more than the Latins did the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, but that he received both the one and the other, not minding the Cuſtom of his own Time, but the Authority of the Ancients. Amphilochius alſo obſerves, that in his time ſome received it, but that there were great numbers that rejected it, and indeed it is not to be found, as we have already taken notice in the Catalogue of the Council of Laodicea, nor in that of St. Cyril. But it has been ſince acknowledged by the Greek and Latin Churches, and cited by St. Epiphanius, by St. Chryſoſtom, by St. Ambroſe, by St. Hilary, by St. Jerome, by St. Auſtin, and by all thoſe that have written ſince. It was reckoned amongſt the Canonical Books by the Council of Carthage, by the Roman Conncil under Gelaſius, and by Pope Innocent. The fourth Council of Toledo held in the year 633. in the ſixteenth Canon has determined, That it was written by St. John, and that it ought to be placed in the number of the Holy Books. And the Council of Trent, by whoſe Deciſions we ought to be determined, reckons it amongſt the Canonical Books of the New Teſtament.

We ought here to diſcourſe a little concerning the Apocryphal Books of the New Teſtament, that were forged either by the Catholicks or Hereticks. But theſe not being of the number of Canonical Books, ought to be ranged amongſt the Books of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers: Wherefore we will now begin our Library of Eccleſiaſtical Authors with them.

New Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory

OF THE

Firſt three Centuries of CHRISTIANITY.

CONTAINING

An Account of the LIVES and WRITINGS of the Primitive FATHERS, with Cenſures upon all their BOOKS, determining which are Genuine, and which Spurious.

Of the Letter ſuppoſed to be ſent by Jeſus Chriſt to King Agbarus, and of that of Agbarus to Jeſus Chriſt.

The Letters of Jeſus Chriſt, and Agbarus.

EUſebius gives us an Account in the firſt Book of his Hiſtory, of a certain King of Edeſſa (a), named Agbarus (b), who having heard the report of the Miracles that were wrote by Jeſus Chriſt, ſent a Letter to him, the purport whereof was, To intreat him to Cure a Diſtemper with which he was afflicted: And that our Saviour did not then grant his Requeſt, but wrote a Letter back to him, wherein he promiſed to ſend one of his Diſciples to heal him: and laſtly, that St. Thomas the Apoſtle, immediately after the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, deputed Thaddeus one of the 72 Diſciples, who went and performed the Promiſe that had been made by our Saviour to Cure his Diſeaſe, and at the ſame time Converted him, together with his whole Family. Euſebius grounds this Story upon the Letters of Jeſus Chriſt and Agbarus, which were taken out of the Archieves of the Church of Edeſſa, which he likewiſe produceth Tranſlated out of Syriack into Greek. Now it is probable, that Euſebius credited thoſe Records that were exhibited to him too eaſily, as alſo, that theſe Letters are forged, and that this whole Hiſtory is fabulous. For firſt, how can it be imagined that the King of Edeſſa, upon the bare rehearſal of the Miracles of Jeſus Chriſt, ſhould addreſs himſelf to him, as one that was convinced of his Divinity, and inſtructed in the Principles of his Religion: Having heard (ſays he) of the Miracles which thou haſt wrought, I am perſuaded that thou art God, or the Son of God. It is evident, that theſe words could not be written but by a Perſon already perſuaded and trained up in the Doctrine of Chriſtianity, who makes Agbarus ſpeak almoſt the ſame Expreſſions as he himſelf would have uſed on the like occaſion. The following Words that are likewiſe attributed to this King, viz. That being informed, that the Jews laid Snares for Jeſus Chriſt, he deſigned to moleſt them, and invited him to come to his City, which, although it were ſmall, might be ſufficient for them both, more clearly demonſtrate the falſhood of this Letter: For who can believe, that a King ſhould offer the Moiety of his Kingdom at once to a Man that was altogether unknown to him?

Neither is it more difficult to diſcover the forging of the other Letter that is attributed to Jeſus Chriſt, beginning with theſe words; Thou art happy, Agbarus, for having believed in me, without ſeeing me; for it is written of me, That they that ſee me ſhall not believe in me, to the end, that they that believe on me without ſeeing me may receive Eternal Life. To what purpoſe are theſe Words written? Is it not apparent, that he that compoſed this Letter alludes to the Expreſſion of Jeſus Chriſt to St. Thomas, Happy are they that have not ſeen and yet have believed? Which Words being not ſpoken by our Saviour till after his Reſurrection, nor written till a long time after, it evidently appears that this Letter is counterfeit.

(a) Edeſſa.] This is a famous City, ſituated beyond the River Euphrates, between Syria and Meſopotamia.

(b) Named Agbarus.] Others read Abgarus, and he is ſo called in ſome ancient Medals; but it is written Agbarus in the moſt correct Manuſcripts, and it is pronounced ſo in Arabick.

The Hiſtory, which is afterwards produced concerning theſe two Letters, and taken from the ſame Archieves, is no leſs fabulous. It is reported, that Jude the Apoſtle (c), who is alſo called Thomas, ſent Thaddeus the Apoſtle, one of the 72 Diſciples, to King Agbarus: That this Prince, being informed that there was a Man in his City that wrought many Miracles, and doubting whether he were not the Diſciple whom Jeſus Chriſt had promiſed to ſend, gave orders to one named Tobias to bring him into his Preſence: And that he had no ſooner ſeen him, but his Countenance ſeeming to him to be Divine, he proſtrated himſelf at his Feet to worſhip him, deſiring to know, whether he were that Diſciple whom Jeſus Chriſt had promiſed to ſend to cure his Diſtemper. Thaddeus having anſwered that he was, and that if he believed in Jeſus Chriſt he ſhould be ſaved, Agbarus replied, I have believed ſo firmly in him, that I intended to proclaim War againſt the Jews who Crucified him, and utterly to deſtroy that Nation; if the fear of the Roman Empire had not deterred me from this Undertaking. Certainly the Perſon (whoſoever he be) that cauſed this petty Prince of Edeſſa to utter theſe Words, was endued with very little judgment, in aſcribing to him a Deſign ſo extravagant as this; for is it not an egregious piece of folly to imagine, that a Prince only of one ſingle City ſhould undertake to maintain a War againſt a Nation ſo powerful as that of the Jews, and ſhould hope to deſtroy it, to revenge the Death of a Man, whom he knew only by hear-ſay? What probability is there, that nothing but the fear of the Romans was able to divert him from ſo raſh an Attempt? I ſhall not proceed to make any Reflection on the other Circumſtances of this Relation, which appear to be no leſs fabulous than thoſe that we have even now recited: I ſhall only add, that the time wherein it is affirmed that thoſe Occurrences happened, ſhews this whole Hiſtory to be Suppoſititious. They take notice at the end of this Record, that theſe Things were Tranſlated in the 430th Year of the Edeſſenian Æra, now the 430th Year of the Edeſſenians is the 15th of Tiberius, in which the Ancients believed that Jeſus Chriſt died and roſe again. And we muſt ſay according to this Epocha, and what we find recorded in the Acts, that this happened immediately after our Saviour's Reſurrection, and that Agbarus, and ſeveral other Gentiles of Edeſſa, received the Goſpel before Cornelius, which is plainly contrary to the Acts of the Apoſtles; and conſequently we may be certain that this Hiſtory is falſe, and that theſe Letters are forged. The Authority of Euſebius is not to be regarded in this caſe, ſince it is evident, that he hath too raſhly given credit to the Memorials that were tranſmitted to him, taken from the Archieves of the Church of Edeſſa. And none can be ignorant, that this ſort of Records ought not too much to be relied on, eſpecially with reſpect to Hiſtories of ſuch a Nature.

But in regard that theſe Fables are always augmented in proceſs of time, it hath been likewiſe feigned that Jeſus Chriſt, in writing to Agbarus, ſent him his Picture drawn on a Handkerchief. Evagrius is the firſt that makes mention of this Effigies in Book IV. Chap. 27. of his Hiſtory, relying on the Authority of Procopius, who nevertheleſs takes no notice of this Relation. However, ſince the time of Evagrius, the Defenders of Image-Worſhip have often cited it, and the Modern Greeks ſo firmly believed it, that they keep a Feſtival on the 16th of Auguſt in Commemoration thereof.

(c) That Jude the Apoſtle, who is alſo called Thomas.] Thomas the Apoſtle was not ſirnamed Jude, but Didymus, and Jude the Apoſtle was not called Thomas; which is a further Proof of the Falſhood of this Hiſtory.

Of ſome Letters attributed to the Virgin Mary.

Letters of the Virgin Mary.

THere are ſeveral Letters likewiſe aſcribed to the Virgin Mary, which being not ſo ancient as thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt to Agbarus, may more eaſily be proved to be falſe; the Letter of the Virgin Mary to St. Ignatius is ſuppoſitious, as we ſhall hereafter take an occaſion to ſhew in diſcourſing concerning the Epiſtles of that Saint. That to the Florentines publiſhed by Caniſius, as alſo another which the Inhabitants of Meſſina pretend to keep in their Poſſeſſion, have more evident Marks of their Falſhood, and are generall rejected; inſomuch that there is no neceſſity to prove them to be Apocryphal.

Of the Counterfeit Goſpels.

Counterfeit Goſpels.

NOthing more clearly evinceth the truth of this Maxim of Holy Scripture, That the Father of Lies often changes himſelf into an Angel of Light, than the great number of Books, that have been heretofore forg'd in imitation of the Sacred Writings. For as the Holy Ghoſt hath cauſed Goſpels, Acts, Epiſtles, and a Revelation to be written, ſo in like manner the Devil to counterfeit the Truth, hath procur'd ſeveral Goſpels, Acts, Revelations, and Epiſtles, to be deviſ'd by his Miniſters, which have alſo been attributed to the Apoſtles. To begin with the Goſpels, Gospels, besides the four that are Canonical and true, there were in the Primitive Ages of the Church several others that were fictitious and substituted in their room as well by the Hereticks as by some Catholicks. Counterfeit Gospels.

Among these last, we may reckon the Gospel according to the Egyptians, and that according to the Hebrews, which though spurious, yet have been quoted by Catholick Authors as Works compos'd by the Orthodox. The Gospel according to the Egyptians is cited by (a) Clemens Alexandrinus, as also by Epiphanius (b,) who declares, that the Sabellians made use of this Gospel to confirm their Error, because it contain'd divers Mystical Expressions concerning Jesus Christ, some whereof might perhaps be applied by them to prove, that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost were but one Person.

The Gospel according to the Hebrews, written (as it is reported by St. Jerome) in the Syriack Tongue with Hebrew Characters, is yet more remarkable among the Ancients; It is quoted by Hegesippus (c,) by Ignatius (d,) by Clemens Alexandrinus (e,) and by Origen in several places, particularly in his Eighth Treatise on St. Matthew, where he produced a considerable Fragment out of it (f;) St. Jerome (g) translated it into Greek and Latin, as he has often told us, observing likewise in one place, that some were of opinion, that this Gospel was the Original of St. Matthew's, which was reputed to have been written in Hebrew; nevertheless it is certain, that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was different from that of St. Matthew, as well on the account, that all those things which are related by the ancient Writers concerning this Gospel, and among others the History of the Woman accused before Jesus Christ (h,) are not to be found in St. Matthew's Gospel, as in regard, that they are clearly distinguished by Eusebius and St. Jerome, who had a perfect knowledge of both those Gospels. Add to this, that St. Jerome translated the Gospel according to the Hebrews, whereas the Author of the Version of St. Matthew's Gospel is unknown, and that in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the Scriptures of the Old Testament are cited according to the Hebrew Text, whereas St. Matthew in his hath followed the Translation of the Septuagint. This Gospel is not different from that which is called by Origen, the Gospel of the Twelve, nor from the Gospel of the Nazarenes, as appears from the Testimony of St. Jerome, by whom they are often confounded: Moreover, the Ebionites made use thereof to prove their Doctrine.

Besides these two Gospels so often cited by the ancient Writers, that are lost, there is yet extant a Book, Entituled, Proto-Evangelium Jacobi, published by Neander, and inserted in the Orthodoxographa. This Book is full of idle Tales and frivolous Relations concerning (i) the Nativity, Life, and Delivery of the Virgin Mary; The Gospel of Nicodemus likewise, annexed to that of St. James in the same

(a) Quoted by St. Clemens.] Stromat. Lib. 3 pag. 452. St. Clement cites an Expression of Jesus Christ to Salome, taken from this Gospel: I am come to destroy the Works of the Woman, and by the Woman he understands Concupiscence. Moreover, in pag. 465. after having produced another passage on the same subject, cited by the Heretick Cassianus, he replies first that it is not found in the four Gospels that are acknowledged by us, and afterward endeavours to apply a good sense to it.

(b) By St. Epiphanius.] Hæres 26. The Valentinians likewise made use of this Gospel.

(c) By Hegesippus.] In Eusebius, Lib. 4. chap. 22.

(d) By St. Ignatius.] In this Epistle to the Inhabitants of Smyrna, where he cites two passages that are observed by St. Jerome; the first is, In carne eum post Resurrectionem vidi, & scio esse; I saw him in the flesh after his Resurrection, and I know that he is. The second is this, Palpate, quia non sum dæmonium incorporale; Handle me, and you shall perceive that I am not a Phantom without a Body.

(e) By St. Clement.] Strom. Lib. 2. pag. 380. where we read this Sentence, ὁ θαυμάσας βασιλεύσει, καὶ ὁ βασιλεύσας ἀναπαύσεται.

(f) Wherein he produceth a considerable fragment.] It is a passage that contains the Answer of Jesus Christ to the rich young Man mention'd in St. Mark's Gospel, chap. 10. and in St. Luke, chap. 18. expressed in other words. Moreover, Origen in his Eleventh Tome upon St. John, cites another passage of this Gospel, wherein the Holy Ghost is call'd the Mother of Christ.

(g) St. Jerome quotes it very often in his Catalog. Voce Ignat. & voce Jacobus, Lib. 2. in Matth. chap. 7. and 12. Lib. 3. contra Pelagianos.

(h) The History of a Woman accused before Jesus Christ.] Eusebius, in Hist. Lib. 3. declares, that the History of the Adulterous Woman was recorded in this Gospel. Moreover, St. Jerome affirms, that it was related therein, that Jesus Christ appear'd to St. James, who had bound himself with an Oath not to eat, until he had seen our Saviour risen from the dead; and in his Third Book against the Pelagians, he informs us, that it was written in this Gospel, that the Mother of our Lord, and of St. John the Baptist spoke to him thus: John the Baptist baptizeth for the remission of sins, let us go and be baptized; and that Jesus Christ replied to them, have I sinned, that I should go and be baptized?

(i) This Book is full of idle Tales and frivolous Relations.] Here's a Specimen of the Fables contain'd in the Protevangelium Jacobi. Joachim was elected among the Nations of the Twelve Tribes; Reuben admonished him, that it was not lawful for him to offer sacrifice, because he had no incense, whereupon he retir'd for grief into the Wilderness, and fasted there 40 days. Anne mourned, and her Servant Judith advis'd her to take a Laurel Tree: therefore she went into a Garden, where she lamented, that she was not like unto a Bird that had a Nest in the Laurel Tree. The Angel appear'd unto her, and told her, that she should have a Son; This Angel descended, and delivered the same thing to Joachim; he beheld himself in the Plate, or in the Ephod of the High Priest, and saw not that he had sinned. The Virgin was able to go when she was six months old; she was bred up by Angels in the Temple; she was Married to Joseph, because a Dove flew out of a little Staff, that was given to him by the High-Priest. St. Joseph having perceived that she was with Child, caused her to drink the Water of Jealousie according to the Law, &c.

place,

place is equally full of Fables relating (k) to the Paſſion and Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, as the former is of thoſe that belong to the Life of the Virgin Mary.

However, although thoſe Goſpels are unworthy of Credit becauſe they are ſo fooliſh, yet they do not contain any groſs Errors, as thoſe do that were forg'd by the Hereticks, no part whereof now remains in our poſſeſſion; ſuch were the Goſpels aſcrib'd to St. Peter, to St. Thomas, and to St. Matthias, mention'd by Euſebius, Book 3. Chap. 25. as alſo thoſe of St. Bartholomew, and of the Twelve Apoſtles, cited by St. Jerome in his Preface to St. Matthew; The Goſpel of Philip, which was that of the Gnoſticks (according to the Teſtimony of Epiphanius, Hær. 26.) and was uſed by the Ebionites, Baſilides, and Apelles. The Goſpel of Judas ſubſtituted by the Gajanites, who honour'd that Traitor, as St. Epiphanius and Theodoret aſſure us, when they ſpeak of theſe Hereticks. And laſtly, the Goſpels of Thaddeus, Barnabas, and Andrew, and thoſe that were counterfeited by Heſychius, together with a Book concerning the Infancy of Jeſus Chriſt, and another relating to the Genealogy of the Virgin Mary, attributed to St. Matthew, and reckon'd by Gelaſius in the number of Apocryphal Writings that were forg'd by Hereticks.

(k) Is equally full of Fables.] Here's another Specimen of the Fables recived in the Goſpel of Nicodemus. Pilate ſent for him by a Meſſenger, this Meſſenger worſhiped him; all the Soldiers did ſo in like manner againſt their wills; and the Enſigns bowed themſelves twice before him. The Hiſtory of the Evangeliſts is intermix'd with divers Fables. Jeſus Chriſt is made to anſwer Pilate's Queſtion. What is Truth? Nicodemus is repreſented ſpeaking, as alſo thoſe whom our Saviour had healed; and the Woman that was cured of the iſſue of Blood is called Veronica. Moreover, the Author of this Goſpel deſcribes the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, adding many things concerning him; he introduceth the dead that were raiſed at his Reſurrection, entertaining one another with abſurd and impertinent Diſcourſes, declaring that they made the ſign of the Croſs, he introduces the Devil reaſoning very ridiculouſly concerning our Saviours deſcent into Hell; And laſtly, he feigns, that after his Reſurrection, Pilate having commanded the Jewiſh Books to be brought to him, they acknowledged that Jeſus Chriſt was the Meſſiah, and rehearſeth ſeveral other Tales of the like nature.

Of the Counterfeit Acts of the Apoſtles, and of the falſe Revelations.

Counterfeit Acts of the Apoſtles, and falſe Revelations.

FOraſmuch as the Acts of St. Luke contain only a very ſmall part of the Tranſactions of ſome of the Apoſtles, ſince he gives no account of the proceedings of all, neither doth he deſcribe at large even all the Actions of thoſe that are mention'd by him; They that applied themſelves to the counterfeiting of theſe Records, were furniſhed with great variety of matter, wherein they might exerciſe their deceitful Arts. The firſt that practiſed this Artifice, was a certain Prieſt, and a Diſciple of St. Paul, who being inflamed with a falſe Zeal for his Maſter, forged under the name of St. Luke the Acts of Paul and Thecla, and was convicted of this Impoſture by St. John, as we are aſſured by Tertullian, and after him by St. Jerome. However, the ſimplicity of this ancient Prieſt might be more eaſily excuſed, in regard that he had no ill deſign; but we cannot but be ſeized with horror when we reflect on the enormous practices of the Hereticks, who have preſumed to write the Acts of divers Apoſtles at their pleaſure, wherein they have obtruded their deteſtible Errors. Such were the Acts of St. Peter and St. Paul deviſed by the Manichees, and mentioned by Philaſtrius, in which the Apoſtles were introduced, affirming that the Souls of Men and of Beaſts were of the ſame nature, and working Miracles to cauſe Dogs and Sheep to ſpeak: The Acts of St. Andrew, of St. John, and of the Apoſtles in general, ſubſtituted by the ſame Hereticks, according to the Teſtimony of St. Epiphanius, Philaſtrius, and St. Auguſtine (a:) The Acts of the Apoſtles counterfeited by the Ebionites, and cited by S. Epiphanius in his deſcription of their Hereſie: The Doctrine, Preaching, Voyages, and Diſputes of St. Peter, falſly attributed to St. Clement, containing the Errors of the Ebionites, and the (b) Hiſtory of St. Paul's being ſnatch'd up into Heaven, being a Work compiled by the Gajanites; whereof the Gnoſticks likewiſe made uſe, and St. Epiphanius aſſures us, Hæreſ. 8. The Acts of St. Philip, and of St. Thomas received among the Encratites and the Apoſtolicks, as is alſo obſerved by the ſame St. Epiphanius in Hæreſ. 47, and 61. The Memoirs of the Apoſtles invented by the Priſcillianiſts: The Itinerary of the Apoſtles rejected in the ſecond Council of Nice, Acts 5. to which may be added ſeveral falſe Relations, as that of the Lots of the Apoſtles rejected in the Decretal: The Writings of the Apoſtles compiled by Dictinius, and diſallowed in the Synod of Braga, chap. 17. A Book of the Prieſthood of Jeſus Chriſt, cited by Suidas, the Author whereof pretended to prove that our Saviour was deſcended from the Tribe of Levi, and that he was reckoned by the Jews among the Prieſts: A (b) In Greek ἀναβατικὸν Παύλου: This might admit divers ſignifications, but St. Epiphanius determines it to ſignifie an Account of St. Paul's being lifted up to Heaven. It contained abſtruſe Matters, and ſeemed to be the ſame with the Secrets or Revelation of St. Paul. St. Auguſtin quotes this Book in Joan. Tract. 98.

Tract,

Tract, Intituled, Liber Apostolicus, which was a Rhapsody devised by Marcion, and whereof St. Epiphanius makes mention: And a Book concerning the Death and Assumption of the Virgin Mary, ascribed to St. John; as also the the Interrogations of the Blessed Virgin composed by the Gnosticks, together with another Book, concerning her Genealogy, published by the same Authors.

Counterfeit Acts of the Apostles, and false Revelations.

Lastly, there are several counterfeit Apocalypses or Revelations, as the Revelations of the great Apostle forged by Cerinthus: The Apocalypse of St. Peter, which Eusebius in Book 3. chap. 25. of his History reckons in the number of those spurious Books that are not Heretical, and which (as Sozomen affirms) was read every year about the time of Easter in the Churches of Palestine. And the Revelation, or the Secrets of St. Paul, which was heretofore very much esteemed by the Monks: The Egyptians (according to the Testimony of Sozomen) boasted that they had it in their possession, and it is inserted in the Catalogue of Apocryphal Books by Gelasius, together with the Revelations of St. Thomas and St. Stephen. None of these Books are now extant, neither ought we to be troubled for their loss.

Of the Epistle to the Laodiceans, and some others attributed to St. Paul.

St. Paul's Letter to the Laodiceans.

BEsides the fourteen Epistles of St. Paul, some of the ancient Writers have likewise cited one directed to the Laodiceans, and indeed, we have at present an Epistle mentioned by St. Anselm, Sixtus Senensis, and Stapulensis, which is inserted in some German Bibles (a) and is written in St. Paul's Name to the Laodiceans. It is not certain whether this be the same with that which was used when St. Jerome lived (b) however it is evident, that that which we now have in our possession, doth not appertain to St. Paul (c) and that that which was extant in St. Jerome's time, was generally rejected, as he declares in his Catalogue; ab omnibus explodituv. That which gave occasion to the forging of this Letter (as is observed by Theodoret) is, that St. Paul at the end of his Epistle to the Colossians, exhorts them to cause the Epistle that he had sent to them to be read by the Laodiceans, and to read among themselves that from Laodicea; this hath induced some to believe, that there was an Epistle written to the Laodiceans at the same time with that to the Colossians; and this also gave Marcion the opportunity of altering the Title of the Epistle to the Ephesians, and giving it the name of the Epistle to the Laodiceans. But this Error is founded on the ignorance of the Greek expression; for no mention is made in this place of any Epistle of St. Paul to the Laodiceans, but of one written from Laodicea. Some are of opinion that this is the Epistle to Timothy, which they imagine to have been written from that City. But it may be much more probably affirmed with St. Chrysostome, Theodoret, Photius, and Oecumenius, that it was an Epistle written to St. Paul from Laodicea, by the Christians of that City, and for this reason it is called in the Vulgar Translation the Epistle of the Laodiceans.

Moreover, as it hath been concluded from this place in the Epistle to the Colossians mis-interpreted, that St. Paul wrote a Letter to the Laodiceans; so in like manner some have inferred, that he wrote a third Epistle to the Christians of Corinth, from a passage taken out of his first Epistle to the Corinthians, ch. 5. v. 9, 10, and 11. viz. I wrote unto you an Epistle, not to company with Fornicators, &c. But (as St. Chrysostome observes) this Epistle is the very same that he then wrote, and the Sense is, When I even now wrote unto you in this Letter, not to keep company with Fornicators, I do not mean the Fornicators of this World.

(a) Inserted in some German Bibles.] It was published in Latin by Pistorus, and afterwards annexed to the German Bibles printed at Ausburg, Worms and Amsterdam; [Particularly in those Bibles which Elias Hutterus set out in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German, in Quarto.

(b) Whether this be the same as that which was used when St. Jerome lived.] That which gives occasion to doubt, whether this Epistle be the same with that which was published heretofore, is that Philastrius affirms in chap. 88. That that which was extant in his time contained several Errors; and there are none in that which we now have. Moreover, that which is cited by St. Epiphanius was composed out of several Sentences of the Epistle to the Ephesians.

(c) That which we now have in our possession doth not appertain to St. Paul.] It is not comfortable to the Style of St. Paul; it is extremely concise, even shorter than that to Philemon, neither hath it any one particular Subject.

Of

Of the Epiſtle of St. Barnabas.

The Epiſtle of St. Barnabas.

JOSEPH, Sirnamed by the Apoſtles Barnabas, that is to ſay, the Son of Conſolation (a,) who was a Levite, and a Native of the Iſle of Cyprus (b,) laboured even as much as the Apoſtles themſelves in eſtabliſhing the Foundation of the Chriſtian Religion. Some of the ancient Writers (c,) affirm, that he was one of the 72 Diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt; but St. Luke makes mention of him after ſuch a manner, as induceth us rather to believe, that he was not admitted into the Fellowſhip of the Apoſtles until after our Saviour's Death. However it be, it is evident, that ever ſince that time he hath been reputed as one of the principal Preachers of the Goſpel, and was deſervedly reckoned in the number of the Apoſtles. We have no certain account of his Life, but only what we find ſet down by St. Luke in the Acts.

He hath written (ſays St. Jerome) an Epiſtle, which is full of Edification for the Church, although it be not Canonical: This Epiſtle is often cited by St. Clemens Alexandrinus (d) and Origen (e,) who do not in the leaſt doubt, but that it belongs to him whoſe Name it bears. It is true indeed that Euſebius and St. Jerom place it in the Rank of Apocryphal Books (f,) nevertheleſs they do not deny that it was written by St. Barnabas; on the contrary they attribute it to him, declaring only, that it ought not to be eſteemed of the ſame Authority as the Canonical Books, becauſe although it really belongs to St. Barnabas, yet it is not generally received by the whole Catholick Church.

And it is upon this account that this Epiſtle is not amongſt the Canonical Writings, becauſe to cauſe a Book to be placed in this Rank, it is not only ſufficient that it was compoſed by an Apoſtle, or a Diſciple of the Apoſtles, but it is likewiſe requiſite that it ſhould be received as Canonical throughout all the Churches of Chriſt; otherwiſe the Treaty of Hermas, and the Epiſtle of St. Clement, ought alſo to be inſerted in the Catalogue of Canonical Books. Therefore it is a very weak Argument to affirm, that the Epiſtle of St. Barnabas doth not appertain to this Apoſtle, becauſe that if it were certainly his, it would have been reckoned in the number of the Canonical Writings; ſince before a Book cannot be owned as Canonical, it is neceſſary, whoſoever is the Author thereof, that it ſhould be acknowledged by the whole Church; becauſe there are Books written by the Apoſtles, or their Diſciples, that were not heretofore, and are not as yet placed in the Rank of Canonical Writings, that is to ſay, thoſe that are rejected by ſome, and received by others as Canonical ἀντιλεγομένων ὑ ἔν ὅμως τοῖς πολλοῖς. In the ſecond are comprehended thoſe Books that are not allowed as Canonical by any; but ſuch as were not forged by Hereticks, as thoſe are that belong to the third Rank. The Epiſtle of St. Barnabas ought to be reckoned among the firſt of theſe ſorts, at leaſt among the ſecond; which although Apocryphal, may nevertheleſs belong to thoſe to whom they are attributed, as the Book of the Paſtor, and others. And although St. Jerome declares in his Epiſtle to Læta, that thoſe Books are Apocryphal, that do not belong to the Authors whoſe Name they bear, yet he too often makes uſe of this Term in another ſignification. Now that Euſebius and St. Jerome believed that the Epiſtle of St. Barnabas was written by him, appears from hence that they conſtantly impute it to him; Euſeb. lib. 6. chap. 13. Item ex Barnabæ, Clementis, & Judæ Epiſtolis. It is certain, that he judged that the Epiſtles of St. Clement and St. Jude were really compoſed by thoſe whoſe Names they bear; and in another place, Judæ Epiſtolam intelligo, item Barnabæ Epiſtolam, & Revelationem quæ dicitur Petri. Where he makes a particular mark on this laſt Book, viz. That it is aſcribed to St. Peter, but he doth not declare the ſame thing with reſpect to the Epiſtle of St. Barnabas; on the contrary he barely affirms, that it is his, as the Epiſtle of St. Jude belongs to St. Jude. St. Jerome likewiſe ſpeaks expreſly to the ſame effect; Barnabas unam ædificationem Eccleſiæ continentem Epiſtolam compoſuit, quæ inter Apocryphas numeratur. Which plainly ſhews, that he did not believe it to be Apocryphal, becauſe of its being falſly attributed to St. Barnabas, ſince on the contrary he himſelf imputes it to him, in affirming that it is Apocryphal.

(a) That is to ſay, the Son of Conſolation.] In Greek υἱὸς παρακλήσεως, The Son of Conſolation, or of Exhortation. Oecumenius on the Acts. chap. 36. and Notkerus in his Martyrology follow the firſt Interpretation; but St. Jerome ſeems to embrace the later.

(b) A Native of the Iſle of Cyprus.] This Iſland of Cyprus was full of Jews, and a very great number of them were maſſacred therein under the Reign of the Emperor Trajan, according to the Teſtimony of Dio, Euſebius, and Oroſius.

(c) Some of the ancient Writers.] Thoſe are St. Clemens, Alex. Stromat. lib. 2. Euſeb. Hiſt. lib. 1. chap. 12. and lib. 2. chap. 1. St. Epiphan. Tom. 1. contra Hæreſ. & Dorotheus. But venerable Bede rejects their opinion, becauſe St. Luke in the 4th Chapter of the Acts declares, That Barnabas was one of thoſe that laid the Price of the Lands, and other Poſſeſſions that were then ſold, at the Apoſtle's Feet; for though this doth not abſolutely hinder, but that he might have been one of the Diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt; yet St. Luke ſeems thereby to inſinuate, that this was the beginning of his Converſion to Chriſtianity.

(d) By St. Clemens Alexandrinus.] Stromat. lib. 2. p. 373, 375, 389, 396, and 410. Lib. 5. p. 571, 572, 577, and 578.

(e) Origen.] Lib. 1. Con. Celſum; and Lib. 3. περὶ ἀρχῶν; and Euſebius, lib. 3. Hiſt. c. 25 Lib. 6 c. 13. and c. 14. Tertullian in his Book De Pudicitiâ tells us, That St. Barnabas's Epiſtle was more generally received by the Catholick Church than the Paſtor. But he takes St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Hebrews to have been written by St. Barnabas.

(f) In the Rank of Apocryphal Books.] Euſebius divides the Apocryphal Books into three Ranks, the firſt contain thoſe that come neareſt to the Canonical tings and on the contrary there are others, the Writers whereof are not certainly known, that have been formerly, and are now, inserted in the Canon of Holy Scripture, as in the New Testament, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Revelation; and several Books in the Old, the true Authors of which cannot be positively shewn. Besides, though it were true, that all Books are Canonicall, which we know to have been written by Men who had Authority to make them so, yet who hath assured us, that St. Barnabas ought to be included in this number, rather than St. Clement, or Hermas? The Catholick Church hath a Right to declare it, and since she has not done it, this is a sufficient Warrant to reckon his Epistle amongst the Apocryphal Writings, though it be really his. The Epistle of St. Barnabas.

Furthermore it hath been objected, that this Epistle is unworthy of St. Barnabas, and that it is not credible that so great an Apostle who was full of the Holy Ghost, and the Colleague of St. Paul, should be the Author of the most part of those things that are therein contained; such are the forced Allegories, the extravagant and incongruous Explications of Holy Scripture, the various Fables concerning Animals, and several other Conceits of the like nature that are comprised in the first Part of this Epistle. To this I answer, That notwithstanding these defects, St. Clement, Origen, Eusebius, and St. Jerome, attributed it unto him; and I am of the opinion, that it is a very great piece of Impudence for any one to imagine himself to be more clear-sighted in this matter, than those exquisite Criticks of Antiquity: They lived much nearer the time of the Apostles than we do: They had a great number of Books composed by their Disciples which are now lost; and consequently, they were more capable than we are of judging of the Style and manner of Writing of the Apostles, and their Companions and Disciples. If then they have found that the Allegories, Mystical Explications and Fables, that are found in the Epistle of St. Barnabas might be his, with what right can we positively assert, that they cannot be his? Certainly they must needs have but a very little knowledge of the Genius of the Jewish Nation, and of the Primitive Christians that were Educated in the Synagogue, who obstinately believe that these sort of Notions could not proceed from them; on the contrary, this was their Character; They had learned of the Jews to turn the whole Scripture into Allegory, and to make Remarks on the peculiar Properties of those living Creatures that were prohibited to be eaten; therefore it is not to be admired that St. Barnabas, being by Nation a Jew, and writing to his own Country-men, hath allegorically explained divers passages of the Old Testament in applying them to the New, and found out several Moral Reflections upon the Proprieties of those Creatures that were not permitted to be eaten by the Jews. The Epistle of St. Clemens Romanus, and the Stromata of St. Clemens Alexandrinus, are full of this kind of Allegories and Figurative Expressions. The History of the Phœnix, related by St. Clement in his Epistle to the Corinthians, so much celebrated among the Primitive Christians, seems to be more Fabulous than that which is alledged by St. Barnabas in this Epistle concerning the Properties of certain Animals; and the Allegory of the Blood of Jesus Christ typified by the Scarlet Thread of the Harlot Rahab, in the Epistle of St. Clemens Romanus, is as far fetch'd as the greatest part of those of St. Barnabas. But what necessity is there to produce farther Proofs of a Matter of Fact that is so evident, since it is sufficiently known to all Men, that the Writings of the Primitive Christians are generally full of such Fables and Allegories?

Lastly, the Author of this Epistle is accused for representing the Apostles as the most flagitious Persons in the World before their Conversion; but his Words have been taken in too strict and literal a Sense; for he intended not to say, that they were the wickedst Men in the World, but only that they were great Sinners (g.)

It is not known to whom the Epistle of St. Barnabas is directed, because we want the Title; it appears from the Body of this Letter, that it was written to some converted Jews that adhered too much to the Law of Moses: It is divided into two Parts, in the first of which he shews the unprofitableness of the Old Law, and the necessity of the Incarnation and Death of Jesus Christ, producing divers passages of Scripture relating to the Ceremonies and Precepts of the Old Law, which he explains Allegorically when he applies them to our Saviour and the New Law: The Second Part comprehends particular Moral Instructions, containing several Rules and Directions concerning what ought to be done, and what ought to be avoided.

This Epistle was first published (h) in Greek, together with the ancient Version by Menardus, and this Edition was Printed at Paris by Piget in the Year 1645.

Afterwards the famous Dr. Isaac Vossius caused it to be Reprinted with the Epistles of St. Ignatius Revised and Corrected from three Manuscripts, Anno Dom. 1646.

Lastly, Cotelerius published it, adding a new Translation è Regione, together with the old Version, entire, and certain Critical Remarks at the end. It is prefixed at the beginning of his Collection of the Works of the ancient Fathers, Printed at Paris by Petit, Anno 1672.

(g) That they were great Sinners.] Thus the following Words ought to be interpreted, Super omne peccatum peccatores. Many very devout Persons have often used this Phrase, I am the greatest Sinner that ever lived in the World, and other Expressions of the like nature, which are not to be understood literally.

(h) Was first published in Greek, &c.] It is said, that there was an older Edition than Menardus's printed in England by the order of the Learned Usher, but that the whole Impression was burnt. We may add to these, another Edition of this Epistle published by Maderus in Germany at Helmstadt. [There have been two other Editions of this Epistle, one at Oxon, 1685. in Duodecimo, wherein all that is in the old Latin Version that is not in the Greek, as also all that is in the Greek that is not in the old Version, is printed with Red Letters: Lastly, Mr. Le Moyne has set it out in his Varia Sacra with large Comments at Leyden, in Quarto, 1685.]

The Epiſtle of St. Barnabas.

The Greek Text of the four or five firſt Chapters is wanting in all theſe Editions, but they are extant in Latin in the ancient Verſion, which, although barbarous and defective, hath nevertheleſs ſerved to correct the Greek Original in ſome places.

Of the Liturgies that are falſly attributed to the Apoſtles.

The Liturgies of the Apoſtles.

WE need only to reflect on what we find Recorded in the Epiſtle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, concerning the Adminiſtration of the Holy Sacrament of the Euchariſt, and upon the Accounts of St. Juſtin, and other Primitive Fathers of the Church, to be perſwaded that the Apoſtles and their Succeſſors celebrated the Euchariſt with great Simplicity. This hath been obſerved by all thoſe that have written concerning Liturgies (a) who have unanimouſly agreed, that the celebration of the Maſs was perfomed in thoſe Primitive Ages without much Ceremony, and that they uſed but few Prayers; but by little and little others were added, and ſeveral viſible Ceremonies were annexed, to render the Service more venerable to the People. In fine, the Churches afterwards regulated, and committed to Writing, the manner of Celebrating it, and this is what they called Liturgies, which being compiled conformably to the various Cuſtoms of divers Places, are likewiſe found to be different. And foraſmuch as Men are naturally inclined to make ſome Alterations in their Exterior Habit, many things from time to time have been ſucceſſively added to them.

This ſingle Remark is ſufficient to ſhew, that the Liturgies that bear the name of the Apoſtles and Evangeliſts, were not actually compoſed by them: But to prove this clearly, and beyond contradiction, we ſhall only examine them one after another.

The Liturgy, or Greek and Latin Maſs, attributed to St. Peter, and publiſhed by Lindanus in the year 1589. from a Manuſcript of Cardinal Sirlet's that was not very ancient, and which was afterwards Printed at Paris by Morellus, Anno 1595. cannot be St. Peter's for the following Reaſons; ſince mention is made therein of St. Sixtus, Cornelius, and St. Cyprian: The Virgin Mary is called the Mother of God, a Term that was not generally in uſe, until after the Condemnation of the Neſtorian Hereſie; The Canon of the Latin Maſs which is reputed by St. Gregory, to have been compoſed by a Scholaſtick, that is to ſay, a Learned Man of the Fifth Century, is entirely inſerted therein: Moreover it contains divers Litanies taken from the Sacramentarium of St. Gregory, and the Liturgies of St. Baſil and St. Chryſoſtom: There are alſo Prayers for the Patriarch, a term altogether unknown before the end of the Fourth Age of the Church, and for the moſt Religious Emperors. In ſhort, if St. Peter had been the Author of this Liturgy, it would have been uſed by the Church of Rome, neither would it have lain hid during ſo many Ages. Theſe Reaſons made the Learned Cardinal Bona ſay, that this Liturgy was forged, and that it was in all probability compiled by a Grecian Prieſt Latinized, becauſe it is collected partly from the Greek Liturgy, and partly from the Latin, and the name of St. Peter was prefixed to it, either that it might obtain more Authority, or becauſe a great part of the Liturgy of the Church of Rome was comprehended therein.

The Maſs of the Ethiopians that bears the name of St. Matthew, appears more evidently to be forged. There are Collects for Popes, Kings, Patriarchs, and Arch Biſhops: The Twelve Apoſtles are therein invocated: The Four Evangeliſts are cited, as alſo the Synods of Nice, Conſtantinople, and Epheſus: The Nicene Creed is inſerted with the Particle Filioque: Moreover, mention is likewiſe made of St. Athanaſius, St. Gregory, and St. Baſil, together with the Epact, the Golden Number, and the Triſagion; which plainly ſhews that this Liturgy is of a very late date.

One ought to give the ſame Judgment of the Liturgy of St. Mark, publiſhed by Cardinal Sirlet and Printed at Paris by Morellus; for we find therein the word Conſubſtantial, and the Triſagion There are alſo ſeveral Prayers for the King, and even for S. Mark himſelf, and mention is made of Chalices, Deacons, Subdeacons, Chanters, Monks, Religious Perſons, &c. which Circumſtances are apparent Demonſtrations of its novelty.

There remains only the Liturgy attributed to St. James, which divers Learned Men have taken much pains to vindicate, but to no purpoſe; for although it is more ancient than thoſe that we have already examined, ſince it is cited in the Synod that was holden in the Emperor's Palace in Trullo after the Fifth General Council, yet we ought not to say, that St. James was the Author thereof, or that it was composed in his time. For, 1. the Virgin Mary is called in this Liturgy the Mother of God; and the Son and the Holy Ghost are said to be Consubstantial with the Father, terms that were altogether unknown in St. James's time: But supposing that they were not, is it credible, that this Authority should not be alledged in the Councils of Nice, Ephesus, and Constantinople? 2. We find therein the Trisagion and the Doxology, that is to say, the Sanctus and the Gloria Patri, which were not generally recited in the Church until the Fifth Century; for though it might be proved that they were in use before, yet it must be confessed, that it was not the general custom of the Church. 3. There are Collects for those that were shut up in Monasteries: Can any Man say, that there were Monasteries in the time of St. James? 4. There is mention made of Confessors, a term that was not inserted in the Divine Offices, till a long time after St. James, even according to the Confession of Bellarmin. 5. In this Liturgy there is mention made of Churches, Incense, Altars, &c. can it be imagined that these things were used in St. James's time? 6. We find therein very many Citations of the Epistles of St. Paul, the greatest part whereof were written after St. James's death; neither ought we to object with the Cardinals Bona and Bellarmin, that these things were afterwards inserted, because it is not probable, that they should be added in so many places; besides, the Connexion and the Ceremonies of this whole Liturgy do not agree with the time of the Apostles. The Liturgies of the Apostles.

I shall not here speak of other Liturgies cited by some Authors, such are those of the Twelve Apostles mentioned by Abraham Ecchellensis, and that of St. Barnabas quoted by a certain Monk, because they are unknown to me; neither shall I examine that which is comprised in the Constitutions of St. Clement, nor that which is extant in the Writings that are attributed to St. Dionysius the Areopagite, in regard that these Books being forged, as I shall hereafter shew in another place, it is not to be doubted but that the Liturgies which they contain, are in like manner fictitious.

Of the Apostles Creed.

Of the Apostles Creed.

HAving already discoursed of the Works of every one of the Apostles in particular, it remains, that we should now give some account of those that are reputed to be composed by them in general; The most Authentick among these is the Apostles Creed, which is generally believed to have been made by all the Apostles. But Authors are not agreed about the time wherein it was written by them, nor concerning the manner how it was compil'd, nor the design they had in making it. Some are of Opinion with Ruffinus (a.) that they compil'd it in the very same year that Jesus Christ died, a little after the descent of the Holy Ghost; whereas Baronius and others conjecture, that they did not finish it till the Second year of the Reign of the Emperor Claudius, a little before they were separated. As to the manner of their drawing it up, some have imagined, that every one of the Apostles pronounced (b) his Article, and that for this reason it is called a Symbol, as consisting of divers Sentences: Others believe, that it was compiled by them after they had conferred all together; and there are some also who assert, that all the Disciples had a share therein. Lastly, as to their design in composing it, some determine that it was, that they might be all found unanimously to agree in one and the same Doctrine (c,) and others, that it was for the benefit of the People, that they might be able to propound to them an Abridgment of the Christian Faith, which should be easie to be understood, and to be retained in their Memory. The Etymology of the word Symbol is yet more uncertain (d;) for some affirm, that the (c) Some determine that it was, that they might be all found unanimously to agree in one and the same Doctrine.] The former opinion is maintained by Ruffinus, and the later by the modern Authors.

(d) The Etymology of the Word Symbol, is yet more uncertain.] The Greek Word Σύμβολον, properly signifies a Note, Sign, or Mark; therefore the Mystical Signs and Notes of Pythagoras were called Σύμβολα Πυθαγόρεια. Herodian uses the Word to denote a Military Signal. Other Authors, as Dion Cassius and Suetonius, apply it to signify Signs or Marks, and certain Tickets that were given to those that were to be admitted to publick Shews, and for the distribution of Largesses Some say, that the Word Symbolum among the Latins signifies an Entertainment, where every one pays his Club, or even the Club it self; but this does not belong to the Neuter Symbolum, but to the Feminine Symbola, and in Greek Συμβόλη, as may be seen in Aristophanes's Scholiast, in Athenæus and Plutarch; therefore it ought to be read in Terence's Andria, Symbolam dedit, and not Symbolum. Aulus Gellius, lib. 6. c. 1. makes use of the Word Symbola to signifie one Man's share in a Reckoning, and declares, that this Term was also attributed to those Questions that were Expounded by Taurus the Philosopher in the Presence of divers Persons. St. Cyprian is the first that applied the Word Symbol to denote an Epitome or Abridgment of the Christian Faith. Ep. 45. Optatus calls the Hereticks, The Deserters of the true Symbol, alluding to a Military Signal. And, to the same effect, St. Chrysologus, in Hom. 62. declares, That the Symbol is the Covenant that we make with God in Baptism.

Of the Apoſtles Creed.

Creed is ſo called, becauſe it is as it were the diſtinguiſhing Mark and Character of Chriſtians (e); others, becauſe it was compoſed of the Sentences of ſeveral Perſons; and laſtly, others, on the account of its being made in a general Conference.

However, although it is an Opinion eſtabliſhed on very good grounds, that this Creed was made by the Apoſtles, and it cannot be denied that they all preached and taught the Articles therein contained after one and the ſame manner, as the main Points of the Doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt, in which it was neceſſary that all Chriſtians ſhould be inſtructed; yet it may be juſtly doubted without incurring the imputation of raſhneſs, whether they were aſſembled together to compoſe this Creed, and whether they wrote it word for word, as it is now received in the Church of Rome; nay there are very weighty Reaſons, whereby it appears, that this Opinion, though commonly received, is nevertheleſs very improbable.

For Firſt, neither St. Luke in the Acts, nor any Eccleſiaſtical Author before the Fifth Century hath made any mention of this Aſſembly of the Apoſtles, and none ever affirmed, that they compoſed the Creed of the Church of Rome, either by conferring together, or by pronouncing every one a particular Article.

Secondly, the Fathers of the Three firſt Ages diſputing againſt the Hereticks, endeavour to demonſtrate by many Arguments, that the Doctrine contained in the Creed, is that of the Apoſtles, but they do not affirm that it was compiled by them; and yet there could not have been a ſtronger, or more convincing proof brought againſt thoſe Hereticks, than to have ſaid thus to them; You impugn the Doctrine of the Creed, and yet it is certain, that the Apoſtles were the Authors thereof, therefore you impugne the Doctrine of the Apoſtles. However they did not argue after this manner; On the contrary, they prove by Tradition, and the Conſent of the Apoſtolical Churches, that the Doctrine compriſed in the Creed, is that of the Apoſtles.

Thirdly, if the Apoſtles had made a Creed, it would have been every where the ſame throughout all Churches, and in all Ages; all Chriſtians would have learnt it by Heart; all Churches would have repeated it after the very ſame manner; in fine, all Authors would have expreſſed it in the ſame terms. Now the contrary is evident; for it is certain, that not only in the ſecond and third Centuries, but alſo in the fourth, there were many Creeds, and all, though the ſame as to the Doctrine, yet differed in the Expreſſion. In the ſecond and third Ages of the Church, we find as many Creeds as Authors (f,) and the ſame Author ſets the Creed down after a different manner in ſeveral places of his Works, which plainly ſhews, that there was not then any Creed that was reputed to be the Apoſtles, nor even any regulated and eſtabliſhed Form of Faith. Ruffinus in the fourth Century compares three ancient Creeds of the Churches of Aquileia, Rome, and the Eaſt, and we may obſerve in theſe three Creeds, none of which perfectly agrees with the common one, very conſiderable differences in the terms, as appears from the Table that is ſubjoyned at the end of this Article. St. Cyril of Jeruſalem in his Catechetick Lectures produceth a particular Creed, that was uſed by the Church of Jeruſalem when this Father wrote. The Authors that have written Commentaries on the Creed, as St. Auguſtine in his 119th Sermon, St. Maximus, Petrus Chryſologus, Fortunatus, and others, omit divers Expreſſions that are inſerted in our Apoſtolical Creed, among others this at the end, The Life Everlaſting; and St. Jerome obſerves in his Epiſtle to Pammachius, that the Creed concludes with theſe words, The Reſurrection of the Body.

It is evident from theſe Reflections, that although the Creed be the Apoſtles as to the Doctrine which it contains, nevertheleſs it is not theirs, as to all the terms, and that they did not draw up any one form of Faith comprehended in a ſet number of words, which they were all obliged to uſe: But that having learn'd the ſame Faith from Jeſus Chriſt, they likewiſe taught it to all thoſe that were converted to the Chriſtian Religion, and inſtructed them all in the ſame Myſteries. That they that were thus trained up in this Faith, had it ſo deeply imprinted on their Mind, as (St. Juſtin and St. Irenæus obſerve) that they were always ready to give an account thereof, and as often as they ſhould be required to do it, without making uſe of any one particular form; and from thence proceeds the difference of the Creeds that are ſet down by the Fathers. And Laſtly, that for the aſſiſtance of the Memory, certain forms of theſe Articles of Faith, were afterwards compiled, which were found to be different according to the diverſity of the Churches wherein they were uſed. For I doubt not in the leaſt, that beſides the above-cited Creeds, there were many others of which we have no knowledge, from whence it muſt be inferred, that Jeſus Chriſt is the Author of the Doctrine contained in the Creed, and that the Apoſtles preached and publiſhed it throughout the whole World; but that it cannot be determined by whom theſe Forms were collected, wherein this Doctrine is compriſed.

(e) The diſtinguiſhing Mark and Character of Chriſtians.] This Etymology is produced by Maximus Taurinenſis, and Venantius Fortunatus. It hath been likewiſe obſerved by Ruffinus, Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis, lib. 2. de Off. c. 22. and Durandus de Mende, lib. 4. Rationalis, c. 25. But the ſecond and third Etymology are more common; and the laſt is maintained by Ruffinus; S. Aug. Serm. 181. de Tempore; Iſidore, lib. 2. div. Off. c. 22. Rabanus Maurus, lib. 2. Init. Clerical cap. 56. Durandus ſupra: Eucherius, Homil. de Symb. and Innocent. III. lib. 2. De Sacris Miſſæ Myſteriis, c. 49. The firſt however is the moſt probable.

(f) As many Creeds as Authors.] St. Irenæus exhibits a Creed, l. 1. c. 2. and another in lib. 2. c 1. Tertullian made uſe of three different Creeds in three ſeveral places, In præſcript. lib. contra Praxeam, & de Virginibus velandis. See Origen. lib. 1. Peri Arch. & in Dialog. contra Marc. Optat. lib. 1. All which Creeds are different from the Vulgar.

It

It may be objected, that St. Irenæus, Tertullian, Lucifer Calaritanus, and St. Jerome affirm, that the Creed is the Rule of Faith, which the Church hath received from the Apostles; That St. Ambrose says, that the Church of Rome hath preserved the Apostolical Creed in its purity without Alteration; That St. Augustine, Ruffinus, Leo, Maximus Taurinensis, Fortunatus, Petrus Chrysologus, and a great many others (g) have taken it for granted as a thing beyond Controversie, that the Creed was composed in an Assembly of the Apostles, that this Opinion is Authorized by the Church, and that it seems to be a rash Presumption to doubt of it; And lastly, that all Catholicks are agreed in this Judgment, and that none but Hereticks, or at least Persons that are suspected of Heresie, durst presume to call it in question. The Epistle of St. Barnabas.

To these Objections I answer first, that the Testimonies of St. Irenæus, Tertullian, and Lucifer, rather overthrow the Vulgar Opinion, than establish it; for these Fathers do not assert, that we have received the Form of Faith from the Apostles, but only the Faith and Doctrine that was communicated to them by Jesus Christ; therefore if there were any force in the Objection, it must be concluded, that our Saviour is the Author of the Creed. Moreover, it is further to be observed, that by the Phrase Rule of Faith used by Tertullian, a set Form of Faith is not to be understood, but the Faith it self, which he declares to have been founded by Jesus Christ; and Lucifer Calaritanus doth not discourse of the Creed, but only of the Faith of the Church as it relates to our Saviour's Divinity. Lastly, when St. Jerome says, that the Faith of the Creed, which is an Apostolical Tradition, was not written on Paper, or with Ink, but was engraved on the Fleshly Tables of the Heart; he gives us to understand, that he meant nothing else, but that the Faith and Doctrine comprehended in the Creed proceeds from the Apostles, who have taught it to all the Faithful. After the same manner, when St. Ambrose assures us, that the Creed was preserved in its purity by the Church of Rome, he doth not speak of the Form of the Creed, but of the Doctrine therein contained. As for the other Authorities that are alledged, they are of little moment. Ruffinus is the first, and the only Person among the Authors of the Fifth Century, that asserts, that the Creed was composed by the Apostles, and yet he proposes this Opinion, as a matter that depended only on a popular Tradition; St. Augustin never approved it, for he doth not so much as mention one word thereof in his 119th Homily, and the 115th which might be cited to this purpose, cannot be proved certainly to be his: In fine, the other Authors who lived after Ruffinus, have taken this History from him, and are too modern to give a certain Testimony of a matter of Fact so ancient as this is; We may also add, that it is related by none but the Latins; that the Greeks never spoke of it, and that even they that produce it, do in no wise agree among themselves, concerning its Circumstances, as hath been already shewn. To conclude, there is no rashness in departing here, from the Vulgar Opinion, since it is meerly a Critical Question, that hath no regard to Faith, because it is granted on all sides, that Jesus Christ is the Author of the Doctrine comprised in the Creed, and that the Apostles taught it to all the Christians. Besides, they that maintain the common Opinion, are at last obliged to subscribe to our determination when they are urged; and to acknowledge, when it is objected to them, that the ancient Roman Creed was different from our Vulgar; that our Creed is not the Apostles as to the words, but as to the Sense, which comes to our Opinion at last. And besides it is not unusual in Critical Matters to forsake an Opinion that hath been generally received, and to embrace that of some Learned and Judicious Men, even of those that are suspected not to be Orthodox. Thus all the World is at present agreed in this, that the Apostolical Constitutions and Canons were not written by the Apostles, as we shall shew in the following Article, and yet scarce any Man presumed so much as to doubt thereof, before Erasmus.

Of

Of the Canons and Constitutions attributed to the Apostles.

Apostolical Canons & Constitutions.

THE Opinions of Authors are extremely divided, as to the Canons that are commonly called Apostolical. Turrianus and some others have determined, that they were all composed by the Apostles: Baronius and Bellarmine except the 35 last, which are rejected by them as Apocryphal, but they have made no difficulty to admit the first 50. Gabriel Albaspinæus Bishop of Orleans, and others, have believed, that although these Canons are not written by the Apostles yet that they were very ancient, as being properly a Collection of the Canons of divers Councils that were holden before that of Nice; this Opinion is likewise maintained by the Learned Dr. Beverege, in a Book lately published by him, Entituled, Vindiciæ Canonum, &c. calling by this Name the Collection of 85 Canons attributed to the Apostles. Lastly, M. Daillé affirms, that these Canons are not only falsly ascribed to the Apostles, but are also of a much later date, and were not collected until about the end of the Fifth Century. We shall now proceed to examine these Opinions, and to establish that of Albaspinæus, which seems to be most probable.

It is not very difficult to prove, that these Canons were not compiled by the Apostles themselves; we need only peruse them, to be convinced, that they contain divers things that never were, nor indeed could be decreed by the Apostles (a); some whereof relate to certain Questions that were not debated until many years after their death (b). But it ought to be observed, that they are usually styled by the ancient Writers, Ancient Canons, Canons of the Fathers, and Ecclesiastical Canons; Titles that are likewise prefixed to them in several Manuscripts, as Cotelerius has observed: And if they are sometimes called or entituled Apostolical, it cannot be upon the account of their belonging to the Apostles; but it is sufficient that some of them have been made by Bishops that presided over the Church a little after the Apostles, because they that lived at that time were generally called Apostolical Men. The Author of the Apostolical Constitutions is the first that attributed these Canons to the Apostles, and he hath said some things to induce us to believe, that they were actually composed by the Apostles (c). Therefore these Canons are not the Work of an Impostor, who hath forged them under the Name of the Apostles, but only a Collection that hath been falsly imputed to them, that it might be esteemed more Authentick, And I am apt to believe, that no Person was (a) Diverse things that never were, nor indeed could be established by the Apostles.] In the first Canon it is Decreed, that a Bishop should not be Ordained but by two or three Bishops; whereas it is certain, that in the time of the Apostles one single Bishop was sufficient to Ordain another. In the third it is determined, that the First-Fruits should be so presented to the Bishop and Priest, as that they should be brought immediately to them, and not offered on the Altar. In the fourth it is provided, that Oil and Incense only should be offered on the Altar Now it is not probable, that any such things were offered in the time of the Apostles. In the fifth Canon it is ordained that the Feast of Easter should not be celebrated after the Jewish manner: If this had been determined by the Apostles, the Controversie between Victor and the Asiaticks might have been easily decided; but it was not, and Victor only alledg'd the Tradition of his Ancestors: In like manner the 21 Canon against those that made themselves Eunuchs would have been produced by Demetrius against Origen, and Origen's action would not have been justified by Alexander and Theoctistus, if there had been then extant a Canon of the Apostles, that had so precisely forbidden it. In the 34th and 35th Canons mention is made of the right of Metropolitans, and of the distinction of Bishopricks, which were not fixed at that time. In the 50th Canon it is decreed, that he that did not baptize or dip a Child thrice in the Water should be deposed; This practice, though very ancient, is later than the Apostolical times. The 52d is against the Errors of the Montanists and Novatians. The 60th is against Books forged by the Hereticks after the death of the Apostles And the 66th is against the Sabbatical Fast. The 69th regulates fasting in Lent. In the following Canons are contained several Injunctions concerning Oil, Vessels of Gold and Silver, and Vails consecrated in Churches, things that were not known in the time of the Apostles The last Canon comprehends a Catalogue of Sacred Books which could not be written by the Apostles. In the 45th, 46th, and 47th Canons the Baptism of Hereticks is rejected as null and void. This question was not resolved by the Apostles. Moreover the style of these Canons is not like the Apostles; and the matter is very different from that which was usually treated by them; neither were the names of Clerk, Bishop, Altars, Sacrifices, &c. so common in the Apostolical times.

(b) Questions that were not debated until many years after their death.] Viz. The questions relating to the Feast of Easter, the Baptism of Hereticks, as also concerning those that made themselves Eunuchs; those that would not admit Sinners to repentance; those that fast on Sundays, &c. Vide supra.

(c) To induce us to believe that they were actually composed by the Apostles.] As for Example in the 29th Canon, where it is ordained, that those Bishops that should obtain the Episcopal Dignity by Money, should be deposed, as Simon was by St. Peter; he hath added by me Peter. For these words are not found in the Epistle of Tarasius to Pope Adrian, nor in the Edition of Dionysius Exiguus. Moreover in the 5th Canon, we read at present the Lord hath declared unto us; whereas in the Greek Manuscripts, and in the Edition of Zonaras and Balsamon, it is simply expressed, the Lord hath declared; and in that of Joannes Antiochenus, Our Lord hath declared. Lastly in the 82d Canon there is this expression, as our Brother Onesimus, and in the last, our Acts, where it ought to be read simply as in the Arabick Paraphrase, as Onesimus, and the Acts of the Apostles.

more capable of performing this Artifice, than the above cited Author of the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions (d), who hath in like manner aſcribed many other Writings to the Apoſtles, and hath inſerted theſe Canons entire in his third Book.

As for the Antiquity of them, it is apparent that they are very ancient, and that a great part of them (if not all) were decreed by Councils that were holden before that of Nice: For firſt, they do not contain any thing (according to my judgment) but what is conformable to the Diſcipline that was obſerved in ſome Churches at the end of the Second Century, throughout the Third, and in the beginning of the Fourth. Secondly, they comprehend certain Ordinances that are known to have been made in thoſe times: As for Example; There is a Canon that prohibits the Celebration of the Feaſt of Eaſter with the Jews, now we are aſſured, that this was Decreed in divers Synods aſſembled in the time of Pope Victor. Moreover there are three, wherein the Baptiſm of Hereticks is rejected, as void and of no effect, which is declared by Firmilian and Dionyſius Alexandrinus to have been determined in the Councils of Synnada and Iconium, that were holden ſome time before them. But who can believe, that theſe Canons were made or counterfeited at a time when Perſons baptized by Hereticks were generally admitted without re-baptizing them? And it cannot be imagined, that they were forged by S. Cyprian, or Firmilian, on purpoſe to authorize their Diſcipline; it is much more reaſonable to believe, that they really are the very Canons of the Synods of Iconium and Synnada, which have been falſly attributed to the Apoſtles, not by theſe Saints, but by later Authors. Thirdly, It is clearly proved, that the greateſt part of theſe Canons are more ancient than the Council of Nice, becauſe they are often cited in this Council, and thoſe that were conven'd not long after, as well as by the Authors who wrote in the Fourth Century (e), under the name of Ancient Laws, Canons of the Fathers, Eccleſiaſtical Canons, and even Apoſtolical, which is different from what they call Cuſtoms, Manners, or Diſcipline, concerning which there are no written Rules or Injunctions. Therefore it is certain, that theſe Canons are ancient, that they have been erroneouſly aſcribed to the Apoſtles, and that they are a Collection of Ordinances of divers ancient Synods that were holden before the Council of Nice, but it is not known when this Collection was made, nor who collected it, nor even whether it conſiſts of thoſe 85 Canons that are now extant, or of a leſſer number. However, it is probable, that it was compiled at ſeveral times, and that ſome Canons have been ſucceſſively added, becauſe no order is obſerved therein, as alſo becauſe that the Canons relating to one and the ſame Subject are often found ſeparated, beſides ſome Contradictions.

The Objections propounded by Mr. Daillé againſt the Apoſtolical Canons, manifeſtly prove againſt Turrianus that they were not compoſed by the Apoſtles, but they do not in the leaſt impugn our opinion. As for Example; It is objected by him, That there are in theſe Canons certain terms that were not uſual in the time of the Apoſtles, as Clerk, Lecturer, Laick, Metropolitan, &c. But he cannot deny that theſe terms were uſed in the third Age of the Church. That which is ordained concerning Lent, and againſt faſting on Sundays or the Sabbath, may belong to the third Century ſince the ſame things are found in the Works of Tertullian. The Canons againſt thoſe that make (d) I am apt to believe that no perſon was more capable of performing this Artifice.] It is ſuitable to the temper of this Author, who deſigned to paſs every where for a Diſciple of the Apoſtles; for which reaſon he has given us divers Conſtitutions under their name, attributing to every Apoſtle ſome particular Conſtitutions and Liturgies, at the end whereof he annexed theſe Canons with the above-mentioned additions; and he likewiſe adds in the name of the Apoſtles: This is what we thought fit to command you O ye Biſhops, continue to obſerve theſe things.

(e) They are often cited] In the firſt Canon of the Council of Nice, the ſecond of the Apoſtles is alledged, concerning thoſe that make themſelves Eunuchs, and in the fifth Canon of the ſame Council, the 12th and 32d is cited relating to Excommunication. In the ninth Canon of the Council of Antioch the 34th is quoted concerning the Metropolitan; in the 20th Canon of the ſame, the 10th about Excommunication; in the 21ſt Canon, the 14th prohibiting Biſhops to leave their Dioceſſes; and in the 23d Canon the 76th, that a Succeſſor ought not to be elected. In the Synod of Conſtantinople convened in the year 394, the 14th Apoſtolical Canon is quoted, of the Juriſdiction of Biſhops. In the Council of Epheſus, Acts 7. col. 788. we find the 35th cited concerning Ordinations; and in Act. 1. the 74th is alledged relating to the three Admonitions that ought to precede Eccleſiaſtical Cenſure. Moreover Alexander in Theodoret, lib. 1. c. 4. cites the 12th, as alſo Athanaſius, Epiſt. ad omnes Orthodoxos, where he likewiſe alludes to the 29, 30, and 75th Canons. The 34th is alledged by Arſenius, in like manner the 30th, 35th, and 81ſt are quoted by Pope Julius in his Epiſtle. St. Baſil in the 43d Canon plainly cites the 24th of the Apoſtles, under the name of an ancient Canon; in the 12th Canon the 77th concerning Bigamy; and in the firſt the 47th relating to the Baptiſm of Hereticks. Laſtly Theodotius in Cod. Lib. 3. de Summa Trinitate quotes the 17th under the name of an Apoſtolical Canon.

M. Daillé replies, that all theſe Quotations do not relate to the Apoſtolical Canons, but to the Diſcipline, Cuſtoms, and Traditions that proceeded from the Apoſtles; however this anſwer hath no probability; for the word Canon ſignifies written Laws, and the Council of Nice diſtinguiſheth Canons from Cuſtoms, which he therein called αρχαια ἔθη. Moreover M. Daillé adds, that certain Canons and ancient Laws are often cited that are not included in the Apoſtolical, and he produceth two Examples, the firſt whereof is taken from the 13th Canon of the Nicene Council, and the 2d from the 21ſt of that of Ancyra. But firſt, the Apoſtolical or Eccleſiaſtical Canons are not cited by name in theſe two, but only in the firſt an ancient and Canonical Law or Cuſtom, παλαιον καὶ κανονικον νομον, and in the ſecond, ἀρχαιον ὅρον, an ancient definition. Secondly, nothing hinders but that theſe words may be underſtood of ſome ancient definitions of Synods; as for example, the Law wherein it was ordained to receive the Lapſi at the point of death, cited in the firſt Canon, was made in the Eaſtern and African Churches before the Council of Nice, if we may give credit to the Teſtimony of Dionyſius Alexandrinus in Ep. ad Stephanum, produced by Euſebius, Lib. 7. chap. 4. and 5.

themselves Eunuchs, might be composed by Demetrius against the Error of Origen. The Canons concerning Easter, are apparently those of the Councils that were convened under Victor; and others relating to the Baptism of Hereticks, are probably those of the Councils of Synnada and Iconium. Upon the perusal of all the Objections alledged by M. Daillé, it will appear, that although they are extremely weighty against the Opinion of Turrianus, yet they are of no force against ours (f). Apostolical Canons and Constitutions.

It ought then to be esteemed as certain, that not only the first 50 Canons, but likewise the following 35. are very ancient, though they do not belong to the Apostles. Therefore they have been always much esteemed by the Greeks, as being of great Authority. Joannes Antiochenus, who lived in the time of the Emperor Justinian, hath inserted them in his Collection of Canons; and they are commended by Justinian himself in his sixth Novel. They are in like manner approved in the Synod that was holden in the Imperial Palace, after the fifth General Council: Cited in the seventh Oecumenial Council, and allowed by St. Joannes Damiscenus, and Photius, but with this difference, that the first, who was no great Critick, attributed them to the Apostles, and the other that was more quick-sighted in these matters doubted whether they belonged to them. However they have not always met with the same Reception among the Latins. Cardinal Humbert hath rejected them, and Gelasius hath placed them among the Apocryphal Books as well because they were falsely ascribed to the Apostles, as because he found among them some Canons, that authorised the Opinion of St. Cyprian concerning the Baptism of Hereticks. Hinchmar favourably explains Gelasius's Notion, declaring, that he did not insert them among those Books that were Apocryphal and full of Errors, but only in the number of those, with respect to which this Rule of St. Paul ought to be observed, Try all things, and hold fast that which is good. Dionysius Exiguus hath translated the first 50, and hath prefixed them to his Collection, taking notice however, that some Persons would not acknowledge them; and perhaps this is the reason that Martinus Braccarensis would not admit them into his Collection of Canons; but Isidore hath made no difficulty to afford them a place in his, and ever since they have been always accounted as a part of the Canon Law. It is further to be observed, that as soon as they appeared in France, they were generally well received there, and were first urged in the cause of Prætextatus under the Reign of King Chilperic, wherein their Authority was allowed, as we are informed by Gregorius Turonensis in the fifth Book of his History, Chap 19. where he takes notice, that there was an Appendix added to the Collection of Canons, which contained certain Canons, as being writ by the Apostles, quasi Apostolicos, and cites one of them, which is the 25th Apostolical, but according to a different Version from that of Dionysius Exiguus. Lastly, Hinchmar Bishop of Rheims observes, that they were annexed to the beginning of a Collection of Canons compiled for the use of the Church of France, separately from the others. and as for their Authority and Antiquity, he is altogether of our opinion, which he explains in these words, in the 24th Canon, The Canons (says he) that are called Apostolical, Collected by some Christians, were written in a time when the Bishops could not freely assemble together, nor hold Councils; they contain many things that may be allowed, but they likewise establish others that ought not to be observed.

I cannot say the same thing of the Apostolical Constitutions, as I have done of the Canons, viz, that they are not supposititious, but that in process of time a false Title happened to be attributed to them; for the Author of the Constitutions is an Impostor, that endeavours every where to pass for Clement a Disciple of the Apostles, and who imputes to them all in general, and to every one in particular, divers Ordinances that are in no wise consonant to the Apostolical ones; such are those concerning Churches built in the form of Temples, Catechumens, Energumens, Fasts, Liturgies, Unction, (f) They are of no force against ours.] However, some of the most material of M. Daille's Reasons may be objected to us; for instance, he affirms that St. Athanasius in the matter of Leontius the Eunuch, cites the Canon of the Council of Nice, and not the Apostolical, which shews (says he,) that it was not as yet known; Moreover, that it is not quoted by St. Epiphanius against the Valesian Hereticks: That St. Basil reckons the triple immersion in Baptism amongst the unwritten Tradition, and consequently, that the Canon of the Apostles in which it is ordained, was not composed in the time of this Father: That this Canon was made against those Hereticks that Baptized with a single Immersion, and that the Eunomians were the first that followed this practice. These are the Arguments of M. Daille that can be urged against us, but it is very easie to refute them. St. Athanasius cites the Apostolical Canon rather than that of Nice. St. Epiphanius produceth no Canon against the Valesians; but only the Holy Scripture. St. Basil and the other Fathers understand by unwritten Tradition all those matters that are not contained in the Sacred Writings. Lastly, the Canon concerning triple Immersion was not made against Hereticks, but to prevent the negligence of Priests. The 84th Canon might indeed be objected with much more probability, wherein we find the Books of the Maccabees, together with the Epistles and Constitutions of St. Clement among the Canonical Writings. But it must be replied to this Objection, that this Canon is corrupted, that the Books of the Maccabees are not extant in the Greek Copy of Joannes Antiochenus, and it may easily be discerned, that the Epistles and Constitutions of St. Clement, have been added by the Author of the Apostolical Constitutions, who endeavoured to pass for St. Clement, to raise the reputation of this Book. It may be proved that this Canon is ancient, because the Books of the Old Testament that were not inserted in the Canon of the Jews, and the Revelation are omitted. Lastly, It is asserted against us, that these Canons were unknown to the Authors of the Fifth Century, that they are not cited by Eusebius, nor included in the Codex Canonum of the Catholick Church; but all these Objections are frivolous, for the Ecclesiastical Writers of the fourth Age have often referred to these Canons. Eusebius indeed hath not mentioned them, but neither doth he take notice of the Canons of the Nicene Council, and in fine it is not to be wondred at that they are not found in the Code of the Universal Church, which did not contain all the ancient Canons, no more than that of the African Church comprehended those that were made by St. Cyprian or Agrippinus.

Apoſtolical Canons and Conſtitutions.

Prayers for the Catechumens and Energumens; the Ordination of Deacons and Deaconeſſes; Virgins, Confeſſors, Subdeacons; The Benediction of Oyl and Water; The Firſt-Fruits of Tyths, Feſtival Days, the Celebration of Eaſter, and many other things that were not practiſed in the time of the Apoſtles, not to mention a great number of Abſurdities and Miſtakes of time, together with ſome Errors that are contained therein (g), which evidently demonſtrates beyond contradiction, that theſe Conſtitutions were not compoſed by Apoſtles, and even that they do not belong to St. Clement, as we ſhall ſhew more at large in diſcourſing concerning the Works of this Father, where we ſhall likewiſe endeavour to diſcover at what time they were forg'd.

I ſhall add nothing concerning the Nine Canons that are alſo attributed to the Apoſtles, and are reported to have been made by them in a certain Council of Antioch unknown to all Antiquity; becauſe there is no queſtion but that they are fictitious; neither are they at preſent maintained by any (h).

(g) A great number of Abſurdities and miſtakes of time, together with ſome Errors that are contained therein.] As in Book 1. That the Beards of Women ought to be ſhaved, and not thoſe of Men. In Book 2. Ch. 1. That all Biſhops ought to be 50 years old. In Chap. 57. it is ordained, That the Goſpel according to St. John ſhould be read; which was not written until the 97th year of our Lord, after the death of the Apoſtles. In Chap. 11. the Author aſſerts, That the Biſhop preſides over Kings and Magiſtrates; and in Book 3. Chap. 2. That third Marriages are an Intemperance, and the fourth a manifeſt Debauchery. In Book 6. Chap. 6. mention is made of the Ebionites, whoſe Errors ſprang up after the deceaſe of the Apoſtles. In the 14th Chapter, James the Son of Zebedee is introduced as preſent at Jeruſalem after the time of his death. In Book 8. Chap. 4. it is declared, That the Conſtitutions were made in the preſence of St. Paul and the Seven Deacons; now it is certain that St. Stephen, one of the ſaid Seven Deacons, died before the Converſion of St. Paul. In Book 1. Chap. 32. Female Slaves are permitted to ſuffer themſelves to be deflowred by their Maſters. Moreover this Author is accuſed of Arianiſm.

(h) Neither are they maintained at preſent by any.] This Synod is unknown to St. Luke, and to all the ancients; for although it is ſaid to be cited by Innocent I. Ep. 18. it is a miſtake, ſince he only mentions the Council of Jeruſalem; and whereas it is written, Antiochenam Eccleſiam quæ meruit apud ſe celeberrimum Apoſtolorum Conventum. The Church of Antioch, which deſervedly had the moſt famous Convention of the Apoſtles celebrated there, it ought to be read propter ſe, near that City; for it is apparent, that this Pope ſpake concerning the Synod of Jeruſalem, which was the moſt famous Convention of the Apoſtles. Moreover, not ſo much as one of the ancient Authors makes mention of theſe Canons, and indeed they are altogether abſurd: It is ſaid in the firſt, that the Chriſtians were called Galileans, a name that was not attributed to them until after the death of the Apoſtles. In the third Canon it is decreed, that the Chriſtians ſhould live Anagogically, a harſh and inſignificant Term. In the 9th Canon the Synagogue is called Beſhuine; and in the 8th it is ordained, that there ſhould be Images in the Churches, a practice that was not in uſe in the time of the Apoſtles. This Canon is cited by Gregorius Peſſinuntius in the ſecond Council of Nice, but it is well known that many Apocryphal Records were alledged in that Council.

Of ſeveral Books attributed to Prochorus, Linus, and Abdias, and of the Acts of the Paſſion of St. Andrew.

Prochorus, Linus, Abdias, &c.

IN the time of the Apoſtles there lived a certain Perſon named Prochorus, one of the Seven firſt Deacons, and there is now extant a Book under his name, containing the Life of St. John, which is Printed among the Orthodoxographa, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum. But Baronius, Bellarmin, Lorinus, the Maſter of the Palace, and in a word, all thoſe that have written concerning Eccleſiaſtical Authors both Roman Catholicks and Proteſtants unanimouſly agree, that it is a ſuppoſitious Book, and unworthy of him whoſe Name it bears; and indeed, it is a Narrative full of abſurd Fables and Tales. It is related there, that St. John caſt himſelf at the Feet of the Apoſtles, deſiring to be exempted from going into Aſia; That after he was taken out of the Caldron of boiling Oyl, a Church was built in Honour of him; That he compoſed his Goſpel in the Iſle of Patmos, &c. The Stile of this Book argues its Author to be a Latin, or a Greek, and not an Hebrew. Laſtly, we find therein the words Trinity and Hypoſtaſis.

The two Books attributed to Linus concerning the Paſſion of St. Peter, and St. Paul are likewiſe generally rejected, as fictitious and full of Fables. They ſay, that Agrippa was Governor of Rome in the time of St. Peter, who ſuffered Martyrdom without the knowledge of Nero; That this Emperor was offended that he was put to Death; That part of the Roman Magiſtrates were Chriſtians; and that the Wife of Albanus departed from her Husband againſt his Will, following the advice of St. Peter. In fine, both theſe Books are full of Errors, Falſities, Fictions, and notorious Untruths; in the laſt of which mention is made of the Epiſtles of St. Paul to Seneca, and of Seneca to St. Paul.

We muſt likewiſe give the ſame Judgment upon the Book imputed to Abdias, that contains divers extremely fabulous Relations concerning the Lives of the Apoſtles, and was Printed by it ſelf in the years 1557, 1560, and 1571; at Baſil, Anno 1532, and at Paris in 1583; it is alſo inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum. At firſt they tried to make it paſs for a Book compoſed in Hebrew, by a Diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt, named Abdias of the City of Babylon, Tranſlated into Greek by Eutropius, and into Latin by Julius Africanus; but now the whole World is convinced of this Error, and it is generally agreed, that it was forged by an Impostor, that falsly pretends to be a Disciple of Jesus Christ, who nevertheless cites Hegesippus, and Julius Africanus, whom he could not have seen if he had lived in our Saviours time; and lastly, he relates many fabulous Narrations concerning the Life of Jesus Christ and his Apostles, which it would be too tedious here to rehearse. Prochorus, Linus, Abdias, &c.

Men are divided in their Censures upon the Acts of the Passion of St. Andrew written by the Priests of Achaia, which are inserted in the History of the Saints published by Surius, Baronius, Bellarmine, and some other Criticks of the Church of Rome admit them as Authentick, but they are rejected by many. The ancient Ecclesiastical Writers know no other Records of St. Andrew than those that were corrupted by the Manichees, mentioned by St. Augustine, Philastrius, and Pope Innocent (a), and which are reckoned by Gelasius in the number of Apochryphal Books. But it is certain that those were different from these whereof we now discourse; it is also evident, that these last Acts of the Passion of St. Andrew, have been cited by none but Authors that lived since the Seventh or Eighth Century, as by Remigius Altissiodorensis. Petrus Damianus, Lanfrank, St. Bernard, and Ivo Carnutensis, which is the cause that we can have no assurance that they are very ancient. Thirdly, the Mystery of the Trinity is not only explained in these Acts after such a manner as gives us occasion to suspect, that he that wrote them lived after the Council of Nice; but he likewise propagates the Error of the modern Greeks, in affirming, that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father, and remains in the Son. It is indeed objected, that there are Manuscripts wherein these words are not expressed, but who knows, whether they have not been omitted in some, rather than added in others? Therefore this History ought at least to be esteemed, as a dubious Writing, that cannot be applied (as St. Jerome declares,) to prove any Doctrine of Faith.

The account of the Life and Death of St. Matthias was forged by an Author who pretends to have received it from a Jew that Translated it out of the Hebrew Tongue. We ought also to place in the rank of Apocryphal and fabulous Books, the Life of St. Mark and the History of St. Clement, together with that of Apollinarius, set down in the Collection of ancient Histories compiled by Laurentius de la Barre. And we need only read them over to be convinced of their falsity.

(a) Mentioned by St. Augustin, Philastrius, &c.] St. Aug. lib. de Fide contr. Manichæos. Philastr. lib de Hæres. N. 40. Innocentii I. Epist. ad Exup. Gelasius in conc. Roman.

Of the Books of the Sibyls, Mercurius Trismegistus, and Hystaspes: Of the Letters of Lentulus and Pilate, concerning Jesus Christ: Of the Epistles of Seneca to St. Paul, and of those of St. Paul to Seneca: And of a Passage in the History of Josephus.

WE joyn all these prophane Records together, that have been heretofore alledged in favour of the Christian Religion, that so we may examine them; and although we should reject them, yet we do not believe that we do any wrong to Religion, which is sufficiently furnished with solid and convincing Proofs, without standing in need of those that are false or dubious. We begin with the Verses that are attributed to the Sibyls, which are frequently cited by the ancient Writers to to convince the Pagans of the Truth of the Religion of Jesus Christ; but before we proceed to Examine them, it would be expedient to give some account of these Sibyls and their Books. Sibyls.

It is difficult to assign a true Etymology of the Word Sibyl; Lactantius, and after him St. Jerom affirm, that the Sibyls were so called, because they were the Interpreters of the Decrees of the Gods; and that their Name consisted of two Greek Words (a), signifying the Counsel of the Gods, which being written in the Æolick Dialect compose that of Sibyl. It is derived by some from an Hebrew Word, and by others from an obsolete Latin Adjective (b), that signifies, Subtil or Acute; but this later Conjecture is false, since the Word Sibyl was used by the Greeks before the Latins. The most probable opinion is, that the Name of Sibyl, which was proper to the famous Delphick Prophetess, afterwards became common to others, as that of Cæsar, peculiar only to Julius, was after him appropriated to all the succeeding Emperors.

(a) Consisted of two Greek words.] These two words are Διὸς βέλη, and in the Eolick Dialect σίὸς βέλη, Lactantius, Lib. 1. c. 6. Hierom. Lib. 1. in Jovin. It is objected against this Etymology that the Adjective σιβύλλινος, the Three last Syllables whereof compose a Dactyl, make it manifest that the word Sibylla cannot be derived from σίὸς βέλη.

(b) From an obsolete Latin Adjective.] This Adjective is Sibus, which according to Festus signifies the same as Acutus, or Callidus; a quick, or crafty Man.

Sibyls. Nothing is ſo uncertain as the Number and Names of the Sibyls (c), many of the ancient Writers mention but one; ſome ſpeak of her of Cuma, and others of her of Delphos. Strabo and ſome others diſtinguiſh two Erythræan. Solinus produceth three, her of Delphos, her of Erythræ, and her of Cuma. Pauſanias names four, the Libyck, the Delphick or Erithæan, the Cuman and the Babylonian. Ælian, Varro, Lactantius, Clemens Alexandrinus, and moſt other Writers, reckon ten, and ſome add others to the number, but they do not agree about their Names, nor the place of their Habitation, and they often confound them one with another.

However, it is certain, that the Name of Sibyls was given to certain Women, who being tranſported with Enthuſiaſm (d), and an extravagant Fury, cauſed either through a violent Inflammation of Choler, or by the poſſeſſion of Dæmons, pronounced divers obſcure and enigmatical Sentences that paſſed among the Heathens for Oracles and Predictions. It is reported, that the Sibyl of Cuma wrote them on the Leaves of Trees (e), and that a Collection of them was offered by a certain Woman to Tarquinius (f) King of the Romans, who bought part thereof, which he cauſed carefully to be laid up in an Urn or Stone-pot, and to be placed in the Capitol, having created Officers on purpoſe, whom he called Duumviri, whoſe Office it was to keep thoſe Oracles with care, and to conſult them upon urgent occaſions. The number of thoſe that executed this Commiſſion was by little and little increaſed, for there were afterwards ten, and at laſt fifteen, conſtituted for this purpoſe; and very ſevere Puniſhments were inflicted on theſe perſons, if they ſuffered the Books of the Sibyls to be ſeen. It is related by Dioniſius, Halicarnaſſæus, and Valerius Maximus, that one of theſe Duumviri, was put to death as a Parricide, that is to ſay, he was ſow'd up alive in a Sack, and thrown into the Sea, for permitting ſome of the Sibylline Verſes to be tranſcribed. Theſe Books were thus preſerved until the year 671, after the Foundation of Rome, which was the 83d before the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt. But the Capitol being burnt in that year, theſe Books were likewiſe conſumed with the reſt of the Ornaments of this Palace, as is obſerved by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus, Pliny, and other Authors. When the Capitol was rebuilt, the Conſuls made a Propoſition to the (c) Nothing is ſo uncertain as the Number and Names of the Sibyls.] Plato in his Phædrus mentions but one Sibyl, neither doth he declare to what place ſhe appertained. The Author of the Book de Mirabilibus Auſcultationibus in Ariſtotle, ſpeaks of her of Cuma. Diodorus Siculus Lib. 4. gives an account of her of Delphos, affirming that ſhe was named Daphne, and was the Daughter of Tireſias; but Virgil, Pauſanias and Suidas call her by the name of Manto, and St. Clement by that of Artemis. Dioniſius Halicarnaſſæus, Pliny, Juvenal, &c. mention but one Sibyl: However it doth not follow, that they knew no others. Strabo. Lib. 13 and 17. aſſures us, that there were two at Erythræ, and that the Second called Athenais lived in the time of Alexander the Great. Stephanus de Urbibus and Capella. Lib. 2. de Nuptiis Philologiæ reckon likewiſe two, Erophile a Native of Troy, who came to Cuma, and Symmachia of the City of Erythræ. Solinus in Polyhiſt. c. 8. produceth three, the Delphick named Eriphile, who was more ancient than Homer, the Erythræan, and the Cuman. Ælian Var. Hiſt. Lib. 2. c. 35. reckons ten, the Erythræan, the Samian, the Egyptian, the Sardian, the Cuman, the Jewiſh, and four others. St. Clement, Stromat. Lib. 1. Manto (ſays he) and a multitude of Sibyls; the Samian, the Colophonian, the Theſſalian, the Theſprotick, &c. Lactantius in Lib. 1. recites ten after Varro: The firſt is that of Perſia mentioned by Nicaver, who wrote the Hiſtory of Alexander the Great: The ſecond of Lybia, cited by Euripides. 3. The Delphick alledged by Chryſippus, in Lib. de Divinatione. 4. The Cuman in Italy, whom Nævius and Piſo mention, the former in his Hiſtory of the Punick War, and the later in his Annals. 5. The Erythræan whom Apolladorus Erythræus affirms to have lived in his City. 6. The Samian, concerning whom Eratoſthenes hath written. 7. The Cuman, called by ſome Amaltheæa, and by others Demophile, or Herophile. 8. The Heleſpontick born in the Countrey about Troy, and in the Town of Marpeſſus. 9. The Phrygian, who Propheſied at Ancyra. 10. The Tiburtina named Albunea, who uttered her Oracles at Tybur, near the River Anio now called il Teverone, at the bottom whereof it is reported, that her Statue was found holding a Book in her hand. Iſidore hath followed the Catalogue of Lactantius, but Suidas reckons up Twelve: Some with Pauſanias, confound the Erythræan with the Delphick, the Phrigæan, the Samian, and the Colophonian. Others as Capella, and the Author de Mirab. Auſcultat. joyn the Cuman, and the Erythræan, St. Juſtin makes no Diſtinction between the Babylonian and the Cuman; according to the Opinion of ſome, the Perſick is the moſt ancient, others attribute the greateſt Antiquity to the Cuman, and St. Clement to the Delphick.

(d) Tranſported with Enthuſiaſm.] We need only read the Deſcription, that is made by all the ancient Authors of the manner how the Sibyls uttered their Oracles: See Virgil in Æneid. Lucan. Claudian in Panegyrico Honorii, Plutarch. de Orac. Pythiæ, &c. It was ſo evident among the Heathens, that they were poſſeſſed, that they applyed the word σιβυλλαίνειν, to ſignifie, to Play the Madman, Diod. Lib. 4. Now this fury that deprived them of their Senſes, cannot be eſteemed as an Inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt, but as an Effect of their being poſſeſſed with a Dæmon, and intoxicated with the Exhalations of inflamed Choler; for in my Opinion, it is an Imagination without any Ground to affirm with St. Jerom, that they received the Gift of Propheſying from God, in recompence of their Virginity.

(e) Wrote them on the Leaves of Trees.] Virgil, Æneid. 6. Foliis tantum ne carmina manda. Juvenal. Credite me folium recitare Sibyllæ.

(f) Was offered by a certain Woman to Tarquinius.] This Hiſtory is recorded by many ancient Authors; ſome affirm, that thoſe Books were Preſented to Tarquinius Superbus, and others, to Tarquinius Priſcus. It is Reported, that the Woman who bought them had Nine Volumes, which ſhe offered to Sell at a dear Rate, but perceiving that Tarquin would not give her what ſhe required, ſhe burnt Three of them; that afterwards having demanded as much for the other Six, as ſhe had done for the Nine, and being repulſed, ſhe burnt Three more, when at laſt the King being aſtoniſhed at her boldneſs, bought the Three that were left at the ſame Price that ſhe had asked for the Nine. See Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus. Antiquit. Lib. 4. Aulus Gellius and Lactantius. Pliny reckons but Three Books inſtead of Nine; and affirms, that Two of them were burnt.

Senate,

Senate, to send Ambassadors into Greece to Erythræ, as also into Asia, to collect the Oracles of the Sibyls, and to transmit them to Rome: Whereupon Octacilius Crassus, and L. Valerius Flaccus were deputed to go unto Attalus King of Pergamus, who brought out of Asia a thousand Verses attributed to the Sibyls, which they had gathered together throughout all the Parts of that Region from the Copies of divers private Persons. But forasmuch as there were many things therein that seemed to be false or superfluous, fifteen Men were appointed to Revise and Correct them, and after this Correction they were placed in the Capitol in the room of the others. In the time of Augustus, these Books were again reviewed, above two thousand Verses attributed to the Sibyls were burnt by the Command of this Emperor, and those that were allowed to be Genuine, were inclosed in two Golden Boxes in the Temple of Apollo. Some are of opinion, that these Writings were burnt in the Conflagration of Rome under Nero, but they have not produced any convincing Proofs of this matter. However, it is certain, that as long as there were Pagan Emperors at Rome (g), the Oracles ascribed to the Sibyls were carefully preserv'd there, to which they had Recourse on all extraordinary and emergent Occasions, and Julian the Apostate designing to re-establish all the ancient Heathen Superstitions, caused the Sibylline Books to be diligently sought for, and consulted. Sibyls.

There are now extant many Greek Verses attributed to the Sibyls, which are divided into eight Books; but at present it is almost generally agreed throughout the whole World, that they are a fictitious Work, as the Time in which the were written (h), the Stile (i), and the Things therein contained (k), do most clearly demonstrate. And if it be certain, that the eight Books, which we now have in our possession under the Name of the Sibyls are counterfeit, it is no less true, that those that were in the hands of the Fathers, and which they cited, were equally spurious, and also that they were not much different from those that we have at this day; I affirm therefore, First, That the Books of the Sibyls, alledged by the Fathers, were not really those Sibylline Oracles that the Romans preserved, with so much Care; For besides that these last were so strictly kept, that a Copy of them could not be procured by any means whatsoever, much less common, as those were that are quoted by the Fathers, which were every where visible; it is plain, that they comprehended such matters as were altogether different from those that are usually found in the Writings of the Fathers. For in the former prophane Things were only comprised, concerning the Ceremonies of the Heathens, whereas the later

(h) As the time in which they were written.] It is certain, that the Sibyls were later than Moses, however the Author of this Counterfeit Work affirms, that the Sibyl was in Noah's Ark, and nevertheless it is declared in Book III that these Oracles were written 1500 years after the Grecian Empire was Established. Now after whatsoever manner this may be understood, it follows that all these Predictions concerning the Jews and Moses, are forged, since these 1500 years continue till the Destruction of Jerusalem. In Book V. we are informed by the Author, that he saw the second Ruin of the desirable House; which is plainly to be understood of the last Destruction of Jerusalem. He says in Book VIII. That after Trajan, intimated by the Letter T, one should Reign whose Name was to be taken from the Adriatick Sea, this is Adrian; and that after him Three should Govern at a time, that is to say, Antoninus, Marcus and Lucius, and that the last should obtain the Supreme Government, which shews that this was written at the beginning of the Reign of Marcus Aurelius, or at the end of that of Antoninus; for in regard that Lucius was the youngest, it was natural to foretell that he should live longest.

(i) The Style.] It appears, that he that counterfeited these Books, was not really transported with Enthusiasm, but only pretended to be so: The Verses of the Sibyls were obscure and without Order, whereas these are not very Irregular: The Affairs of the Emperors are therein Historically digested, and not after a Prophetical manner: The style contains nothing of that Impetuosity and Enthusiasm that is every where Conspicuous in the Expressions of the Sibyls, neither is it like that of Homer who took many Verses from those Propheteresses, if we may believe Diodorus: Moreover the Author of these Sibylline Books was illiterate; for he derives the Name of Adam from ἀδὴς; in the second Book he affirms, that the Four Letters of his Name signifie the Four Quarters of the World; thô, in Hebrew and Chaldee, there are but three; he feigns that the Letters of the Name of God, Compose the number 1697. which is not true, unless it be written in Greek after a barbarous manner from the Name of JESUS, which he makes to consist of four Vowels, and two Consonants, he extracts the Number of 888 years, and from that of Rome 948. he vouches the Fables of the Titans, as true Histories; Moreover he says, that the Mountain Ararat is in Phrygia; that the River Euxotas is in Epirus, and that Gog and Magog are Ethiopians, which shews that this Impostor was ignorant of the Hebrew Tongue, of Geography and History, which we cannot say of the Sibyl.

(k) And the things therein contained.] There are certain Principles in these Books, that were not imbibed by any but the ancient Christians; the Author is of the Opinion of the Millenaries, he believes Nero to be Anti-Christ, that the Souls of Men shall remain in Hell until the Resurrection, that the Fire of the Judgment shall serve instead of Purgatory, that the Terrestrial Paradise shall be preserv'd, and that at last the wicked shall be delivered from Hell Fire: he likewise maintains divers other Opinions of the ancient Christians. Lastly, it cannot be doubted, but that the Accounts in these Books, of the Nativity, Life and Actions of Jesus Christ, have been taken from the History of the Evangelists: And indeed, the Prophets have said nothing that comes near the Plainness, that appears in the Books of the Sibyls. I shall omit many other Reasons.

Sibyls. were full of Predictions and Inſtructions relating to Chriſtianity. The Books of the Sibyls were never conſulted among the Romans, without extracting from them ſome Superſtitions perfectly Pagan (l). They were informed therein, that they ought either to offer ſome ſort of Sacrifice to the Gods, or to faſten a Nail in the Capitol, or to celebrate ſome particular Games to the Honour of Jupiter. At another time it was found to be neceſſary to cauſe the Statue of Æſculapius to be brought to Rome, to erect a Temple to Venus, to offer Sacrifices to the Infernal Deities, and to appeaſe the Heathen Gods with peculiar and extraordinary Solemnities. Laſtly, Nothing was ever gathered from theſe Books, but Ceremonies that were abſolutely prophane. On the contrary, the Fathers alledge nothing out of the Writings of the Sibyls, but what relates to the Chriſtian Religion, and to the true Worſhip of God. Is there any probability, that theſe Propheteſſes ſhould have uttered Things ſo different, and that they ſhould have taught in one and the ſame Book, the way of Worſhipping the True God, and the greateſt Superſtitions of the Gentiles? Who can imagine that theſe Books that were kept by the Romans to Authorize all their Superſtitious Rites, and which they eſteemed as the moſt ſublime and refined part of their Religion, ſhould contain far clearer Prophecies concerning Jeſus Chriſt, than all that was ever declared by the Jewiſh Prophets? Moreover, not only the Books of the Sibyls that are now extant ſpeak of our Saviour in ſuch plain Expreſſions, as look more like a Hiſtory than a Prophecy; But the ſame thing may be ſaid of the Books cited by the Fathers, that comprehend the ſame Predictions, and even more diſtinct. For can there be a plainer Prediction concerning Jeſus Chriſt, than the Verſes produced by Euſebius in the Prayer attributed to Conſtantine?

There is but one God, who is alſo the Saviour;
Who has ſuffer'd for us;
Who is mark'd out in theſe Verſes.

The Acroſtick quoted in the ſame place is not more obſcure. Can any thing be ſpoken more expreſly concerning the Creation of the World, the laſt Judgment, and the Life Everlaſting, than what is produced by Theophilus Antiochenus, as proceeding from a Sibyl? All the other Sibylline Verſes recited by the Fathers, are written almoſt after the very ſame manner on every particular Subject, and this obliged the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles, attributed to St. Juſtin, to affirm, that the Sibyl had foretold the Advent of Jeſus Chriſt in clear and evident Terms, Σαφῶς καὶ σατρῶς. Now what an abſurdity is it to believe, that the Heathens, from whom God had concealed the Coming of his Son, and whom he ſuffered to walk in Darkneſs, ſhould have more notable Prophecies among them, than all thoſe of the Jews, to whoſe Cuſtody he had committed the Sacred Writings, and to whom he had given the knowledge of the Meſſiah.

Moreover, this Argument might be urged farther, and it might be demanded from whence the Sibyls could receive the knowledge of the Meſſiah. It is alledged by ſome, that they were Inſpired by God; and by others that they took from the Holy Scripture, all that they uttered concerning Religion; but there is no probability neither in the one nor the other Aſſertion; for what likelihood is there that God ſhould inſpire Sorcereſſes and Prieſteſſes of falſe Gods, that deluded Mankind, to cauſe them to adore the Dæmons with which they were poſſeſſed? Or who can imagine, that God ſhould make uſe of ſuch Inſtruments to reveal his Myſteries ſo clearly to the World; and on the other ſide, how could they draw thoſe Truths out of the Old Teſtament, that are but very obſcurely expreſſed therein, and which the Jews themſelves could ſcarcely underſtand.

It remains only for a more full demonſtration of the falſity of the Sibylline Oracles that were uſed by the Fathers, to ſhew, that they differed very little from thoſe that ſtill bear the ſame Title. To evince this, it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that excepting three or four Paſſages, all the others quoted by the ancient Authors, being very numerous, are expreſſed in equivalent Terms in the Sibylline Books that are read even at this day. Now the ſtrongeſt Argument that can be alledged to prove that a Work is ancient, is, that thoſe Paſſages that have been cited by the ancient Writers are found therein. Do we not frequently demonſtrate the Antiquity of an infinite number of Books, only becauſe a particular Paſſage recited by ſome ancient Author, is there to be found? Why then may it not be concluded after the ſame manner, that the Sibylline Books, thô forged, are the ſame with thoſe that were formerly extant? And this Proof is of ſo much the more force, becauſe this may be urged not only againſt one ſingle Paſſage, but very many, that are alledged by different Authors, and alſo becauſe the Sibylline Oracles ſtill remain in the ſame Language in which they were cited. Moreover it is not to be admired, that there are ſome Paſſages which are not found therein, and that there are others which are not Verbally expreſſed, becauſe ſome places in theſe Books are wanting; and it hath been often obſerved, that the ancient Writers are not uſually very exact in their Quotations, but adhere to the Senſe rather than the Literal Expreſſion. It might likewiſe be added, that all that is related by the ancient Fathers concerning the Books of the Sibyls that were heretofore in uſe, is comformable to theſe: The Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles affirms, that the Stile of the Sibylline Writings was not very polite; theſe are of the like nature; they were then reported to contain divers Anachroniſms, and this defect is alſo at preſent obſervable among them. They Treated concerning Jeſus Chriſt, the laſt Judgment, Hell, &c. all theſe Things are in like manner compriſed in thoſe that we now have in our possession. Lastly, these last are very ancient, and belong to the time of the most ancient Fathers; for some Opinions may be found there, that could not be maintained but in the Primitive Ages of the Church: Such are the Errors of the Millenaries; That Nero is Anti-Christ; That the end of the World was near at hand; That it should happen in the time of Antoninus; That Rome should soon be destroyed 948 years after its Foundation, and many other things that could never be asserted by later Christians, who would have been very far from admitting such Notions, when they were convinced of the falsity of these Predictions. Upon the whole matter it ought to be concluded, that the Books of the Sibyls were certainly forged in the Second Century, but it is difficult to determine the precise time, and by whom this was done; all that can be alledged as most probable is, that they began to appear about the end of the Reign of the Emperor Antoninus Pius. (m). Sibyls.

M. Vossius in his last Book gives us an Hypothesis of the Sibylline Oracles somewhat different from this; he acknowledgeth that the ancient Writings of the Sibyls which were preserved until the burning of the Capitol, were entirely prophane, and differed from those that are cited by the Fathers; but he maintains, that among those that were brought from Greece by Octacilius Crassus, there were some Prophecies inserted that had been received from the Jews, who pretended that they were written by the Sibyls, in which the Coming of the Messiah was foretold, and that these were cited by the Fathers under the Name of The Books of the Sibyls, which Title was actually attributed to them.

This Hypothesis, which is well enough contrived, yet lies liable to many Difficulties; for first, the Collection of Oracles ascribed to the Sibyls, that was made after the burning of the Capitol, related no less to the Pagan Superstitions, than the ancient Verses ascribed to the Sibyl of Cuma. Secondly, Since the Predictions concerning Jesus Christ, expressed in the passages of the Sibylline Books, and quoted by the Fathers, are clearer than those that were contained in the Prophecies of the Jews, there is no probability that they could proceed from any of that Nation. Lastly, The Doctrine comprised in the Books of the Sibyls, seems rather to be that of a Christian than of a Jew, since the Coming of Jesus Christ, is therein manifestly foretold; The Resurrection of the Dead, the Last Judgment, and Hell Fire, are expressly described in plain Terms; and mention is made of the Millennium, of the appearing of Anti Christ, together with many other Things of the like nature, which could not be related, but by one that had been instructed in the Christian Religion. Therefore it is much more probable, that the Writings attributed to the Sibyls were forged by a Christian, rather than by a Jew.

However, none ought to be surprised that we reject those Books as supposititious, which have been quoted by the Ancients as real, and it must not be imagined, that we thereby contemn the Authority of the Fathers, or that we impugn the Truth; on the contrary, we should do an Injury to it, if we should endeavour to support it by false Proofs, especially when we are convinced of their Forgery. The Fathers are to be excused for citing the Sibylline Verses as true, because they had not examined them, and finding them published under the Name of the Sibyls, they really believed that they were theirs; but they that are certainly informed of the contrary, would be inexcusable if they continued to rely on such Testimonials, or refused ingenuously to confess what the Truth obliged them to own. And indeed it ought not to be admired, that the Fathers did not examine these Books critically; it is sufficiently known, that they wholly applied themselves to Matters of the greatest Consequence at that time, and that they often happened to be mistaken in prophane Histories and to cite fictitious Books; such are the Works of Hystaspes, and Mercurius Trismegistus, which they almost always joyned with those of the Sibyls; as also the Acts of Pilate, Apocryphal Gospels, divers Acts of the Apostles, and a great number of other Records that have been undoubtedly forged.

But altho the most part of the ancient Writers cited the Oracles of the Sibyls, yet there were even then many Christians that rejected them as Counterfeit, and could not be perswaded to approve the practice of those that made use of their Testimony, whom in derision they called by the Name of Sibyllists. This is attested by Origen, in his Fifth Book against Celsus: Celsus (says he) Objects, that there are Sybillists amongst us, perhaps, because he hath heard it reported, that there are some amongst us who reprove those that affirm, that the Sibyl is a Propheteſs, and call them Sibyllists. St. Augustine hath likewise acknowledged the falsity of these pretended Oracles; and as often as he makes mention of them, he declares that he is not not convinced of their Truth, particularly in Lib. 18. c. 45. De Civit Dei. Were it not (says he) that it is affirmed, that the Prophecies that are produced under the Name of the Sibyls and others concerning Jesus Christ, were feigned by the Christians. And in cap. 47. It may be believed, that all the Propheeies relating to Jesus Christ, that are not contained in the Holy Scriptures, have been forged by the Christians: Wherefore there can be nothing more solid in confuting the Pagans, than to alledge these Prophecies that are taken from the Books of our Enemies.

(m) They began to appear about the end of the Reign of Antoninus Pius. Possevinus affirms, that these Books were written under the Reign of Commodus; but he is deceived in taking the Conflagration mentioned in Book V. for the Fire of the Temple of Vesta, that happened in the time of that Emperor, for the Temple of Jerusalem is to be understood in this place, which is called the desirable House, and the Guardian Temple of God. We have already shewn, that the Author had seen Lucius and Marcus, but that he knew not the later Emperors. All the Fathers that have quoted the Sibylline Books, wrote either under the Reign of Antoninus Pius, or after that time, Josephus indeed and Hermas cite the Sibyls, but in general Terms, and there were possibly some Verses extant under their Names, even in the time of Josephus, who produceth one of them concerning the Tower of Babel, Lib. 1 Ant. c. 5.

But

Sibyls. But the Heathens (ſay they,) doubted not of the truth of the Predictions of the Sibyls that were urged by the Fathers; they only put another ſenſe upon them, nay, they even proceede ſo far as to own, that the Sibylline Verſes foretold the Nativity of a certain new King, and a conſiderable Revolution. This is mentioned by Tully in divers places; moreover when Pompey took the City of Jeruſalem, it was commonly reported, that the Sibyl had foretold, that Nature deſigned a King for the People of Rome; the Senate was likewiſe aſtoniſhed at it, and, by reaſon of this Prediction, refuſed to ſend a General, or an Army, into Egypt. Lentulus (according to the Teſtimony of Cicero and Salluſt,) flatter'd himſelf, that he ſhould become this King that was intimated by the Sibyl. Others have interpreted this Prophecy, with reſpect to Julius Cæſar or Auguſtus, as is obſerved by Cicero and Suetonius. Virgil, in his Fourth Eclogue, produceth the Verſes of the Cuman Sibyl, foreſhewing the Birth of a new King that ſhould deſcend from Heaven. In ſhort, it is moſt certain, that the Gentiles acknowledged that the Books of the Sibyls were favourable to the Chriſtians, inſomuch that the later were prohibited to read them, as appears from the words of Aurelian to the Senate, recited by Vopiſcus. I admire, ( ſays he) Gentlemen, that you ſhould ſpend ſo much time in conſulting the Writings of the Sibyls, as if we were debating in an Aſſembly of Chriſtians, and not in the principal place of the Roman Religion.

Theſe Arguments ſeem to be very plauſible, but if we examine them, we ſhall find that they contain nothing that is ſolid: The Pagans never ſubmitted to the Authority of theſe Books of the Sibyls that were quoted by the Fathers; on the contrary it is manifeſt, that Celſus was perſwaded that they were forged by the Chriſtians; and St. Auguſtine plainly declares, that this was the general Opinion of all the Gentiles. The Sibylline Verſes mentioned by Tully were Paracroſticks. that is to ſay, the firſt Verſe of every Sentence comprehended all the Letters in order, that began the following Verſes; now among all the Verſes of the Sibyls, only thoſe cited by Conſtantine are compoſed in Acroſticks. As for the Aſſertion, that in the time of Pompey, Julius Cæſar, and Auguſtus, there was a general report, that it was foretold in the Sibylline Books, that a new King ſhould be born within a little while; we may eaſily reply with Tully, that the Verſes attributed to the Sibyls by the Heathens were made after ſuch a manner, that any ſenſe whatſoever might be put upon them; and that, perhaps, mention might be made therein of a certain future King, as it is uſual in this kind of Prophecies. Therefore when the Grandeur of Pompey began to be formidable to the Roman Empire, they thought it fit to make uſe of this pretence, to prevent him from going into Egypt with an Army. And Lentulus, to whom this Charge was committed, being Governor of Syria, vainly flattered himſelf with this Prediction, which might peradventure be further confirmed by the Prophecies of the Jews, who expected the coming of the Meſſiah, believing that he ought to be their King.

Afterwards when it happened that Julius Cæſar, and Auguſtus after him, actually made themſelves Maſters of the Roman Empire, the Prophetical Expreſſions of the Sibyls were interpreted in their favour; neither was it neceſſary on this account, that they ſhould clearly point at the Coming of Jeſus Chriſt, as it is expreſſed in the Writings of the Sibyls that are alledged by the Fathers; but it was ſufficient, that they mentioned a future King, which is the uſual practice of all thoſe that undertake to utter Predictions of extraordinary Events. This gave occaſion to Virgil, who intended in his fourth Eclogue to compoſe Verſes in Houour of Pollio his Patron, as alſo to Extol Auguſtus at the ſame time, and to deſcribe the Felicity of his Reign; this, I ſay, afforded him an opportunity to do it with greater Majeſty, to make uſe of the name of the Sibyl, and to pronounce theſe Verſes:

Ultima Cumæi venit jam carminis ætas;
Magnus ab integro ſæclorum naſcitur ordo:
Jam nova progenes Cœlo demittitur alto;
Jam redit & Virgo, redeunt Saturnia regna.

By which nothing elſe is meant, but that at the Nativity of Saloninus the Son of Pollio, under the Conſultate of his Father, and the Reign of the greateſt Prince in the World, the Golden Age ſhould return, as it was foretold by the Sibyl; That Plenty and Peace ſhould flouriſh throughout the whole Univerſe, and that the Virgin Aſtræa, the Goddeſs of Juſtice, who had abandoned the Earth at the beginning of the Iron-Age, ſhould deſcend again from Heaven: What is there in all this, that reſembles the Prophecies concerning Jeſus Chriſt? Or rather, what is there that is not altogether prophane, and feigned by an Heathen Poet, who only makes uſe of the Sibyls Name to flatter the Ambition of Auguſtus, and to add greater Authority and Luſtre to that which he ſays in his Commendation? Laſtly, the Words of Aurelian do not intimate, that the Chriſtians were forbidden by the Pagans to read the Sibylline Books, but only that the Chriſtians looked upon them as prophane Writings, which in no wiſe related to their Religion, and to which they gave no Credit.

THE Books that are attributed to Hyſtaſpes, and Mercurius Trimegiſtus and cited likewiſe by the ancient Fathers, are not more Genuine than the Verſes of the Sibyls. There is nothing now extant of Hyſtaſpes, and this Author was altogether unknown to the ancient Heathens; but the ſame thing cannot be ſaid of Mercurius Sirnamed Triſmegiſtus (n), who is mentioned by the moſt (n) Sirnamed Triſmegiſtus.] In Greek τρισμέγιστος, the Egyptians call him Thaaut; ſome affirm, that he was ſtyled Triſmegiſtus by the Grecians, becauſe he was a great King, a great Prieſt, and a great Philoſopher; others as Lactantius, that this Name was attributed to him, by reaſon of his incomparable Learning.

ancient Pagan Writers (o) as an incomparable Perſon, and an Inventer of all the Liberal Arts and Sciences. He was an Egyptian, and more ancient than all the Authors, whoſe Works are ſtill extant: He is believed to be as Old as Moſes; he either wrote, or at leaſt it is ſaid that he wrote, Twenty five, or Thirty thouſand Volumes. But we have only two Dialogues at preſent under his Name, one whereof is called by the Name of Pœmander, and the other of Aſclepius, who are the principal Speakers. The firſt Treatiſe is concerning the Will of God, and the ſecond Treats of the Divine Power; theſe have been cited by the ancient Fathers, to prove the Truth of our Religion, by the Authority of ſo famous an Author. But it is certain that they cannot be his (p), for the Author of theſe Treatiſes is a Modern Platonick Chriſtian, who argues from the Principles of that Philoſophy, and hath taken from the Holy Scripture, that which he writ concerning the Word of God, and the Creation of the World.

Hyſtaſpes, and Mercurius Triſmegiſtus.

IT were needleſs to ſhew the falſity of a Letter attributed to Lentulus, and directed to the Senate and People of Rome, concerning the Actions of Jeſus Chriſt, ſince the Forgery is apparent: It is pretended to have been written by Lentulus, as Governor of Jeruſalem, although he never was ſo; the Superſcription thereof is inſcrib'd to the Senate and People of Rome; whereas ever ſince there were Emperors, it was the general Cuſtom among the Governors of Provinces to write immediately to them: Moreover the Contents of this Letter are ridiculous, there is a mean and unworthy Deſcription of the Perſon of Jeſus Chriſt, as particularly it is ſaid, that his Hair was of a light Colour, long and looſe after the manner of the Nazarenes; the Style is alſo very far from the Purity and Elegancy of the Age wherein Auguſtus lived. In ſhort, this Letter is not ſo much as mentioned by any of the ancient Writers, A Letter of Lentulus.

THE Letter of Pilate to Tiberius on the ſame Subject, concerning the Miracles of Jeſus Chriſt ſeems to be more Authentick; for it is recorded by Tertullian in his Apologetick, that Tiberius being informed of the ſupernatural and wonderful Operations, that were performed by our Saviour in Paleſtine, which were ſo many Teſtimonies of his Divinity, made report thereof to the Senate, and determined, that he ought to be Enrolled among the Gods; but that the Senate having rejected this Propoſition, Tiberius nevertheleſs perſiſted in his Opinion, and forbad his Subjects to perſecute the Chriſtians. It is added, a little after by the ſame Author, that Pilate being a Chriſtian in his Heart, wrote to Tiberius concerning the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt. Euſebius in the ſecond Book of his Hiſtory Chap. 2. produceth this paſſage of Tertullian, and giving a large Account how the fame of our Saviour was ſpread abroad, and came to the Ears of Tiberius, he ſays, that Pilate ſent a Letter to the Emperor, according to the uſual Cuſtom of the Governors of Provinces, who were obliged to give an Account of the moſt remarkable Occurrences that happen'd within their Juriſdiction, and that he wrote to him concerning the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, avouching that he had been informed of his Miracles by many, and that a great number of People eſteemed him as a God, after he roſe again from the Dead. We find in the Orthodoxography, after the Epiſtle of Lentulus another attributed to Pilate and directed to Tiberius, wherein the ſame things are contained. But it is difficult to determine whether this Letter was extant in the time of Euſebius, or afterwards forged from his Story. However, there are divers learned Men, that doubt of the Truth of this Hiſtory, which hath but very little probability in its Foundation; for what Likelihood is there that Pilate ſhould tranſmit theſe things in writing to Tiberius, relating to a Man whom he had condemned to Death? And although he had writtem them, it is credible that Tiberius ſhould have made a Propoſition to the Senate, for the admitting this Perſon into the number of the Gods upon the bare report of a Governor? And if he had propounded it, who can doubt but that the Senate would have immediately ſubmitted to his Judgment? Therefore, though this Relation cannot be abſolutely charged with Falſhood, yet it ought at leaſt to be accounted as dubious. [Dr. Pearſon late Biſhop of Cheſter in his Lectures upon the Acts of the Apoſtles (p. 64. 65.) vindicates the Truth of this Story againſt the Objections of Tana-

And we are informed by Jamblichus, who quotes Manetho and Seleucus, that he wrote above Thirty five thouſand Volumes. S. Clemens Alexandrinus in Stromat. Lib. 6. makes mention of Forty two Books of this Author, and gives an Account of the Subject of ſome of them. The Works of Mercurius Triſmagiſtus, are cited as favourable to the Chriſtian Religion by the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles, ſaid to be St. Juſtin, by Lactantius in the Fourth Book of his Inſtitutions, by St. Clement, in Lib. 1. Stromat. by St. Auguſtine, in Tract. de 5. Hæreſ. and in Lib. 8. De Civit. Dei, Chap. 23. by St. Cyril of Alexandria, in Lib. 1. contra. Julianum, and by many others.

(p) But it is certain that they cannot be his.] The Eternity and Divinity of the Word is clearly explain'd in the Pœmander, and the Author of this Book attributes to the Son, the quality of being Conſubſtantial with the Father; he declares, that he is the Son of God our God, who proceeds from the Intellect of the Father, and he makes uſe of the very words of the Septuagint, in deſcribing the Creation of the World: he Diſcourſeth of the Fall of the firſt Man. In ſhort, he Copies out ſeveral paſſages of the Old and New Teſtament, and follows the Principles of the Modern Platonick Philoſophy. But the Book Entituled Aſclepius hath not quite ſo great a Tincture of Chriſtianity: The Author Treats therein of Idolatry after an exquiſite manner; he explains the Greek word ἄθεος, he Tranſcribes many things out of the Holy Scriptures, and the Works of the Grecian Writers: Laſtly, he foretels the Extirpation of the Egyptian Religion.

Pilate's Letter.

quil Faber ſo fully, that I ſhall ſet down his Reaſons at large: And 1. He ſays, that Tertullian might have taken his Information from the Acts of the Senate, wherein the Votes and Acts of every day were conſtantly ſet down. 2. He obſerves from Suetonius, that Tiberius acquainted the Senate with every thing that he was informed of, whether publick or private, of great or of little Concern. 3. He obſerves that Tiberius often took no notice when the Senate decreed things againſt his own Opinion; and this alſo is expreſly affirmed by Suetonius. 4. The Senate refuſed to Rank Jeſus Chriſt amongſt the Gods out of a Compliment to Tiberius, who had before refuſed Divine Honours, Commanding that no Statues of his ſhould be Erected in their Temples, unleſs for Ornament; they might probably therefore ſuſpect that this was propos'd by Tiberius, who never ſpoke his mind plainly in any thing, to enſnare them, who could not attribute thoſe Honours to any Body elſe which Tiberius had forbidden to be paid to himſelf, without making that Perſon greater than Tiberius. 5. It is not probable that Pontius Pilate ſhould neglect ſo remarkable a thing, as the Crucifixion and Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, when all the Governors of particular Provinces were obliged to ſend Relations of every one that was conſiderable under their Governments to the Emperors who ſent them: And the Queſtion is not, as Faber miſ-underſtood it, whether the Chriſtians then made any conſiderable Figure in the World; but whether upon Pilate's tranſmitting an Account to Tiberius, of the Death and Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt at Jeruſalem, when he was Procurator of Judæa, the Emperor did not propoſe to the Senate that this Jeſus Chriſt might be ranked amongſt the Gods; which being poſitively aſſerted by Tertullian, cannot be diſproved by any Negative Arguments that may at this time of day be brought againſt it.

But though theſe Reaſons which are urged by this great Man againſt Tanaquil Faber, ſufficiently vindicate the Truth of Tertullian's Authority in this Matter; yet that is no Argument why the Epiſtle that goes under Pilate's Name ſhould be Genuine. Pilate ſent this Account of Jeſus Chriſt in the Acts of his Adminiſtration, not in a particular Letter to the Emperor. The Acts are quoted by Juſtin Martyr, Euſebius, Epiphanius, and St. Chryſoſtome, and this Letter was made in all probability when the Original Acts were loſt.]

Epiſtles of Seneca to St. Paul, and of St. Paul to Seneca.

BUT we have reaſon to reject the Thirteen Epiſtles, as well thoſe of Seneca to St. Paul, as the others of St. Paul to Seneca, as undoubted Forgeries; althô St. Jerome, and St. Auguſtine ſeem to own them as Authentick. For (1) Theſe Epiſtles are not written according to the ſtyle of St. Paul, nor in that of Seneca (q). 2. It is declared therein, that in the Fire that happen'd in Rome under Nero, there were only 132 Houſes burnt, which is a manifeſt falſhood ſince it is certain, that a great part of the City was conſumed as Tacitus informs us (r). 3. The date of theſe Letters is falſe (s). 4. They contain nothing that is worthy of Seneca, or of St. Paul (t). Laſtly, it may be eaſily diſcerned, that they were feigned by ſome Perſons, meerly to gratifie their Fancy, and to Exerciſe their Faculty of Invention.

A late Author acknowledging, that the Epiſtles extant at this day under the Name of Seneca to St. Paul, and of St. Paul to Seneca are counterfeit, and yet not daring to affirm, that St. Jerom and S. Auguſtine, who believed them to be Genuine were deceived, hath imagined that the real Letters of St. Paul to Seneca, and of Seneca to S. Paul were loſt ſince their time; and that thoſe that we now have in our Poſſeſſion, were ſubſtituted in their room. But beſides that the reſpect that we have for theſe two Fathers, ought not to hinder us from believing, that they might be miſtaken in a matter of ſo little moment (u): It is alſo to be obſerved, that they do not poſitively aſſert, that thoſe Epiſtles were Authentick, but only that they were generally reputed to be ſo; and that they were read under their Names: (x) Moreover it might be eaſily demonſtrated, that the Letters which remain in (q) Are not written according to the ſtyle of St. Paul, nor in that of Seneca.] The ſtyle of thoſe that are attributed to Seneca is Barbarous, and full of words that are ſcarce Latin. The Epiſtles aſcribed to St. Paul, do not ſuit with the Gravity of this Apoſtle, and contain Compliments rather than ſolid Inſtructions.

(r) As it is related by Tacitus.] He informs us, that of Fourteen quarters of the City of Rome, there remained but four entire, that there were three, the Houſes whereof were wholly conſumed, that very little was left in the other Seven, and that thoſe that were left were half burnt.

(s) The Date of theſe Letters is falſe.] One of them is Dated under the Conſulate of Aprianus and Capito, that is, Vipſanius and Capito, Five years before the burning of Rome, and the other under the Conſulate of Phrygius and Baſſus. But it was under the Conſulate of Lecanius Baſſus, and Licinius Craſſus, that this Fire happened: And the Letter is Dated in March, whereas the Fire did not begin (according to the report of Tacitus) till May following.

(t) They contain nothing that is worthy of Seneca or of St. Paul.] There is ſcarcely one Moral Notion in thoſe of Seneca, or one Chriſtian Precept in thoſe of St. Paul.

(u) In a matter of ſo little moment.] It is certain, that the Fathers have often cited Apocryphal and Counterfeit Books, as we have already ſhewn; Natalis Alexander himſelf the Author of the Opinion, which we now confute, Confeſſes it, and on the very ſame Account rejects the Epiſtle of Jeſus Chriſt to Abgarus, that of Abgarus to Jeſus Chriſt, that are more Authorized by the ancient Writers than thoſe Letters of Seneca.

(x) But only that they were generally reputed ſo to be.] St. Jerom in Catalog. I reckon Seneca in the number of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, by reaſon of certain Letters which are read by many under the Name of Seneca to St. Paul, and of St. Paul to Seneca. St. Aug. Ep. 14. now the 153. Seneca of whom certain Letters are read written to St. Paul. But in Lib. de Civit. Dei, Chap. 11. He declares that Seneca neither commended nor cenſured the Chriſtians, and that he hath made no mention of them; therefore he did not believe that theſe Letters were his.

their hands at present, and those that were extant in the time of St. Jerome are the same, for he declares that Seneca wished in one of his Epistles, to be among his Followers, what S. Paul was among the Christians, which bears a great Analogy with what we find in the 11th Letter of Seneca to Saint Paul (y). It is not known, when or by whom these Epistles were forged, and it is difficult to determine, whether it were on their Account, that there is this passage in the false Acts of the Passion of St. Linus, that Seneca and St. Paul wrote divers Letters one to another; or whether the Narrative of this Author, gave the hint to those that forged these Letters, as Cardinal Baronius conjectures.

Epistles of Seneca to St. Paul, and of St. Paul to Seneca.

LAstly, among all the profane Monuments that might be quoted for the Confirmation of the Truth of the Christian Religion, none seems to be more considerable than this passage of Josephus, taken from Book 18. chap. 4. of his Jewish Antiquities, wherein he declares: That, at that time there was a wise Man named JESUS, (if we may only call him a Man; for he wrought many Miracles, and taught the truth to those that received it with joy,) who had a great number of Disciples, as well among the Jews as the Gentiles; that he was the CHRIST, and that being accused by the chief of his Nation, he was crucified by Pilate's Order: That nevertheless, he was not abandoned by those that loved him, because he had appeared unto them alive on the Third day, as was foretold by the Prophets, and that he was the Author of the Sect of the Christians, which remains at this day.

A Passage of Josephus, concerning Jesus Christ.

This Testimony of Josephus is produced by Eusebius, St. Jerome, and several others after them, as a Record very important for the establishing of the Christian Faith; but in these later times, when Matters began to be examined more accurately, there have been, and there are even at present many learned Men, who maintain that this passage doth not really belong to Josephus, and it must be Confessed, that their Conjectures are not altogether to be disallowed; for they affirm,

1. That the style is intricate, not very fluent, and different from that of Josephus, whose Expressions are generally clear and elegant.

2. That it is evident, that this passage was inserted afterwards into the Texts of Josephus; because the Coherence of the following Sentence is interrupted; for immediately after the end thereof, we read, About that time the Jews began to be afflicted again, with another Calamity, words that have no manner of Relation to what went before, concerning our Saviour: but which manifestly appertain to the Account of the Massacre of the Jews, whom Pilate had caused to be slain in Jerusalem, that came just before this Passage concerning Jesus Christ; which plainly shews (say they) that it doth not belong to Josephus, and that it hath been afterwards added.

3. They argue, that in case this Passage were taken separately, yet even then it might be easily perceived, that those are the words of a Christian, and not of a Jew; since Jesus Christ is therein called God, his Miracles and Resurrection is acknowledged, and it is declared, that these things were foretold by the Prophets; How can it be imagined that this should proceed from a Jew, especially Josephus, who seems to doubt of the Miracles recorded in the Books that were written by Hebrew Authors?

4. What probability is there, that Josephus a Person extremely addicted to the Interest of his own Nation, should speak so honourably of Jesus Christ, whom he did not believe to be the Messiah, (as is observed by Origen in his Book against Celsus) and that he should accuse his Country-men, as having unjustly put him to Death?

5. Josephus describing in the same Book, Chap. 8. the Martyrdom of St. James, declares, that he was the Brother of Jesus Christ; now if he had made mention of him in some of his preceding Chapters he would not have failed to take notice thereof, or at least, he would in this place have added somewhat in his Commendation.

6. This Testimony (say they) is not only unknown to the Authors that lived before the time of Eusebius: but Origen expressly denies, that Josephus wrote any thing concerning our Saviour; It is very strange, (says he, in Tom. 2. in Matth. That Josephus who did not acknowledge Jesus Christ as the Messiah, should give so Authentick a Testimony concerning the Innocency of St. James. Would he have spoken to this effect, if there had been in his time so remarkable an Evidence of the Divinity of Jesus Christ in the Works of Josephus, as that which is now extant therein? Theodoret hath also observed, that Josephus knew not our Saviour. But nothing is more considerable than the silence of Photius as to this Matter, who making an exact Epitome of the Books of Josephus, takes no notice of this passage concerning Jesus Christ, which he would not have omitted, if it had been then found in all the Copies of the Writings of Josephus, and if he had believed that it was written by him. Biblioth. Cod. 238.

Lastly, that which deserves a more particular Reflection is, that it is remark'd by Photius in another place, that there was extant in his time a Book concerning the Universe attributed to Josephus, which he judged to be fictitious, in regard that Jesus Christ is too honourably mentioned therein, and he adds afterwards, that he hath been since informed that this Book was written by Caius a Priest of (y) Which bears a great Analogy with that which we find in the 11*th Letter of* Seneca to St. Paul.] According to St. Jerom; Optare se dicet servus ejus esse loci apud suos, cujus sit Paulus apud Christianos. In the 11th Letter of Seneca we find the following Expression. Cum sis vertex, & Altissimorum montium cacumen, haud te indignum in prima facie Epistolarum nominandum censeas---nam qui meus tuus apud te locus, qui tuus velim ut meus. If apud tuos were put instead of apud te, these words would express S. Jerom's Sense; and they seem not to be capable of admitting any other; however it is evident, that he alludes to this place.

A Paſſage of Joſephus concerning Jeſus Chriſt.

Rome; Perhaps this paſſage, which is at preſent in his Antiquities, was taken from this Caius, who bore the Name of Joſephus.

Hue'ius replies to theſe Teſtimonies of Origen, Theodoret, and Photius, that thoſe Authors happened to meet with certain Manuſcripts of Joſephus, in which this Paſſage had been ſtruck out by the Jews: But this Anſwer ſeems rather to weaken its Authority; for if there were ancient Manuſcripts, wherein it was not expreſſed, we have yet more reaſon to doubt of its Veracity; and the Arguments that have been already produced ſufficiently ſhew, that it is more probable, that it hath been added in ſome Manuſcripts by the Chriſtians, than left out in others by the Jews. However, I ſhall not undertake to decide this Queſtion, but ſhall leave it to the Judgment of the Reader to determine; whether the Authority of Euſebius, St. Jerome, and all the Manuſcripts of Joſephus that we have at preſent in our Poſſeſſion, ought to be preferred before the above-cited Conjectures of the learned, the general Teſtimonies of Origen, Theodoret, and Photius, and perhaps ſome ancient Manuſcripts of Joſephus, that are long ſince loſt.

H E R M A S.

THERE are Three things to be examined in this Book of the Paſtor, attributed to Hermas which is one of the moſt famous Books of Antiquity (a). 1. Who is the Author thereof? 2. Whether it be Canonical or not? 3. Whether it be a uſeful Book; as alſo, whether it deſerves the Eſteem and Reputation that it formerly had?

The firſt Queſtion may be eaſily determined. It bears the Name of Hermas, and all the ancient Writers have cited it under this Name; it appears likewiſe from the Antiquity thereof, that it might poſſibly be written by that Hermas, whom St. Paul ſalutes at the end of his Epiſtle to the Romans. Origen, Euſebius, and St. Jerome, have made no difficulty of aſſerting it; however, it cannot be doubted, but that the Author of this Book was called Hermas, and that the Name of Hermes hath been attributed to him by ſome Authors through a miſtake, which gave occaſion to certain Modern Writers, to aſcribe this Book to one Hermes, the Brother of Pope Pius I. (b). But this Imagination is ſufficiently refuted by the Teſtimony of all the ancient Fathers, who conſtantly call him Hermas, beſides the Author of this Book was a Greek, and his Writings were more known amongſt the Greeks, than

(a) One of the moſt famous Books of Antiquity.] The Book of Hermas entituled The Paſtor, hath been admitted by many Churches as Canonical. S. Irenæus cites it under the Name of Scripture, Lib. 4. chap. 3. Bene ergo pronunciavit Scriptura quæ dicit primo omnium crede, quoniam unus eſt Deus, &c. This Paſſage is found in the Paſtor, Lib. 2 Mand. 1. Clemens Alexandrinus produceth ſeveral other Expreſſions, as taken from a Book of great Authority, Lib. 1. Stromat. p. 311, and 356. Lib. 2 p. 360, 379, 384, and 385. Lib. 4. p. 503. Lib. 6 p. 679. It is likewiſe cited by Origen as a Book of Holy Scripture, Homil. 10. in Joſ. Homil. 1. in Pſal. 37. Homil. 13. in Ezek. Lib. 1. Περὶ Ἀρχῶν, c. 3. Lib. 2. c. 1. Lib. 2. in Matth. c. 24. 42. t. 1. Comment in Joannem, Lib. 10. in Ep. ad Rom. where he declares, that the ſame Hermas mentioned in this place of the Epiſtle of S. Paul, is the Author of the Paſtor, item in Oſeam, Philocal. c. 8. Although he obſerves in other places, that it was not generally received in Homil. 8. in Numb. Lib. 4. Περὶ Ἀρχῶν, Philocal. c. 2. and Homil. 35. in Luc. It is reported by Euſebius, Lib. 3. ch. 3. that ſome reckoned it among the Canonical Writings, and others in the number of good Eccleſiaſtical Books, that were neceſſary for new Converts, Lib. 3. c. 25. He placeth it amongſt the Apocryphal Books, and obſerves Lib. 5. c 8. that it is quoted by S. Irenæus St. Athanaſius cites it in Lib. de Incarnat. Verbi, and in Lib. de Decret. Synodi Nicænæ, p. 252. Edit. Pariſ. 266. where he expreſly declares, that it is not included in the Canon. He quotes it again in his Epiſtle to the Biſhops of Phrygia, p. 396. and in his Paſchal Epiſtle he inſerts it in the Catalogue of Books that are not Canonical. S. Jerom, in Lib. de Scriptoribus, affirms, that it is a uſeful Book, but almoſt unknown to the Latins. In his Prologue, he placeth it in the rank of Books that are not Canonical. In Comment. in Hoſeam, c. 7. v. 9. he cites it, adding theſe words, Si cui tamen placet, ejus recipere Lectionem. In his firſt Book on Habakkuk, ad c. 1. v 14. he calls it Apocryphal, and finds fault with a fooliſh Thought in the Book. Ruffinus on the Creed reckons it among the Eccleſiaſtical Books, though not Canonical. It is cited by Caſſian. Collat. 8 c 12 13, and 17. And S. Proſper rejects it as a Book of no Authority, Ut nullius Authoritatis, contra Collat c 30. Gelaſius inſerts it in the Liſt of Apocrypha Books. And laſtly, Maximus cites it in Lib. 4 De divinis nominibus. This ſhews, that notwithſtanding its various fortune, it hath been always very famous.

(b) To impute this Book to one Hermes, the Brother of Pope Pius I.] The Author of Damaſus's Pontifical, Regino, the Author of the Letter of Pope Pius I. and ſome other modern Writers, are in this Error, and they ſeem to have taken it from the Author of the Poem againſt Marcion, who affirms, that Hermas, who wrote this Book, was the Brother of Pius; Poſt hunc deinde Pius, Hermas cui Germine frater Angelicus Paſtor cui tradita verba locutus. But he calls him, Hermas and not Hermes; It is true indeed, that we find in the Verſion of Origen Περὶ Ἀρχῶν made by Ruffinus, Lib. 1. c. 3. and Lib 4. c. 2. Hermes inſtead of Hermas; but it is a fault of the Tranſcriber, for in the Greek Text of the laſt Fragment that is extant of the Philocalia, it is read Hermas, and not Hermes; and Ruffinus himſelf in other places calls him Hermas. Moreover all the ancient Writers, as St. Clement, Tertullian, Origen, Euſebius, S. Jerom, and others above-mentioned, always call him Hermas, and never Hermes. Baronius and ſome others diſtinguiſh two Books, one written by Hermes the Brother of Pius, which Treated of Eaſter, and the other by our Hermas; but ſince they ground their Opinion only on the Authority of modern Writers, in attributing a Book to this pretended Hermes, a Perſon unknown to all Antiquity, their Conjecture ſeems to be without any probability.

the Latins, as is observed by S. Jerom, which would not have happened, if it had been composed by the Brother of Pope Pius. Hermas.

As for the Authority of this Book, it is certain that it hath been heretofore received in many Churches as Canonical, and that S. Irenæus, S. Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and even Tertullian, in Lib. de Oratione, cite it as a part of Holy Scripture: nevertheless it cannot be doubted, that it hath been rejected by divers other Churches, (c) and esteemed only as a Treatise, that might be used to very good purpose for the Edification of Christians: But there have been very few ancient Authors, that have not set a high Esteem on this Book, and it hath been almost always cited by the Fathers, as a Work of great Authority (d)

It hath been so much valued by Modern Authors, and there are very few at present that commend it; or that have the same regard to it, as those that lived in the primitive Ages of the Church. And indeed, if we may judge by the Method according to which it is written, and by the things therein contained, it doth not seem to deserve much Esteem. The First Part Entituled the Visions, is full of many Revelations, that are explained to Hermas by a Woman representing the Church; they all relate to the State of the Church, and the manners of the Christians. The Second Part which is most useful, is called the Ordinances, wherein are comprized divers Precepts of Morality, and pious Instructions, which the Pastor or Angel of Hermas prescribes to him. The Third Part is called The Similitudes, because it begins with several Similes or Comparisons, and concludes with Visions. These three Books comprehend very many Moral Instructions concerning the Practice of Christian Virtues; but the great number of Visions, Allegories, and Similitudes, make them tedious, and all these Moral Truths would, in my opinion, have been more useful, if the Author had propounded them simply, as the Apostles have done in their Epistles.

We have lost the Original Greek Text of these Three Books; and there remains only a Version which is Printed in the Orthodoxagrapha, as also in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and hath been likewise published separately by Barthius, and lastly by Cotelerius, together with the Greek Fragments extracted from Ancient Authors. It is not known when, nor by whom this Translation was composed; some attribute it to Ruffinus: and others affirm, that it was made in the Primitive Ages of Christianity, when the Writings of Hermas were not altogether unknown to the Latins. However it be, this Version is not amiss, since it exactly agrees with the Greek Passages cited by S. Clement, Origen, Antiochus, and some other Ancient Writers.

[There have been other Editions of Hermas's Pastor, besides these which M. Du Pin mentions: It was first published by Jacobus Faber at Paris, 1513. Then at Strasburg, 1522. And it was lately published from two MS. Copies at Oxon, with short Notes in 12°. A. D. 1685.]

(c) It cannot be doubted that it hath been rejected by divers other Churches.] Origen acknowledgeth, that it was Thrown out of the Canon of Holy Scripture by many Christians; Tertullian, in Lib. de Pudicitiâ, replies to certain Persons, who objected it to him, that this Book was rejected by divers Orthodox Churches. Eusebius, S. Athanasius, S. Jerom, and Ruffinus above-cited, reckon it among those Writings that are not Canonical, yet such as may be useful for the Instruction of Christians; and Gelasius placeth it amongst the Apocryphal Books.

(d) It hath been cited as a Book of great Authority.] Tertullian censures it, but after he turned Montanist, Origen observes that it was contemned by some Christians, but that he had a great Esteem for it. S. Jerom in one place accuseth it of Nonsense, but in others he commends it. S. Prosper throws it aside as a Book of no Authority; but it was because he scarce knew it.

S. CLEMENS ROMANUS.

ST. Clement the Disciple, and Coadjutor of the Apostles (a,) was ordained Bishop of Rome after S. Anacletus (b), in the year of our Lord 93. Divers Books are attributed to him, some of which are really his, others are Ancient tho' suppositious, and others are both counterfeit and modern: And indeed we can only reckon among those that were certainly composed by this Bishop the two Epistles to the Corinthians, the first whereof, so famous among the Ancient Authors (c.) was undoubtedly written by him. Irenæus Book 3. chap. 8. speaks thus. In the time of St. Clement. S. Clemens Romanus.

(a) St. Clement the Disciple and Coadjutor of the Apostles.] This is the same Clement whom S. Paul mentions, Phil. 4. v. 3. reckoning him in the number of those that had laboured together with him in propagating the Gospel, and that had assisted him in his Ministry; With Clement also, and with other my Fellow Labourers, whose Names are in the Book of Life.

(b) Was ordained Bishop of Rome after Anacletus.] He is reputed by S. Irenæus, Eusebius, and other ancient Writers, to have been the third Bishop of Rome, tho' some affirm, that he was the immediate Successor of S. Peter; but it is better in my Opinion to adhere to S. Irenæus.

(c) So Famous among the Ancient Authors.] S. Irenæus hath cited it, Lib. 3. chap. 3. S. Clemens Alex. Lib. 1. Stromat. p. 289 and Lib. 4. p. 516. Lib. 5. p. 686. Lib 6. p. 647. Origen, Lib. 2. Περὶ ἀρχῶν; chap. 3. (says

S. Clemens Romanus.

(ſays he) upon occaſion of a great Diviſion that happened in the Church of Corinth, the Church of Rome wrote a very pathetical Letter to the Corinthians, to reſtore them to Peace, wherein ſhe ſtrengthens their Faith, and preacheth theſe Traditions that they had lately received from the Apoſtles. This Epiſtle which is cited by S. Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, Euſebius, S. Jerom, and Photius, was for a long time concealed, until at length Mr. Patrick Young having found it in an ancient Manuſcript (d) cauſed it to be Printed at Oxford, Anno Dom. 1633.

After the Holy Scriptures, it is in my Opinion, one of the moſt eminent Records of Antiquity. S. Clement, therein exhorts the Faithful of the Church of Corinth, that was in a diſturbance by the revolt of ſome Chriſtians, who refuſed to ſubmit to their lawful Paſtors, he exhorts them, I ſay, to a Re-union, and to ſeek after Peace; particularly he admoniſheth them to perſevere in the Obedience and Submiſſion that they owed to their Spiritual Guides, he cenſures thoſe that diſturbed the Church, and that promoted ſecret Cabals againſt their Miniſters on purpoſe to ſupplant them; He begins with putting them in mind of the Happineſs of that Peace which they had formerly enjoyed; afterwards he repreſents to them the misfortune of their preſent Diviſions, and proceeds to ſhew by many Examples, what lamentable Conſequences have always attended it, and how diſpleaſing it is to God; Moreover, he adviſeth them to repent, in practiſing Humility, Obedience, and Charity, in imitation of the Humility of Jeſus Chriſt, and the Mercy of God, through the Hope of a Reſurrection: From thence he takes an occaſion to recommend to the Faithful, the practice of many Chriſtian Virtues, and the Obſervation of a Regular Diſcipline: He declares to them, that it was very ill done to riſe up againſt the Paſtors and Biſhops that were Conſtituted by the Apoſtles, or Elected by the Faithful after their Death: He aggravates the heinouſneſs of their Crime that were the firſt promoters of this Diviſion, and earneſtly ſollicites them to return to their Duty by obeying their Miniſters, and by reuniting themſelves with the reſt of the Believers. Thus you have an account of the Subject of this Epiſtle written by S. Clement in the name of the Church of Rome to that of Corinth, about the end of the Perſecution raiſed by the Emperor Domitian. The Style thereof (ſays Photius) is ſimple and clear, and it comes very near the natural and artleſs manner of Expreſſion uſed by the ancient Eccleſiaſtical Authors. I ſhall add, that one may diſcern a great deal of Energy and Vigour, accompanied with much Prudence, Gentleneſs, Zeal, and Charity.

The ſecond Epiſtle of S. Clement is not ſo certainly known to be his; Euſebius, S. Jerome, and Photius obſerve, that there is reaſon to doubt of its being Genuine, becauſe it is not mentioned by the ancient Writers; nevertheleſs ſome of the Fathers have cited both theſe Epiſtles, as if they were of equal Authority (e.) The Fragment that is now extant of this laſt Letter publiſhed in Latin by Wendelinus, and in Greek by Mr. Young, is an Exhortation to the Practice of Repentance, and of divers Chriſtian Virtues on the account of the Mercy of God, and the Reward that is promiſed to the Faithful.

Beſides theſe two Epiſtles, ſeveral voluminous Books have been attributed to S. Clement, even in the Primitive Ages of the Church, that were not his; ſuch were (as Euſebius declares in the third Book of his Hiſtory, chap. 38.) the Diſputes of S. Peter and Appion, whereof the ancient Authors have made no mention, and which contain Matters that are far from the Purity of the Apoſtolical Doctrine: We may conjecture, that theſe Writings were part of the Book, Entituled, Recognitiones Clementis, which is likewiſe called, The Voyages, Itinerary, or Acts of St. Peter: This Work, thô fictitious, is ancient, being cited by Origen (f,) Euſebius, S. Athanaſius, S. Epiphanius, S. Jerom, and the Author of The Commentaries on S. Matthew, aſcribed to S. Chryſoſtom: Ruffinus hath made a Tranſlation thereof which is ſtill extant; Gelaſius hath inſerted it in the Catalogue of Apocryphal Books; and Photius obſerves, that there are Abſurdities and Errors to be found in it: And indeed it is a Writing full of Fables, Tales, Conferences, and ridiculous Diſputes feigned at pleaſure, and pretended to be holden between S. Peter and Simon Magus, concerning certain Events, and Occurrences that are related after a childiſh manner; but that which is more dangerous, is, that we may eaſily diſcover in ſeveral Paſſages thereof the Opinions of the Ebionites, tho' much palliated, together with many other Errors. In ſhort, this Book is of no uſe, if we reflect on the Style and Method in which it is written, or on the Things that are compriſed therein.

(d) In an ancient Manuſcript.] It is called The Manuſcript of Thecla, becauſe it was written with the hand of an ancient Virgin called Thecla, who lived, (as is generally believed) in the time of the firſt Council of Nice. Theſe Epiſtles have been ſince Printed in the Collection of Cotelerius, in Labbee's Edition of the Councils, and at Helmſtadt in the year 1654. [As alſo at Oxford in 1677.

The Sibyls were heretofore cited therein, if we may give Credit to the Author of the Queſtions attributed to S. Juſtin; but he doth not declare, whether it were in the firſt Part, or in the ſecond, and part of the ſecond is loſt. I ſhall

I shall not pass the same censure upon the Apostolical Constitutions that are likewise falsly imputed to St. Clement, and which, thô written by a later Author (g.) yet contain many things very useful to the Discipline of the Church; It is not known by whom, nor when they were composed (h.) All that can be certainly affirmed is, that they are cited by S. Epiphanius (i.) and the Author of The Commentary on St. Matthew, falsly attributed to St. Chrysostom; but the passages which are produced by them not perfectly agreeing with those that are found in the Constitutions which are extant at this day, we may be induced to conjecture that they have been since corrupted, and so much the rather, because they are infected with the Arian Heresie (k.) and several other Errors. This is the Judgment that was given concerning them by the Greek Bishops in the Synod that was conven'd in the Imperial Palace of Constantinople after the fifth General Council. However, I admire that the Learned Photius (l) hath not made this Observation, and that he hath imputed the Errors of this Book to its Primitive Author. S. Clement Romanus.

It remains only to enquire, whether this Book be the same as that which is mentioned by Eusebius (m) and St. Athanasius, Entituled, The Doctrine, or the Precepts of the Apostles, τῶν ἁγίων διδαχαὶ, or διδαχὴ. This is the Opinion of Nicephorus (n,) Zonaras, and Matthæus Blastares; but it seems to me to be most probable, that The Constitutions of the Apostles, and the Book called their Doctrine, were two different Works which the likeness of their Titles hath caused to be confounded (o.)

(g) Tho' written by a later Author.] The Author of the Recognitions is not the same with the Author of the Constitutions, tho' some have been of this Opinion; for their style is different; the later is well versed in the Principles of the Christian Religion, and in the Rites of the Church, but the other is ignorant of these matters; moreover, they maintain a contrary Doctrine: The Author of the Constitutions, in lib. 8. c. 46. reckons the Sun, Moon and Stars, in the number of inanimate Creatures; whereas the Author of the Recognitions imagineth, that they have a Soul, in lib. 5. chap. 16. Lastly, the Author of the Constitutions was not an Ebionite, but he that writ the Recognitions was.

(h) It is not known by whom, or when they were composed.] It is certain that they do not belong to the Apostles, as we have already evidently demonstrated.

(i) They are cited by St. Epiphanius.] In Hæres. 45. this Father produceth a passage that is found in the beginning of the Constitutions, and in Hæres. 80. he cites another, which we read in Lib. 1. Constitut. chap. 3 concerning the Beads of Priest. In Hæres. 25. he quotes a passage taken from Lib. 5. chap. 14, and 17. relating to the Fasts enjoyned on Wednesday and Friday, as also on the Days before Easter. In Hæres. 70, he observes that the Audians made use of certain Constiturions, which tho' dubious, ought not altogether to be rejected, as containing nothing contrary to the Faith or Discipline of the Church. This may induce us to believe that the Constitutions which are now extant, have been corrupted since the time of Epiphanius, because the same thing could not be affirmed of those. Add to this, that in the same place Epiphanius cites a passage concerning Easter, wherein the Christians are admonished to celebrate that Feast together with the Jews, and the contrary is expresly declared in Constitut, Lib. 5. chap. 17. Moreover, in the same place, he produces other Testimonies, out of the Constitutions that are not found therein: Perhaps S. Epiphanius had not sufficiently examined this Work, or perhaps he cited it without Book, or on the Report of another; However it be, he acknowledgeth it to be dubious.

(k) Because they are infected with the Arian Heresie.] In Lib. 6. chap. 25. the Author reckons in the number of Hereticks, those that believe that JESUS is the same with the God of the Universe, but this might have been said in opposition to the Sabellians; and so much the rather since he adds, and do not distinguish the Son and the Holy Ghost. Many other Passages are likewise alledged, wherein he affirms, that the Son and the Word is the Servant, and Minister of God the Father. These are the Phrases used by the ancient Ecclesiastical Writers, but they have been suspected ever since the Council of Nice.

(l) That the Learned Photius.] He censures them on Three several Accounts, in Cod. 112. First, ex malafictione, from which (as he says) they may be vindicated; Secondly, by reason of some Expressions used by the Author, which are Contradictory to the Book of Deuteronomy, and for these he might likewise be excused; and Lastly, he chargeth him with Arianism, from which he cannot be cleared without offering him some violence.

(m) Mentioned by Eusebius.] Euseb. Lib. 3. chap. 25 Athan. in Ep. Fest. & Synopsi.

(n) Of Nicephorus.] Niceph. in Stichometria. Zonaras in Ep. Ath. Mat. Blastares in a Collection of Canons that is not Printed.

(o) Which the likeness of their Titles hath caused to be confounded.] There are many Reasons to prove, that these are two different Books, for first S. Athanasius reckons the Book of the Doctrine of the Apostles, among those that were usually read to the Catechumens, whereas the Constitutions were composed rather for the use of Bishops, and we find it prohibited in the last Canon to publish them, or to discover the Contents thereof to all sorts of People. Secondly, the Book of the Doctrine of the Apostles, contained only Two hundred Verses according to the Stichometria of Nicephorus, which cannot agree with the Constitutions that are more voluminous. Thirdly, in the Index of Scripture made by Anastasius Nicenas, διδαχαὶ and διδασκαλία Κλήμεντος are mentioned as distinct Books, and in some Manuscripts the Constitutions are Entituled διδασκαλία. Fourthly, in the Epitome of S. Athanasius διδαχὴ. and κλημεντια are distinguished; therefore this Work was not attibuted to St. Clement. Fifthly, when Eusebius Discourses of the Writings of S. Clement, he takes no notice of the Apostolical Constitutions, neither have the Ancients mentioned them. The Arians might have objected them, in Vindication of their Heresie, and the Orthodox would have been obliged to make a Reply, but this is not done by either Party; therefore they are of a later Date, than the Doctrine of the Apostles, that was known to Eusebius, and S. Athanasius. These Reasons howsoever probable they may seem to be, are not altogether Irreprehensible; to the First it is replied, that the Constitutions were made for the use of all Christians, as appears from the first Words thereof; that the last Canon might perhaps be of a later Date; that S. Athanasius observes only, that this Book was useful for the instructing of Catechumens in the Discipline, and Faith of the Church, tho' it was not Canonical, which may be very safely affirmed of these Constitutions. In Answer to the Second it is alledged, that there were two Editions of the Costitutions, one more large, being that which is now extant; and another that was an Epitome thereof, and perhaps Nicephorus makes mention mention of this laſt under the Name of The Doctrine of the Apoſtles: Beſides that there are ſome Manuſcripts wherein there are 6000 Verſes, and beſides the Length of every particular Verſe is not known. Thirdly, that the Diſtinction of διδαχὴ and διδασκαλία is nothing to the purpoſe, the one poſſibly was an Abridgment of the other; neither is it certain whether The Conſtitutions, be the Books now called διδασκαλία. Fourthly, the Clementinæ are a Work different from the Conſtitutions, as well as The Doctrine of the Apoſtles. Laſtly, the ancient Writers have not cited every thing that occurred to them; the Arians have not made all the Objections that were obvious; and the Orthodox have not replyed to every particular Circumſtance that might be objected againſt them. Theſe are the Anſwers, that are propounded to thoſe that diſtinguiſh this Book of The Doctrine of the Apoſtles from The Conſtitutions, and I ſhall leave it to the Determination of the Reader, whether they do not cauſe greater Difficulties; for my part, I believe the former Opinion to be more probable.

It is therefore extremely difficult to determine when the Conſtitutions aſcribed to the Apoſtles firſt appeared, ſince the Author of them is abſolutely unknown, neither can it be proved whether they were at firſt the ſame as they are now. We can only conjecture, that it is moſt probable that the Conſtitutions aſcribed to the Apoſtles, or St. Clement belong to the third, or rather the fourth Century; and that they have been from time to time corrected, altered, and augmented, according to the various Cuſtoms of different Ages and Countries (p.)

Thoſe that we have at preſent are not in Greek. Crabb gives us a Latin Epitome of them in his Second Edition of the Councils, Printed Anno 1557. The firſt entire Verſion that ever appeared, was made by Bovius, and inſerted by Surius in the Collection of Councils, which he ſet forth in the years 1567, and 1585. Nicolinus publiſhed another Tranſlation of the Conſtitutions compoſed by Turrianus, together with the Annotations of the ſame Author; this was Printed at Venice, in 1563, and at Antwerp in 1578. Afterwards Binius cauſed it to be Reprinted in his firſt Edition of the Councils, Anno Dom. 1606. but he did not think fit to allow it a place in his Second Edition of the year 1608. Fronto Ducæus, a Jeſuite, is the firſt that publiſhed a Greek and Latin Edition of thoſe Conſtitutions at the end of Zonaras, which was annexed to the new Collection of Councils. They are divided into eight Books, containing a great number of Precepts relating to Chriſtian Duties, eſpecially to thoſe of Paſtors, and concerning the Ceremonies and Diſcipline of the Church, of all which it would be too tedious to give a particular account. They that are deſirous to be further informed, may have recourſe to the Titles of the Chapters that are prefixed to theſe Tracts.

The laſt Work attributed to St. Clement, is a Collection of divers pieces, Entituled, Clementinæ, and there hath been a Book under this Title for ſome time: The Author of the Epitome of the H. Scriptures attributed to St. Athanaſius mentions them, and after him the Chronicle of Alexandria, Nicephorus Calliſtus in the Third Book of his Hiſtory, Chap. 18. S. John Damaſcen, and ſome others (q.)

Perhaps this is the ſecond Part of the Recognitions cited by Ruffinus, for it is a Continuation of the Preachings and Acts of S. Peter. The Greek and Latin Collection, publiſhed by Cotelerius under this Name, contains divers Tracts full of Errors in Philoſophy, as alſo of the Hereſie of the Ebionites, and is ſuch another Book as the Recognitions. There muſt needs have happened ſome Alteration in theſe Clementinæ, as well becauſe they do not agree with that which is cited from them by Maximus, and by the Author of the Chronicle of Alexandria, as becauſe they are infected with the Errors of Eunomius; beſides, there is a Paſſage cited by an Author in the Library of the College of Clermont, which is not to be found there; and we are informed by Nicephorus, that the Clementinæ are an Orthodox Work, whereas this (as we have already ſhewn) abounds with Errors. It contains, firſt, two Apocryphal Letters, one of which is attributed to S. Peter as written to S. James, wherein he adviſeth him not to deliver the Book of his Preachings to the Gentiles, which is followed by a Proteſtation of S. James. The other is a Letter of S. Clement to S. James, which tho' it be Ancient, and Tranſlated by Ruffinus, yet is certainly counterfeit; as we ſhall hereafter ſhew when we give an account of the Forgeries of the Decretals of the Popes. To theſe two Epiſtles there are nineteen Homilies annexed relating to the Voyages, Preachings, and Diſputes of S. Peter. Moreover at the end of this Work is likewiſe inſerted an Epitome of the Actions of S. Peter extracted from the Clementinæ, the Recognitions, and the Epiſtle of S. Clement. Cotelerius found three of them in the King's Library, and hath publiſhed but one, which is the ſhorteſt, formerly publiſhed by Turnebus, and Printed at Paris, Anno Dom. 1555. All theſe Writings, which are of very little uſe becauſe they are full of Errors, are only a Contexture of Fables and idle Tales. Laſtly, Cotelerius hath added the Records of the Martyrdom of S. Clement, concerning the Antiquity whereof we have no aſſurance, and which appear on the contrary to have been compoſed by the modern Greeks (r.)

(p) That they have been from time to time Corrected, &c. according to the various Cuſtoms of different Ages and Countries.] It is on this account, that the Ethiopians have certain Conſtitutions different from Ours, which are cited by Anaſtaſius Nicenus, Cod. 189. in the King's Library, and in his Queſtions, Q. 160. where they are much commended.

(q) S. John Damaſcen and ſome others.] S. Epiphanius ſeems to quote Hæreſ. 26. n. 16. as alſo Anaſtaſius, Q. 20. p. 242. Maximus in Homil. 53. and 55. Cedrenus in Compend. Hiſt. p. 170, 171. Moreover, it is cited in a Collection of the Works of the Fathers, which is in the Library of the Jeſuits Colledge at Clermont, and by Nicon in his Pandect.

(r) Which appear on the contrary, to have been Compoſed by the Modern Greeks.] It is related in theſe Acts that S. Clement was ſent beyond Sea, (ultra mare) and afterwards into a Deſart near the City, (in Deſertum urbi vicinum.) That he found there 2000 Chriſtians condemned to hew Marble out of the Quarries, who intreated him, ſaying, Ora pro nobis Pontifex, ut digni efficamur promiſſione Chriſti; Pray for us O Prieſt, that we may be made worthy of the Promiſe of Chriſt. That S. Clement cauſed a Spring to riſe up in that place, becauſe becauſe theſe Chriſtians were obliged to fetch water Six Miles off from thence, that they built there within one Year 75 Churches, that they demoliſhed the Temples, and cut down conſecrated Trees to the Number of 300000, that the Empeaor Trajan being aſtoniſhed at theſe Actions, ſent thither the Peeſident Auſidianus, who cauſed S. Clement to be drowned; that whilſt his Diſciples ſought after the Relicks of his Body, the Sea withdrew, and they found it laid in a Tomb of ſtone, and that it was revealed to his Diſciples, that his Body ſhould not be taken away, and that the Sea ſhould retire after the ſame manner every year during ſeven Days, which it continues to do (ſays the Author of theſe Acts) even unto this Day, and this was accompanied with divers Miracles. Here are many Fables that do not agoee with the time of S. Clement. Who can imagine that People condemned to hew Stones ſhould find means to Erect 75 Churches, and to pull down an infinite Numbea of Temples? S. Ephrem, or rather the Author of the Narrative, which is falſly ſaid to be his, gives an Account of the ſame Miracle, concerning the Sea that was dryed up, to diſcover the Body of S. Clement, and adds, that his Child being left in a Tomb, was found alive, and in good health at the end of the year following: But this pretended Ephrem is an Author no leſs addicted to Fables, who calls himſelf Archbiſhop of Cherſona, thô he never was in that place. S. Clement Romanus.

[There have been ſeveral Editions of S. Clemen's Epiſtle to the Corinthians, beſides Mr. Young's and Cotelerius's: Joachim Maderius Printed it at Helmſtadt 1654. in Quarto; Colmeſius likewiſe ſet it out at London in Octavo, with ſome few Notes 1687; and it was Printed at Oxon in 1677 in Twelves. All theſe Editions are in Greek and Latin; Mr. Burton who writ Notes upon Antonius's Itinerary, as far as it concerned Britain, Tranſlated it into Engliſh, and Printed it with Notes in Quarto 1947, at London.]

Now it will not be amiſs briefly to recollect all that hath been ſaid concerning the Works of Saint Clement, and to declare our Opinion in this matter. The firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians was certainly written by him, and is a good and uſeful Treatiſe. The ſecond is very ancient, thô not of the ſame Authority. The Conſtitutions are an ancient and uſeful Book falſly imputed to S. Clement, in which many things have been added and altered in proceſs of time, for which Reaſon ſeveral Errors have crept in among them. The Recognitions are an Apocryphal Work, ancient indeed, but abounding with Errors and Fables. The ſame Judgment ought to be given concerning the Clementinæ, which are not perhaps ſo ancient, as alſo the Second Part of the Recognitions. The Book Entituled, The Doctrine of the Apoſtles, may be the ſame with the Original Conſtitutions, but it is more probable that they are a different Work. We can give no account of the Book that bears the Title of The Precepts of St. Clement, Διδασκαλία Κλήμεντος. The Voyages or Itinerary of St. Peter are the ſame as the Recognitions and the Clementinæ. The Epitome is an Abridgment of the Apocryphal Writings. The Acts of the Martyrdom of S. Clement were compoſed by the modern Greeks. The Diſcourſe of Ephrem is likewiſe of a later Date. There were alſo certain Sermons aſcribed to S. Clement concerning the Juſt Judgment of God and Divine Providence cited by Anaſtaſius Antiochenus, Queſt. 96. but there is no probability of their being his. The five Decretals are counterfeit; and the Revelations or Apocalypſe of S. Peter, heretofore thought to have been written by S. Clement, is likewiſe ſuppoſititious. Thus we have given in ſhort, the Judgment that (according to our Opinion) ought to be given of all the Books that are, or have been attributed to S. Clemens Romanus, and all that we judge neceſſary to be propounded or explained concerning them in this place.

S. DIONYSIUS the Areopagite.

DIONYSIUS the Areopagite; who is reputed to have been a Native of Thrace (a), after he had been converted by S. Paul, as it is recorded in the Acts (b) of the Apoſtles; was made Biſhop of Athens (c), and ſuffered Martyrdom (d) in that City. I ſhall not ſpend time in proving that he never came into France, and that that S. Denys who was the firſt Apoſtle of this Kingdom, is different from the Areopagite; this Queſtion has been ſo clearly diſcuſſed in our time (e), that there is ſcarcely any one, thô never ſo incredulous that can queſtion it. I could alſo very willingly forbear to give any Account of the Books that are attributed to him, or to ſhew how they have been forged, were it not that the Deſign of my Work obligeth me to this undertaking; therefore I ſhall do it with as much Brevity and Moderation as is poſſible. St. Dionyſius, the Areopagite.

(b) Acts 17.

(c) Was conſtituted Biſhop of Athens.] Dionyſius Corinthius in Euſeb. Hiſt. lib. 3. cap. 4. and lib. 4. cap. 4.

(d) And ſuffered Martyrdom.] Ariſtides in Uſuardus, and the other ancient Writers of Martyrologies.

(e) This queſtion hath been ſo clearly diſcuſſed in our time.] Sirmondus publiſhed a Diſcourſe wherein he proves it beyond contradiction; after him Launoy wrote ſeveral Tracts to confirm his Opinion, and to ſhew the falſhood of the Records produced by Hilduinus, which are urged to authorize the vulgar Opinion; and in a word, to confute all the Arguments that are uſually brought. To which we may add what Morinus had ſaid concerning this Queſtion in the beginning of his Book of Ordinations; And though I inſerted nothing relating to this matter in the Text, yet I thought it convenient to ſet down the Opinions of the Learned Men above-mentioned, for the benefit of thoſe that have not read their Works. The firſt Proof is, That it is certain that the Goſpel was Preached later in France, than in the other Regions of the World, and that there was no Perſecution in that Country before that of Valerian, as it is expreſly atteſted by Sulpicius Severus an Author who lived in the Fourth Century. Now if St. Dionyſius the

S. Dionyſius the Areopagite

Areopagite had been in France, the Chriſtian Religion would have been introduced there very early, and there would have been many Martyrs in that Kingdom before the Perſecution of Valerian. Secondly, It is evident that Pothinus was the firſt that propagated Chriſtianity in France; that during his Life, and that of his Succeſſor Irenæus, the Faith was only eſtabliſhed in the Provinces of Vienna and Lyons, and that there were no Martyrs but in theſe two Churches in the time of the Perſecution of Marcus Aurelius: therefore there were no other Churches then planted among the Gauls. And indeed Euſebius mentions no other Churches, or any other Martyrs in France, no more than the Chriſtians of the Church of Lyons in the Epiſtle that they wrote concerning their Martyrs called by them Proto-Martyrs. Thirdly, it is related by Gregory of Tours in the firſt Book of his Hiſtory, ch. 28. on the credit of an ancient Author that compoſed a Treatiſe concerning the Paſſion of St. Saturnius, that S. Denys and his Companions the Apoſtles of France, came thither under the Reign of the Emperor Decius, about the year of our Lord 250, to re-eſtabliſh the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt in that Country, which was almoſt entirely extinct after the Death of S. Irenæus. Fourthly, there are great numbers of Martyrologies, in which the Feſtivals of S. Dionyſius the Areopagite, and of S. Denys the Apoſtle of France, are deſcribed as on two different days, and wherein the place and circumſtances of their Martyrdom are diſtinguiſhed. We may likewiſe draw the ſame Argument from the ancient Breviaries, Miſſals, Kalendars and Laitanies in which St. Denys the Apoſtle of France is reckoned after the Saints that ſuffered under Marcus Aurelius. Fifthly, the Author of the Life of S. Fuſcianus, Fulbertus, Carnutenſis, and Letbaldus, diſtinguiſh two Denys's. Sixthly, the opinion of thoſe that affirm, that S. Denys the Apoſtle of France is the ſame with the Areopagite, was unknown before the Ninth Century, neither doth the Monk that wrote the Life of our S. Denys in the year 750, ſay one word concerning this matter. Hilduinus, who is the firſt that mentions it, is a very Fabulous Author, who tells abundance of Lies, and cites a Book written by one named Viſbius, which is plainly forged; on the credit of which wretched Author he builds up the Opinion of thoſe that confound the two S. Denys's.

We muſt obſerve Firſt, that the manner of the firſt appearing of thoſe Books ought to be ſuſpected; for it is certain, that being unknown to all Antiquity, they were firſt quoted by the Severian Hereticks, in a Conference holden between them, and the Orthodox Biſhops at Conſtantinople in the Palace of the Emperor Juſtinian 532 Years after the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt. The ſilence of all the ancient Eccleſiaſtical Writers, is without doubt a very great prejudice to them; for who can imagine that ſo conſiderable an Author as S. Denys (if theſe Books had been really Compoſed by him) ſhould have been unknown to Euſebius and S. Jerom. And who can believe, that if they had known them, they ſhould take no notice of them, when they Compoſed an exact Catalogue of all the Authors, of whom they had any knowledge; not omitting even thoſe, that had ſo little Reputation that they were ſcarcely heard of in the World? Is it poſſible that Euſebius in making mention of Dionyſius the Areopagite in two ſeveral places, ſhould not have obſerved according to his uſual Method, that he had written ſeveral Books. St. Jerom in his Epiſtle to Magnus doth not omit the Teſtimony of one ſingle Author, to prove that it is lawful to make uſe of profane Books, whereas the Writings of S. Denys, might have ſerved as a notable Proof; why then doth he not ſpeak ſo much as one word concerning them? He gives us an Account in his Catalogue, of Quadratus Biſhop of Athens, and of Ariſtides the Athenian Philoſopher; is it poſſible that S. Denys ſhould be more obſcure than theſe two Writers, or leſs eſteemed by S. Jerom? How could it happen, that all the ancient Writers that mention S. Dionyſius the Areopagite, as Dionyſius Corinthius, S. Chryſoſtom, S. Ambroſe, S. Auguſtine, and the Author of the Dialogues aſcribed to S. Cæſarius the Brother of S. Gregory Nazianzen, ſhould give us no Intimation of theſe Books? In ſhort, why were theſe Books which contain many things relating to the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Chriſtian Church, and that would have been of great Authority, as proceeding from ſo ancient and conſiderable an Author as S. Dionyſius the Areopagite, never cited, either for or againſt any Heretick, or for the Illuſtration of any point of Diſcipline before the ſixth Age of the Church? Furthermore admitting, that they had appeared even at that time, as Books of whoſe Antiquity and Truth there could be no ſcruple; if they had been then produced by the Orthodox as ancient Records, if they had been rejected by none, would not this be a matter of great moment? But who are they that produce them? They are Hereticks who have been uſed to quote counterfeit Records. How do they cite them? As uncertain Books, ſicut ſuſpicamini, ſay the Catholicks. To what end do they produce them? To eſtabliſh their Errors. Againſt whom do they cite them? Againſt the Orthodox. And what do they reply? This ought to decide the Controverſie; let us then hearken to them, and let us give credit to their Teſtimony, rather than to that of the Hereticks: How can you prove (ſay the Orthodox Biſhops to the Severian) that theſe Records which you affirm to belong to S. Dionyſius the Areopagite, are Genuine, as you may imagine; for if they were his, they could not have been unknown to S. Cyril of happy Memory; but why do we only mention S. Cyril? If S. Athanaſius had believed that they had been written by S. Dionyſius, would not he have made uſe of their Authority in the Council of Nice, to prove the Conſubſtantiality of the Trinity againſt the blaſphemies of Arius? If they have not been cited by any of the ancient Writers, how can you demonſtrate, that they were written by him? Thus the Orthodox then argued; but having ſince peruſed theſe Books, and finding nothing therein, that is contrary to the Catholick Faith, they admitted them without much Examination; thô there have always been ſome Criticks, who have queſtioned them. Photius ſays in the beginning of his Bibliotheca, that one Theodorus wrote a Book by way of reply to the Objections that were generally urged againſt theſe Books, and he produceth the Objections that were propounded by this Author, but takes no notice of the Anſwers that he had annexed to them, which is an Argument that he thought them to be of no great ſtrength.

2. The ſtyle and method of theſe Books is very far from the manner of writing uſed in the Firſt and Second Centuries, as being ſwelling and two much affected; the Author purpoſely leaves ordi-

hary and natural Expreſſions, to make uſe of thoſe that are lofty and Figurative; he Amplifies every thing, even that which ought to be recited after the moſt ſimple manner, he uſes a great deal of Artifice in the diſpoſing of his Periods, and obſerves an exact Method in the Order of his Arguments; which ſhews that it was written by a Philoſopher, who had leiſure to reviſe and poliſh it with much Care and Study, which doth not agree with the Character of S. Dionyſius the Areopagite, nor with the way of writing in his time. St. Dionyſius, the Areopagite.

3. Neither are the Contents of theſe Books conformable to the Genius of the Age, wherein S. Dionyſius the Areopagite lived. The Chriſtians were employed in theſe primitive Times, in Compoſing Three ſorts of Books, Apologies for their Religion, Epiſtles for the Inſtruction of the Faithful, and to exhort them to ſuffer Martyrdom; and Laſtly, Treatiſes againſt the Hereticks: Now theſe Writings attributed to S. Denys plainly relate to another Subject, and have a quite different Deſign; for his principal Intention is to treat of Myſteries after a curious and exquiſite manner, and to expound them according to the Principles of Plato's Philoſophy, and even in Platonick Terms. He is not content to propound them with the ſimplicity of the ancient, but he applies himſelf nicely to enquire into all the Difficulties that might occur therein, and to raiſe divers Queſtions more curious than uſeful concerning the Nature of God, and the different Orders of Angels: He explains the Doctrine of the Trinity more diſtinctly, even than S. Athanaſius himſelf: He plainly rejects the Errors of the Neſtorians, Eutychians, Anthropomerphites. He ſpeaks of the Church as in a proſperous Condition, and enjoying Peace; neither doth he make any mention of Perſecutions or Martyrs: He diſtinguiſhes the ſeveral Orders of Angels, and obſerves their difference, things that were unknown to the ancient Writers, and concerning which they were not ſollicitous to be informed, as S. Irenæus aſſures us, in *Lib.2. chap.*55. and S. Cyril Catech. Illum. 11, Upon the whole matter, if we compare theſe Writings with thoſe of the other ancient Authors, we ſhall find that there can be nothing more different, either as to their Style and Method, or as to the Matters therein contained.

We ſhall now proceed to give particular Proofs whereby it will plainly appear, that theſe Books were not written by S. Dionyſius the Areopagite, and there are two ſorts of theſe, ſome proving that they cannot belong to S. Denys, others ſhewing that they were compoſed by an Author who lived after the Fourth Century. I ſhall begin with the Arguments which prove that thoſe Books do not belong to S. Denys. 1. The Author of the Book, de Divinis Nominibus, Dedicates it to Timothy, and then cites an Epiſtle of S. Ignatius. Now Timothy was dead when S. Ignatius wrote his Epiſtles, and Oneſimus ſucceeded him; and beſides, he calls Timothy his Son, and yet he muſt needs be older than S. Denys. He cites and explains the Goſpel according to S. John, and the Apocalypſe, which were ſcarcely written when Dionyſius the Areopagite was alive: And yet he declares in thoſe Books, that he was but a young Man. He cites the Revelation, as undoubtedly included in the Canon of Holy Scripture, and yet it was very much queſtioned in the Primitive Ages of the Church, whether it were Canonical or not. The ſame Reflection may be likewiſe made upon his Citations, taken from the Second Epiſtle of S. John, and that of S. Jude. 3. He rejects the Error of the Millenaries which could not have appeared in his time. 4. He expreſly produceth in Lib. de Divinis Nomin. chap. 4. certain Paſſages out of the Epiſtle of S. Ignatius to the Romans, written by this Biſhop a little before his Martyrdom; whereas S. Ignatius was put to Death under the Reign of the Emperor Trajan, and S. Dionyſius the Areopagite, under that of Domitian, and conſequently the later was dead, when the former wrote this Epiſtle. Maximus replies that this Citation is added, but there are Three or Four entire Lines that relate to this matter, which there is no reaſon to diſallow. 5. This Author affirms, that he was preſent at the Death of the Virgin Mary, but S. Dionyſius the Areopagite was not Converted at that time; for it is generally believed, that ſhe died Fifteen years after the Crucifixion of Jeſus Chriſt, and S. Paul who Converted S. Denys came not to Athens till Seventeen years after our Saviour's Paſſion.

Laſtly, There are many Reaſons, by which it may be proved, that this Author wrote after the Fourth Century; For, 1. He treats of the Myſteries of the Holy Trinity, and the Incarnation in ſuch Terms as were not known till after the Fourth Age of the Church; he uſed the word Hypoſtaſis to ſignifie the Divine Perſons, (c.7. Cæleſt.Hier. c.1. de Divinis Nominibus) whereas it is well known, that this word was not uſed in this Senſe, till after the end of the Fourth Century. 2. In Lib. de Cæleſti Hierarchia cap. ult. He confirms the Baptiſm of Infants by an ancient Tradition: We declare that (ſays he) which our Biſhops have taught us according to an ancient Tradition. Could this have been written by S. Dionyſius the Areopagite, or rather, doth not this ſhew, that he that diſcourſeth thus, is a much later Author than this Biſhop of Athens? 3. He deſcribes the ſolemn Adminiſtration of Baptiſm as it was, when the Church being delivered from Perſecution, began to practice the ancient Ceremonies with exterior Pomp and Splendor. 4. He ſpeaks of Churches built on purpoſe, wherein there was a Sanctuary ſeparated from the reſt of the Churches; as alſo of the perfuming of Altars with incenſe, and of divers Ceremonies relating to the Energumens, Catechumens, and Penitents, which were not obſerved in thoſe Primitive times. 5. It is certain, that the Inſtitution of Monks is not ſo ancient as St. Denys, and that they were not conſecrated till long after the Age wherein he lived. Yet the Author of the Divine Hierarchy in *chap.*6. mentions them, as being more ancient than himſelf, and adds that his Inſtructers called them Therapeutæ or Monks; and he gives an Account of the manner of their Conſecration, and diſtinguiſheth ſeveral ſorts of them. 6. He often cites the Eccleſiaſtical Authors that lived before him, who wrote concerning matters that were only debated in the 4th Century, ſuch were the diſtinctions between Love and Charity, the Opinions relating to the ſeveral Functions and Orders of Angels, as alſo the Lot by which S. Matthias was elected, the Prayers that were recited at Maſs, which he declares to have been received from their Anceſtors by Tradition; The Baptiſm of Infants, of which he affirms the ſame thing; The Funeral Rites and Solemnities, the Ceremonies of Baptiſm, and many other Cuſtoms. Laſtly, he cites St. Clemens Alexandrinus under the name of Clement the Philoſopher, and the paſſage of this Author produced by him, is taken from Stromat. lib. 8. which ſhews that he ſpeaks of St. Clement, who lived in the Third Age of the Church.

However many Arguments are alledged to prove the Verity and Antiquity of theſe Books, which nevertheleſs may be very eaſily confuted in a few words. It is objected firſt, That it is affirmed, by Maximus, Anaſtaſius Sinaita, and Cypariſſiota, that St. Dionyſius Alexandrinus compoſed Scolia, or Annotations on the Books of Dionyſius the Areopagite de Nominibus Divinis. 2. That St. Athanaſius in Queſt. 4. ad Antiochum, and Origen, in his firſt Homily on St. John quotes the Writings of Dionyſius the Areopagite, and that St. Gregory the Great calls him an ancient Father; St. Gregory Nazianzen ſeems likewiſe to cite him in Hom. 38. 42. where after having declared that the repetition of the word Holy thrice, relates to one and the ſame Lordſhip, and to one and the ſame Divinity, he adds, as another hath very excellently and very clearly Philoſophized before us, which may well be applied to the Author of the Hierarchy, who lived before the time of St. Gregory Nazianzen, and whoſe Philoſophy was very ſublime: Moreover, S. Denys is cited by S. Chryſoſtom in his Sermon of falſe Prophets; Where is (ſays he) St. Ignatius the Tabernacle of God, where is Dionyſius the Areopagite, the Eagle of Heaven? deſigning by this Expreſſion to ſet forth the magnificence of his ſtyle. There is a compariſon in Lib. de Divinis Nominibus, chap. 3. of an Anchor that attracts us to it more than we drew it to us, which St. Clemens Alexandrinus ſeems to have taken from S. Denys. Laſtly, Nicephorus affirms, that Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who aſſiſted at the Council of Chalcedon, in replying to Pulcheria concerning the Sepulchre and Death of the Virgin Mary, made uſe of the words of S. Dionyſius the Areopagite. All theſe Arguments ſeem to prove, that the Books de Hierarchia & de Nominibus Divinis, were written by S. Denys, or at leaſt that they are more ancient than the Fourth Century.

But if we examine theſe Objections, they will appear all very weak: For 1. We ought not to believe on the Teſtimony of Anaſtaſius and Maximus, that Dionyſius Alexandrinus, the Diſciple of Origen, compoſed any Annotations upon the Writings of Dionyſius the Areopagite, ſince Euſebius and S. Jerom, who took a Catalogue of the Works of this Saint, did not mention it; whence we ought to infer, either that it was another Dionyſius Alexandrinus, or that ſome Grecian hath forged Commentaries on the Books attributed to S. Dionyſius the Areopagite, under that name. 2. The Book Entituled, Queſtiones ad Antiochum, cited under the name of St. Athanaſius, and the Homilies on ſeveral places of the New Teſtament aſcribed to Origen are alledged to no purpoſe, becauſe it is certain that theſe Books are falſly attributed to St. Athanaſius and Origen, as it is generally agreed. 3. St. Gregory Nazianzen doth not cite St. Denys by name; Elias Cretenſis is of opinion that Saint Athanaſius is here meant, and indeed the paſſage quoted by St. Gregory Nazianzen concerning the Triſagion is found word for word in one of the Homilies of St. Athanaſius, who living before St. Gregory might be cited by him. 4. The Sermon quoted under the name of S. Chryſoſtome, was without queſtion not written by this Father, but by John the Faſter, Patriarch of Conſtantinople; and though it really belonged to the former, yet he takes no notice of the Writings of St. Denys, but only extols him as a great Saint. Laſtly, it is more probable that the Author of the Treatiſe De Divinis Nominibus, hath borrowed the ſimilitudes from St. Clemens Alexandrinus, whom he cites in another place, than that St. Clement ſhould have taken them from him.

As for the Authority of Nicephorus and other modern Writers, it proves nothing elſe, but that theſe Books were attributed to St. Dionyſius the Areopagite when they wrote, and this is agreed on all ſides, for after they firſt appeared in the beginning of the Sixth Century, they ſoon got a great deal of Reputation and Authority; They are cited by St. Ephrem in a Treatiſe that he compoſed in vindication of the Synod of Chalcedon; The Monk Jobius, Andreas Cæſarienſis, Leontius, Anaſtaſius Sinaita, Suidas, Nicephorus, and many other modern Greeks, make honourable mention of them; and Joannes Scythopolitanus, Maximus, and Pachymeres, wrote Commentaries on this Author. Among the Latins, Gregory the Great cites them with great applauſe; Joannes Scotus Erigena tranſlated them into Latin, and Anaſtaſius the Library-Keeper ſent this Verſion to Charles the Bald, with a Preface and Annotations. But the Teſtimony of theſe modern Authors is of very little moment in this matter, and only proves, that theſe Books were then thought to belong to St. Dionyſius the Areopagite; On the contrary, the Reaſons that we have already alledged are ſufficient to convince all Perſons that are Ingenuous and of a clear Judgment, that they were forged about the end of the Fifth Century, or at the beginning of the Sixth, for the time when they firſt appeared cannot be preciſely determined; but it is certain, that they were written ſince the Fourth Century, and before the middle of the Sixth. Moreover it cannot be affirmed, that the Works of ſome other Denys might accidentally be imputed to St. Dionyſius the Areopagite, it being evident that the Author of theſe Books affects to ſeem to have lived in the time of the Apoſtles.

We ſhall here ſubjoin a Catalogue of the Works that have been publiſhed under the name of St. Dionyſius the Areopagite; A Book concerning the Celeſtial Hierarchy, another of the Eccleſiaſtical Hierarchy, a Treatiſe of the Divine Attributes, another of Myſtical Divinity, together with Ten Epiſtles, whereof the Four firſt are written to the Monk Cajus, the fifth to Dorotheus, the ſixth to the Prieſt Soſipater, the ſeventh to the Biſhop Polycarp, the eighth to the Monk Demophilus, the ninth to the Biſhop Titus, and the tenth to St. John. All theſe belong to the ſame Author, who hath likewise composed some others which are cited by himself; A Book concerning Symbolical Theology (f) another treats of the Soul (g,) another of Divine Hymns (h,) another of Theological Instructions; a Treatise concerning the just Judgment of God (i,) and another of those things that are understood by the Mind, and of those that may be perceived by the Senses (k;) but these are lost. The others have been often Printed in Greek and in Latin separately (l,) and were published in Greek and Latin by Lanselius at Paris, Anno Dom. 1615. afterwards at Antwerp in 1634, and again at Paris 1644, by the Jesuit Corderius. together with the Commentaries of Pachymeres and Maximus.

St. IGNATIUS.

IGNATIUS Sirnamed Theophorus (a,) was the Succeſſor of Evodius (b) in the Epiſcopal See of Antioch, about the year of your Lord 70. He governed this Church for the ſpace of almoſt Forty years with admirable Prudence and Conſtancy, and at laſt ſuffered Martyrdom in the Tenth Year of the Reign of Trajan, when this Holy Prelate having profeſſed the Faith even in the preſence of the Emperor himſelf with great Courage, (if we may believe the Acts of his Martyrdom) was condemned to be expoſed to wild Beaſts in the Amphitheatre at Rome: And he is reputed to have wrote his Epiſtles to ſeveral Churches, in the way as he was carried a Priſoner in Chains to that City, for maintaining the truth of the Chriſtian Religion; but ſince there are very great difficulties concerning the number and different Editions of theſe Epiſtles, it will be neceſſary to draw up their Hiſtory, and to produce the Teſtimony of Authors that have mentioned them ſince his time.

S. Ignatius.

Immediately after the death of this Holy Martyr, Polycarp Biſhop of Smyrna, his Diſciple, collected theſe Epiſtles, and ſent them to the Chriſtians of Philippi, as appears from a Letter that he wrote to them, and which cannot be queſtioned without contradicting, not only Euſebius, S. Jerom, and Photius, the moſt renowned Criticks of Antiquity, but alſo S. Irenæus himſelf the Diſciple of S. Polycarp, who cites this Epiſtle, and commends it in theſe words: There is an Epiſtle of Polycarp to the Chriſtians of Philippi which is extremely accurate, and very proper to ſhew the character of the Faith, and the Doctrine of the Truth, to thoſe that take any care of their Salvation. Moreover we have not only an approbation of St. Polycarp's Epiſtle by S. Irenæus, to prove the Authority of S. Ignatius's, but it is likewiſe evident, that this Father had read theſe Epiſtles: Irenæus (ſays Euſebius) was not ignorant of the Martyrdom of S. Ignatius, and mentions his Epiſtles in theſe words: Thus one of our Brethren being condemned for maintaining the Faith, to be expoſed to the wild Beaſts, ſaid, (c) I am the Wheat of God, and ſhall be ground by the Teeth of wild Beaſts, that I may become the Bread of Jeſus Chriſt. The words recited by S. Irenæus in Lib. 5. contra Hæreſ. cap. 28. are alſo found at preſent in the Epiſtle of S. Ignatius to the Romans. Origen hath cited the Epiſtles of S. Ignatius, and that which he produceth in two ſeveral places, is read in thoſe that are now extant. I have found it written (ſays he in his 6th Homily on S. Luke) in the Epiſtle of a certain Martyr, I mean Ignatius Biſhop of Antioch, who was expoſed to wild Beaſts at Rome, I have found it written (I ſay) very elegantly, that the Virginity of Mary was unknown to the Prince of this World. This paſſage is word for word in (a) Sirnamed Theophorus.] This is not an Epithet, but his Sirname. Some have believed, that he was that young Child, whom Jeſus Chriſt placed in the middle of his Apoſtles, and that from thence he took the Name of Theophorus, but this is a vain Imagination without any ground, not ſupported by the Teſtimony of any ancient Author; and beſides, it contradicts the Opinion of St. Chryſoſtom, who declares that S. Ignatius never ſaw our Saviour in the Fleſh.

(b) The Succeſſor of Evodius.] S. Chryſoſtom, Theodoret, and the Author of the Chronicle of Alexandria affirm, that he was ordained by S. Peter; but Euſebius S. Jerom and the other ancient Eccleſiaſtical Writers, place Evodius between S. Peter and S. Ignatius.

(c) Wild Beaſts ſaid.] In citing the Teſtimony of any Author, we ſay, as he ſays, or as he writes, without uſing any Choice; and it ought not to be concluded from thence, that S. Irenæus only produced a remarkable Expreſſion of S. Ignatius, without taking it from any of his Works, for it is much more probable, that he took it from his Epiſtle to the Romans, becauſe it is found there word for word.

St. Ignatius.

the Epiſtle of S. Ignatius to the Epheſians. The Second paſſage quoted by Origen is in his Commentary on the Canticles. We remember (ſays he) the Expreſſion of a Saint named Ignatius in ſpeaking concerning Jeſus Chriſt, my Love is Crucified, and I do not believe that he ought to be reprehended on this Account. Theſe are the Teſtimonies taken from Authors who wrote in the Second and Third Centuries; in the Fourth, Euſebius cites the Epiſtles of S. Ignatius, declares their number, and gives us a Catalogue of them. He ſays in the Third Book of his Hiſtory, chap. 36. that this Holy Martyr being carried from Aſia into Italy, confirmed the Churches of the ſeveral Cities, through which he paſſed, in the Faith, and admoniſhed them to avoid Hereſies by conſtantly adhering to the Tradition of the Apoſtles; and that being arrived at Smyrna, where (l) Polycarp was then Biſhop, he wrote four Letters; The firſt to the Church of Epheſus, wherein he mentions Oneſimus their Paſtor; The ſecond to the Magneſians, wherein he ſpeaks of Damas their Biſhop; The third to the Trallians, where he names Biſhop Polybius; and the laſt to the Church of Rome, wherein he intreats the Romans not to deprive him through the fervour of their Prayers of the Crown of Martyrdom. Afterwards he recites a large fragment of this Epiſtle, and adds, that being departed from Smyrna, and arrived at Troas, he wrote to the Philadelphians, as alſo to the Church of Smyrna, and particularly to S. Polycarp their Biſhop, recommending to him the care of the Church of Antioch, as unto a good Paſtor worthy of thoſe Apoſtolical times. he cites likewiſe a Fragment of the Epiſtle to the Inhabitants of Smyrna, and confirms what he had before alledged by the Atteſtations of S. Irenæus, and S. Polycarp. It is evident from this paſſage, that in the time of Euſebius there were Seven Letters, which were eſteemed undoubtedly to be S. Ignatius's, and that they were the very ſame with thoſe that are ſtill extant, becauſe they were written from the ſame places, to the ſame Perſons, and on the ſame Subject, and contain all the Paſſages that are produced by Euſebius word for word, after whom theſe very Epiſtles were unanimouſly allowed by the whole Church, and cited by an infinite number of Eccleſiaſtical Authors. S. Athanaſius who could not be led by the Authority of Euſebius, whoſe Hiſtory perhaps he had never ſeen, ſets down in his Book of the Synods, a paſſage of this ancient Biſhop, which is in the Epiſtle to the Epheſians. S. Chryſoſtom in the Oration, that he made in the Commendation of S. Ignatius, recites this famous Sentence taken from his Epiſtle to the Romans: Would to God that I might ere long fight with Beaſts, and in another Oration, if that be really his, (d) he quotes a paſſage of the Epiſtle to S. Polycarp.

S. Jerom acknowledgeth the Seven Epiſtles of S. Ignatius mentioned by Euſebius to be Genuine: they are reckoned in his Catalogue of Authors, and cited by him in divers other places of his Works. The Learned Theodoret uſes the Authority of the Letters of this Father, as certainly written by him, againſt the Heretieks, and in his Dialogues produceth many large paſſages out of the Epiſtles to the Smyrneans, Epheſians, and Trallians, that are expreſſed after the very ſame manner, as they are Printed in the Editions of Voſſius and Biſhop Uſher. Geſaſius likewiſe cites a paſſage of the Epiſtle to the Chriſtians of Smyrna on the ſame Subject in his Treatiſe concerning the two Natures of Jeſus Chriſt? The Author of the Book of the Divine Attributes, aſcribed to Dionyſius the Areopagite, produceth a Sentence taken from that to the Romans. S. Ephrem in the ſixth Century (according to the report of Photius, Cod. 228.) hath cited the Writings of S. Ignatius: Gildas de Excidio Britanniæ, produceth a large paſſage of the Epiſtle to the Romans: The Monk Jobius (as it is related by Photius, Cod. 222.) quotes another of that to the Smyrneans: Leontius oppoſeth the Authority of S. Ignatius to the Heretieks in Lib. de Sect. Act. 3. Anaſtaſius Sinaita of the Seventh Century, in his Book Entituled ὁδηγὸς (The Guide) ſets down a paſſage taken from the Epiſtle to the Romans, and Antiochus a Monk of Paleſtine, in his 124th Homily to Euſtathius concerning the Honour, that is due to the Biſhops, recites many paſſages of thoſe to Polycarp, the Philadelphians and Trallians, S. Maximus acknowledgeth the Works of S. Ignatius, and Theodorus in the Eighth Century (whom Photius mentions Cod. 1.) produceth divers paſſages thereof, as alſo Andreas Cretenſis a Writer of the Ninth Century, in Hom. 2. de Virgine; and Singelus in his Panegyrick upon S. Dionyſius the Areopagite: To theſe may be added, Simeon Metaphraſtes in the Tenth Century, Honorius Biſhop of Autun in the Twelfth, Nicetas Choniates in the Thirteenth; and Laſtly, Nicephorus Caliſtus in the Fourteenth: This ſhews that the Epiſtles of S. Ignatius have been allowed by the Church in all Ages, as authentick Records; but the modern Grecians ſince the time of S. Joannes Damaſcen have uſed other Letters, that are not named by Euſebius, whereas before, the Seven Epiſtles mentioned by Euſebius and S. Jerom were only cited.

Having produced the ſeveral Teſtimonies of the Ancients, concerning the Epiſtles that are attributed to S. Ignatius, we ſhall now proceed to ſhew what Judgment hath been given by the Moderns concerning the ſame, and for the better underſtanding of this matter, it ſeems to be neceſſary in the beginning, to ſet down a Catalogue of the different Editions of theſe Epiſtles that have been made in our time.

The firſt Edition of the Epiſtles of S. Ignatius, was publiſhed at Paris, Anno Dom. 1494. which did not contain any of the Seven that are recited by Euſebius, but only the Three Latin Letters, one whereof was written to the Virgin Mary, and the other two to S. John. In the Year 1498, Eleven were Printed in Latin, which being revised by Clictoveus, were Reprinted at Strasburg in 1502, 1515, and 1527, as also by Henry Peter at Basil, in 1520. Not long after Champerius added three others, and one written to Maria Cassobolita, which he caused to be Printed at Colen, by Quentelius in 1536. together with the Commentaries of Dionysius Carthusianus on the Works attributed to S. Dionysius the Areopagite; afterwards they were Printed at Antwerp in 1540. at Alcala in 1541. at Basil in 1530, and 1540. at Zurick in 1546, 1550, 1557, and 1560. at Paris in 1569, 1575, and 1610. at Colen in 1570. at Basil in 1569, and 1628. at Louvain in 1568. and at Antwerp in 1572. In the Year 1557, they were set forth at Colen, according to the Version of Perionius, Pacæus gave us the Greek Text. In 1557, 1558, and 1562 Morellus procured them to be Printed in Greek, at Paris in Octavo. Moreover, Gesner published them in Greek, in 1559, with the Translation of Brunnerus. In the Year 1566. they were published at Antwerp, being corrected from certain Manuscripts by Vairlenius, and Printed by Plantin, Mestræus set forth a new Edition of them in 1608. Vedelius a Protestant caused them to be Printed with large Annotations in Quarto, at Geneva, Anno Dom. 1623. Lastly Usher having observed, that three English Divines had formerly quoted a passage of S. Ignatius, in the very same words as it is expressed by Theodoret, which was not inserted in the Greek Text, nor in the Vulgar Translations, judged that it might not be difficult to find some Manuscripts of the Original Epistles of S. Ignatius in England; Whereupon having made Enquiry, he happened to meet with two, one in the University of Cambridge, (in Caius Colledge Library,) and another in a private Library of one Richard Mountague, which contained an ancient Version of those Epistles very different from the Vulgar; and afterwards having compared this Translation, with the passages recited by the Fathers, he perceived that it exactly agreed with them, quite through; for which reason, when he set out a new Edition, (e) of the Epistles of S. Ignatius he used them, and caused the places that were added by the Modern Greeks, to be distinguished, in the Greek Text by Red Characters. Not long after, the Learned Isaac Vossius found in the Library of Florence a Greek Manuscript of the same Epistles, which had been perused about an hundred years before by Turrianus, wherein the Greek Text perfectly answered to the Version published by Usher, and so he published the Greek Original of S. Ignatius. (f)

S. Ignatius.

We may Learn from the knowledge of these Editions, that the Epistles of S. Ignatius ought to be divided into three Classes. The first contains those Three that are only extant in Latin, written to the Virgin Mary and S. John. The Second comprehends those that are in Greek, whereof Eusebius and S. Jerom make no mention, which being five in number (g,) are cited by some Modern Greeks. In the Third Rank are comprized those Seven Epistles mentioned by Eusebius (h,) but these are either such as were published before the Editions of Vossius and Usher; or such as are conformable to their Copies, that is to say, more concise, and more simple.

We must likewise distinguish three several Opinions concerning these Epistles: The first is, of those that allow them all, even the Three which are written only in Latin, as Faber, Roffensis, Driedo, Marianus, Victorius, Canisius and Halloixius. The last of whom, tho' Living in a clearer Age than the former yet was not a better Critick than any of them that were before him. We may also reckon almost in the same Rank, those that admit all the Greek Letters, wherein they follow the Opinion

(e) He made use thereof in preparing a new Edition.] The first Edition of Usher was Printed at Oxford, An. Dom. 1644. It contains, 1. A preliminary Dissertation. 2. The Six Epistles of S. Ignatius in Greek, wherein all that is not in the ancient Version is distinguished by Red Characters. 3. The counterfeit Letters. 4. The ancient Latin Translation. 5. Several Notes in the Year 1647. He published another Edition which he calls Appendix Ignatiana, in which he inserted the Greek Text, published by M. Vossius in 1646. as also a new Translation. He added therein, 1. The Ancient Records of the Martyrdom of S. Ignatius, which bear the Name of Philo. 2. The Letters of Tiberianus; Pliny, and Trajan concerning the Constancy of the Martyrs. 3. The entire Epistle of the Church of Smyrna, concerning the Martyrdom of S. Polycarp. 4. Annotations on the Acts of the Epistles of S. Ignatius.

(f) To publish the Greek Original of S. Ignatius.] His Edition was Printed at Amsterdam, Anno Dom. 1646. It contains, 1. The seven Original Epistles, excepting that to the Romans, as they were written in his Greek and Latin Manuscripts. 2. The Greek Epistles falsly attributed to S. Ignatius, which are not cited by Eusebius. 3. The three Latin Letters to the Virgin Mary and S. John. 4. The seven Greek and Latin Epistles, as they were in the former Editions. 5. The Epistle of S. Barnabas, together with Notes on the whole Work. The Editions of Cotelerius and of Madrus at Helmstadt in Octavo, are not different from that of Vossius, which hath been lately Reprinted at London, in 1680.

(g) Which being Five in Number.] We find at the beginning, the Epistle of Maria Cassobolita ? afterward the first Epistle of S. Ignatius to this Mary; the Second to the Inhabitants of Tarsus; the Third to the Antiochians; the Fourth to Hero a Deacon of the Church of Antioch; and the last to the Philippians.

(h) The seven Epistles mentioned by Eusebius.] They are written according to the Order observed by M. Vossius, 1. To the Christians of Smyrna; The Second to S. Polycarp; The Third to the Ephesians; The Fourth to the Magnesians; The Fifth to the Philadelphians; The Sixth to the Trallians; and the Seventh to the Romans. Moreover, we may distinguish Four ancient Editions of the Epistles of S. Ignatius; the First contained only these seven that were known to Eusebius, and the other ancient Writers without any Additions; the Second comprehended only these seven Epistles, but with several Additions; Pearson had a Manuscript of them; which Copy had been used by Gobarus, Anastatius Antiochenus, and the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle; in the Third there are the seven Authentick Epistles without Interpolations, together with the counterfeit; such are those of the Version of Usher, and the Greek Manuscript of M. Vossius, and these were perused by S. Joannes Damascenus, and Antonius; the Fourth is that of the seven Genuine Epistles, together with the Additions, and the others that were forged, which is the Vulgar.

of Cardinal Bellarmin, Baronius and Poſſevin. The ſecond is of thoſe who reject all. Calvin was the chief promoter of this Opinion, being followed by the Centuriators, Socinus, and even, after the Editions of Uſher and Voſſius, by Salmaſius, Blondel, Albertinus and Daille, who have uſed their utmoſt endeavours to ruin the Credit of their Copies. The Third Opinion is that of thoſe who keeping the middle way, aſcribe to S. Ignatius only the Seven Epiſtles, that are recited by Euſebius and S. Jerom, diſallowing all the reſt as Suppoſitirious, and owning that there were ſome Additions in the others. This has been formerly obſerved by very Learned Men, even before the Editions of Voſſius and Uſher appeared, as by Chemenitius, Perkins, Cook, and Vedelius, who tho' ſeparated from the Communion of the Church of Rome, yet were very able Criticks. But ſince their Editions, the judicious of both perſuaſions as Rivet, Grotius, Petavius, Labbæus, and the Author of the Offices of the Holy Sacrament, have acknowledged that the Seven Epiſtles of S. Ignatius, which had been corrupted by many Additions, were reſtored to their Original purity in Voſſius's Greek Edition, and in the Verſion publiſhed by Uſher. Morinus is the only Perſon among the Learned, that maintains the contrary Opinion, affirming that the Original Text of thoſe Letters is contained in the ancient Greek Edition, whereas it is retrenched and corrupted in the later of Voſſius. I had almoſt forgotten to obſerve, that Uſher and ſome others after him, have rejected the Epiſtle of S. Ignatius to S. Polycarp; and therefore reckon only ſix as Genuine. Thus we have repreſented the different Opinions concerning the Epiſtles of S. Ignatius; let us now conſider which ſide we ought to take.

Firſt, it is certain, that the Three Latin Epiſtles, whereof two are written to S. John, and the Third to the Virgin Mary are forged. S. Bernard is the firſt that quotes them in his 7th Sermon, on the Pſalm Qui habitat; they were unknown to the ancient and modern Grecian Writers; they were never extant in Greek, and the affected gingling of words that appears therein, ſhews that they were compoſed in Latin, and by one of that Nation. Beſides, they are written in a mean Style, and they are full of uſeleſs Notions unworthy of S. Ignatius.

Secondly, neither can it be doubted, but that the Five Greek Letters, which are not quoted by Euſebius and S. Jerom are in like manner counterfeit. For had they been extant when theſe Authors lived, it were impoſſible but they ſhould have ſeen or heard of them. And is it credible that having ſeen them, they ſhould take no notice of them, when they made a Catalogue of the Epiſtles of S. Ignatius? 2. They were not only unknown to Euſebius and S. Jerom, but likewiſe to all the Greek Fathers, whoſe Teſtimonies we have produced, and who have all cited only the Seven Epiſtles mentioned by Euſebius, the others being quoted only by the more modern Writers: They contain many things that do not agree with the time of S. Ignatius, for there are ſome Hereſies named which did not appear until a great while after his Death: We find an account of Subdeacons, Lecturers, Chanters, Porters, Exorciſts, and of thoſe that were called among the Grecians ἀναγνώσται or Readers. Now who knows not that theſe Orders were eſtabliſhed after the Deceaſe of S. Ignatius? They mention alſo Aſſemblies of Virgins, Lent, the Sabbath, Feſtivals, &c.

Thirdly, it muſt be confeſſed that the Epiſtles of S. Ignatius ſuch as they were before the Editions of Uſher and Voſſius, were corrupted, and different from thoſe that are cited by the ancient Writers. 1. Becauſe the paſſages cited by Theodoret and others, are not conformable to thoſe which we may find in the vulgar Edition. 2. Becauſe if we compare the ancient Edition with Voſſius's, it will evidently appear, that the later is not an Epitome of the former, but that the other is a kind of a Paraphraſe of this laſt: for the greater part of the paſſages which are extant in the ancient Edition; and are not to be found in Voſius's, are Explanations and Paraphraſes, or Thoughts added afterward, that have no manner of coherence with the reſt, and wherein one may find a plain difference in the Style and Doctrine. 3. There are divers things contained in the vulgar Edition, that cannot belong to the time of S. Ignatius, and which might give an occaſion juſtly to doubt of their Authority, before the Editions of Uſher and Voſſius were publiſhed. As for Example, in that to the Trallians we find the Names of Theodotus and Cleobulus; there are certain paſſages that confute the Opinion of Saturninus concerning Marriage, and the errors of Praxeas, mention is alſo made therein of the Nicolaitans, of the leſſer Orders, &c. things that by no means ſuit with thoſe Primitive Ages of the Church.

I have now only to enquire whether the ſeven Epiſtles, according to the Edition of Voſſius were written by S. Ignatius, and the firſt Queſtion that offers it ſelf to our Examination, is whether this Father wrote any Epiſtles at all: To which I reply, that it cannot be reaſonably doubted. For, 1. This matter of Fact is atteſted by all Antiquity. 2. It is proved by the above-cited Tradition that the Authors who ſaw S. Ignatius, as S. Polycarp, and thoſe that lived immediately after him, as Irenæus and Origen, knew and quoted theſe Epiſtles. Now to believe that they were falſly attributed to him even in their time, is in my Opinion great Nonſenſe; therefore it ought to be taken for granted, that S. Ignatius wrote Epiſtles; And who can imagine, that thoſe are not Genuine that were collected by S. Polycarp? Or what likelyhood is there that they were loſt between S. Polycarp's death, and Euſebius's time, and that others were ſubſtituted in their room? Wherefore Euſebius had the Original Epiſtles of S. Ignatius, and they that ſucceeded him, whoſe Teſtimonies we have already alledged, having without doubt preſerved the Seven that are mentioned by him, it cannot be affirmed with any probability that they have cited fictitious Epiſtles. From whence we ought to conclude, that ſince all the paſſages produced by them may be found word for word in the Editions of Uſher and Voſſius, it is very probable that they contain the Authentick Epiſtles of S. Ignatius in their Original Purity. And this Argument is of ſo much the more force, becauſe this is not only true in the reſemblance of one or two Paſſages, for it were not to be admitted that they ſhould agree, ſince they might have been inſerted by an Impoſtor; but in a very great number that are cited by different Authors,

Authors, which makes it much more certain. Besides, there is nothing in these Epistles that does not agree with the Person and Time of S. Ignatius; there are no Defects in the Chronology, nor any Anachronisms, which are usually found in Suppositious Works; there is no mention made of any Heretick that lived after S. Ignatius; the Errors that are refuted belong to his time, as that of the Simonians and Ebionites concerning the Passion and Divinity of Jesus Christ; the Tradition of the Church is confirmed according to Eusebius: He speaks of those Gifts of the Holy Spirit that were visible in the Church; he cites very few Passages out of the Holy Scriptures; he imitates the Style of S. Paul, and interminges nothing of Prophane Learning. Upon the whole matter, these Epistle are written with great simplicity, and bear an Apostolical Character; thus all the Arguments that evince the Falsification, or the Corruption of the other Epistles, invincibly prove the Truth and Purity of these. But this will appear yet further from the Answers to the Objections propounded by Salmasius, Blondel and Daille, which we shall set down and confute in a few Words, replying only to those that may be alledged against the seven Epistles, as they are Printed in the Edition of Vossius, and omitting the others which do not relate to our Opinion. S. Ignatius Objection 1. Our Adversaries not being able to produce any considerable Testimonies, at least such as can be esteemed to be of sufficient Authority, and being unwilling to appear to be the first Authors of the Opinion which they maintain, have sought for the Author of the Stichometria, which is prefixed to the Works of Syncellus and Theophanes, and is commonly attributed to Nicephorus, Patriarch of Constantinople, tho' it is not certain whether it is his or not. This Stichometria is a Catalogue of the Sacred Books both Canonical and Apocryphal, together with the number of their Verses, at the end whereof are annexed, The Apocryphal Books of the New Testament, the Voyages of S. Peter, and The Doctrin of the Apostles, of S. Clement, Ignatius, Polycarp and Hermas; from whence M. Daille concludes, that this Author hath inserted the Epistles of S. Ignatius among the Apocryphal and Counterfeit Writings.

Answer. First, This Author calls all those Books Apocryphal that are not Canonical, and in this Sense the Epistles of S. Ignatius may be reckoned under this Denomination, as the Book of the Pastor, which is Styled Apocryphal by those that do not receive it as Canonical, tho' it is very ancient, and was certainly writ by him whose Name it bears.

Secondly, This Author doth not mention the Epistles of S. Ignatius or S. Polycarp; and there is no probability that he intended to do it, because his Design is to make a Catalogue of the Sacred Writings both Genuine and Apocryphal; now what Analogy is there between this and the Epistles of S. Ignatius, which being writ a long time after the Death of the Apostles, could not be comprized amongst the Books of the Holy Scripture? And indeed if the Epistles of S. Ignatius, and S. Polycarp ought to be rejected as fictitious, because this Author hath inserted their Names among the Apocryphal Books of the New Testament, we must likewise reject the Epistle of S Clement, whose Name is found immediately before; therefore it must necessarily be inferred, that he intended to reject some other Books that were ascribed to S. Clement, to S Ignatius, and to S. Polycarp, and that the Word διδαχὴ ought to be understood with relation to these three last; for after having said διδαχὴ ἀποστόλων, The Doctrin of the Apostles, he adds, without specifying any thing else, of Clement, Ignatius and Polycarp, that is to say, the Books in like manner Entituled, The Doctrin of Clement, The Doctrin of Ignatius, and The Doctrin of Polycarp; this is the plain Sense of that Passage.

Thirdly, Altho' it were granted, that this Author had rejected the Epistles of S. Ignatius, which is not true, Of what weight could his Testimony be, against the Tradition that we have even now alledged?

Object. 2. It is said, That these Epistles were unknown to S. Justin, to S. Clement of Alexandria, and to all the ancient Writers before Eusebius.

Answ. Tho' this were true, yet there are many Books whose Truth is not called in question, that are mentioned by Eusebius alone, and by no other ancient Author; but besides, we have already shewn, That these Epistles are cited by S. Polycarp, S. Irenæus, and Origen, and that the Passages which they produce, are found in those Letters that we have.

Object. 3. The Style (say they) of the Epistles attributed to S. Ignatius, is very different from that of this Father; it is full of lofty Expressions and affected Epithets, which is very far from the simplicity of the Apostolical Times. They say moreover, that the Inscriptions of these Letters are long and full of pompous Epithets.

Answ. The Objections taken from the Style are of little Moment; for who hath informed these modern Criticks how S. Ignatius writ? However it is not true, that the Style of these Epistles is far from the simplicity of the ancient Christians; on the contrary, it is very simple, and extremely natural: It must be confessed indeed, that there are some Epithets and compound Words, but this agrees with the Asiatick Style, which is generally more florid than that of other Nations. It might also be added, That we find the like Epithets in the Epistle of S. Clement, and in other ancient Authors. The Inscriptions are not longer than S. Paul's Epistles, and in the Editions of Usher and Vossius they are not so large nor so magnificent as in the Vulgar, as well as in that of the Epistle to the Romans, recited by Metaphrastes.

Object. 4. This Objection is the first of those that are taken from the Contents of the Epistles themselves. It is said, That the Author writes against the Opinion of Saturninus, who believed, that Jesus Christ suffered only in Appearance; and of Theodotus, who imagined that our Saviour was a mere Man. Now these two Hereticks are later than S. Ignatius.

S. Ignatius asserted by Cerinthus and Ebion, Hereticks who lived in S. Ignatius's time.

Anſw. The firſt of theſe Errors was maintained by Simon Magus and Menander; the other was Object 5. This is the Principal, or the only Objection that hath any Difficulty, it is taken from an Expreſſion in the Epiſtle to the Magneſians, That the Eternal Word proceeded not from Silence, ἐκ σιγῆς προελθὼν, which ſeems to be ſaid purpoſely againſt the Errors of the Valentinians, who firſt uſed the Word Silence as a Term of Art.

Anſw. If there were no Anſwer to be given to this Objection, I ſhould rather chuſe to affirm, That this Paſſage is added, than merely on this accout to reject the Epiſtles that are acknowledged as Authentick by all the Ancients. There are many Books wherein ſome Editions have been made, which make them appear later than they really are; and we find ſome of this ſort in the Bible, in Homer, and in almoſt all the Eccleſiaſtical and Prophane Authors. But there is no neceſſity to make uſe of this Anſwer, ſince we have ſeveral others that are ſufficient to afford reaſonable Satisfaction to the Impartial and Judicious Reader.

For 1. It is not true that S. Ignatius here ſpeaks of the Silence of the Valentinians, or of any other Notion of the Hereticks that is like it; he only declares, That the Word of God is not like unto that of Men, which comes from, or follows after Silence. Theſe are his Words: There is but one God, who hath made himſelf manifeſt by his Son Jeſus Chriſt, who is the Eternal Word of God, that doth not proceed from Silence, and that is in all things like unto him that ſent him. The main Deſign of S. Ignatius in this Place, is to eſtabliſh our Saviour's Divinity againſt the Ebionites. He ſhews that he is God, becauſe he is the Word or the Speech of God, which being Eternal, is not preceded by Silence as that of Men. This Explication is Natural and liable to no Difficulty, though M. Daille hath thought fit to cenſure it as Impertinent; however, there is none that reads this Paſſage but will readily grant, that this Senſe is moſt proper and very conformable to the Intention of the ancient Writers, who endeavoured to demonſtrate the Difference that there is between the Word of God and that of Men. S. Auſtin, in his Homily concerning the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt, makes uſe of the very ſame Compariſon, without having any regard to the Valentinians; Quid eſt (ſays he) hoc Verbum? Quod dicturus antea non ſilebat, quo dicto, non ſiluit qui dicebat: And S. Fulgentius, lib. 3. ad Traſim. cap. 28. Idem Verbum nullo potuit coerceri ſilentio, quia ipſe Patris eſt ſempiterna locutio. That which is affirmed by M. Daille, that the Word προελθὼν was uſed by the Valentinians, may be true, but they oftener uſed the Word προβολὴν, neither is the Word προελθὼν peculiar to the Valentineans, it is commonly applied in Greek to ſignifie To go or come forth. Beſides, S. Ignatius ſays not ἐκ σιγῆς, but ἀπὸ σιγῆς, which may ſignifie, that the Word of God came not forth after Silence as that of Men.

2. Valentinus and his Diſciples did not affirm, That the Word came from Silence. The Word according to their fantaſtical Imagination, came from the Spirit and the Truth, and not from the Deep and from Silence.

3. The Opinion of Valentinus concerning Silence, was deviſed and propagated before his Time, for all that ſpeak of his Hereſie obſerve, that he revived the ancient Errors of the Gnoſticks. Euſebius declares in lib. 2. de Theolog. Eccleſ. cap. 9. That Simon Magus often talked of Silence among his Followers: Secundum impium (ſays he Hæreticorum principem, qui, impia dogmatizans, prænunciavit dicens, erat Deus, & Sige; which comes nearer to the Error, that is ſuppoſed to be confuted by S. Ignatius. S. Irenæus attributes this Opinion to all the Gnoſticks, as alſo Tertullian, S. Epiphanius, and S. Auguſtin. S. Gregory Nazianzen, orat. 23. and after him Ellas Cretenſis, charge it upon the Gnoſticks. This ſhews, that tho' the Author of the Epiſtle to the Magneſians ſhould have oppoſed the Error of thoſe that maintain that the Word proceeded from Silence, yet this doth not hinder but that it might have been written by S. Ignatius.

4. It is not certainly known, whether Valentinus had not already began to divulge his Errors even before the Death of S. Ignatius, ſince it is evident that S. Polycarp ſurvived this Arch-Heretick, and tho' he was not declared to be the Ring-leader of this Party till afterwards, yet he might even then have taught ſome of his pernicious Doctrins, to which S. Ignatius might allude. Theſe four Anſwers are ſolid, and every one of them ſeparately might be ſufficient to convince any Man; but the firſt in my Opinion is moſt natural.

Object. 6. In the Epiſtle to the Chriſtians of Smyrna, mention is made of certain viſible Princes that ſhall be judged, if they do not believe in Jeſus Chriſt. Now what probability is there (ſay they) that S. Ignatius ſhould ſpeak this of the Emperors and Kings of his Time?

Anſw. Why may not this be affirmed of the Unbelieving Emperors and Kings that were Contemporary with S. Ignatius? Since Tertullian and S. Juſtin have declared as much of the Emperors of their time, and that too in the Preſence of the Emperors themſelves. Moreover, it is not neceſſary to underſtand the Word Ἄρχοντες only of Emperors and Kings, ſince it may ſignifie all that are inveſted with any Authority.

Object. 7. In the Epiſtle to the Romans we find this Expreſſion, That he was led by the Leopards, which are Soldiers. This Explication (ſay they) is needleſs, and the compariſon is childiſh.

Anſw. And, I ſay, that the Similitude is very natural, and that the Explication was neceſſary. Bochart indeed affirms, That the Word Leopard was not uſed until the Time of Conſtantine; but how does he know it? It is in the Acts of the Paſſion of S. Perpetua and S. Felicitas; Ælius Spartianus, in the Life of Geta, thinks, that it was an old Word at the time when he wrote his Hiſtory.

Object. 8. In the Epiſtle to the Philadelphians, he ſpeaks of Penitents that were publickly received by the Church, whereas, (ſay they) in the firſt Ages, they that had once fallen were not afterward readmit-readmitted into the Communion of the Church; neither was there any Penance that ended in Reconciliation.

Answ. There is nothing in the Epistle to the Philadelphians concerning publick Penitence who had committed enormous Crimes; this is a meer Imagination. It is only declar'd, That they that had departed from the Church should obtain Pardon for their Fault, if they repented thereof by re-entring into it, that is to say, if they re-united themselves to the Church, from which they were separated. It is certain, that Hereticks and Schismaticks returning to the Church, were always readmitted. Beside, the Example of the Young Man who was reconciled by S. John, after he had been for a long time Captain of a Troop of Highway-men, and of many others, shew, that Penance was then in use; and Morinus evidently proves, That in the two first Centuries Absolution was granted more easily than in the third.

Object. 9. Onesimus Bishop of Ephesus, who died before S. Ignatius, is cited by Name in this Epistle.

Answ. This Onesimus is not he that was the Disciple of S. Paul, whom others affirm to have been Bishop of Berœa: And besides, even the Onesimus, mention'd by S. Paul, might be living when S. Ignatius wrote this Epistle, since that of S. Paul to Philemon was written from Rome about the Year of our Lord 64, therefore tho' Onesimus might be 26 Years old then, yet he could not have been above 70 Years of Age about the Year 107, or 108, when S. Ignatius compos'd these Works, which is no very extraordinary thing.

Object. 10. The Author of the Epistles attributed to S. Ignatius cites (as they say) several Apocryphal Books. He produceth in the Epistle to the Smyrneans a Sentence concerning Jesus Christ, taken from the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Who can believe this of S. Ignatius?

Answ. This is no unusual thing among the Ancients. S. Jerom gives us the same Passage of S. Ignatius, and Papias hath likewise quoted the Gospel according to the Hebrews. S. Clement, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, uses some Expressions as taken from the Holy Scriptures which are not there, as is observed by Photius, Cod. 126. S. Jude also cites the Book of Enoch. And besides, we cannot positively affirm, that the Gospel according to the Hebrews is cited by S. Ignatius, for he only produceth a Sentence, as knowing by Tradition that it was uttered by Jesus Christ. Thus S. Clement and S. Barnabas set down the Words of our Saviour, which they had either heard spoken by him, or had received from those by whom he was seen in the Flesh. Lastly, this Passage in S. Ignatius, is quoted by S. Jerom, as belonging to the Gospel according to the Hebrews; but Origen produces it out of the Book, entituled, The Doctrin of S. Peter, which shews that it was a very common Expression.

Object. 11. The ardent Desire of suffering Martyrdom, express'd by S. Ignatius, is (according to their Judgment) too excessive.

Answ. This hath been admired in the Epistle to the Romans, by the ancient Christians; the same Ardor appears likewise in S. Cyprian, in Germanicus a Martyr of Smyrna, and in many others. Certainly they must needs have but a very little Knowledge of Antiquity, who deny that the Primitive Christians were inflamed with a fervent Desire of suffering Martyrdom, and a Man shews that he is but meanly skill'd in Divinity, if he blames this Passion, when it neither does, nor says any thing that is Impudent or Indecent. And this is the Case of S. Ignatius, who, in testifying an earnest Desire of becoming a Martyr, uttered no Expressions but such as were very prudent, and very moderate: Let us read his Epistle to the Romans with the same Spirit as he wrote it, and we shall be so far from censuring it with the modern Criticks, that we shall admire it as much as the Ancients did.

Object. 12. S. Paul doth not mention the Ephesians in all his Epistles, as it is affirmed by the Author of the Epistle to the Ephesians: Therefore, &c.

Answ. He doth not say that S. Paul mention'd the Ephesians in all his Epistles, but throughout the whole Epistle that he wrote to them, (ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ) and compos'd altogether for their Use.

Object. 13. He declares that he saw Jesus Christ, which, S. Chrysostom says, is not true.

Answ. The Passage which is meant by them signifies only, that he knew and believed the real Incarnation of Jesus Christ. And after all, it was not impossible for S. Ignatius to have seen our Saviour.

Object 14. He gives an account of the Errors of certain Hereticks that abstain'd from the Eucharist; now there were not any such (says M. Daille) in the time of S. Ignatius, but afterwards when these Epistles were counterfeited.

Answ. Who hath informed him, that there were no such at the time when these Epistles were forged, and none before? These Hereticks are the Docetæ, who believed that Jesus Christ suffered only in Appearance, whose Heresie was very ancient.

Object. 15. He affirms, that the Romans might easily have deliver'd him from his Persecutor, why then did they not do it?

Answ. He doth not declare that they were absolutely able to deliver him, but only that he was ready to undergo Martyrdom, if they did not prevent it; that they might easily do whatever they thought fit, that is, use their Endeavours to rescue him from Death; but for his part, he could not find a better Opportunity of suffering for Jesus Christ.

Object. 16. He promiseth to send a Book to the Ephesians; but how could he do it when he was going to be put to Death?

Answ. His meaning is, That he would write a second Letter to them, Δεύτερον βιβλίον, a second ſmall Volume, upon two Conditions: Firſt, if God ſhould permit; and, Secondly, in caſe the Epheſians S. Ignatius ſhould want it. He might well hope to write another, having had the liberty to write the former.

Object. 17. There appears (ſay they) too much Arrogance and Affectation in theſe Epiſtles; the Author boaſts, that he hath the knowledge of Celeſtial Things, Se multa ſapere in Deo, and that he knew the Orders, Offices, and Stations of the Angels.

Anſ. All this might be affirmed by an ancient Biſhop, that had acquired the Reputation of S. Ignatius; all the Chriſtians might likewiſe boaſt, that they were endued with the knowledge of Celeſtial Things, and more eſpecially Biſhops. S. Ignatius immediately adds, after the Words cited in the Objection, Whatſoever Knowledge I have, I am not puffed up, but I meaſure my ſelf. He ſays nothing of Angels, but what had been ſaid before by S. Paul.

Object. 18. What reaſon is there, that S. Ignatius ſhould be ſent to Rome, to be expoſed to wild Beaſts in the Amphitheatre of that City, as if Perſons condemned to this ſort of Puniſhment, were not executed in all the great Towns, where Shews were exhibited? Why muſt he be brought thither by Sea and Land, a Way ſo far about?

Anſ. If we may believe the Hiſtory of the Martyrdom of S. Ignatius, he was ſent to Rome by the expreſs Command of the Emperor. However, if this were not true, it is ordained by the Law, Ad beſtias, tit. de Pœnis: That Criminals, condemned to be torn in pieces by wild Beaſts, ſhould be conveyed to Rome with the Emperor's Permiſſion; (which ought to be underſtood of conſiderable Malefactors;) ſuch were the Ring-leaders of Factions, and the Biſhops among the Chriſtians, eſpecially ſo famous a Biſhop as that of Antioch. The way through which he was conducted thither was the ordinary Road; for to come to Rome out of Syria, it is neceſſary to go to Smyrna or to Epheſus, afterward to croſs the Helleſpont, and ſo to Brunduſium, and from thence to Rome.

Object. 19. The laſt Objection, which is the cauſe why all the others were made, is taken from the different Orders of Biſhops and Prieſts, who are often diſtinguiſhed in the Epiſtles that are attributed to S. Ignatius; it is ſuppoſed that this diſtinction was not made until the third Age of the Church, from whence it is concluded that theſe Epiſtles are none of his.

Anſ. This Suppoſition being falſe, the whole Objection muſt conſequently fall of it ſelf, and tho' we had no other Proofs of the diſtinction of Biſhops and Prieſts in the ſecond Century, than the Epiſtles of S. Ignatius, yet we ought not to doubt thereof, and inſtead of inferring from thence, that theſe Letters are Counterfeit, it may well be concluded on the contrary, that the different Orders of Biſhops and Prieſts, were eſtabliſhed in S. Ignatius's time, ſince they are found in the Epiſtles that have been acknowledged by all the ancient Writers as certainly belonging to him: But there are many other Teſtimonies which make it appear, that there was a diſtinction between Biſhops and Prieſts even in the ſecond Age of the Church. Hegeſippus, for Example, gives us a Catalogue of the Biſhops of Jeruſalem; can this be ſaid to be a Liſt of the Prieſts of that City? Polycrates hath made another of the ancient Biſhops of Aſia, and Euſebius hath compiled that of the principal Cities throughout the whole World ſince the time of Jeſus Chriſt. Therefore there muſt of neceſſity have been always in the Church, Perſons called Biſhops, who preſided over Churches and Prieſts. The Martyrs of Lyons ſtyle Photinus Biſhop, and S. Irenæus Prieſt. The anonymous Author, cited by Euſebius againſt the Cataphrygians, diſtinguiſhes Prieſts from Biſhops. And there are infinite Numbers of Teſtimonies and Arguments, by which it may be proved, that there was ſome difference made between Prieſts and Biſhops even in the ſecond Century; but we ſhall inſiſt no longer on this Subject: And I am afraid that I have already tired the Reader's Patience in Refuting all the Objections that have been alledged againſt the Epiſtles of S. Ignatius, but I judged it neceſſary for the confirmation of their Authority.

It remains only, for the concluſion of our Critical Enquiries concerning theſe Epiſtles, to give ſome account of that to S. Polycarp. I know not what reaſon Uſher might have to reject it, ſince it plainly belongs to the number of the Seven that are mentioned by Euſebius, who clearly diſtinguiſheth it from that which was written to the Inhabitants of Smyrna. S. Jerom follows Euſebius in this particular, Et proprie (ſays he) ad Polycarpum. It is true, indeed, that here he cites a Paſſage of the Epiſtle to the Smyrneans, as appertaining to that of S. Polycarp, but this may only be an Error as to Matter of Fact, and it very frequently happens, that in Citations one Work is taken for another. A notable mark of the Truth of this Epiſtle is that in the Manuſcript of Florence, it is found to be different from the Vulgar Edition, as well as the ſix others that are eſteemed Authentick, whereas all the reſt which are forged do not vary in this Manuſcript from the ordinary Editions; this ſhews, that the Author of theſe Letters, is the ſame Perſon that made the Additions in the real Epiſtles of S. Ignatius, and that all thoſe that are purged from theſe Additions in the above-cited Manuſcript of Florence, and in the Edition of Voſſius, are undoubtedly genuine.

The Chronological Order of theſe ſeven Epiſtles is this: Firſt, it is certain that they were all written by S. Ignatius when he was in Bonds, and as he was conveyed from Antioch to Rome to be expoſed to wild Beaſts in that City. Secondly, it is likewiſe evident, that four of them were made at Smyrna, where he reſided, perhaps, for ſome conſiderable time; theſe four in the Edition of Voſſius and in S. Jerom, are put in this following Order; the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, to the Magneſians, to the Trallians, and the laſt to the Romans. It cannot be preciſely determined, whether this be the Order wherein they were written, or whether they were all compoſed at the ſame time. It is probable that the Epiſtle to the Romans is the laſt, becauſe he declares therein, that he wrote to the other Churches, and that he went chearfully to ſuffer Martyrdom: It ſeems to have been made when he was ready to depart, being wearied with the long ſtay of his Guards in that place; ſo great was his Paſſion to ſuffer Martyrdom.

He

He wrote the three others at his departure from Smyrna whil'ſt he ſtayed at Troas, from whence he was obliged to go to Naples. The Epiſtles to the Smyrneans and to S. Polycarp, ſeem to have been written together, and that to the Philadelphians laſt, becauſe it is expreſſed in the later, that the other Cities had ſent ſeveral Biſhops and Prieſts into Syria; and in the Epiſtle to S. Polycarp, he chargeth him to depute a fit Perſon for the Epiſcopal Function in that Country. However, there is a more probable conjecture to prove, that the two others were written after that to the Philadelphians, according to S. Jerom's Opinion, becauſe S. Ignatius declares therein, that he was ready to embark for Naples, and that this was the reaſon why he could not write to the other Churches, which ſhews, that the time of his departure drew near when he Compoſed them. He there mentions his Martyrdom, as a thing certainly to be accompliſh'd. S. Ignatius in his Epiſtle to the Chriſtians of Smyrna, confutes the Error of thoſe that denied that Jeſus Chriſt took upon himſelf the Human Nature; that he aſſumed a real Body, and that he actually ſuffered: He affirms, that thoſe Hereticks neglected the Poor and the Widows, and ſeparated themſelves from the Publick Prayers of the Church, and from the Euchariſt, becauſe they did not believe that it was the Body of Jeſus Chriſt, which had been nailed to the Croſs for our ſakes, and afterwards roſe again from the dead: He admoniſheth the Smyrneans to avoid Diviſions, as the Original of all Evil, to obey their Biſhop, to honour the Prieſts and Deacons, and to do nothing contrary to the Precepts of their Biſhop, without whoſe Aſſiſtance (ſaith he) it is not lawful even to Baptize, or to celebrate the Agapæ or Love-feaſts. S. Ignatius

In the Epiſtle to S. Polycarp, he gives excellent Counſels to this Biſhop; he adviſes him to endeavour to preſerve Union in his Church, to watch continually over his Flock, and to apply convenient Remedies to their Diſtempers, to reprove thoſe that offend, with Charity and Gentleneſs, to pray to God inceſſantly and to ſue for his Grace. In ſhort, to labour without Intermiſſion as a faithful Servant and Soldier of Jeſus Chriſt, who being inviſible and impaſſible, made himſelf viſible and mortal for our ſakes. He admoniſheth him to take care of the Widows, not to deſpiſe the meaneſt People, not to ſuffer any thing to be done without his Concurrence, and to do nothing himſelf but what is conformable to the Will of God, to enjoyn Women to pleaſe their Husbands, and Husbands to love their Wives, as alſo to recommend to them Chaſtity, accompanied with Humility, and to inform the Chriſtians, that their Marriage, when performed, according to the Will of God, ought to be ſolemnized in the Preſence of the Biſhop. Afterward he exhorts all the faithful, to ſubmit to their Biſhop, Prieſts and Deacons, and to work out their own Salvation. Laſtly, directing his Diſcourſe to S. Polycarp, he adviſeth him to call a Synod, and to ordain a Biſhop to be ſent into Syria.

In the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, he teſtifies his Joy in ſeeing Oneſimus their Biſhop, who came to him with a Deacon, named Burrus, and two other Believers; he admoniſheth them to live Holily, in perfect Unity among themſelves, and in Obedience to their Biſhop and Prieſts; he declares, that they that do not joyn with the Biſhop and are not preſent at the Publick Service of the Chriſtians, over which the Biſhops preſide, are without the Pale of the Church, and deprived of the Celeſtial Food. Afterward he warns them to beware of Hereſies, to avoid the Company of Hereticks, and to believe that Jeſus Chriſt is God, who was incarnate, that he is impaſſible as he is God, and paſſible as he is Man. Laſtly, after having commended their Piety, he exhorts them to pray to God, for all ſorts and conditions of Men, frequently to aſſemble together, to make Publick Prayers and Supplications, and inviolably to preſerve Faith and Charity; he affirms, that the Prince of this World, that is to ſay, the Devil, was ignorant of the Virginity of Mary, of her Child-birth, and of the Death of our Lord: He promiſeth to ſend to them a little Book, that is to ſay, a Letter concerning the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, and he intreats them to pray to God for him.

In the Epiſtle to the Magneſians, he exhorts the Chriſtians of that Church to be obedient to their Biſhop Damas, who came to ſee him, to do nothing without him, and to live in Unity one with another. He admoniſheth them not to ſuffer themſelves to be led away with vain Opinions, not to live like Jews but as Chriſtians, to believe in Jeſus Chriſt, who is the Word of God that doth not proceed from Silence, but was ſent by God the Father, and is our only hope. At laſt he deſires them to remember him in their Prayers.

In the Epiſtle to the Philadelphians, he Congratulates their Union, he exhorts them to avoid Corrupt Doctrins, and adviſes them not to follow thoſe that are the Abetters of Schiſms and Diviſions amongſt them, and to concur in every thing with their Biſhop. Laſtly, he refutes the Arguments of thoſe that refuſed to believe any thing, but what was written in the Old Teſtament, and declares that the Goſpel is the perfection of that which was prefigured in the Old Law.

In the Epiſtle to the Trallians, he commends their Union, and the Submiſſion and Reſpect that they ſhewed towards their Biſhop, Prieſts and Deacons, and exhorts them to perſevere in this Union, and to beware of Hereticks. He expounds the Orthodox Doctrins of the Catholick Church, that Jeſus Chriſt was born of the Virgin Mary, that he was really Man, that he actually ſuffered and died, and not in appearance, as ſome Hereticks ſaid.

Laſtly, In the Epiſtle to the Romans, he expreſſeth his Zeal, and ardent deſire of ſuffering Martyrdom, and entreats them not to take this glorious Crown from him, by preventing his being expoſed to wild Beaſts in the Amphitheatre of Rome.

Upon the whole matter, all theſe Epiſtles are full of very wholſom Precepts, and uſeful Exhortations; they are extremely worthy of a Chriſtian, of a Biſhop, and of a Martyr, and are all full of Warmth and Piety. One cannot read them, without perceiving every-where, that this Holy Man was animated with a Zeal truly Divine for the Salvation of Souls, for the fulfilling of the Law of Jeſus Chriſt, and for the preſervation of his Doctrin. In every thing that he ſays, he appears to be full of Love to our

our Saviour, of Affection towards his Brethren, of Care for the Diſcipline of the Church, and of Ardor for the Bleſſing of Peace. In ſhort, let Criticks that are of a contrary Opinion ſay what they pleaſe, I dare maintain that theſe Epiſtles deſerve to be well eſteemed, and to be admired by all thoſe who profeſs to have any Reſpect for Books of Piety.

S. POLYCARP.

S. Polycarp.

S. Polycarp (a) the Diſciple of S. John the Evangeliſt (b), and by him ordained Biſhop of Smyrna, was after the Deceaſe of this Apoſtle, eſteemed as the Head of the Churches of Aſia; (c) when he went to Rome, under the Pontificate of Anicetus about the Year 160 (d) he converted ſeveral Marcionites, and obliged them to return to the Boſom of the Church. He had ſeveral Conferences with Pope Anicetus, probably about ſeveral particular Cuſtoms of the Church of Rome; They debated the Queſtion of the Day when they ſhould keep Eaſter, which was afterwards diſputed under the Pontificate of Pope Victor, but each of them having judged it to be moſt convenient to obſerve his own Cuſtom, they amicably communicated one with another; and Anicetus to do the greater Honour to S. Polycarp, cauſed him to officiate in his own Church (e), and in his own Place.

This Holy Biſhop always abhorred Hereticks; and he uſed to tell a Story, That S. John having ſeen Cerinthus entring into a Bath, ſpeedily fled from thence without bathing himſelf therein, fearing leſt the Building ſhould fall becauſe Cerinthus the Enemy of the Truth was there; and he himſelf having once accidentally met with Marcion, who deſired that he would vouchſafe to take notice of him, he replied, I know that thou art the eldeſt Son of the Devil. He had a very particular Reſpect for the Memory of S. John; he took much delight in telling over the Diſcourſes that he formerly had with him, and with others that had ſeen Jeſus Chriſt in the Fleſh; he related every thing whereof he had been informed by them concerning his Doctrin and Miracles, and if he had heard any one maintaining any Principles contrary to the Apoſtolical Faith, he was wont to cry out, O God to what Times haſt thou reſerved me! and would immediately depart from the Place where he was. All this is recorded by S. Irenæus, and cited by Euſebius in the 14th Chapter of the fourth Book of his Hiſtory, and in Book 5. Chap. 20.

The illuſtrious Martyrdon of this Saint, which happened in the Year 167. after the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt on the 23d Day of February, is deſcribed after a moſt elegant manner in the Excellent Epiſtle of the Church of Smyrna to thoſe of Pontus, produced in part by Euſebius, in the Fifteenth Chapter of the fourth Book of his Hiſtory, and publiſhed entirely firſt by Archbiſhop Uſher, and afterward by Valeſius. They there give an account that S. Polycarp did not voluntarily ſurrender himſelf to his Executioners, but that he waited after the Example of our Saviour, 'till he was deliver'd into their Hands; that many Chriſtians ſuffered before him with admirable Conſtancy, all the Torments imaginable; that there was only one Quintus, who had perſuaded the others to preſent themſelves before the Tribunal of the Judge, that was overcome in the great Tryal, which ſhews (as it is obſerved in the ſame Epiſtle) that although we cannot but admire the Conſtancy of thoſe that have generouſly ſuffered, after they had preſented themſelves, yet their Conduct ought not to

(a) S. Polycarp] Halloixius ſays that S. Polycarp was originally of Smyrna; that he was born in the Eaſt, and that he was a Slave in his Youth, that he was bought by a certain Lady named Caliſtione, who gave him his Liberty, and cauſed him to be inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion; that ſhe afterward made him her Steward, and at laſt her Heir. He enlarged on the liberal Donations of this Lady; he affirms that Bucolas Biſhop of Smyrna was at firſt Tutor to S. Polycarp, and afterwards S. John; he writes much in the commendation of this Fictitious Bucolas, and declares, that he ordained S. Polycarp, who is the Angel of Smyrna. Theſe Tales and many others are extracted from the falſe Acts of the Life of S. Polycarp forged under the name of Pionius from the Menologium Græcorum by the modern Greeks.

(b) The Diſciple of S. John the Evangeliſt.] S. Irenæus tells us, lib. 3. cap. 3. That he was conſtituted Biſhop of Smyrna by the Apoſtles; and this could be done by no other than S. John.

(c) The head of the Churches of Aſia.] S. Jerome ſays that he was Princeps Eccleſiarum Aſiæ, that is to ſay, that he was the moſt conſiderable Biſhop, and (as I may ſay) ſucceeded in the Authority of S. John.

(d) About the year 160.] He died in the ſeventh Year of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius in the Year 167. he had then ſerved Jeſus Chriſt 86 Years, as he declares himſelf in the Acts of his Martyrdom; Thus he might have begun to ſerve God in the Year 81. after the Nativity of our Saviour, and then he might be Ten Years old. He converſed with all the Apoſtles, if we may believe the Teſtimony of S. Irenæus. S. John died in the Year of our Lord 101, and in the ſecond of Trajan; he was baniſhed in the fourteenth of Domitian, Anno Dom. 95. and returned into Aſia after the Death of this Emperor. Theſe Obſervations may ſerve to fix the Chronology of the Life of S. Polycarp. He was born about the Year of our Lord 70. he began to conſecrate himſelf to the ſervice of God in the year 81. At that Time he converſed with the Apoſtles, and became the Diſciple of S. John; after the return of this Apoſtle he was ordained Biſhop of Smyrna, however it is not preciſely known in what year, but this muſt of neceſſity have happened before the Year 101, ſince S. John died that Year: He undertook his Journey to Rome in the beginning of the Pontificate of Anicetus, who preſided in the from that See Year 158 to the Year 169.

(e) In his own Church] All theſe Circumſtances are related by S. Irenæus. There are ſome who affirm, That the Expreſſion of S. Irenæus ſignifies only, that Anicetus adminiſtred the Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper to S. Polycarp, but he would not thereby have done him much Honour, it may be better underſtood according to our Explication.

be approved, since it is condemned in the Gospel. That S. Polycarp being informed of what had happened, determined to remain in the City; but being constrained to retire into a little House in the Country, he there continually prayed to God Night and Day for all the Churches, and for all Men; that three Days before he was apprehended, being fervent in Prayer, he saw a Vision, wherein he perceived that his Bedstead was all on Fire, which caused him immediately to foretel that he should ere long be burnt alive; that although he was removed from the Place of his Abode, yet he was seized by the Soldiers of the Provost-Marshal, led into the City, and brought before the Pro-Consul, who endeavoured to perswade him to swear by the Genius of Cæsar, and to curse Jesus Christ, whereupon Polycarp being encouraged by a Voice from Heaven, openly declares that he was a Christian; That the Pro-Consul having caused his Profession to be proclaimed with a loud Voice, all the People who were in the Amphitheatre, cryed out, That he should be burnt alive: That being tied to a Stake, he prayed to God, and concluded with Blessing the most Holy Trinity; that when the Fire was kindled it made a kind of a Circle round about the Body of this holy Martyr, who remained in the midst thereof without receiving the least Hurt; And lastly, that the Pagans perceiving that the Fire could not burn or consume him, sent an Officer to run him through with a Sword; and would not suffer the Christians to carry off his Body, which continued whole and intire, lest (as these deluded Heathens affirm'd) they should adore it in stead of Jesus Christ. Fools as they were (these are the Words of the Epistle of the Church of Smyrna) they did not know that the Christians worship none but Jesus Christ because he is the Son of God, and only honour the Martyrs who are his Disciples and Followers, because of the Love which they testifie to have for their King and Master. The Centurion having caused the Body of this Martyr to be burnt, the Christians carried away his Bones being more valuable than the most precious Stones, and more pure than Gold, which they buried in a place where they assembled together, to celebrate with joy and chearfulness the Day of his Martyrdom, thus honouring the Memory of those that have fought gloriously for the defence of their Religion, and to confirm and instruct others by such Examples. These were the Notions of the Primitive Church concerning the Respect due to Martyrs and their Relicks, explained after a clear and exact manner, which are as far removed from the Aspersions that are cast on them by the Protestants of our Time, as from the Superstition of some Roman Catholicks.

S. Irenæus assures us, in his Letter to Florinus, that S. Polycarp wrote several Epistles to the neighbouring Churches to confirm them in the Christian Faith, and others to some of his Brethren to encourage and exhort them to persevere in the Truth. We have at present but one single Epistle written by him to the Philippians, and particularly cited by S. Irenæus, Eusebius, S. Jerom and Photius, (f) who have all commended and approved it as really belonging to this Primitive Bishop. And it cannot be doubted that it is the same with that which was extant in the time of these ancient Writers; wherefore I shall make no difficulty to affirm, That it would be great Rashness to reject it, as M. Blondel and M. Daille have done; for by whom have these Modern Authors been informed that this Letter was not composed by S. Polycarp? What Reasons can they alledge? Do they know S. Polycarp's style better than S. Irenæus his Disciple? Have they a greater insight into this matter than Eusebius, S. Jerom, or Photius? Besides, if the Arguments produced by them had any Weight, one might set them in the Balance with the Authority of these ancient Writers, but they are so weak that they scarcely deserve to be mentioned. This Epistle (says M. Daille) is disallowed by Nicephorus in his Stichometria: This is indeed an Authority of great Moment fit to be set against the Testimony of Eusebius, S. Jerom and Photius! It is not certainly known by whom this Stichometria was composed, and altho' we should allow that it was written by Nicephorus, yet he is a late Author, and of very little Authority in comparison of those that we have now cited. After all, he doth not reject the Epistle of S. Polycarp, but only a certain Work that was attributed to him, and the Book of the Doctrin of S. Polycarp (as we have elsewhere observed) ought to be thereby understood, after the same manner as the Book of the Doctrin of S. Ignatius, and the Book of the Doctrin of S. Clement. Otherwise we must likewise disallow the Epistle of S. Clement to the Corinthians, whose Name is found among the Apocryphal Writings immediately before that of S. Polycarp. It is certain also, that there was extant a Book, entituled, The Doctrin of S. Polycarp, as well as one called, The Doctrin of S. Clement, since it is cited by Maximus, Bede, Ado, Usuardus, Metaphrastes, Pachymeres, Honorius and Nicephorus Calistus.

S. Polycarp.

[There is nothing in this Declaration of the Church of Smyrna which the Protestants ever disallowed: They are far from thinking that those are not worthy of extraordinary Honours here below, who are so peculiarly graced by God himself. But yet if they are jealous of the Honour which is only due to Jesus Christ, and afraid of doing any thing which may derogate from it, they think this to be a thing which needs no excuse; since we have a positive command for the one, whereas the other is wholly discretionary: And we can never Err in assigning the Bounds of that Respect which is due to Saints and Martyrs, if we consider that their great Honour arises from their inviolable fidelity to our common Master; and that the chiefest reason why the Church at first commanded the anniversaries of Saints and Martyrs to be observed with so much splendor, was to encourage the rest of the Faithful to imitate them as they imitated Jesus Christ.]

(f) By S. Irenæus, Eusebius, S. Jerom and Photius] S. Irenæus in lib. 3. contr. Hæres. says thus, There is extant an Epistle of Polycarp to the Christians of Philippi, which is extremely accurate, and very proper to shew the Character of the Faith, and the Doctrin of the Truth, to those that take any Care of their Salvation. Eusebius adds, in lib. 4. cap. 14. That S. Polycarp, in this Epistle, makes use of some Testimonies taken from the First Epistle of S. Peter; These References are found in that which we now have under his Name. S. Jerom affirms, that this Epistle was read in the Assembly of the Faithful of Asia. See Photius, Cod. 126.

M. Daille

S. Polycarp.

M. Daille perceiving the weakneſs of his Objection againſt the Epiſtle of S. Polycarp, is obliged to aſſert, that tho' the firſt Part is genuine, yet the ſecond, wherein he mentions thoſe of S. Ignatius, is ſuppoſititious: And to prove this he ſhews, that the Epiſtle was concluded with the Invocation of Jeſus Chriſt, and that which follows ought to be eſteemed as an addition made afterwards, being of no Authority. But M. Daille cannot maintain this Hypotheſis without rejecting the Teſtimony of Euſebius and Photius, who cite this ſecond Part, and more eſpecially that which relates to the Letters of S. Ignatius; neither doth it ſignifie any thing to urge that the Epiſtle was concluded before, becauſe it is evident, that the Invocation of Jeſus Chriſt is frequently inſerted in the middle of an Epiſtle, which is nevertheleſs continued after this ſort of Concluſion; this is very often to be found in S. Paul's Epiſtles, particularly in the fifteenth Chapter of his Epiſtle to the Romans. The only Objection alledged by M. Daille that hath any manner of Probability is this; it is manifeſt (ſays he) that the Author who wrote that part wherein S. Ignatius is mentioned, ſuppoſeth him to be yet living, ſince he requires the Philippians to inform him concerning the tranſactions of S. Ignatius, and of thoſe that were with him; De ipſo Ignatio & de iis qui cum eo ſunt (g) quæ certius agnoveritis ſignificate. But if we obſerve theſe Words, it will appear, that they might as well be written after the Death of S. Ignatius as when he was alive, and that S. Polycarp only deſired an account of the particular Circumſtances of the Life and Martyrdom of that eminent Biſhop, which were not unknown to the Chriſtians of Philippi, through which City he had paſſed in his Journey to Rome.

This Epiſtle being full of admirable Counſels, Precepts and Exhortations taken from the Holy Scriptures, is written with a great deal of Elegancy and Simplicity, as Photius has obſerved already. It was Printed in Latin together with the Epiſtles of S. Clement and S. Ignatius in the years 1498, 1502, 1520, 1536, and 1550. at Baſil in 1579. at Colen in 1530. at Paris in 1569. with the Works of S. Irenæus, at Ingolſtadt in 1546. at Paris in 1562, and at ſeveral other times: It is likewiſe inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum ſet forth by La Bigne. Beſides, it was Printed at Colen in 1557. of the Tranſlation of Perionius, with the Works of Dionyſius the Areopagite, and in 1585, with them and the Epiſtles of S. Ignatius. Halloixius firſt publiſhed part thereof in Greek from a Manuſcript which Sirmondus had tranſcribed from a Copy written by Turrianus. Uſher hath printed it in Greek and Latin afterwards with the Epiſtles of S. Ignatius in the year 1644. Cotelerius put it into his Collection of the ancient Records of the Fathers. Moderus hath likewiſe procured it to be reprinted at Helmſtadt; and laſtly it was Printed in Holland in 1687. with a Diſſertation concerning the Life and Writings of S. Polycarp, in a Collection of Treatiſes, entituled, Varia Sacra, ſet forth by M. Le Moine.

There are ſeveral other Works attributed to this ancient Biſhop, as an Epiſtle to S. Dionyſius the Areopagite, quoted by Suidas, and a Treatiſe concerning the Union of S. John, which is pretended to be kept in the Abby of Fleury; ſome Paſſages or Notes on the Goſpels are likewiſe produced for his, which are taken from the Catena of Feuardentius under the Name of Victor Capuenſis. But it is very probable that theſe Tracts are fictitious. S. Jerome in his 28th Epiſtle to Bæticus declares, that it was commonly reported in his Time, that the Authentick Works of Joſephus, Polycarp and Papias, were brought to him, but that it was a falſe Rumor.

(g) Qui cum eo ſunt] It is expreſſed in the Greek, Τῶν μετ' αὐτοῦ, that is to ſay, they that had been with him, and who followed him when he paſſed through Philippi.

PAPIAS.

Papias.

Papias, Biſhop of Hierapolis (a) a City of Aſia, was a Diſciple either of S. John the Evangeliſt (b), or of ſome other Perſon who bore the ſame Name: He wrote five Books, entituled, The Explications of our Lords Diſcourſes, which were extant even in the Time of Trithemius; but at preſent we have only ſome few Fragments in the Writings of the ancient and modern

(a) Hierapolis.] There are ſeveral Cities of that Name, but this lies betwen Phrygia and Lydia near Laodicea, being famous for Springs of hot Water.

(b) A Diſciple of S. John the Evangeliſt] S. Irenæus, lib. 5. cap. 33. Hæc Papias Joannis auditor Polycarpi contubernalis. S. Jerom, Ep. 29. ad Theodorum: Refert Irenæus vir Apoſtolicorum temporum & Papiæ auditoris Evangeliſtæ Joannis Diſcipulus. In the Martyrologies of Beda, Uſuardus, and Ado, as alſo in the Roman, in the Works of Trithemius and Andreas Cæſarienſis, in Anaſtaſ. Sinait. lib. 7. in Hexamer. Oecumen. in Act. cap. 2. he is called, The Diſciple of S. John the Evangeliſt. Euſebius on the contrary reciting a Paſſage of Papias in Hiſt lib. 3. cap. ult. wherein he ſpeaks of two Johns, obſerves that the Maſter of Papias was not John the Evangeliſt, but the other John called the Elder. His Reaſon, or rather Conjecture, is, That this Author in the beginning of his Books doth not aſſure us, That he was the Diſciple of the Apoſtles, or that he had learn'd any thing from them, but only that he had received that which he declares from thoſe that were familiar with the Apoſtles, and who knew them. However, in the Paſſage alledged by Euſebius to prove his Aſſertion, Papias only affirms, That he interrogated the ancient Men who had ſeen the Apoſtles, demanding of them, What ſays Andrew? What ſays Philip? What ſays S. John? What ſays John the Elder? Therefore if it may be inferred from thence, that he was not the Diſciple of S. John the Evangeliſt, becauſe he informs us, that he enquired of thoſe who had ſeen him what were the Opinions of this Apoſtle; it may as well be inferred that he was not the Diſciple of John the Elder. However, the Words of Papias may be inter-

Authors. He was the first that promoted the famous Opinion, or rather Dotage of Antiquity (c), concerning the Temporal Reign of Jesus Christ, which they fansied should happen on Earth a thousand Years before the Day of Judgment, when the Elect should be gathered together after the Resurrection in the City of Jerusalem, and should enjoy there all the Delights imaginable during these thousand Years, Papias.

S. Irenæus produceth a Fragment taken from the fourth Book of Papias, wherein he endeavours to prove this Opinion by a Passage of the Prophet Isaiah: And Eusebius having cited a Paragraph of his Preface to these Books, in which he shews the great Care that he took to be informed of the Doctrin of the Apostles, by interrogating their Disciples, adds; That this Author hath set down many things, which he pretended to have learnt by an unwritten Tradition, of which sort there are several new Parables and Instructions of our Saviour Jesus Christ, that are not contained in the Gospels, together with other fabulous Histories, among which we may reckon the Reign of Jesus Christ on Earth during the space of a thousand Years after the Resurrection of the Body; that which led him into this Error (continueth Eusebius) is that he understood the Discourses and Instructions of the Apostles too literally, not understanding that a mystical Sense ought to be given to this sort of Expressions, and that the Apostles only made use of them as illustrations; for he was a Man of a very mean Capacity, as appears from his Books, who nevertheless gave occasion to many of the ancient Fathers, and among others to Irenæus, to follow this Error, which they maintained by the Authority of Papias. Eusebius in the same Place relates two Miracles, the account whereof Papias declares that he had received from the Daughter of Philip the Deacon, who resided at Hierapolis; That a dead Man was raised at that Time, and that Barsabas sirnamed Justus, Elected to be an Apostle, together with S. Matthias, having swallowed deadly Poison, was not hurt by it: Moreover he assures us, That Papias had collected in his Books divers Explications on some Words of Jesus Christ composed by Aristion a Disciple of the Apostles, and the Traditions likewise of the venerable Elder S. John; but omitting these things, he is content only to recite a Passage wherein this ancient Writer affirms, That S. Mark compiled his Gospel from what he had heard S. Peter tell of the Actions and Discourses of Jesus Christ, and this is the reason that he hath not observ'd an Historical Method; That S. Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew, and that it was afterward Translated into Greek. Lastly, Eusebius affirms, that he cited the first Epistles of S. Peter and of S. John, and that he explained the History of a Woman that was accused before our Saviour of several Crimes, which was found in the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Thus we have given an account of all that is recorded by Eusebius concerning Papias. Andreas Cæsariensis and Oecumenius have likewise produced some Passages (d) of his Works in their Commentaries on the Holy Scripture, but it is not certain whether they were Papias's or no.

The Judgment that ought to be given concerning him, is that which hath been already given by Eusebius, that is to say; That he was a good Man, but very credulous, and of very mean Parts, who delighted much in hearing and telling Stories and Miracles. And since he was exceedingly inquisitive, and inclined to believe every thing that was told him, it is not to be admired that he hath divulged divers Errors and extravagant Notions, as the Judgments of the Apostles, and hath given us fabulous Narratives for real Histories, which shews, that nothing is so dangerous in Matters of Religion, as lightly to believe, and too greedily to embrace, all that hath the Appearance of Piety, without considering in the first place how true it is (e).

preted after such a manner, as to signifie nothing else, but that he was careful whensoever he happened to meet with any one that had familiarly conversed with the Apostles, to desire of them a particular account of their Doctrin or Judgment; Which makes me believe, that he was the Disciple of the Evangelist, and this is confirmed by the Authority of S. Irenæus, who certainly means S John the Evangelist; for S. Polycarp was his Disciple, and he asserts that Papias was the Companion of Polycarp, Polycarpi contubernalis.

(c) The famous Opinion, or rather Dotage of Antiquity.] This was the Opinion of S. Justin, Athenagoras, S. Irenæus, S. Clement, Tertullian, Lactantius, and many other ancient Writers.

(d) Andræas Cæsariensis and Oecumenius have likewise produced some Passages.] Andræas Cæsariensis, in Serm. 12. in Apocalyps. cites a Passage of Papias wherein he says, that the disposing of sublunary Things was committed to the Care of the Angels that are round the Earth, but that they did not perform their Duty as they ought to do; Oecumenius upon the Acts observes, That Papias believed that Judas did not end his Life by hanging, but that he was run over with a Chariot, which is the Opinion of Theophylact, Euthymius and Oecumenius.

(e) Without considering in the first place how true it is.] This is conformable to an excellent Passage of S. Augustin: Non sit Religio nostra in Phantasmatibus nostris; melius est enim quælecunque verum quam omne quicquid pro arbitrio fingi potest, melior est vera stipula, quam lex inani cogitatione pro suspicantis voluntate formata: De ver. Rel. c. 55.

QUADRATUS and ARISTIDES.

Quadratus and Ariſtides.

THeſe two Defenders of the Faith preſented Apologies for Chriſtians to the Emperor Adrian: The firſt was a Diſciple of the Apoſtles (a), and it is ſaid, that he had the Gift of Prophecy (b). Euſebius aſſures us, That the Apology of this Author was extant in his Time, and that it ſhewed the Genius of this Man, and the true Doctrin of the Apoſtles. But we have only a ſmall Fragment produced by Euſebius in the fourth Book of his Hiſtory, chap. 3. wherein the Author declares, That none could doubt of the Truth of the Miracles of Jeſus Chriſt, becauſe the Perſons that were healed or raiſed from the Dead by him, had been ſeen, not only when he wrote his Miracles, or whilſt he was upon Earth, but even a very great while after his Death: So that there are many (ſays he) who were yet living in our Time (c).

We have alſo loſt the Apology of Ariſtides, which was preſerved till S. Jerom's Time. This Ariſtides was a very Eloquent Athenian Philoſopher, (ſays the ſame S. Jerom) who when he changed his Religion, did not alter his Profeſſion, and preſented unto the Emperor Adrian, at the ſame Time as Quadratus, a Volume in form of an Apology, wherein he produced the Proofs of our Religion, and being ſtill extant, ſhews the Learned how excellent a Writer this Author was. The ſame S. Jerom obſerves in another Place, that this Work was full of Philoſophical Notions, and that it was afterward imitated by S. Juſtin.

(a) A Diſciple of the Apoſtles.] Hieron. Ep. 84. ad Magnum. This appears from the Fragment that is ſet down afterward. We muſt not confound this Quadratus with another of this Name who was Biſhop of Athens, and the Succeſſor of Publius mentioned by Euſebius, Lib. 4. cap. 23. S. Jerom makes no diſtinction between them in his Catalogue, nor in his Epiſtle to Magnus; and they are likewiſe confounded in the Menologium Græcorum: But Valeſius clearly proves that they are different; for the firſt was not a Biſhop, as appears from the Teſtimony of Euſebius, Lib. 3. c. 37. and Lib. 4. c. 3. Beſides, the former Quadratus was a Diſciple of the Apoſtles, and lived in the time of the Emperor Adrian, whereas the other never ſaw the Apoſtles, as being Contemporary with Dionyſius Corinthius under the Reign of Antoninus. And it cannot be doubted, but that it was the Elder who preſented the Apology to Adrian.

(b) It is ſaid, that he had the Gift of Prophecy] Euſebius, Lib. 3. cap. 37. aſſures us, That he was endued with the Gift of Prophecy, as were the Daughters of Philip the Deacon; and Miltiades in Euſeb. Lib. 5. cap. 17. reckons him in the Number of the Prophets of the New Teſtament.

(c) In our Time.] Euſebius Theſſalonicenſis cites this Author againſt Andreas Cretenſis, apud Phot. Cod. 335. Bede, who hath confounded him with the Biſhop of Athens, declares, that he determined that there was no Meat from which a Chriſtian ought to abſtain, which is likewiſe Recorded in the Menologium Græcorum upon the 21*ſt* day of September.

AGRIPPA.

Agrippa.

AT the ſame Time, and under the Reign of the ſame Emperor, lived Agrippa, Sirnamed Caſtor, a Learned Man, who wrote a very convincing Book againſt the Hereſie of Baſilides, in which he confuted the Errors of this Heretick, after he had diſcovered them, and detected all his Devices and Frauds. He obſerves, (ſays Euſebius) that Baſilides, had written twenty four Books on the Goſpels, and that he forged ſeveral Prophets that never were in the World, to whom he attributed extraordinary Names, ſuch as Barſabas and Barcoph, on purpoſe to amuſe the Minds of his Auditors. He affirmed alſo, That this Heretick taught his Followers, That it was a thing indifferent to eat Sacrifices that were offered unto Idols; That it was lawful to renounce the Faith in the Time of Perſecution; and that, in imitation of Pythagoras, he impoſed Silence on his Diſciples for the ſpace of five Years. We have no further Knowledge of this Author, ſince his Book is loſt, and I know not whether we have any conſiderable Fragment of it left.

HEGESIPPUS.

Hegeſippus.

HEgeſippus appeared in the World a little after the Death of the Apoſtles, about the beginning of the Second Age of the Church (a). He left the Jewiſh Religion, in which he was born (b), to Embrace that of the Chriſtians; he took a Journey to Rome under the Pontificate of Pope Anicetus, and remained there until that of Eleutherus (c), that is to ſay, from the Year 165, until the Year 180, or thereabouts; he is the firſt Author that hath Compoſed an entire Body of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which he divided into five Books (d), wherein he relates the principal Occurrences which happened in the Church from Jeſus Chriſt's Paſſion to his own Time. This Book was written in a ſimple Style (e), becauſe he reſolved (ſays S. Jerom) to imitate the Phraſes and Dialect of thoſe, whoſe Lives he wrote. We have only ſome few Fragments left, which are inſerted by Euſebius in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. Hegeſippus.

and

The firſt Fragment extracted from the Writings of Hegeſippus, and produced by Euſebius in the ſecond Book of his Hiſtory, Chap. 23. contains a Relation of the Martyrdom of S. James Biſhop of Jeruſalem, but his way of telling it looks more like a fabulous Narrative than a true Hiſtory (f).

The ſecond Fragment of Hegeſippus is likewiſe to be found in the Hiſtory of Euſebius, Book 3. Chap. 20. He therein informs us, That the Emperor Domitian cauſed a ſtrict Search to be made after the Poſterity of David, who were the Children of S. Jude the Brother of our Lord, but that perceiving them to be extremely poor, and very far from being able to make any Attempt againſt the Empire, he ſoon diſmiſſed them without any Moleſtation (g).

The third is alſo found in the ſame Book, Ch. 32. where he gives an account of the Martyrdom of Simeon the Son of Cleophas Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who was crucified under the Reign of Trajan, and adds, That hitherto the Church had remained a Virgin (h), but that after the Death of thoſe that had heard and ſeen Jeſus Chriſt in the Fleſh, the firſt Hereſiarchs began openly to divulge their deteſtable Errors.

The fourth Fragment concerning Antinous, whom Adrian cauſed to be regiſtred among the Gods is cited, Book 4. Chap. 8. only to ſhew that Hegeſippus lived after the Time of that Emperor.

The fifth is in Book 4. Chap. 22. where Hegeſippus ſpeaks of his Journey to Rome in paſſing through Corinth, where he ſaw Primus the Biſhop of that City; he deſcribes the Election of Simeon in the room of S. James, and makes mention of a certain Perſon named Thebutis, whom he affirms to have been the firſt that rent the Church by his Errors, being incenſed becauſe he was not made a Biſhop; he obſerves, that this Thebutis had collected his Doctrins from the ſeven Sects that were among the Jews, as well as the other Hereticks.

Euſebius adds, That Hegeſippus produced divers Paſſages out of the Hebrew and Syriack Goſpels, and that he ſpeaks of ſeveral Traditions of the Jews; it is likewiſe obſerved by him, That he cites the Proverbs of Solomon, as well as S. Irenæus, under the Name of The Book of Wiſdom, and that he mentions certain Apocryphal Writings compoſed by the Hereticks of his Time. This is all that is extant of the Five Books of the Hiſtory of Hegeſippus, the Order of which is alſo unknown to us; but, as far as we can judge by the remaining Fragments of this Work, it was not very exact, and was rather filled with feigned and fabulous Relations, than with ſolid and real Hiſtories.

We have beſides, under the Name of Hegeſippus an Hiſtory of the Wars of the Jews, and of the taking of the City of Jeruſalem, divided into five Books, which hath been often publiſhed, and particularly at Colen with the Notes of Galterius, in the Year 1559. It was likewiſe printed in a Collection of the Works of the Fathers, ſet forth by Laurentius de la Barre, A. D. 1583. as alſo in the Bibliotheca Patrum of La Bigne, &c. But it is certain that this Work does not belong to Hegeſippus, it being evident that it was written by an Author who lived after the Reign of Conſtantine the Great. For firſt, the Hiſtory of Hegeſippus was merely Eccleſiaſtical, whereas this is an Hiſtory of the Jews copied out in Part from Joſephus. Secondly, We do not find therein any of the Paſ-

(c) And remained there until that of Eleutherus.] So S. Jerom ſays; but Hegeſippus only declares, That he came to Rome, and reſided there during the Pontificate of Anicetus, whoſe Deacon Eleutherus was at that time; that Soter ſucceeded Anicetus, and Eleutherus Soter. This ſhews, that he lived in the Time of the Antonines, and wrote his Hiſtory at leaſt under the Pontificate of Eleutherus. In the Chronicle of Alexandria it is obſerved, that he died under the Reign of the Emperor Commodus.

(d) Which he divided into five Books.] According to the Teſtimony of Euſebius and S. Jerom; this Work was entituled, ὑπομνήματα ἐν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν πραξεων, Apud Euſeb. & Gobarum apud Phot. c. 232.

(e) This Work was written in a ſimple Style.] This Euſebius, Lib. 4. c. 8. and S. Jerom de Script. Eccleſ. both bear witneſs.

(f) But his way of telling it, looks more like a fabulous Narrative than a true Hiſtory.] Scaliger proves by many Arguments that this Relation is fabulous, ſome whereof are not very ſolid, but others are ſo convincing, that the Anſwers of Halloixius and Petavius are not ſufficient to give Satisfaction to any Man of a ſound Judgment; for to omit the particular Circumſtances of the Life of S. James recited by Hegeſippus, which cannot be true; as that he alone was permitted to enter into the Sanctuary, becauſe he was not cloathed in Woollen but in Linnen, and other Things of the like nature; the account of his Martyrdom being contrary to that of Joſephus, the verity of whoſe Hiſtory was never ſuſpected by any, furniſhes us with Arguments againſt which it is almoſt impoſſible to diſpute. See Valeſius his Notes on Euſebius.

(g) He ſoon diſmiſſed them without any moleſtation.] This Narrative is likewiſe accuſed of Falſhood by Scaliger, but his Arguments are not ſo conſiderable as thoſe which he urges againſt the former: The Anſwers of Halloixius and Valeſius are indeed of ſome Weight; yet I can ſcarcely perſwade my ſelf of the Truth of this Relation.

(h) Hitherto the Church had remained a Virgin.] Not but that the Church always remains in this ſtate. Therefore the meaning of Hegeſippus is this; That until that time ſhe was not torn in pieces by Hereſies and Schiſms, and that all thoſe who were called by the Name of Chriſtians, had one and the ſame Faith, whereas afterward the Arch-Hereticks divided the Profeſſors of Chriſtianity, rent the Church, and propagated their pernicious Errors. It were a manifeſt Abuſe of this Paſſage to interpret it otherwiſe.

Hegeſippus. ſages of the true Hegeſippus that are produced by Euſebius. Thirdly it is Recorded by this Author, in Book 3. C. 5. that the City of Antioch, which was reckoned as the third in Order and Dignity among thoſe of the Roman Empire, became the ſecond ever ſince the City of Byzantium was called by the Name of Conſtantinople. It is plain therefore, that the Author of this Book lived after Conſtantine. Some with Gronovius attribute it to S. Ambroſe, by reaſon of the Conformity of its Style to that of the Writings of this Father; others, as Labbee, are of Opinion, that it is a Greek Verſion; and laſtly, others, as Voſſius and Miræus, affirm, That this Book was Compiled ſince the Time of Nicephorus Phocas, that is to ſay, after the tenth Century, becauſe the Author diſcourſing concerning the City of Antioch, declares, that it formerly belonged to the Perſians, and that at preſent it was a Bulwark againſt them, which may be underſtood of the taking of this City by the Emperor Phocas. However it be, this Author is only a Tranſcriber, or an Interpreter of Joſephus, who hath made a kind of an imperfect Epitome of his Hiſtory. The Latin Interpreter, who hath Tranſlated it from Joſephus, gave it the Title of Joſeppi or Joſippi, and the Tranſcribers not underſtanding this Word, have ſubſtituted Igiſippi or Egeſippi in its Room, as it appears from ſome ancient Manuſcripts.

Father Mabillon obſerves in his Voyage into Italy, that he found in the Ambroſian Library at Milan an ancient Manuſcript of this Book, wherein it is ſaid, that it was Tranſlated by S. Ambroſe, in the Titles whereof it is ſometimes written Joſippi; he ſaw another likewiſe at Turin that appear'd to be about 700 years old, and that was entituled Egeſippi. If theſe Manuſcripts are as ancient as Mabillon would have them to be, this Book muſt of neceſſity be of greater Antiquity than Voſſius and Miræus have imagined. It was Printed by it ſelf at Paris in the Years 1511, 1589, 1610; and afterwards inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

S. JUSTIN.

S. Juſtin. S. Juſtin was a Native of the City of Sichem, otherwiſe called Naples of Paleſtine (a), which even at this Day bears the Name of Napolous; his Father was called Priſcus Bacchius; he was a Græcian by Birth and Religion (b), but having in vain ſought for the Knowledge of the true God among all the Sects of the Pagan Philoſophers, (tho' he chiefly adhered to the Platonick) was converted to the Chriſtian Faith in a private Conference that happened between him and a certain ancient Man unknown to him, as himſelf tells the Story in his Dialogue with Tryphon; however being turned Chriſtian he did not lay aſide his Habit nor his Profeſſion, but added to his Skill in the Heathen Philoſophy, a profound Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. He was at Rome when the Perſecution, that was raiſed under the Reign of Antoninus Pius the Succeſſor of Adrian, began to break forth, where he compoſed an excellent Apology in behalf of the Chriſtians, and Dedicated it to the Emperor, and to the Cæſars his Sons (c), about the Year 150 after the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt (d).

(a) Of the City of Sichem, otherwiſe called Naples of Paleſtine.] In Dialog. 2. a p. 212. ad p. 223. Juſt. Apol. 2. p. 53. Ιυστινος Πειθων τῳ Βακχειῳ τῳ ἀπὸ Φλαυιας νεας πολεως ἡ Συριας, Juſtin the Son of Priſcus Bacchius of Flavia, the new City, or Naples of Syria. This was one of the principal Cities of the Samaritans, and it hath had four Names. The firſt and moſt ancient is that of Sichem; thus it is uſually called in the Holy Scripture, and in the Works of Joſephus. The Second is Maboortha, or Mamortha, in Joſeph. Lib. 5. de bello Judaico, c. 4. and in Plin. Lib. 5. Nat. Hiſt. c. 13. The Third is Naples, and the Fourth is Flavia, which Name it has had ever ſince one of the Emperors (it is not certainly known, whether it were Veſpaſian or Domitian) cauſed a Colony of the Greeks to be Tranſported thither. Moreover this Name is to be found, not only in the Paſſage of S. Juſtin, that we have even now cited, but alſo in ancient Medals and particularly in one of Domitian's Φ ΒΙ-ΟΠΟΛΕΙΤΩΝ ΣΑΜΑΡΕΙΤΩΝ.

(b) He was a Greek by Birth and Religion.] S. Epiphanius ſeems to believe, that S. Juſtin was of the Extraction and Religion of the Samaritans, when he ſays, that he paſſed from the Samaritan to the Chriſtian Religion, ἀπὸ Σαμαρίτων εἰς Χριστὸν πεπιστευκέναι. But when S. Juſtin himſelf mentions his Converſion, he declares, that he had been Educated in the Greek Religion, and that having diſcovered the Falſhood thereof he readily embrac'd the Chriſtian. It is true indeed that he calls the Samaritans in his Dialogue, and in his firſt Apology, his Stock, his Nation, and the like: But it was becauſe he was born among them, in a City the Original whereof was Samaritan, as S. Paul is ſaid to be a Citizen of Rome, and of the City of Tarſus, tho' he was a Jew, and of the Tribe of Benjamin; and perhaps Epiphanius meant nothing elſe in this Place.

(c) To the Emperor, and to the Cæſars his Sons.] The Inſcription of this Apology is, To the Emperor Ælius Hadrianus, Antoninus Pius, Auguſtus Cæſar, and to his Son Veriſſimus, and to Lucius the Philoſopher, the natural Son of Cæſar, and the adoptive of Antoninus Pius. To underſtand this Inſcription it is requiſite to know, that the Emperor Antoninus Pius, the Adoptive Son of Adrian, adopted Marcus Antoninus the Philoſopher; and Lucius Verus, the Son of Ælius Verus, whom ſome affirm to have been adopted by Marcus the Philoſopher; therefore the firſt, who is named in this Inſcription, is the Emperor Antoninus Pius; the Second called Veriſſimus, is Marcus Antoninus the Philoſopher, the adoptive Son of Antonius; the Third is Lucius Verus, the Son of Ælius Verus, who had been Cæſar, and was the adoptive Son of Antoninus Pius; he affects to call them Philoſophers, and Pious, that ſo he might inſinuate himſelf into their Favor, and that he might oblige them patiently to hearken to the Reaſons of the Chriſtians.

[This Reaſon is by no means true: S. Juſtin deſigned only to give theſe Emperors thoſe Titles, by which they themſelves deſired to be called: This Family of the Antonines from Adrian to Commodus affected the Title of Philoſophers, as much as of Fathers of their Country, or any other Title by which the flattering Romans endeavoured to get the Favour of their Maſters whom they Courted.]

This Apology is commonly called the second, but is really the first, whereas the other, commonly so called, is actually the second (e), nay, (if we may give Credit to the Testimony of Eusebius) it was not Presented unto the Emperor and the Senate (f) until the Time of Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher and Successor of Antoninus Pius. The Subject of these two Apologies is almost the same. S. Justin in the former, to shew the Injustice of their Proceedings in Punishing and Persecuting the Christians, and that they were Innocent of the Crimes laid to their Charge, gives an exact account to the Emperor and his Sons, of their Doctrin, Manners, and Ceremonies, which Qualifications render this Apology one of the most considerable Records of Antiquity, and one of those wherein many things are contained relating to our Religion: We there find the Doctrin of the Church concerning the Trinity, the Incarnation of our Saviour, and Eternal Life, as also the Proofs of the Christian Faith, the Holiness of the Conversation of its Professors, together with a Description of their Assemblies, and the Ceremonies used by them in the Administration of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. S. Justin.

The second Apology, whereof some few Sentences are lost, doth not comprehend such variety of Matter, as being properly a Complaint or Remonstrance directed to the Emperor, the Senate, and all the People of Rome, concerning the Injuries that were unjustly offered to the Christians. In this last Apology he describes the Snares that were laid for him by a certain Cynick Philosopher named Crescens, whom he had convinced of Ignorance and Debauchery. I expect (says he) that those that falsly call themselves Philosophers, should lie in wait for me, and should cause me to be bound with Chains; perhaps through the Instigation of this ignorant Crescens, who delights more in vain Glory than in the Truth. This really happened just as he foretold; for not long after, Tatian (g) the Disciple of Justin observes, this Crescens caused him to be Condemned to Death in the Sixth Year of the Reign of Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher (h), in the Year 166. It is not certainly known what kind of Punishment was inflicted on him, unless we stand by the Accounts which are given us in the Menologium (i) of the Greeks, or the Acts of his Martyrdom (k) related by Metaphrastes, which seem to be very ancient; wherein it is declared, that he was beheaded by the command of Rusticus the Prefect or Gover-

Followers of Marcion, who came not to Rome, till the Death of Pope Hyginus in the Fourth Year of Antoninus, and did not begin to propagate his Heresie, until about the end of the Reign of the same Emperor. S. Justin himself says, that it was 150 Years after the Birth of Christ, when he wrote it, Dici a nobis Christum ante centum quinquaginta annos natum sub Cyrenio. It is observed by Eusebius in his History, That it was Composed under the Pontificate of Anicetus, wherefore S. Jerom is deceived when he asserts, that it was presented in the Fourth Year of Antoninus, and Scaliger is yet more mistaken, when he maintains that it was written in the beginning of his Reign; and the Argument alledged by him, that S. Justin mentions the War raised against the Jews under Adrian, as a thing that lately happened, τὸν νεωστὶ γεγενημένον πόλεμον, is not considerable, since this might very well be affirmed of a War that was made ten or twelve Years before.

(e) Is actually the second.] It is not to be doubted but that the Apology which is commonly called the first, is really the second, for besides the Authority of Eusebius, and Anastasius the Library Keeper, it is evident that it was written a little before the Martyrdom of S. Justin, since he therein describes the snares that were laid for him by the Philosopher Crescens. But there is only the Testimony of Eusebius to induce us to believe that it was Composed in the time of Marcus Antoninus. Valesius affirms, That Eusebius is mistaken in this Point; 1. because he affirms in this Apology, That a certain Woman that was desirous to live separately from her Husband, presented a Petition to the Emperor, ἐπὶ τῷ αὐτοκράτορι, and not to the Emperors which she ought to have done, if this had happened in the beginning of the Reign of Marcus Antoninus, who had Lucius Verus for his Associate in the Empire. 2. Because he there says, That a certain Person named Lucius reproved a Judge in these Words: This is not worthy of a pious Emperor, nor of him who is the Son of a Cæsar and a Philosopher; or, as it is expressed by Eusebius, Of a Philosopher the Son of a Cæsar, ἐ φρέπουσα εὐσεβεῖ αὐτοκράτορι, οὐδὲ φιλοσόφῳ Καίσαρος παιδὶ, Eusebius, οὐδὲ φιλοσόφῳ. This Pious Emperor (says Valesius) is Antoninus Pius. And the Philosopher the Son of Cæsar can be no other than Marcus Antoninus surnamed the Philosopher. The third Objection is, that Urbicus who is mentioned in this Apology, as Præfectus or Governour of the City of Rome, exercised this Office under Antoninus, as appears from the third Oration of Apuleius, and from the Inscriptions of Gruser, p. 38. These are the Reasons or rather Conjectures of Valesius, which nevertheless seem not to deserve to be preferred before the Attestation of Eusebius, and in my Opinion they may be easily answered; for, 1. Mention is only made of one Emperor in this Apology, because Lucius was absent, and might be engaged in his Expedition against the Persians. 2. The Epithet of Pious might likewise be attributed to Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher, and his Son Commodus might well be called the Son of the Philosopher. Lastly, Urbicus might be Governour of Rome in the beginning of the Reign of Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher, as well as at the end of that of Antoninus Pius.

(f) And the Senate.] Valesius affirms, That it was directed to the Emperor alone, and not to the Senate; however it is not only addressed to the Senate, but the Author likewise in the sequel of his Discourse makes application to the Romans in the plural Number.

(g) As is observed by Tatian.] In Lib. contr. Gr. ὡς καὶ Ἰουστῖνον καθάπερ μεγάλω κακῷ τῷ θανάτῳ περιβαλεῖν περισπουδάσαι. He procured that Justin should be condemned to Death, as if to dye were the greatest of all Evils.

(h) In the sixth Year of the Reign of Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher.] The Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle sets the Death of S. Justin down in this Year, and we have not any certainer Proof.

(i) To the Menologium.] In Menolog. Kalend. Junii.

(k) Or to the Acts of his Martyrdom.] These Acts are very plain, and contain the Replies of S. Justin and of six other Companions of his Martyrdom, which are very generous and pathetical; which makes me think that they are ancient.

nour of the City of Rome, under whom Epiphanius (l) likewiſe affirms, That S. Juſtin ſuffer'd Mar-S. Juſtin. tyrdom.

Beſides theſe two Apologies, there are ſeveral other Books of this ancient Father, as, his excellent Dialogue againſt Tryphon the Jew, which was Compoſed by him after his firſt Apology, ſince he expreſly aſſures us therein, That he had informed the Emperor, in a particular Writing, that ſome Samaritans were led away by the Impoſtures of Simon Magus; (m) which Paſſage is in his Apology, dedicated to the Emperor Antoninus, from whence it follows that it was written before this Dialogue. Euſebius ſays, That this Conference was holden at Epheſus, but whether S. Juſtin ever had any Diſcourſe with Tryphon, or whether he only feign'd it, as Plato, Cicero and many others have done, this Book is very conſiderable. This Author proves againſt the Jews by an infinite number of Paſſages taken from the Old Teſtament, That Jeſus Chriſt is the Meſſiah and the Word; who firſt appeared unto the Patriarchs, and afterward condeſcended ſo far as to be made Man, and to be born of the Virgin Mary, for our Salvation. Of all the Writings of this ancient Martyr, cited by Euſebius, theſe only that we have now mentioned remain entire; to which may be added, a Fragment of his Treatiſe of Monarchy, wherein (ſays Euſebius) he demonſtrated the Unity of one God, not only by the Authority of the Holy Scriptures, but alſo by the Teſtimony of profane Authors. The firſt part of this Work is loſt, but I am perſuaded, that there is no reaſon to doubt, but that the Tract which is at preſent Entituled, Of Monarchy, is the Second Part thereof, and ſo much the rather, becauſe it begins after this manner; (n) Having already produced Divine Authority; I ſhall alſo make uſe of human Allegations, from whence it evidently appears, That this Book which we now have, is the Second part of that mentioned by Euſebius.

We might likewiſe attribute to S. Juſtin, two Orations which are prefixed at the beginning of his Works, wherein he exhorts the Gentiles to embrace the Chriſtian Religion, in ſhewing the abſurdity and Novelty of that of the Pagans, and the Truth and Antiquity of ours. Theſe two Diſcourſes are undoubtedly ancient, and tho' they are not quoted by Euſebius, and the Style of them ſeems to be a little different from that of S. Juſtin, yet we may affirm them to have been written by him, without any Injury to his Reputation. The ſame Judgment may likewiſe be given of the Epiſtle to Diognetus, (o) which was alſo Compoſed by an ancient Author, who lived in a Time when the Chriſtians were under Perſecution: But the other Epiſtle written to Zena and Serenus, does not agree in the leaſt with the Style of S. Juſtin, and contains many Precepts, which rather concern Monks than ſimple Chriſtians (p).

As for the other Works that bear the Name of this Father; Beſides that they are not cited by Euſebius, nor any of the ancient Writers, we have poſitive Proofs that they are counterfeit. The firſt of theſe is a Treatiſe purely Philoſophical, the Compiler whereof produceth divers Paſſages of Ariſtotle's Phyſick; which he confutes very dryly, and in a Style altogether different, not only from that of S. Juſtin, but even from that of the Age wherein he lived. At the End of this Tract there is another written, after the ſame manner, and probably Compoſed by the ſame Author, wherein are comprehended five Queſtions, which he calls Chriſtian, tho they have a much greater Tincture of the ſubtilty of a Philoſopher, than of the ſimplicity of a Chriſtian. Beſides, the Author of this Book reſolves theſe Queſtions, after the Method of the Pagan Philoſophers; and afterwards diſallows of the firſt Anſwer, by accommodating Chriſtianity to Philoſophy; to this are annexed ſeveral Philoſophical Axioms together with divers Queſtions and Anſwers concerning Incorporeal Things, and the Reſurrection. All theſe Books are written in the ſame Style and by the ſame Author after the Hereſie of the Manichees was ſprung up, which is often mentioned therein; now ſince this Hereſie was not known till above an Hundred Years after the Death of S. Juſtin, it muſt neceſſarily be affirmed that they were not written by him.

The Book of Anſwers to the Queſtions of the Orthodox, containing 146 that are very curious, is much more uſeful, and more worthy of a Divine than the preceeding; but neither can this belong to S. Juſtin, tho' it is aſcribed to him by Photius; for beſides that this ſort of Queſtions and Anſwers were not uſual in his time, in which no regard was had to matters of Curioſity, ſuch as the moſt part of thoſe that are compriſed in this Work, Origen is cited in Queſt. 82. and 88. S. Irenæus in the 115

(l) S. Epiphanius.] It ought to be obſerved, That S. Epiphanius is deceived in referring the Martyrdom of S. Juſtin to the Reign of the Emperor Adrian; but he is not miſtaken as to the Name of Ruſticus, who lived in the Time of Marcus Antoninus, and was much eſteemed by him.

(m) Pag. 342.

(n) It begins after this manner.] Page 103. Φιλοδόξῳ τῇ γνώμῃ χαίρουσες φιλαληθεῖ χρήσασθαι τῇ φωνῇ.

(o) The Epiſtle to Diognetus.] This Letter is written very much after S. Juſtin's way. There is mention made of a certain Perſon named Diognetus an able Painter in the Writings of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, and in thoſe of Julius Capitolinus.

(p) Rather concern Monks than ſimple Chriſtians.] ſuch are theſe following Inſtructions; That they ought not to give occaſion to Diſcord; That they ought not to withdraw themſelves from the Publick Prayers on the account of any Difference; That they ought not to ſeek after the chiefeſt and the moſt honourable Employments; That they ought to keep Silence and to preſerve Modeſty; That they ought not to diſcourſe of the Affairs of the World, but that they ought to look upon them as out of their way, and not to retain them in their Minds; and many other Admonitions of this Nature, which although exceeding uſeful, yet ſuit more with another Age different from that wherein S. Juſtin lived, and ſeem to have been given to Monks rather than ordinary Chriſtians. The Author gives an account there of a Letter which he had written to a certain Pope, and to his Superiors, which further confirms our Conjecture.

and the Manichees in the 127. The Author Diſcourſeth there of the Myſteries of the Trinity, and of the Incarnation, in ſuch Expreſſions, and with ſuch Precautions as were not in uſe, until thoſe Hereſies were ſtarted in which theſe Truths were called in Queſtion. We find the Words Hypoſtaſis, Perſon, Conſubſtantial, in Queſt. 16, 17, 139, 144. according to the Senſe that was attributed to them by the Church, in the Fifth and Sixth Century. In Queſt. 126, he ſays, That at the Time when this Book was written, Chriſtianity was no longer under the Dominion of Paganiſm, which evidently ſhews that the Author of theſe Queſtions is much later than S. Juſtin, not to mention that there are ſome things in this Work, which are not conformable to the Doctrin of this Father; as for Example, in Queſt. 52. he denies that the Witch of Endor cauſed the Soul of Samuel to return, which is aſſerted by S. Juſtin, in his Dialogue againſt Tryphon; in Queſt. 112. he ſays, that it was a created Angel that communed with Moſes and Jacob, which is expreſly contrary to the Doctrin of this Father, and of the reſt of the Writers of that Age, who believed it to be the Word himſelf. Some attribute theſe Queſtions to Theodoret, as well becauſe they come near his way of writing, as becauſe there are ſeveral Phraſes uſed by the Writer, which are alſo frequently found in Theodoret. However it be, this Book was written by an Author, who lived about the Fifth or Sixth Age of the Church. Laſtly, the Expoſition of Faith, attributed to S. Juſtin, and cited by Leontius, and Euthymius Zagabenus, too plainly refutes the Errors of the Arians, Neſtorians and Eutychians to be written near the Age, in which this Father lived. S. Juſtin.

It were to be wiſhed, that inſtead of theſe Books which are falſly aſcribed to S. Juſtin, we had thoſe that were really Compoſed by him, whereof the Titles only remain at preſent. He wrote as he himſelf declares (q), a Treatiſe againſt Hereſies; and it is difficult to determine, whether the Book againſt Marcion, cited by S. Irenæus in two ſeveral Places, was part of that Tract; or whether it were a diſtinct Work, according to the Opinion of S. Jerom; however (r), there is nothing now extant, except two Paſſages quoted by S. Irenæus. We have alſo entirely loſt two Books that were Compoſed by S. Juſtin, againſt the Gentiles, in the firſt of which, after having Diſcourſed of divers Queſtions that are uſually debated, as well by the Chriſtians, as among the Pagan Philoſophers, he treated of the Nature of Demons; the other was Ἔλεγχος called and contained a Confutation of the Errors of the Heathens. It may perhaps be ſuſpected by ſome, that thoſe two Treatiſes are the Orations prefixed at the beginning of the Works of S. Juſtin, immediately before his two Apologies; but beſides that they have different Titles, there is not any Deſcription in either of the two, of the Nature of Demons. Moreover there was another Work called Ψαλτης, that is to ſay, the Pſalmiſt, and a Book of Collections concerning the Soul, wherein he produced the Opinions of the Pagan Philoſophers, promiſing to give his own in another Diſcourſe on this Subject. Theſe are all the Writings of S. Juſtin mentioned by Euſebius, S. Jerom and Photius; beſides which (ſays Euſebius) There are many other Works written by him, in the hands of the Chriſtians; Perhaps the Epiſtle to Diognetus, and the two Books againſt the Gentiles belong to this Number. Anaſtaſius Sinaita and Glycas, cite a Commentary of this Father upon the Hexameron. Methodius, Leontius and S. John Damaſcen, quote a Book of his concerning the Reſurrection of the Body, but it is very probable, that theſe Writings are none of his.

This Author (ſays the Learned Photius, ſpeaking of S. Juſtin) was perfectly ſkilled in the Chriſtian Philoſophy, and yet more in the Profane; he had acquired an univerſal Learning, and a perfect Knowledg of Hiſtory; but he hath taken no care to adorn the Natural Beauty of Philoſophy, with the Artificial Ornaments of Eloquence; Therefore his Diſcourſes, tho' very Learned, have not the Elegancy and Grace of Eloquent Diſcourſes. This Character appears throughout all his Works, which are extreamly full of Citations, and of Paſſages taken from the Holy Scriptures and Profane Authors, with little Order, and without any Ornament. He had joyned to his exquiſite Skill in the Pagan Philoſophy, an admirable Knowledge of the Sacred and Prophetical Writings, as alſo of the Principles of the Chriſtian Religion; that there is ſcarce any one of the ancient Fathers who ever Diſcourſed more accurately, than he hath done of all its Myſteries. It is true indeed, that as to the Doctrin of the Trinity (r),

(q) As he himſelf declares.] Apol. 2. Pag. 70. ὅτι δὲ ἡμῖν καὶ σύνταγμα κατὰ πασῶν τῶν γενομένων αἱρέσεων ὁ τοιοῦτος ἔστι βέλεσι ἐντυχεῖν δώσομεν. We have alſo Compoſed a Book againſt all the Hereſies that have appeared, which we ſhall preſent unto you if you deſire it. S. Irenæus Lib. 4. Cap. 14. Præclare Juſtinus in eo libro, quem ſcripſit contra Marcionem ait, quoniam ipſe quoque Domino non credidiſſet alterum Deum annunciauti; and Lib. 5. Bene Juſtinus in ſuo libro ait, quoniam ante adventum Domini nunquam auſus eſt Satanas blaſphemare Deum, quippe nondum ſciens ſuam damnationem.

(r) As to the Doctrin of the Trinity.] The moſt difficult Paſſage concerning the Trinity is that which we read in his Dialogue, page 356, and 357. wherein he declares, That the Father is inviſible and the Son viſible, and that the Majeſty of the Father is greater than that of the Son. But if we reflect a little on this matter, it will appear, that S. Juſtin and the other Fathers who ſaid the ſame thing, yet do not affirm that the Father is of a different Nature or Subſtance from the Son; but only, that it is the Son who manifeſted himſelf unto Men, or rather, that the Father hath not diſcovered himſelf unto Men but by his Son. Their Principle is this, That the Father performs no exterior Action but through his Word, which is his Son; that it was the Son who created the World, who revealed himſelf under ſeveral Figures to the Patriarchs and Prophets, and who at laſt was made Man. It is on this account that they aſſert, That the Son is viſible and the Father inviſible, becauſe the Father is not viſible but through the Son; but this doth not hinder them from being of the ſame Nature. We find the like Expreſſions in S. Athanaſius, Orat. 4. contra Arian. who cannot be ſuſpected of maintaining any Heterodox Opinions concerning the Divinity of the Word.

he

S. Juſtin. he ſeems to differ from us in following the Platonick Maxims; but it will appear to thoſe who ſhall thoroughly examine his Opinions, and thoſe of the ancient Fathers, that in the main they agree with ours (s), and that they are only different in the manner of Expreſſion. He aſſerts with many of the ancient Writers, That the Souls of Men after their Separation from the Body, ſhall wait for the Day of Judgment, to be either entirely happy or miſerable (t); but at the ſame time he acknowledgeth, that during this Interval they ſhall receive Puniſhments or Rewards, according to their Deſerts. Moreover he believes (according to the Opinion of the moſt part of the Primitive Chriſtians) That the Juſt after the Reſurrection ſhall remain for the ſpace of a Thouſand Years in the City of Jeruſalem where they ſhall enjoy all lawful Pleaſures (u). He ſeems to have thought that the Souls of the Wicked ſhould at laſt become capable of dying (x); tho' in other Places (y) he affirms that their Torments ſhall be eternal. He has a peculiar Opinion concerning the Souls of the righteous; which he affirms to have been before the coming of Jeſus Chriſt, under the Power of the Devil, who could cauſe them to appear whenſoever he ſhould think fit (z). He hath aſſerted, as S. Irenæus aſſures us, (aa) that the Devils were ignorant of their Damnation until the coming of our Saviour; nay, he goes further in his Apology to the Emperor, affirming that they are not as yet thruſt down into Eternal Flames (bb), &c. Laſtly, he ſeems not to deſpair of the Salvation of thoſe who have lived Vertuouſly among the Gentiles, having only the Knowledge of God without that of Jeſus Chriſt. (cc) Theſe are almoſt all the particular Points wherein he hath departed from the preſent Opinions of the Catholick Church.

The Works of S. Juſtin were firſt Printed all together in Greek (dd), by Robert Stephen in the Years 1551 and 1571; except the Second Treatiſe againſt the Gentiles, and the Epiſtle to Diognetus which were printed by themſelves, by Henry Stephen in the Years 1592, and 1595. This Edition was ſoon followed by that of Commelinus in Greek and Latin, publiſhed by Fridericus Silburgius, Anno Dom. 1593. It comprehends the entire Works of S Juſtin, divided into Three Parts, the firſt whereof contains the Books againſt the Gentiles, the Second, the Dialogue againſt Tryphon, and the Third, the Tracts that were Compoſed for the Inſtruction of the Chriſtians: They are tranſlated by Langus; except the ſecond Oration againſt the Gentiles, and the Epiſtle to Diognetus, which are of Henry Stephen's Tranſlation: At the End are ſubjoyned ſome Notes of Silburgius, Stephens, and other Learned Men. Morellus followed this Edition in the Impreſſion of the Works of S. Juſtin, which he cauſed to be made at Paris in the Years 1615, and 1656. only he added the ſmall Tracts of Athenagoras, Theophilus, Hermias and Tatian. This laſt Edition is thought to be the beſt, and yet it is very imperfect, and it were to be wiſhed that another might ere long be publiſhed; to this end a (s) In the main they agree with ours.] We need only examine his Diſcourſe concerning the Three Perſons of the Holy Trinity in his Apology to the Emperour, p. 36, 93, 94. as alſo concerning the Divinity of the Word, p. 67, 96. and in the firſt Apology, p. 44, 45. and more eſpecially his Declaration concerning the Word in his Dialogue, p. 267. where he not only confutes the Opinion of thoſe that imagined that Jeſus Chriſt was a mere Man, but he likewiſe proves that he is really God: and in p. 358. where he plainly aſſerts, that the Word was begotten of the Father without dividing his Subſtance.

(t) To be either entirely happy or miſerable.] In his Dialogue, p. 223. he declares, that the Souls of the Juſt and of the Wicked wait for the Day of Judgment in a Place where they ſuffer more or leſs, proportionably to the Good or Evil that they have done in the World.

(u) Where they ſhall enjoy all lawful Pleaſures.] See p. 306. of his Dialogue; This Opinion is common to him and almoſt all the ancient Fathers, and it was a Fancy ſet on Foot by Papias, and from him ſpread among the Primitive Chriſtians, of the Vanity where of we are at preſent convinced.

(x) That the Souls of the Wicked ſhould at laſt become capable of dying.] We find this Notion in the beginning of his Dialogue, p. 222, 223, and 224. where the old Man that inſtructs him, refutes the Opinion of Plato, that Souls are incorruptible of their own Nature, and maintaining that they are ſo only through grace; from whence he concludes, That the Souls of the Wicked are only tormented as long as it ſhall ſeem good to the Will of God; inſomuch that after many Ages they ſhall ceaſe to be.

(y) Although in other Places, &c.] In his Apology to the Emperor, p. 57. he affirms, That the Torments of the Damned ſhall not only laſt for a thouſand years, as theſe mentioned by Plato, but that they ſhall be everlaſting. Obſerve likewiſe what he ſays concerning theſe torments in p. 64, 65, 66. and in other places, wherein he always calls them Eternal, oppoſing this word Eternal to the Pains that ſhall one day have an end.

(z) Who could cauſe them to appear, &c.] He aſſerts this in ſpeaking of Samuel, whoſe Soul the Witch really cauſed to return, according to his Opinion in Dialog. p. 332, and 333.

(bb) That the Devils are not as yet thruſt down into Eternal Flames.] We find this in his Apology to the Emperor, p. 71.

(cc) Having only the Knowledge of God without that of Jeſus Chriſt.] In his ſecond Apology, pag. 83. he declares, That they that lived according to the Principles of Natural Reaſon, as Socrates, Heraclitus, Azarias, Miſael, &c. might be called Chriſtians, and he ſeems to ſuppoſe that they were ſaved by living up to the Law of Nature.

(dd) The Works of S. Juſtin were firſt printed all together in Greek. I do not ſpeak of the ſeveral Editions of the Verſions which are common, and whereof there are three beſides that of Langus. The firſt was Compoſed by Picus Mirandula, and printed at Baſil by Henry Peter in the Years 1528, and 1551. The ſecond by Perionius, and printed by Nivelle at Paris in 1554. The third by Gelenius was printed at Baſil in 1555. Laſtly, a Tranſlation of all the Works of Juſtin was ſet forth by Langus, and printed at Baſil in 1565, and at Paris in the ſame Year, and in 1578, together with large Commentaries. The Book of the Confutation of the Opinions of the Ariſtotelians was tranſlated by Poſtellus, and printed by it ſelf by Nivelle in 1552. A Greek Edition of his Apologies and ſeveral other little Tracts of the Greek Fathers were printed at Rome by Zinnerus. The Exhortation to the Greeks in Greek is printed by it ſelf by Guillard at Paris.

new Version ought to be made of all S. Justin's Works, because Langus's hath many defects, the ancient Manuscripts ought to be consulted (if any such can be found) and exactly compared with the Greek Text, which was not corrected by Silburgius from any Manuscript: Lastly, some Annotations ought to be added, and many of those that are already Printed should be cut off. S. Justin.

As for the disposing of these Works, the following Order may be observed; They should be divided into Three Classes. 1. Those that were really Composed by S. Justin. 2. Those that may be his, tho' we cannnot certainly affirm it. And, 3. Those that are manifestly Supposititious. His Apology to the Emperor Antoninus, that which ought to be called the first Apology, that so for the Future it may always be cited under that Name, ought to be placed in the Front: the other Apology, that immediatly follows, should be Entituled the Second; after this might be inserted the Fragment of the Books concerning Monarchy; the excellent Dialogue against Typhon, should be the last Treatise of this Class at least, till some of those that are lost, happen to be found. The Second Class should contain the two Orations to the Greek, and the Epistle to Diognetus. The Third may take in all the Books that are undoubtedly forged, which also might be distinguished into two Parts; in the first whereof should be placed those Writings, that may be in some manner useful, such are the 146 Questions, the Exposition of the Faith, and the Epistles to Zena and Serenus; and then in the Second one may add the Philosophical Tracts above cited, if it should not be thought more convenient to omit them altogether.

MELITO.

MELITO Bishop of Sardis in Asia, is one of those Fathers, who wrote the most concerning the Doctrin and Discipline of the Church; but there remains nothing of them at present but the Titles, and a few small Fragments produced by Eusebius in the Fourth Book of his History, chap. 26. The Titles are these; Two Books of the Feast of Easter, one of the Lives of the Prophets (a) one of the Church, one of the Lords-Day, one concerning the Nature of Man, another of his Creation, one of the Submission of the Senses unto Faith (b), a Book concerning the Soul, the Body, and the Spirit, one of Baptism, another of Truth, another concerning the Generation of Jesus Christ, one of Prophecy, one of Hospitality, another entituled the Key, one of the Devil, another of the Apocalypse, one of God incarnate (c), and a Collection taken out of the Holy Scriptures. Lastly, an Apology presented to Marcus Antoninus, whereof we have a Fragment in Eusebius, wherein Melito intreats the Emperor, that he would vouchsafe to examine the Accusations that were alledged against the Christians, and to cause the Persecution to cease by revoking the Edict that he had published against them: He represents to him, that the Christian Religion was so far from being destructive to the Roman Empire, that it was very much augmented since the propagation thereof; that this Religion was persecuted only by wicked Emperors, such as Nero and Domitian; that the Emperors Adrian and Antoninus had written several Letters in its behalf, and therefore he hoped to obtain of his Clemency and Generosity, the favour which he so earnestly requested. Eusebius also gives us another little Fragment out of the Book concerning Easter, to shew the time when this Author wrote, in which he mentions Sagaris Bishop of Laodicea, whom he affirms to have suffered Martyrdom, under Servilius Paulus the Proconsul of Asia. As also another Fragment more considerable, which is the Preface to his Collections, wherein he gives us a Catalogue of the Canonical Books of the Old Testament, omitting those that are not included in the Canon of the Jews; these are the Books of Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom (for he calls the Book of the Proverbs by the name of Wisdom) Judith, Esther, and the two Books of the Maccabees. Melito.

There is also another Fragment of Melito's preserv'd by the Author of the Chronicle commonly called the Alexandrian in Olympiad 236. wherein he says, that the Christians do not adore insensible Stones, but that they worship one God alone; who is before all things, and in all things, and Jesus Christ who is God and the World before all Ages. It is not known from what Book this Fragment was taken; but it is probable, that it is in his Apology to the Emperor. Some other Passages are likewise attributed to him, which are taken out of a Catena of the Greek Fathers upon Genesis, but they seem to me to be unworthy of this Author (d); we find also in the Bibliotheca Patrum, another Book under his Name, Entituled, Of the Passage or Death of the Virgin Mary, which is inserted

(a) A Book of the Lives of the Prophets.] Some reckon two Books on this Subject, but it is plain from the Greek Text of Eusebius, and the Authority of S. Jerom, that there was but one.

(b) One of the Submission of the Senses unto Faith.] S. Jerom, and Ruffinus distinguish the Book of Faith, from that of the Senses, but it is more probable, that it was but one Book bearing the above mentioned Title, as being Composed against some Hereticks, who asserted that we ought to believe only according to our Senses.

(c) Of God incarnate.] It is expressed in Greek Περὶ ἐνσωμάτου Θεοῦ, of God incarnate, or invested with a Body. Others expound this passage after another manner, imagining that he maintained that God was Corporeal; but this last is not the proper signification of the Greek word. However, Origen, cited by Theodoret in Quest 20. in Exodum, says that Melito wrote a Book περὶ τοῦ ἐνσωμάτου εἶναι Θεόν, That God was Corporeal, which answers to the other Interpretation.

(d) Unworthy of this Author.] One of these passages is produced by Halloixius, being a Comparison between Isaac and Jesus Christ, full of childish Notions and Expressions, that are more agreeable to the Modern, than the ancient Writers.

Melito. by Pope Gelaſius amongſt the Apocryphal Writings, and rejected by Bede; but it is at preſent generally agreed, that this Book as not being cited by any of the ancient Writers, and containing many untruths and abſurdities, is a counterfeit Work. Melito lived under the Reign of Marcus Antoninus; he preſented his Apology in the Second year of this Emperor, that is to ſay, in the Year of our Lord 182. and died before the Pontificate of Victor, as appears from the Epiſtle of Polycrates to this Pope, wherein he mentions him, as already dead, in theſe Words: Why ſhould I not ſpeak of Melito, whoſe Actions were regulated by the Motions of the Holy Ghoſt, who lyes interr'd at Sardes, where he expects the Judgment and Reſurrection? This ſhews that Melito was eſteemed as a Prophet, that is to ſay, as a Man inſpir'd by God, according to the Teſtimony of Tertullian produced by S. Jerom. If the ſame Tertullian had not aſſured us, that this Author wrote Elegantly and was a good Orator, it would be very difficult to give any Judgment concerning his Style, by that little of his Writings which is yet extant.

TATIAN.

Tatian. TATIAN Sirnamed the Aſſyrian, (a) from the Name of his Country, was an able Orator, and S. Juſtin's Scholar. He remained in the Communion of the Church during the Life of his Maſter, but after his Martyrdom being puffed up with Pride, which often attends the Opinion of Knowledge, he became Head and Author of a new Sect (b), which was called the Hereſie of the Encratites, or of the Continent, becauſe theſe Sectaries condemned Marriage, as alſo the uſe of divers ſorts of Meats and Wine, leading a ſober and auſtere Life in appearance; beſides this, they maintained ſome of the Errors of the Valentinians, and affirmed that our Fore-Fathers were Damn'd: This Sect was afterwards augmented by Severus (c), from whom they took the Name of Severians: theſe latter rejected the Epiſtles of S. Paul, and the Acts of the Apoſtles. But to return to Tatian; he having got a great facility in writing, Compoſed a great number of Books, and among others an excellent Treatiſe againſt the Gentiles, which is moſt eſteemed of all his Works, as alſo a Goſpel Collected from the Four Evangeliſts.

There is yet extant the Treatiſe of Tatian againſt the Gentiles, which was firſt Printed at Zurick, in the Year 1646. together with the Verſion of Conradus Geſner, afterwards inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum; and Laſtly, annexed to the Works of S. Juſtin; the Title thereof is as follows: The Diſcourſe of Tatian againſt the Gentiles, proving that the Greeks are not the Inventors of any of the Sciences, as they boaſt themſelves to be, but that they were all invented by thoſe whom they call Barbarians. This is indeed the Subject of the beginning of his Diſcourſe, but then he adds, that the Greeks corrupted the Sciences, which they received from the Barbarians, and more eſpecially Philoſophy. Afterwards he proceeds to the Explication and defence of the Chriſtian Religion; he Treats of the Nature of God, of the Word, of the Reſurrection of the Body, and Freedom of the Soul: He confutes the Opinion of Fate, he diſcourſeth of the Nature of the Soul, and of Devils, diſcovering the Snares that they lay for Men. He intermixeth all theſe things with Satyrical Reflections on the ridiculous Theology of the Pagans, and the corrupt Manners of their Gods and Philoſophers, ſhewing at the ſame time, that the Writings of Moſes, are more ancient than all other Hiſtories, and giving an admirable Deſcription of the Holy Converſation of the Chriſtians. This work is extreamly full of profane Learning, and the Style thereof is Elegant enough, but exuberant, and not very elaborate; and the Matters therein contained are not digeſted into any Order. It was certainly Compoſed by Tatian, before he fell into Hereſie, tho' after S. Juſtin's Death, ſince he doth not condemn the State of Matrimony in that Book (d). He argues concerning the Generation of the Wrod in ſuch Expreſſions as do not agree with our manner of explaining it, but they may be interpreted in a Senſe which is not Heretical (e). He maintains that the Angels, and Devils conſiſt of Bodies and Souls: He denies the Immortality of the later, affirming that they die, and that they ſhall hereafter riſe again with their reſpective Bodies, which is a conſiderable Error.

As for the Goſpel that was Compiled by Tatian, S. Epiphanius in his Deſcription of the Hereſie of the Nazarenes, hath confounded it with that which was Entituled: The Goſpel according to the He-

(a) Sirnamed the Aſſyrian.] At the end of his Treatiſe againſt the Gentiles, he declares that he was born in Aſſyria, and that he had been inſtructed in the Theology of the Grecians.

(b) Of a new Sect.] S. Irenæus Lib. 1. Euſeb. Lib. 4. c. 29. S. Jerom, in Catalogo.

(c) This Sect was afterwards augmented by Severus.] S. Ephiphanius affirms, that Severus lived before Tatian but he is miſtaken.

(d) He doth not condemn the the State of Matrimony in that Book.] On the other hand, Pag. 168. he ſeems to approve it.

(e) A Senſe which is not Heretical.] He aſſerts that the Word was begotten in the time of the Creation of the World; altho' he was from all Eternity, calling the Generation of the Word his Application, (if we may ſo term it) to the exteriour Work: He adds, that the Word was not begotten by way of Separation, but after the ſame manner, as one Fire is lighted or kindled by another; ſo that God did not remain without the Word, but that the Word proceeded from him, and remained in him altogether, or at the ſame time; this he explains by the inſtance of human Speech. Theſe are the Principles of ſome of the ancient Chriſtians. The Verſion of this Treatiſe was Printed together with the Greek Text at Baſil, in the Years 1564, 1569, 1575, 1593. and at Geneva in 1592.

brews; and indeed they had this in common, that the Genealogy of Jeſus Chriſt was not in either of them: But the Goſpel according to the Hebrews was older than Tatian's; beſides the latter was only a kind of a Catena or Concordance, wherein this Author had gathered together, what he judged proper to be Collected out of the Four Evangeliſts. S. Ambroſe ſeems to mention it in the Preface to his Commentaries on S. Luke; when he declares, that ſome Writers had made one ſingle Goſpel out of the Four, by Collecting thoſe paſſages, which they believed to be moſt favourable to their Opinions, and omitting the reſt. The Goſpel of Tatian, was Compoſed after this manner; in which he retrenched the Genealogy of Jeſus Chriſt, together with all that which relates to his human Nature, and his Extraction from the Stock of David. Baronius thought that that was the Work of Tatian, which is in the Seventh Tome of the Bibliotheca Patrum, under the Name of Ammonius; but this is a diſtinct Book: for as Valeſius obſerves, it is an Hiſtorical Epitome of the Goſpels, written by an Ancient Orthodox Author, containing many Paſſages, wherein Jeſus Chriſt is called the Son of David; whereas Tatian's Goſpel was a Rhapſody of the Paſſages taken out of the four Evangeliſts, on purpoſe to induce us to believe that our Saviour was not deſcended from the Lineage of David. Tatian lived after the Death of S. Juſtin, and died about the time when S. Irenæus wrote his Book concerning the Hereſies. S. Clement in the third Book of his Stromata, cites a Treatiſe of this Author, Entituled, Of Perfection according to the Saviour, written by him after his Fall into Hereſie; he produceth a paſſage out of it againſt Marriage, which he confutes in Pag. 460.

Tatian.

ATHENAGORAS and HERMIAS.

Athenagoras & Hermias.

ATHENAGORAS an Athenian Philoſopher, lived in the time of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, to whom he preſented an Apology for the Chriſtians (a). This Work and its Author, were unknown to Euſebius, S. Jerom, and Photius; but 'tis cited by S. Epiphanius in the Hereſie of Origen. In this Apology he refutes the three principal Calumnies that were alledged againſt the Chriſtians, as 1. That they were Atheiſts. 2. That they eat humane Fleſh. 3. That they committed horrible Crimes in their Aſſemblies. To the firſt Accuſation he makes Anſwer, that the Chriſtians were not Atheiſts, ſince they acknowledged and adored one God in Three Perſons, and lived Conformably to his Laws and Commadments, believing that he ſees and knows all things; that they refuſed to worſhip Idols, and to offer Sacrifice to them, as being perſuaded that they were not Deities. He replys to the two laſt Objections, in ſhewing that the Life, Laws and Manners of the Chriſtians were very far from Murther and thoſe infamous Crimes whereof thew were accuſed. He plainly Eſtabliſheth the Unity of the Eſſence of God, and the Trinity of the three Divine Perſons: He affirms that the Word, that remained in God from all Eternity departed from him, (if we may uſe ſuch an Expreſſion) to create and govern all things: He maintains the Worſhip of Angels, and declares that they were created to take care of Affairs here below. He aſſerts that the Devils were ruined through the Love that they bore unto Women; he admits Free-will in the utmoſt Latitude; he makes divers Deſcriptions of the Holineſs of the Converſation of the Chriſtians; he commends Virginity; he condemneth ſecond Marriages, calling them an honeſt Adultery. Laſtly, he Treats of the Reſurrection, of the laſt Judgment.

There is another Treatiſe of this Father extant, concerning the Reſurrection of the Dead, wherein he endeavours to prove, that it is not only not impoſſible, but even extreamly credible: Theſe two Books are written in a Dogmatical ſtyle; they were Printed ſeparatly in Greek and Latin (b), Tranſlated by Geſner, Nannius, Marſilius Ficinus and Suffridus, and are inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, as alſo in Greek, in the Supplement to the Bibliotheca; and Laſtly, after the Works of S. Juſtin, with the Annotations of Geſner, and Henry Stephen; there is another imperfect Tract annexed to them, which is a continual Series of Satyrical Reflections, on the Opinions and Philoſophical Notions of the Gentiles, Compoſed by Hermias, a Chriſtian Philoſopher. But this Author is not known, nor the perciſe time when he wrote, however it is not to be doubted but that he is ancient, and that he lived before the Pagan Religion was extirpated. This little Book was Printed by it ſelf in Greek and Latin, at Baſil, Anno. Dom. 1553.

(a) In the time of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, &c.] He joyns Lucius Aurelius Commodus and Marcus. Labbe affirms that it was Lucius Verus; but it is more probable, that it was Commodus the Son of Antoninus, and that this Apology was preſented after his being taken into the Government, about the Year 178.

(b) In Greek and Latin.] At Paris in Quarto, by Veke, Ann. Dom. 1541, and in Octavo, by Stephen with Nannius's Tranſlation in 1557. Alſo by Plantin, at Antwerp in 1560, 1583, and 1588. The Tranſlation of Suffridus was Printed at Colen, with Commentaries in 1567, and 1573. Nannius's Verſion of the Treatiſe concerning the Reſurrection, was publiſhed at the end of the Works of Philo at Baſil 1561, and in 1558 by Epiſcopius, as alſo at Colen in 1599. There is a verſion of the Treatiſe of the Reſurrection by Ficinus, and Printed at Baſil in 1516, and another of Valetus in Italian, Printed at Venice in 1556. The Apology was Printed in Latin at Paris in 1498, in Greek and Latin in 1577. In Latin at Baſil 1565. Tranſlated by Geſner, and there again in 1558, in Octavo at Zurick in 1599. The Book concerning the Reſurrection of the Dead, was Printed in Latin at Paris in 1498, at Baſil in 1561. In Greek and Latin in Venice in 1498, and 1550. At Baſil in 1593, and 1653. At Paris in 1615, 1618, and 1636. The Tranſlations which are at the end of S. Juſtin, are Nannius's of the Treatiſe of the Reſurrection, and Geſner's of the Apology.

[Athenagoras has alſo been Printed at Oxon Gr. Lat. in 12°. 1682; and at Leipzick 1684 in Oct. cum Notis Var.]

THEOPHILUS Biſhop of ANTIOCH.

Theophilus Biſhop of Antioch.

THEY that imagine (a), that this Theophilus, whom we ſpeak of, is the ſame with him, to whom S. Luke dedicates the Acts of the Apoſtles, are groſly miſtaken; for this Man was ſo far from being Contemporary with S. Luke and the Apoſtles, that he was not Ordained Biſhop of Antioch (b), until the Year 170. after the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt, and he governed this Church Twelve or Thirteen Years, until the beginning of the Reign of Commodus (c); that is to ſay, until the Years of our Lord 181, or 182. This Biſhop was one of the moſt vigorous Oppoſers of the Hereticks of his time; he wrote a conſiderable Book againſt Marcion, and a Treatiſe againſt the Hereſie of Hermogenes (d), wherein he cited the Apocalypſe. He likewiſe Compoſed other ſmall Tracts, for the Inſtruction and Edification of the Faithful: All theſe Works are entirely loſt; but we have Three Books ſtill written by him to Autolycus, a learned Heathen of his Acquaintance, who had undertaken to vindicate his Religion againſt that of the Chriſtians.

In the firſt of theſe Books he anſwers the Requeſt, that had been made to him by that Heathen, to teach him how to know the true God, and after, having declared, that to attain to the knowledge of him, we muſt be purified in Mind and Heart, he proceeds to Treat of the Nature of God, and of thoſe things which the Divines call his Attributes, as his Eternity, Immenſity, Power, Inviſibility; afterward he enlargeth on the Bleſſedneſs of the other Life, and on the Reſurrection of the Body; he obſerves, by the way, that Princes ought to be honoured as having received their Authority from God, and derives the Etymology of the word Chriſtian from Unction. This firſt Book is properly a Diſcourſe between him and Autolycus, in Anſwer to what this Heathen had ſaid againſt the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt. The ſecond Book was written to convince him of the Falſhood of his own Religion, and of the Truth of the Chriſtians. He begins with a Confutation of the Opinions that were maintained by the Pagans, concerning their Gods, and ſhews the Contradictions of the Philoſophers and Poets on this Subject; he explains at large the Creation of the World, and that which happened in the ſucceeding Ages; he demonſtrates, that the Hiſtory of Moſes is the oldeſt and trueſt Hiſtory that ever was, and that the Poets have extracted many things from the Holy Scriptures, particularly their Relations concerning the Torments of the Damned. In the third Book, after having proved that the Writings of the Heathens are full of an infinite number of Notions, contrary to right Reaſon and good Manners, he ſhews, that the Doctrin and Lives of the Chriſtians, are very far from thoſe Crimes that are laid to their Charge. Laſtly, At the end of his Work he adds an Hiſtorical Chronology, from the beginning of the World unto his Time, to prove, that the Hiſtory of Moſes is the ancienteſt and the trueſt. It is apparent, from this little Epitome, how well this Author was acquainted with profane Hiſtory. Theſe three Books are filled with a great Variety of curious Diſquiſitions concerning the Opinions of the Poets and Philoſophers: Tho' there are but few things that relate immediately to the Doctrins of the Chriſtian Religion; not that Theophilus was ignorant of them, for it appears from ſeveral Paſſages that he was very skilful in theſe Matters, but in regard that he compoſed this Book chiefly to convince a Pagan, he inſiſts rather in proving our Religion, by Arguments from without, than by expounding its Doctrins. He is the firſt Author that hath applied the word Trinity (e), to the Three Perſons of the Godhead, but he calls the Third by the Name of Wiſdom: He aſſerts two things concerning the Word, which ſeem to ſavour of the Arian Hereſie; the firſt is, that the Word

(a) They that imagine, &c.] This was the Opinion of Gulielmus Tyrius, who in S. Bernard's time wrote the Hiſtory of the Cruſade, See lib. 4. c. 9. It is a groſs error, for according to this account Theophilus muſt have lived above 150 years.

(b) Ordained Biſhop of Antioch,] He was the ſixth; The firſt (according to the teſtimony of Euſebius) was Evodius, the ſecond S. Ignatius, the third Hero, the fourth Cornelius, the fifth Heros, and Theophilus the ſixth; S. Jerome indeed declares in one place that he was the ſeventh, but he is miſtaken; Euſebius in his Chronicle, and in his Hiſtory, refers his Ordination to the eighth year of the Reign of the Emperor Marcus, that is the 170 after Chriſt, according to the common computation.

(c) Until the beginning of the Reign of Commodus.] Euſebius affirms that Maximinus was his Succeſſor in the ſeventeenth year of Marcus Antoninus, but in the Chronology of the Emperors compoſed by Theophilus at the end of his third Book to Autolycus he reckons nineteen years and ten days of the Reign of Verus, that is to ſay, of the ſame Emperor Antoninus, and it cannot be affirmed that 16 years ought to be put inſtead of 19, as it is in the Tranſlation, for by computing the total Sum of the years of the Emperors which amount to 237 years and one day, it is apparent, that there muſt of neceſſity be 19. From whence it follows, that either he was miſtaken in reckoning up a greater number of years of the Reign of this Emperor under whom he lived, than were really paſſed, which is not credible, or that he did not write theſe Books until after this time, under the beginning of the Reign of Commodus; and then, he could not have had Maximinus for his Succeſſor until the year 182 of the Vulgar Account, unleſs he was taken in his Life-time to be his Coadjutor. There is more probability that Euſebius was deceived a year or two. Nicephorus in his Chronography of the Patriarchs of Antioch allows 13 years to Theophilus, which agrees with our Opinion.

(d) And a Treatiſe againſt the Hereſie of Hermogenes.] Euſeb. lib. 4. cap. 24. Ἀπό τινος ἐκ ἀγγραφῶν αὐτῷ κατὰ Μαρκίωνος συντεθείσης λύσις. St. Jerom, *Sub Imperatore M. may may be in a Place, and the Second, that he was begotten in Time; but these Expressions, which are common to him, and many of the ancient Fathers, had a different Signification (f) from that which was afterwards given them by the Arians.

Moreover these Books are full of Moral and Allegorical Expressions, the Style is elegant, and the Turn of the thoughts very agreeable, that whoever reads them, cannot doubt but that the Author was a very Eloquent Man. They are intituled in the Greek Manuscripts, The Books of Theophilus to Autolycus concerning the Faith of the Christians against the malicious Detracters of their Religion. They have been published in Greek and Latin, as also in Latin by Conradus Gesner, and Printed at Zurich in the Year 1546; afterwards they were inserted in the Orthodoxographa, Printed at Basil in 1555. Fronto Ducæus annexed them to the first Volume of the Supplement of the Bibliotheca Patrum; set forth in 1624; and they were afterwards Printed at the end of the Works of S. Justin in the Edition of Morellus.

Besides these three Books, we have another Book in Latin attributed to Theophilus, consisting of Allegorical Commentaries on the four Gospels, which is in the Bibliotheca Patrum; there was a Commentary on the Gospels under his name in S. Jerom's time, divers passages whereof are produced by him in his Annotations on S. Matthew; there were also Commentaries on the Proverbs of Solomon; but this Father observes in his Treatise of Ecclesiastical Writers, that they did not come up to the elegancy or to the style of the Writings of Theophilus.

(f) But these Expressions which are common to him with many of the ancient Fathers had a different signification.] They meant nothing else by the first Expression, as hath been already observed, but that God made himself manifest unto men by the Word; therefore when Theophilus affirms that the Word is in a place, and that the Father cannot be there, he intended only to declare that the Word appears unto Men in a place, as he heretofore appeared unto Adam in the Terrestrial Paradise, and that the Father doth not appear in that manner: This is a System of the ancient Christians: It would be more difficult to resolve the second Expression, were it not that they themselves have explained it, since they acknowledge that the Word is Eternal, and that he remained in God from all Eternity, as his Counsel, Wisdom, and Word. But they say that the same Word who was in God, in some manner went out from him when he undertook to Create the World, because he began to make use of this Word in Exterior Operations, and this is what they call the Procession, Prolation, and Co-generation of the Word, which does not hinder but that the Word might be from all Eternity, and eternally begotten of the Father after the same manner as we apprehend it, but this is not that which they call Generation. These Expressions are not only used by Theophilus, but likewise by Athenagoras, Tatian, Tertullian, the Author of the Book concerning the Trinity, amongst the Works of this Father, Lactantius, the Compiler of the Homilies attributed to Zeno Veronensis, and afterwards by Rupertus in his Commentaries on Genesis.

APOLLINARIUS, or, APOLLINARIS of HIERAPOLIS.

Apollinarius.

A Pollinarius, or, Apollinaris Bishop of Hierapolis, a City of Phrygia, wrote several Books under the Reign of Marcus Antoninus, the Titles whereof only remain at present; The first was an Oration dedicated to the Emperor in defence of the Christian Religion; The second a Treatise against the Gentiles divided into five Books; The third, two Books concerning Truth; The fourth, two Tracts against the Jews; The fifth was one or more Treatises against the Sect of the Montanists, which then began to appear. These are all the Works of this Author that are cited by Eusebius and S. Jerom (a), they were extant in Photius's time, who having read his Books against the Gentiles, as also those concerning Piety and Truth (b), declares that he was much to be esteemed both for his Doctrin and his Style; wherefore I shall prefer the Judgment of this Learned Man before that of Trithemius, who without perusing the Works of Apollinarius, peremtorily asserts, that there seems to be more Zeal than Learning in what he has writ.

We find in Eusebius, Book 5. Chap. 16. a large fragment of a certain Author, whom he doth not name, against the Heresie of the Montanists, from whence Ruffinus and Nicephorus have asserted, that this Fragment was taken from the Discourses of Apollinarius against them, but they must of necessity be deceived; for Apollinarius composed his Books to confute their Opinions, when they first began to be divulged, whereas the Anonymous Author of this Fragment, wrote after the death of Montanus, Maximilla, and Theodotus, who were the Ringleaders of that Party; besides, he makes mention of this Heresie as maintained in a Country far distant from his, and established a great while ago, which plainly shews, that this Fragment belongs not to Apollinarius, and consequently, that there is not any part of his Works now extant.

(a) By Eusebius and S. Jerom.] Lib. 4. Cap. 27. S. Jerom in Catalogo omits the Books against the Jews, neither are they found in the Version of Ruffinus, nor even in some Greek Manuscripts of Eusebius.

(b) As also those concerning Piety and Truth.] Photius Cod. 14. It is probable that the Book of Piety is the first of those two that are cited by Eusebius, under the Title of Truth. Besides, he affirms, that there were other Works of this Author, which he had never seen.

DIONYSIUS of CORINTH.

Dionysius of Corinth.

Dionysius Bishop of Corinth lived under the Reign of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, and in the beginning of Commodus's. 'He not only took care of his own Flock, (says Eusebius, Book 4. Chap. 23.) but he also made the Christians of other Countries partakers of his Divine Labours, causing them to fructifie every where by his Catholick Epistles, which he sent to many Churches. The 'first is written to the Lacedæmonians, containing an Instruction of the Catholick Faith, and an 'Exhortation to Peace and Unity. The second is directed to the Athenians, to excite their Faith, 'and to induce them to lead a Life Conformable to the Rules of the Gospel: He likewise reproves 'their negligence, whereby they had almost abandoned the Christian Religion ever since their Bishop 'Publius suffered Martyrdom in the Persecutions that were raised in his time: Moreover he mentions 'Quadratus, who was elected Bishop of Athens after the Martyrdom of Publius, and testifies, that 'the Christians of this City owed the renovation of the ardour of their Faith to his Care. Besides 'this, he informs us, that Dionysius the Areopagite being converted by St. Paul, (as it is recorded 'in the Acts of the Apostles) was constituted the first Bishop of Athens. There is also another Epistle 'written by him to the Nicodemians, wherein he confutes the Heresie of Marcion, and keeps close 'to the Rule of Faith. He likewise composed a Letter directed to the Church of Gortyna; as also 'to all those of Crete, in which he extreamly commends Philip their Bishop, to whom his whole 'Church had given authentick Testimonies of his singular Abilities and Generosity, and he admonish-'eth them to avoid Heresies. In his Epistle to the Amastrians, and to the other Churches of Pontus, 'addressing his Discourse to their Bishop Palma, he explains divers passages of the Holy Scriptures; 'He therein lays down several Precepts concerning Marriage and Chastity, determining at the same 'time, that all Penitents should be received that returned from any Crimes whatsoever, and even 'from Heresie. In the same Volume is contained another Epistle to the Gnossians, wherein he ad-'viseth Pinytus their Bishop not to impose on the Christians the heavy burden of the Obligation to 'preserve their Virginity, but to have respect unto the weakness which is incident to most of them. 'Pinytus in replying to this Epistle, extols and admires Dionysius of Corinth, and exhorts him at last 'to afford them more solid nourishment, and to send frequent Letters to him which might fill and 'satiate the People that were committed to his charge, lest being always nourished only with Milk, 'they should grow old, and yet remain in a kind of Infancy. This answer represents as it were a 'lively Portraiture of the Faith of Pinytus, his diligence in watching over the Flock, with which he 'was entrusted by God, his profound knowledge in Divinity, and his extraordinary Eloquence. We 'have also in our hand another Letter of Dionysius written to the Romans, and particularly directed 'to Soter, who was then their Bishop; a passage whereof it will be expedient here to produce, in 'which he recommends to them the continuation of a certain Custom, that had been always ob-'served by them from their first plantation unto the persecution which happened in our time. This is (says he) a custom which hath been established among you, O ye Romans, ever since the beginning of your Church, to be charitable unto your Brethren, and to send to divers Churches throughout the World things necessary for their subsistence; you comfort the poor in their indigence, and relieve the urgent necessities of those that are condemned to the Mines; This custom you have received from your Ancestors, which the blessed Bishop Soter hath not only retained, but even augmented, by abundantly distributing the Donatives appointed for the relief of the Faithful, and cherishing as a Father would do his Children all the Brethren who came to Rome. 'He mentions St. Clement's Epistle to the Corinthians, which had 'been for a long time constantly read in the Church of Corinth, as he testifies in these Words: We have even now passed the Lords Day, when we perused your Epistle, which we shall hereafter read continually, as we do that of St. Clement, that we may be replenished with Precepts and wholsom Instructions: Afterward he observes, that his Letters were corrupted by Falsifiers in these Words: I wrote several Epistles at the Entreaty of the Brethren, but the Ministers of the Devil have filled them with Tares, by retrenching and adding many things; they may well expect this terrible Sentence; Cursed be he that adds or diminisheth any thing from my Words. Wherefore it is not to be admir'd that some have presumed even to corrupt the Sacred Writings, since they have done it in Books of much less Authority. 'Besides 'these Epistles, there is another Extant, written to Chrysophora his faithful Sister, to whom he gave 'Instructions suitable, carefully nourishing her with spiritual Food. These are the Contents of this passage of Eusebius, concerning the Epistles of St. Dionysius, which I have set down entire, because he hath made use of the same Method as we should have done, in case those Epistles had been still Extant.

Moreover Eusebius in his 2*d. Book Chap.* 25. recites another Fragment of his Epistle to the Romans, wherein it mention'd the Death of S. Peter, in the City of Rome in these Words. 'Thus (says he) as I 'may so say, by your Exhortations you have mixed the Grain that sprung from the Seed of St. Peter 'and S. Paul, that is to say, the Romans and the Corinthians: for these two glorious Apostles entring into 'our City of Corinth, instructed us in dispersing the spiritual Seed of the Gospel, afterwards they passed 'together into Italy, and having given you also like Instructions, they suffered Matyrdom with 'you at the same time. This is all that we certainly know concerning the Life and Writings of Dionysius Bishop of Corinth. In the Menologium of the Greeks, he is reckoned among the Martyrs, (a) but (a) He is reckoned among the Martyrs.] On the 29th of November, τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρᾳ Διονύσιος ἐπίσκοπος Κορίνθου ξίφει πληγὶς πλειῶνι, on this day Dionysius Bishop of Corinth died by the Sword. Glycas affirms that he suffered Martyrdom under the Reign of Antoninus Pius; and yet it is certain, that he lived under Marcus Aurelius.

since neither Eusebius, nor S. Jerom take any Notice of the matter, I am apt to believe that the Latin Church hath done more prudently in placing him in their Martyrology in the Rank of the Confessors Pinytus, Philippus, Modestus, Musanus, and Bardesanes.

Pinytus, &c.

AT the same time lived Pinytus Bishop of Gnossus in the Island of Crete, who replyed (as we have even now observ'd) to S. Denys of Corinth, in an Eloquent and Learned Epistle. Philippus Bishop of Gortyna, mentioned likewise by the later, wrote a Treatise against Marcion as well as Modestus (a), but less accurate.

Among these may be reckoned Musanus, who wrote a Work against the Encratites, and Bardesanes (b) the Syrian, who Composed two Tracts translated into Greek by his Disciples, the First against Marcion, and other Hereticks, and the Second concerning Fate; this last was dedicated to the Emperor Antoninus (c). Besides he wrote other Treatises upon the Persecution, that was then raised against the Christians of Syria. Eusebius observes, that this Author having been engaged in the Sect of the Valentinians, though he had acknowledged and retracted the most part of his Errors, yet he retained some of them; wherefore he is accused by S. Jerom, of being the Deviser of a new Heresie: Tho' he owns that Bardesanes was endued with a very quick Apprehension, and was extremely vehement in his Disputes. S. Epiphanius likewise makes him to be the Ring-leader of an Heresie. 'Bar-'desanes (says he in Hæres. 56.) is the Author of the Heresie of the Bardesianites; he was a Native of 'Mesopotamia, and an Inhabitant of the City of Edessa; moreover he was a very good Christian (d), 'and wrote many useful Books, being well skill'd in the Greek and Syriack Tongues (e). He was in-'timately acquainted with Abgarus Prince of Edessa, and assisted him in his Studies; he lived until 'the time of Antoninus Verus, and Collected many things concerning Fate against the Astronomer Abi-'das: There are also other Works written by him agreeable to the Faith: He Courageously withstood 'Apollonius the Friend of Antoninus (f), who advised him to deny that he was a Christian, and un-'dauntedly replyed, that he did not fear Death, which he could not avoid, tho' he should do that 'which the Emperor required: But at last this Man adorned with so many Vertues fell into Heresie, 'suffering himself to be infected with the Errors of the Valentinians; inventing divers Æones, and de-'nying the Resurrection of the Dead: He acknowledged indeed the Law and the Prophets, toge-'ther with the whole New Testament, but then he admitted several Apocryphal Books along with 'them. Eusebius in Lib. 6. Præparat. Evangel. produceth an excellent Fragment of the Writings of this Author against Fate, whereby it is evident that it was written in the Form of a Dialogue. He proves in this Fragment, that Men are not Conducted by Nature and Necessity as brute Beasts, but by Reason and with Liberty; because, altho' the Nature of all Men be the same, yet there are infinite numbers of Manners, Customs, Laws and Religions among them, that are different even in the same Country, and under the very same Climate, which cannot proceed but from the different Choice that is made by them. Afterwards having alledged many Examples to evince this Truth, he adds: 'What 'shall we say, of the Society of Christians, who are dispersed throughout all the Cities of the World, 'and who cannot be induced by any Consideration, nor by any Arguments whatsoever, to follow the 'Manners and Customs of those among whom they reside; but on the contrary, wheresoever they are, 'they still adhere to peculiar Laws, and have Manners different from those of the People among whom 'they live, without being perswaded by any means to commit those things, which their Master hath 'declared to them to be Criminal, chusing rather to suffer Poverty, Dangers, Ignominy, Torments, 'and even Death it self? This passage set down by Eusebius, not only shews that Bardesanes was a Person of a quick Apprehension, and of a vehement Temper, (as hath been observed by S. Jerom) but it likewise informs us, that he had acquired much Learning (g), and that his Style wanted neither Elegancy nor Ornament.

(a) As well as Modestus.] S. Jerom affirms, that in his time there were other Tracts extant under the Name of Modestus; but that they were rejected by the learned as Suppositious.

(b) Bardesanes] Porphyrius, Lib. de Abst. cites one Bardesanes a Babylonian, who he says lived in the time of his Fore-fathers, and writ concerning the Brachman and Indian Philosophers: But he must needs have been another Person.

(c) Was Dedicated to the Emperor Antoninus.] It is asserted by S. Jerom, that he presented it to him; but it is more probable, that being Translated, it was afterwards delivered by others; for since he wrote in Syriack, it is not credible, that he presented, or even Dedicated his Book to the Emperor; on the contrary, he Composed it at the Entreaty of his Friends; and in the form of a Dialoge.

(d) A very good Christian.] S. Epiphanius is deceived; for it is otherwise affirmed by Eusebius, that he was at first a Valentinian, and that his Errors were the remainders of this Heresie.

(e) Being well skilled in the Greek and Syriack Tongues.] He did not understand Greek, since, as Eusebius assures us, his Disciples Translated his Works.

(f) The Friend of Antoninus.] Neither is there much certainty in this Relation.

(g) That he had acquired much Learning.] This Fragment contains an Enumeration of the Manners, Customs and different Laws of a very great number of People, which plainly shews his Learning, and it is written as agreeably as the Subject was capable of allowing it.

S. IRENÆUS.

S. Irenæus. WE know nothing of the Country of S. Irenæus (a), but only in general, that he was a Greek. It is probable, that he was at firſt Educated in the Chriſtian Religion (b), or at leaſt that he made profeſſion thereof even from his Youth, during which he was a Diſciple of S. Polycarp Biſhop of Smyrna in Aſia, who was then very Old. This induceth me to believe, that this Father could not be born till about the end of the Reign of the Emperor Adrian, or the beginning of that of Antoninus Pius, ſome time before the Year 140, after the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt (c). He was alſo a Diſciple of Papias, if we may believe S. Jerom (d), and perhaps it is he whom he frequently cites in his Work againſt the Hereſies, under the Name of an Elder, that had ſeen the Succeſſors of the Apoſtles (e). After he had thus ſpent the time of his Youth in the School of the moſt Learned of the Apoſtles, (f) he went into France; where he was ordained Prieſt of the Church.

(a) That he was a Greek.] Galeſinius and ſome other Authors tell us, that he was of Smyrna, but this is barely a Conjecture: 'Tis certain, he was a Greek, and in all probability of Aſia.

(b) He was at firſt Educated in the Chriſtian Religion.] He always ſpeaks of the Chriſtian Religion, as if he had never been of any other, and he no where takes notice, that he had ever been a Heathen. Beſides it is certain that he was a Chriſtian, and a Diſciple of S. Polycarp from his tender years, as he himſelf teſtifies in his Letter to Florinus, as it is cited by Euſebius, Lib. 5. c. 20. I have ſeen you, ſays he, when I was as yet but a Child in Aſia with S. Polycarp, I remember it very well, becauſe we beſt retain what we have ſeen in our Youth, ſo that I can tell, what kind of a place it was where S. Polycarp lived, what Diſcourſes he held, and after what manner he lived. And in the Third Book againſt Hereſies, Ch. 3. Polycarpus autem conſtitutus ab Apoſtolis Smyrnis in Aſia Epiſcopus, quem & noſtra prima ætate vidimus, multum enim perſeveraverat, & valdu ſenex, Glorioſiſſime, ac Nobiliſſime Martyrium faciens exivit e vita. Which clearly Demonſtrates that S. Irenæus was very young, when he uſed to go to S. Polycarp, and that on the other hand, S. Polycarp was extreamly old.

(c) The Year of our Lord, 140.] 'Tis commonly believed, that he was born towards the end of Trajan's Reign, or in the beginning of Adrian's. But this does not agree with what we have obſerved concerning him, by which it undeniably appears, that he only knew S. Polycarp in his old Age, when he himſelf was exceeding young: Beſides, S. Irenæus lived till the Year 202, or 203, wherein he ſuffered Martyrdom, and that he had Strength and Vigor enough ſtill left under the Pontificate of Eleutherus, towards the Year of our Lord 178. And this abundantly diſcovers the Error of thoſe Perſons, who have imagined, that Irenæus was the Angel of Thyatira, of whom mention is made in the Apocalypſe. 'Tis certain, that Book was writ before his Birth, for in his Fifth Book ſpeaking of the Revelations; It is not very long, ſays he, ſince it has appeared in the World, almoſt in our own time, at the end of Domitian's Reign.

[Mr. Dodwel has fixed the time when S. Irenæus lived, in his Third Diſſertation upon this Father, in this manner. Irenæus ſpeaking of S. John's Revelation ſays (Lib. 5. cap. 30.) Neque enim ante multum temporis viſum eſt, ſed pene ſub noſtro Seculo, ad finem Domitiani imperii. So that the latter end of the Reign of the Emperor Domitian, was very near the time when S. Irenæus lived. Whence it muſt follow, that he was alive at leaſt under the former part of Trajan's Government. But then the words, Sub noſtro ſeculo, are not ſo eaſie; becauſe Seculum at that time ſignified as often the time of the preſent Emperors Government as any thing elſe. Irenæus ſays alſo, that when he was ἐν πρώτῃ ἡλικίᾳ he heard S. Polycarp at Smyrna; when he was πάνυ γεραλέος. Now S. Polycarp was an old Man in the beginning of Hadrian's Reign, to which time Irenæus being his Diſciple muſt be referred: For S. Irenæus in his Letter to Florinus, ſays, that he ſaw him when himſelf was very Young, making a very ſplendid Figure in the Emperor's Court. Now this can agree to none but Hadrian, who often went about his Empire, ſtaying long in ſeveral places, where their Antiquities and Hiſtories could afford him Entertainment. This of neceſſity muſt be about the Year CXXII. ſince no other time can be Aſſigned in Hadrian's Reign for ſuch a Journey.

As for the time of his Death it muſt be carried as much higher as that of his Birth. The common Opinion is, that he ſuffered in the Perſecution which Severus raiſed in Gaul, after he had Conquered Albinus. But that is inconſiſtent with it ſelf; and it is no ways probable, that Severus ſhould raiſe Perſecution againſt thoſe Men, for favouring Albinus, who as Tertullian aſſures us, made it a great part of their Juſtification, that in all theſe Civil Wars they had never declared themſelves of any one Faction againſt the Emperor Severus; and this he appeals to as a thing notoriouſly known. Beſides, none of the Ancients within 300 Years of Irenæus ever mention his being a Martyr, a thing never omitted in thoſe Primitive times, whenever they had juſt grounds to give a Title, which of all others they thought the moſt Honourable. It is plain by the Controverſies concerning Eaſter and his Letter to Florinus, that he lived to Commodus's time. And if he were 25 years old, when he ſaw Florinus at Smyrna about the Year CXXII, he muſt have been born near or in the Year XCVII. In the CLXXXII (the 3d. of Commodus) he wrote againſt Blaſtus and Florinus, when by this Account he himſelf was 85 years old. The laſt Controverſies concerning the time of obſerving Eaſter were in the Year CLXXXIX, in the 10th year of Commodus, when we are ſure that S. Irenæus was alive, becauſe his Opinion was appealed to, and he gave it ſo ſolemnly as to put an end to their Differences. Then he was by the former Account, in the XCII Year of his Age: After that we have no Memorials, either how long he lived, or what he did.]

of Lyons by Pothinus, who was Biſhop of that See (g). And when this Holy Prelate had ſuffered Martyrdom in the 90th Year of his Age, being the 17th of the Reign of Marcus Antoninus, and the 178th Year of Jeſus Chriſt, Irenæus was Elected his Succeſſor upon his return from a Voyage that he made to Rome (h); having carried ſeveral Letters thither written to Pope Eleutherus, by the Martyrs of Lyons, concerning the new Sect of the Montaniſts. At the end of this Epiſtle, theſe Holy Men recommended S. Irenæus in theſe words: We have deſired our dear Brother and Collegue Irenæus, to carry this Letter unto you; we commit him unto your Care; and we entreat you to eſteem him as a Perſon that hath very much Zeal for the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt; if we believed that his Dignity would add any thing to his worth, we would have recommended him to you in quality of a Prieſt; but he is much more recommendable for his Zeal and Piety. S. Irenæus

S. Irenæus being conſtituted Biſhop, was not only employed in governing his particular Church with ſingular Prudence, but he applied himſelf alſo to the preſerving of all the other Churches in the World from the infection of Hereſies, which were then ſpread abroad in great numbers. And it was on this account (i) that he Compoſed in Greek (k) under the Pontificate of Eleutherus (l) five (g) By Pothinus.] Halloixius was of Opinion, that he was ordained Presbyter by S. Polycarp. But there is more Reaſon to induce us to believe, that he was ordained by Pothinus, and therefore S. Jerome calls him the Presbyter of Pothinus.

(h) At his return from a Voyage that he made to Rome.] 'Tis certain, that the Martyrs had reſolved to ſend him to Rome to carry their Letter, but we can't certainly tell, whether he went thither or no. Valeſius thinks, that though they intended to ſend him, yet Pothinus's Death preventing him, he was detained there to be his Succeſſor, and ſo never went to Rome at all. Baronius and Petavius ſay, That he went to Rome, and that he was not ordained till after his Return. They have the Authority of S. Jerome to ſupport them, who ſays the ſame thing in his Book of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers in the following Words. Irenæus, Pothino Epiſcopi qui Lugdunenſem in Gallia regebat Eccleſiam Presbyter, a Martyribus ejuſdem loci ob quaſdam Eccleſiæ quæſtiones rogatus Romam miſſus, honorificus ſuper nomine ſuo ad Eleutherum perferi literas, poſtea tum Pothina prope Nonagenario Martyrio Coronato in locum ejus ſubſtituitur. Euſebius alſo ſeems to be of the ſame Opinion, ſince he mentions a Letter wherein it is ſaid, that he was ſent to Rome, without telling us, that his Journey was ſtopt by the Death of Pothinus. The Conjecture of Valeſius is only founded upon the Improbability of the thing, that they would ſend S. Irenæus, who was the chief and the beſt known Member of the Church of Lyons, and who beſides was to ſucceed Pothinus, at a time when that Church ſtood ſo much in need of his Aſſiſtance. But beſides that in a Queſtion of Fact, as this is, a Conjecture of this Nature is of little Conſequence, ſo it may be replied, that he was ſent at the beginning of the Perſecution, and that he returned before the Death of Pothinus. Feuardentius imagines, that S. Irenæus carried Letters alſo into Aſia and Phrygia, which the ſame Martyrs wrote to their Brethren in thoſe Churches about the ſame Subject; but this is very improbable, and there is nothing in Euſebius to induce us to believe it. All that we Read there, amounts only to this, that the Churches of Vienna and Lyons, after the Death of Pothinus, and the other Martyrs, wrote a long Letter (which in all probability was Compoſed by S. Irenæus) to the Churches of Aſia and Phrygia, cited by Euſebius, towards the end of which, They paſſed their Cenſure upon the Montaniſts, with a great deal of Piety and Devotion, ſetting before them (ἐκθέμενοι) the Letters which their Martyrs had written, while they were as yet in Chains, as well to the Brethren of Aſia and Phrygia, as to Eleutherus Biſhop of Rome. But he does not ſay, that thoſe firſt Letters to the Brethren of Aſia and Phrygia, were carried by S. Irenæus, nor that they were ſent at all, till the Letter concerning their Martyrdom was writ, and it ſeems to be very improbable that they would ſend them the ſecond time, if they had been carried thither once before. As for what relates to the Ordination of S. Irenæus it is certain, that he was only a Presbyter, when he went to Rome, and this appears by the Letter of the Martyrs by Euſebius, and S. Jerome. It is more difficult to know, who ordained him afterwards. Father Queſnel in his Diſſertations upon S. Leo, pretends thas he was ordained by the Pope, and that he went purpoſely to Rome upon that account; others believe that he came back before the Death of Pothinus, and was ordained by him. It is more natural and more agreeable to the Teſtimony of the Ancients to believe that he was not Elected, and ordained Biſhop of Lyons, till after the Death of Pothinus; and whereas Father Queſnel pretends, that at that time there was only one Biſhop of France, and therefore it was neceſſary for S. Irenæus after the Death of Pothinus to go and be ordained at Rome, all this is precarious, and the rather, becauſe it appears that S. Irenæus was ſent thither while Pothinus was living, and upon another occaſion.

(i) 'Twas upon this Account.] He himſelf tells us in his Preface to the fifth Book, that he Compoſed theſe Books to convert the Hereticks, and to preſerve the Novices in the Faith, leſt they ſhould be laid aſide by thoſe, who would uſe their utmoſt Endeavours to pervert them, and ſeduce them from the Truth.

(k) In Greek.] Eraſmus having found this ancient and barbarous Verſion, at firſt imagined, that theſe Books were Originally written in Latin, but afterwards he altered his Opinion, and no body doubts at preſent, but that they were written in Greek. For firſt S. Jerome places S. Irenæus among the Greek Authors. Secondly, Euſebius, S. Epiphanius, Theodoret, Photius and S. John Damaſcene, read and quoted him in Greek. Thirdly, This Author was leſs known to the Latins, than to the Greeks; and Laſtly, ſpeaking of the number of the Letters, and the Name of Anti-Chriſt, Lib. 5. he ſays ſeveral things that could not be ſaid but by an Author that wrote in Greek. We dont't know who made this Verſion; ſome have attributed it to himſelf, but this is a fooliſh Chimera; it was certainly Compoſed by a Man that underſtood neither Language as he ought. It was not known in the time of Gregory the Great, who in his 50th Letter to Ætherius tells him, that he had ſearched a long time after the Writings of S. Irenæus, without being able to find them. Geſta vel ſcripta B. Irenæi jamdiu eſt quod ſolicite quæſivimus, ſed hactenus ex eis invenire aliquid non valui. S. Auſtin cites a paſſage out of S. Irenæus, Lib. 1. contra Jul. cap. 3. which is of another Verſion.

(l) Eleutherus.] This appears, becauſe in his Catalogue of the Biſhops of Rome, from S. Peter down to his own time, he ends with Eleutherus, who, he ſays, was then living. Nunc duodecimo loco Epiſcopatum ab Apoſtolis ſortitur Eleutherus, Lib. 3. c. 3.

S. Irenæus. Books againſt Hereſies, bearing this Title (m), The Confutation and Subverſion of that which is falſly called Knowledge. He wrote likewiſe at the ſame time two Epiſtles to two ſeveral Hereticks of Rome, one whereof was directed to Blaſtus, and the other to Florinus, whom he knew when he was the Diſciple of S. Polycarp. In the firſt of theſe Letters he treated of Schiſm, and in the ſecond concerning Monarchy. In the latter he proved, that there was but one God, and that he was not the Author of Evil; for this was at firſt the principal Error of Florinus, tho' he ſoon fell into thoſe of the Valentinians, which obliged S. Irenæus to dedicate another Work to him, Entituled, περὶ ὀγδοάδος, becauſe it was written againſt the Octonary of the Æons of the Valentinians.

Not long after, under the Pontificate of Victor the Succeſſor of Eleutherus, the Controverſie that aroſe between the Aſiatick Biſhops and this Pope, gave occaſion to S. Irenæus to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to re-eſtabliſh Peace. The Subject of this Diſpute was to know on what day Eaſter ought to be obſerved; The Biſhops of Aſia, according to their ancient cuſtom, always celebrated that Feſtival on the 14th of the Moon of March, on whatever Day of the Week it happened, whereas the Weſtern Churches waited for the Lords-Day before they celebrated it. This difference in point of practice, which ſeems to be but of little conſequence, produced ſome diſturbance among the Churches of the firſt Ages; and when S. Polycarp came to Rome in the time of Pope Anicetus, theſe two Biſhops earneſtly endeavoured to accommodate this matter; but not being able to perſuade one another to leave their former Cuſtom, (ſo jealous have Churches always been of their Ceremonies and Cuſtoms) they parted very good Friends, thinking that a difference of ſo little moment ought not to interrupt their mutual Agreement. But under the Pontificate of Victor, this Conteſt was revived with greater heat; and had well nigh cauſed a diviſion in the Catholick Church. For this Pope, incenſed becauſe the Biſhops of Aſia being very far from ſubmitting to the Threats and Penalties which he had denounced againſt them, in caſe they refuſed to aboliſh their own Cuſtom, and to conform to that of the Weſtern Churches, had procured a large Epiſtle to be written to him by Polycrates Biſhop of Epheſus in vindication thereof; took a reſolution to drive Polycrates and the Aſiatick Biſhops out of their Churches, and ſent every where Letters (ſays Euſebius) in which he declared them to be Excommunicated. Whereupon the other Biſhops, and even thoſe that celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter with thoſe of the Weſt, diſapproved the Proceedings of Victor, and wrote Letters to exhort him to take other Meaſures more conformable to Peace and Charity. But there was none that performed this with greater efficacy than S. Irenæus, who wrote an Epiſtle to him under the name of the Church of France, wherein he declares, that tho' he himſelf ſolemnized the Feaſt of Eaſter on the Lord's Day according to his manner, yet he could not approve of his undertaking to Excommunicate whole Churches for the obſervation of a Cuſtom which they had received from their Anceſtors. He advertiſeth him, that different Cuſtoms have been uſed in Churches not only in the Celebration of the Feſtival of Eaſter, but alſo of Faſts, and in divers other matters of practice. Laſtly, he lays before him, that his Predeceſſors did not contend with the Aſiatick Biſhops in this matter; and that S. Polycarp being arrived at Rome, and having holden a Conference with Pope Anicetus touching this affair, they decreed, that mutual Communion and Peace ought not to be broken for a matter of ſo ſmall importance. It is probable that Victor was convinced by theſe Reaſons; for tho' the Aſiaticks did not lay aſide their Cuſtom, yet it doth not appear that the Union between them and the Biſhops of Rome was thereupon diſcontinued. This Epiſtle is produced by Euſebius, who affirms, that this Father wrote many others of the like nature to other Biſhops.

To return to the Works of S. Irenæus, beſides thoſe that we have already mentioned, he wrote a Treatiſe againſt the Gentiles very conciſe and extreamly neceſſary, (ſays Euſebius) Entituled, Of Knowledge (n) περὶ ἐπιστήμης, as alſo another Tract which he wrote to Marcion, to ſhew what was the Doctrin that was Preached by the Apoſtles; and laſtly, a Book containing ſeveral Diſſertations διαλέξεις on different Subjects, wherein (according to the Teſtimony of Euſebius) he quotes the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, and the Book of the Wiſdom of Solomon. Theſe are all the Works of S. Irenæus that Euſebius and S. Jerome mention (o), but it is not known when theſe laſt were written.

(m) Bearing this Title, &c.] Ἐλέγχου καὶ ἀνατροπῆς τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως βιβλία πέντε. Euſebius, Photius, and others. This agrees with the name which he has given his Books in his Prefaces to Lib. 2, 3, and 4. and in the laſt Chapter of the 4th as well as the firſt of the fifth. The Hereticks of thoſe times called their knowledge γνῶσις, and themſelves Gnoſticks, which was alſo the name of a particular Sect.

(n) Of Knowledge.] St. Jerome diſtinguiſheth this Treatiſe of Knowledge from that againſt the Gentiles, for want of having ſufficiently minded a paſſage in Euſebius, Lib. 5. c. 26.

(o) That Euſebius and S. Jerome mentions.] S. Jerome ſpeaking of the Apocalypſe of S. John tells us, that S. Juſtin and S. Irenæus have interpreted it, from whence ſome conclude, that S. Irenæus compoſed a Commentary upon it. But S. Jerome's true meaning is, that theſe two Authors cited and explained ſome paſſages of it. Some Authors formerly attributed to him the Book De Vniverſo, which was compoſed by Caius a Presbyter of Rome, mentioned by Photius, Cod. 48. The Author of the Queſtions attributed to S. Juſtin, cites a Book about Eaſter, Queſt. 115. and tells us, that there was an Account, that they did not pray kneeling on Sundays. and that there was mention made of the Pentecoſt, all which perhaps might be found in the intire Letter of S. Irenæus to Polycarp, of which Euſebius has only given us a fragment. Euſebius in his fourth Book, ch. 25. ſpeaking of the Book of Philip againſt Marcion, tells us, that S. Irenæus and Modeſtus had likewiſe wrote againſt the ſame Heretick. S. Irenæus himſelf, lib. 1. c. 29. promiſes to write particularly againſt that Heretick. We are not aſſured whether he ever did write againſt him or no, becauſe neither S. Jerome, nor Euſebius, who have given us a Catalogue of all the Books of S. Irenæus, mention it. 'Tis probable, that the Letter of the Churches of Vienna and Lyons concerning their Martyrs was writ by S. Irenæus.

The

The Death of S. Irenæus was no less glorious than his Life; for after having governed the Flock which Jesus Christ had committed to his Charge for 24 Years, he was not willing to abandon it in the time of the Persecution of the Emperor Severus, which was much more cruel in France than in any other part of the World. He suffered Martyrdom at Lyons with all the Christians that were found in that City, and in so great numbers that their Blood ran down through all the Streets, according to the report of Gregory of Tours in the first Book of his History, Chap. 27. We have not any particular account of his Martyrdom, which happened in the Year, 202, or 203, after the Nativity of Jesus Christ. S. Irenæus.

Of all the Works of this Father, there remains only in our possession a very barbarous Version of those against the Heresies, and some few Greek Fragments of these Books given us by Eusebius, Theodoret, S Epiphanius, and S. Johannes Damascenus, which are collected in the last Edition of Feuardentius, and in the Writings of Halloixius. There is also a Fragment of his Epistle to Florinus extant, and a considerable part of that to Victor, and an Advertisement which he had inserted at the end of his Book περὶ ὀκταδος, to oblige the Transcribers thereof, faithfully to revise and correct their Copy from his Manuscript. The Version of the five Books, concerning the Heresies, tho' Barbarous (as I have hinted already) and full of Faults, yet is a very valuable Fragment; for the Variety which is in it is admirable.

In the First Book, after having described at large the Errors of the Valentinians, in Chap. 1. He opposeth to them in the Second, the Faith of all the Churches in the World, which he comprehends in a kind of Creed; In the Third and Fourth Chapters, he proceeds to shew that all the Churches and all Christians agree in this Faith, and that the most Learned cannot add any thing to it, or make any Alterations from it, nor the most simple and ignorant, diminish any part of it. The following Chapters are spent in explaining the absurd Notions of Valentinus and his Disciples. In the 20th he returns to the Source and Original of the Hereticks, and beginning with Simon Magus, he gives an Account successively of all the Heresies that appeared since the time of the Sorcerer, even unto that wherein he wrote. This first Book indeed is extreamly tedious, being fill'd with almost nothing else but the wild Conceits, and extravagant Imaginations of the primitive Hereticks: There is a notable passage in it concerning Penance, upon the occasion of certain Women, who being defiled by a famous Impostor named Mark, afterwards did Penance, during the remainder of their Lives. In the Second Book, S. Irenæus begins to impugn the Errors which he had barely recited in the First: He chiefly makes use of the Principles of the Hereticks in opposing them, and shews that they contradict themselves, and that all their Whimsies are ridiculous and ill laid together. In the Third Book he confutes them by the Authority of Holy Scripture and Tradition: He proves that it is impossible, that all the Churches in the World should agree together, to alter the Apostolical Doctrin; that the Evangelists and Apostles knew but one only God, the Creator of Heaven and Earth, and one Jesus Christ God and Man, who was born of a Virgin, who is not the Son of Joseph, but was really Man, and that he actually suffered, and not in appearance only, as was pretended by the Hereticks. He occasionally refutes the Error of Tatian, concerning the Damnation of Adam, and maintains as a certain Truth, that he is saved. In the Fourth Book he continues to demonstrate, that there is but one God; particularly, he shews against Marcion, that the same God is exhibited in the Old and New Testament; he Answers all the Objections of the Hereticks, and especially those which they took from Scripture; afterwards he alledgeth the Reasons that induce a spiritual Man, that is to say, a Christian, to condemn the Pagans, Jews, Hereticks and Schismaticks. Lastly, he rejects the Opinion of those who affirmed, that Men were naturally good or evil, and proves the Liberty of Mankind. In the last Book, he Treats of the Redemption of Jesus Christ, of the Fall of Man, of the Resurrection of the last Judgment, of Anti-Christ, and of the State of Souls after Death. This is in General the Subject of every one of the Books of S. Irenæus; and they that peruse them will find several other passages relating to some weighty Articles of our Religion.

There are for Example, many excellent Paragraphs concerning the Holy Scriptures, and among others, one in Book 2. Chap. 46, and 47. There are very considerable passages touching the Eucharist in Book 3. Chap. 19. Book 4. Chap. 32, and 34. and in Book 5. Chap. 4. Where he proves the Resurrection of the Body against the Valentinians, because it is not credible, that being nourished with the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ, it should remain in Corruption: He mentions the Three Persons of the Trinity (p). In many places of his Works, and almost as often as he speaks of the Word he establisheth his Divinity, Eternity (q), and Equality with the Father (r).

(p) Of the Trinity.] Lib. 1. c. 2. lib. 3. c. 20. lib. 4. c. 25, 37, and 75. and lib. 5.

(q) His Divinity and Eternity.] Lib. 1. c. 19. lib. 2. c. 18, and 48. lib. 3. c. 6. In all these places, and several others, he says, That the Word is truly God. Lib. 2. c. 43, and 56. and lib. 3. c. 20. he says, that the Word is, and was always co-existent with the Father.

(r) And his equality with the Father.] In the fourth Book, ch. 8. he says, That the Son is the measure of the Father, because he comprehends him. He seems to have said something contrary to this, lib. 2. where he says, that the Father is greater than the Son, that he knew not of the Day of Judgment; And in another, place he says, that the Father is invisible, and the Son visible. But as to the first passage, there is no more difficulty in it than in that of S. John, and he speaks there of Jesus Christ considered as a Man. And the second ought to be understood after the same manner, as we have explained a like passage of S. Justin. It is yet more favourable to us, because he says that the Son makes the Father visible, Visibile Patris Filius. Which shews, that the Father and the Son are of the same nature.

S. Irenæus.

In the Second Book (s), he Treats at large concerning the Faculties of the Soul; he conceives that it is diſtinguiſhed from the Body, and that it is of a different Nature; he there refutes the Metempſychoſis, or Tranſmigration of Souls out of one Body into another, and proves that thoſe of the juſt ſhall ſubſiſt Eternally. But he ſeems to have believed, as well as S. Juſtin, that they are immortal only through Grace, and that thoſe of the Wicked ſhall ceaſe to be, after they have been tormented for a long time. He maintains alſo another particular Opinion, that the Souls aſſume the Figure of their Bodies, but this word Figure may be underſtood of ſome peculiar Quality of the Soul.

He Diſcourſeth in many places of the Fall of the firſt Man, and of the lamentable Conſequences of his Sin (t), he teacheth that to repair this Loſs, and for the Redemption of Mankind, the Word was made Man, and that it is through Grace, that he hath merited for us by his Paſſion, that all Men may be ſaved (u). As for the State of Souls ſeparated from their Bodies, he determined that they were conveyed into an inviſible place, where they expected the Reſurrection of the Body, and that the Juſt after having Reigned with Jeſus Chriſt on Earth, during the ſpace of a Thouſand Years, and enjoyed temporal Pleaſures, ſhould enter into Heaven, to poſſeſs Eternal Happineſs (x). He imagined alſo, that our Saviour deſcended into Hell, to preach the Faith there unto the Patriarchs, and to the ancient juſt Men, as well Jews as Gentiles, and that they that believed at his Preaching ſhould be reckoned in the number of the Saints (y). Moreover he maintained ſome other particular Opinions; he believed for Example, that Jeſus Chriſt lived above Fifty Years upon Earth (z), and that as Man. He was ignorant of the Day of Judgment, &c. He approves the Judgment of S. Juſtin, that the Devil knew not his Condemnation before the coming of Jeſus Chriſt (aa). He aſſerts, that the Saints ſhall underſtand by little and little, thoſe things whereof they had no knowledge in their Entrance into Happineſs (bb). Laſtly, he imagines that God ſent Enoch to the Angels (cc), whom he conceives to be corporeal. The ancient Propagators of Chriſtianity ought to be excuſed for theſe ſorts of Opinions, there being ſcarcely one of them that had not admitted ſome Notions almoſt like theſe.

The Style of S. Irenæus (as far as we can judge by that part of his Works, which as yet remains) is ſuccinct, clear and ſtrong, but not very ſublime: He declares himſelf in his Preface to the Firſt Book; That the Elegancy of a polite Diſſertation ought not to be ſought for in his Works, becauſe reſiding among the Celtæ, it is impoſſible but that he ſhould utter many barbarous Words; that he did not affect Diſcourſe with Eloquence nor Ornament, and that he knew not how to perſuade by the force of his Expreſſions, but that he wrote with a vulgar Simplicity. He takes more pains to inſtruct his Reader, than to divert him, and he endeavours more to convince him by the Matters which he propounded, than by the manner of Expreſſing them. It cannot be doubted, but that he was a very profound Scholar in all ſorts of Knowledge, as well Prophane as Sacred; he perfectly underſtood the Poets and Philoſophers (dd); there was no Heretick of whoſe Doctrin and Arguments he was ignorant; he had an exquiſite knowledge of the Holy Scriptures; he retained an infinite number of things, which the Diſciples of the Apoſtles had taught by word of Mouth: Laſtly, he was exceeding well verſed in Hiſtory and in the Diſcipline of the Church, ſo that nothing can be more litterally true, than what is atteſted of him by Tertullian, Irenæus omnium Doctrinarum Curioſiſſimus explorator. Moreover, his Learning was accompanied with a great deal of Prudence, Humility, Efficacy and Charity, and it may be juſtly affirmed, that he wanted nothing that was neceſſary for the Qualification of a good Chriſtian, an Accompliſhed Biſhop, and an able Eccleſiaſtical Writer. However, the Learned Photius had reaſon to take notice of one defect, which is common to him, with many other ancient Authors; that is, That he weakens and obſcures (if we may ſo term it) the moſt certain Truths of Religion, by Arguments that are not very ſolid (ee). It were eaſie to produce ſome Inſtances of this defect, but it ſeems to me to be more expedient to leave them to the Judgment of the Readers of his Works.

Eraſmus firſt publiſhed the ancient Verſion of the Five Books of S. Irenæus, which was at firſt Printed at Baſil, in the Year 1526. A Second Edition was likewiſe ſet forth at the ſame place by Frobenius in 1528. afterwards in 1533, 1545, 1548, 1554, 1560, in Folio, and in 1571, at Paris in 1528, and 1563. in Octavo by Petit, in a very fair Character, and by the ſame Printer in 1567. again in Octavo. Theſe Editions were followed by thoſe of Gallaſius Miniſter of Geneva, in the Year 1570.

(dd) The Poets and Philoſophers.] It is certain, he underſtood Homer very well, ſince he collects ſeveral Verſes taken out of different places, to deſcribe the carrying away of Cerberus, lib. 1. And as for the Pagan Philoſophers, he knew them ſo very thoroughly, that in the ſecond Book, ch. 11. he diſcovers all that the Valentinians had borrowed from each of them. We need only read over his firſt Book to be ſufficiently perſuaded, that he had very particularly applied himſelf to know all the Opinions of the Hereticks. One ſees by the Hiſtories which he cites as well in his Books, as in his Letter to Victor, how well he was verſt in Hiſtory, and in the Diſcipline of the Church.

(ee) Arguments that are not very ſolid.] Phot. Cod. 120. Etſi in aliquibus Eccleſiaſticorum dogmatum certa veritas ſpuriis rationibus fuſcari videtur.

Laſtly,

Laſtly, Feuardentius, a Profeſſor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris, a Learned Man in his time undertook this Work, and Printed at Paris by Nivelle, in 1575 and 1576, the Five Books of S. Irenæus, Reviſed and Corrected in many places, from an ancient Manuſcript, and Augmented with Five entire Chapters, which were found in his Manuſcript at the end of the Fifth Book. He has added at the end of every Chapter ſeveral Notes, which he judged to be neceſſary for the better underſtanding of this Author; they are for the moſt part uſeful and Learned, but there are ſome which exceed the due Limits, that a Commentator ſhould preſcribe to himſelf, whoſe Deſign ought not to be, to make Oſtenation of his Learning, or to Treat of Matters of Controverſie, but barely to explain the Senſe of his Author. The Second Edition of Feuardentius, Printed at Colen in the Year 1596, and afterwards in 1630, and at Paris in 1639. is better than the former, becauſe it contains the Greek paſſages of S. Irenæus, which are extant in the Works of S. Epiphanius, and ſome other ancient Writers. To theſe may be added, thoſe that are Collected by Halloixius from the Writings of S. Joannes Damaſcenus, in a Manuſcript of the Cardinal de la Rochefoucauld. I am of Opinion, that it would be uſeleſs to make a new Edition of the Works of S. Irenæus, at leaſt until the Greek Text ſhall happen to be found; for to Compoſe one from the Verſion, that we now have in our Poſſeſſion (as Halloixius propoſes) would be a Buſineſs ſcarce of any manner of uſe. S. Irenæus.

Victor, Polycrates, Theophilus of Ceſarea, and Bachillus of Corinth.

SAint Jerome places Victor among the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, becauſe he wrote ſome little Pieces about the Day of the Feſtival of Eaſter, which he believed ought not to be celebrated upon any other Day but a Sunday. Euſebius mentions but one Roman Synod publiſhed in the Name of Victor. Victor, &c.

Polycrates Biſhop of Epheſus wrote a Letter againſt the Opinion of Victor, wherein he pretended that we ought to celebrate this Feſtival upon the 14th day after the appearance of the Moon in March, upon what day of the Week ſoever it fell. Euſebius c tes part of this Letter written in the Name of Polycrates, in the 24th Chapter of the Fifth Book of his Hiſtory, wherein he aſſerts, that S. Polycarp, and ſeveral other Diſciples of the Apoſtles, celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter on the ſame Day, as was generally obſerved in Aſia; that is to ſay, the Fourteenth Day after the appearance of the Moon in March upon what day ſoever it happened. This difference, as we have already obſerved, raiſed ſome Diviſions among the Churches, and exerciſed the Pens of the moſt Learned Biſhops. The Biſhops of Paleſtine, Narciſſus of Jeruſalem, Theophilus of Ceſarea, Caſſius of Tyre, and Clarus of Ptolomais, wrote a Letter in the Name of the Council, wherein, after they had proved that they derived this Cuſtom from the Apoſtles, they gave Orders to have their Letter ſolemnly publiſhed, and declared, That they celebrated Eaſter after the ſame manner as the Church of Alexandria did. Bachillus Biſhop of Corinth wrote alſo a Letter in the Name of the Biſhops of Achaia upon the ſame Subject, and in Euſebius's time the Letters of the Biſhops of Pontus of the Province of Oſroene were exant. But all theſe Books are loſt, and we have nothing that is ancient upon this Subject, except the Fragments of a Letter of S. Irenæus, and of that of Polycrates cited by Euſebius, lib. 5. c. 4. All theſe Letters were writ towards the end of the Reign of Commodus, or the beginning of that of Severus. There goes indeed under the Name of Polycrates, a Book Entituled, The Paſſion of Bleſſed Timothy, mentioned by Sigebert, and publiſhed by Stapulenſis, but 'tis a ſuppoſititious Work, and never mentioned by the Ancients.

Several Writers, of whom nothing remains, and who were little known among the Ancients.

THERE lived at this time ſeveral Writers, whoſe Works were extant in Euſebius's time, who mentions theſe that follow, lib. 5. cap. 27. Heraclitus upon S. Paul; Some Books of Maximus upon that common Queſtion among the Hereticks, From whence proceeds Evil; and About the Creation of Matter; The Commentaries of Appion, and of Candidus upon the Hexameron; Sextus's Book concerning the Reſurrection; A Treatiſe of one Arabianus, and the Writings of ſeveral others, whoſe time, ſays Euſebius, we are not able to find out, there being no Traces or Signs of it; and laſtly, the Diſcourſes of ſeveral Authors, whoſe Names we don't ſo much as know, who, though they were Orthodox, and of the Church, as appears by their Explication of the Scriptures, yet they were for the moſt part unknown, and without reputation, becauſe their Books carried not the Names of their reſpective Authors. To theſe we muſt add a certain Perſon named Judas, who Compoſed a Diſſertation upon the Seventy Weeks of Daniel, wherein he has compoſed a Chronology that reaches down to the Tenth Year of the Emperor Severus, and would perſuade the World, that Anti-Chriſt was then at hand. So much had the Perſecution, raiſed againſt the Chriſtians at that time, troubled the Church. Several Writers &c.

SERA-

SERAPION of ANTIOCH.

Serapion of Antioch.

SErapion the Eighth Bishop of Antioch was advanced to this Dignity in the Tenth Year of the Emperor Commodus, in the Year of our Lord 191. He wrote a Letter to Caricus and Pontius against the Sect of the Montanists, a Fragment whereof Eusebius had cited, wherein he opposes the Authority of Apollinarius Bishop of Hierapolis, and the (a) Subscriptions of two Bishops of Thrace to the Montanists. There was also in the time of Eusebius another Letter of his addressed to Domninus, who of a Christian turned Jew, to reduce him from his Apostacy, and a Book concerning the Gospel falsely attributed to S. Peter. Eusebius cites a Fragment of this Book, by which it appears, that the subject and occasion which induced Serapion to write it, was a Contest that arose in the Church of Rhossus in Cilicia about the truth of that Gospel, that Serapion happening to be there, permitted them to read it, but that afterwards being convinced, that those Persons who defended it, were secret Hereticks, and that Marcion, who was the principal Asserter of it, received it from some Hereticks named the Docetæ (who believed that Jesus Christ did not really suffer, but only in appearance) he wrote this Letter to them, till he could go to see them himself, to acquaint them with the falsity and errors of that Gospel.

S. Jerome takes notice, that in his time there were some short Epistles of the same Author that were conformable to his austere rigid way of living; but they are wholly lost. This Bishop governed the Church of Antioch till the first Year of the Emperor Caracalla, and the Year of our Lord 203. Antoninus succeeded him, and was the Ninth Bishop of Antioch after the Apostles.

(a) The Subscriptions of two Bishops of Thrace.] These Subscriptions occasioned Baronius to imagine, that a Council was held upon this Subject; but they are only the Subscriptions of the Letters of two Bishops of Thrace, who wrote to the Asiaticks concerning this new Sect (as the Church of France had done) and therefore there is no necessity of saying that there was a Council assembled upon this occasion.

RHODON.

Rhodon.

RHodon, though he was of Asia, studied at Rome, and had Tatian for his Master. He wrote many Books, and among the rest a Treatise against the Heresie of Marcion, dedicated to one Callistion. He likewise wrote a Piece upon the Hexameron. S. Jerome attributes to him a Book against the Montanists, a Fragment of which, as he supposes, Eusebius has cited. But since Eusebius says nothing of its being written by Rhodon, and since it is certainly of a later date, we may be sure that it cannot be his. So that we have nothing of Rhodon's left, save only a passage or two cited by Eusebius, taken out of his Book against the Heresie of Marcion, wherein he observes, that this Heresie in his time was divided into several Sects; that one Apelles acknowledged but one Principle, but that he rejected the Prophecies; that some others, as Potitus and Basilicus acknowledged two, and others introduced three Natures. He also tells us, That he had a Conference with Apelles, and that he himself being convinced of several Errors in their Conference, said, That we are not obliged to examine what we believe, and that all those who place their hope in Jesus Christ crucified, would be saved; that the Question about the Nature of God was exceeding obscure; that he in truth believed there was but one Principle, but that he was not assured of it, and that the Prophecies were contrary one to another. Lastly, Eusebius adds, that Rhodon says in this Book, that he was Tatian's Disciple at Rome; that Tatian had written a Book concerning the most difficult Questions of Scripture, promising to explain them, but that having never done it, he himself endeavoured to perform it. And this is all we know of this Author; he flourished under the Emperors Commodus and Severus.

PANTÆNUS.

Pantænus.

PAntænus, a Stoick Philosopher (a), born in Sicily, about the beginning of the Reign of the Emperor Commodus (b), presided over the celebrated School of Alexandria, where from the time of S. Mark the Founder of that Church, they had always a Divine that was eminent for his Learning and Piety, to explain the Holy Scriptures, and to instruct them in Human Learning.

(a) Born in Sicily.] Some have thought that he was an Hebrew, but they are mistaken, for S. Clement speaking of the Master he had in Ægypt, who was our Pantænus. Lib. 1. Strom. calls him the Sicilian Muse, which shews that he was a Sicilian, for otherwise he would as soon have called him the Attick Muse. That Master of his, whom he calls an Hebrew, was another Person that instructed him in Palestine.

(b) Presided.] Eusebius, lib. 5. c. 10. and S. Jerome, in Catalogo.

He

He was obliged for a time to leave this Employment to undertake another far more excellent. For the Indians having sent to the Bishop of Alexandria to furnish them with a Divine to instruct them in the Christian Religion, Demetrius sent Pantænus thither, who undertook this Mission with Joy, and behaved himself very worthily in it. 'Tis reported, that he found that the Indians had already some Tincture of the Christian Religion, which had been infused by S. Bartholomew the Apostle, and that he met with the Gospel of S. Matthew among them written in Hebrew (c), which that Apostle had left there. Pantænus.

After Pantænus was returned to Alexandria, he re-assumed the Government of the School of that City, which in his absence he in all probability had committed to the care of his Disciple S. Clement, a Presbyter of Alexandria. He continued to explain the Holy Scripture publickly under the Reign of Severus, and Antoninus Caracalla, and as S. Jerome tells us, was more serviceable to the Church by his Discourses, than by his Writings. Nevertheless he published some Commentaries upon the Bible, where he has discovered, as Eusebius says, the Treasures of the Scripture. We may judge after what manner he explained the Sacred Text, by the like performance of S. Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and the rest that were brought up in that School. They abound in Allegories, they find Mysteries and Instructions in every thing, and scarce ever follow the literal sense, and fill their Annotations generally with a great deal of Learning. A Man ought to have abundance of Wit and Eloquence to keep up this way of writing Commentaries, and to render it advantageous and entertaining to the People, otherwise it will degenerate and grow flat and tedious. The Commentaries of Pantænus are all lost. We only know, that he was the Author of that Rule, which has been ever since followed by all the Interpreters of Prophecies; that the Prophets often express themselves in indefinite Terms, and that they make use of the present time, instead of the past and future. Theodotus has related this Opinion of Pantænus, but he speaks of it, as if he had rather said it than writ it.

(c) Which that Apostle had left there.] S. Jerome tells us, that Pantænus brought it with him, and that it was in his time preserved in the Library of Alexandria. I cannot easily prevail with my self to believe this Story, and indeed I should rather believe, that this was the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which the Nazarines owned, which might pass for that of S. Matthew; for why should S. Bartholomew leave an Hebrew Book with Indians?

S. CLEMENT of ALEXANDRIA.

SAint Clement (a), a Presbyter of Alexandria, and Disciple of Pantænus (b), was after him, or rather at the same time with him, Master of the School at Alexandria, and Catechist of the Catechumens (c), belonging to the Church of that City. He flourished under the Emperors Severus and Antoninus Caracalla, and it plainly appears, that he lived till the Reign of Heliogabalus, or Alexander Severus, that is, till about the Year Two hundred and twenty from the Birth of Christ (d). As he was endowed with extraordinary Learning, and a singular Talent in Writing, so he Composed several considerable Works, which discover great Industry and Study. This is plain by the Catalogue which is left us of them, by Eusebius and S. Jerome. 'The Eight Books 'of Stromata; Entituled the Commentaries, or Stromata of Titus Flavius Clemens, concerning 'true Knowledge; Eight Books of Hypotyposes, or Instructions, an Exhortation to the Gentiles, 'quoted in the Seventh Book of the Stromata; Three Books commonly called the Pedagogue; and a S. Clement of Alexan.

(a) S. Clement.] He was called Titus Flavius Clemens. S. Epiphanius, in the Heresie of the Secundians, says, that he was called Athenienſis by some, and Alexandrinus by others, which has been the occasion that it was generally believed that he was of Athens, and that he was called Alexandrinus from the name of the Church whereof he was a Priest, but his Country is not certainly known. He was of the Sect of the Stoicks.

(b) Disciple of Pantænus.] S. Clement had several Masters, as he tells us himself, Lib. 1. Stromat. q. 274. He says that he had two in Greece, one of Cœlosyria, and the other of Egypt. And two others in the East, whereof one was an Assyrian, and the other of Palestine, and descended from the Hebrews: But that at last he found out one in Egypt, who was more Excellent than all the rest. This last was Pantænus, whom he often mentions in his Book of Institutions. We do not know who were the other four. Baronius believes that the Assyrian was Bardesanes, and he of Palestine, Theophilus of Cæsaria; but Bardesanes was not properly an Assyrian, and Theophilus of Cæsaria was rather S. Clement's Companion than his Master. Velasius thinks with greater probability, that Tatian was the Assyrian, and Theodotus the Hebrew, under whose Name there is a Fragment of the Institutions at the end of the Work of S. Clement.

(c) Catechist of the Catechumens, &c.] Eusebius, Book 5. Chap. 10. and Book 6. Chap. 6. and S. Jerome in his Catalogue. We have already said, that Pantænus left the School of Alexandria to his Care when he went to preach to the Indians, and it is probable, that after his return they both taught in the same School.

(d) About the Year two hundred and twenty from the Birth of Christ.] It is generally believed that he died about the Year 200 from the Birth of Christ, but he must needs have lived longer, for Pantænus who was his Master lived to this time, and tho Ancients assure us that he survived him. He wrote his Stromata in the time of the Emperor Severus.

S. Clement of Alexandria.

'Book Entituled, What rich Man can be saved; a small Treatise concerning Easter; a Discourse of 'Fasting, another of Slander; an Exhortation to Patience, written to the Catechumens; a Book 'Entituled, The Ecclesiastical Rule, against the Jews, Dedicated to Alexander Bishop of Jerusalem. Besides these Books, S. Clement in his Second Book of the Pedagogue, Chap. 10. tells us, That he wrote a Book of Continence, and in his Third Book, Chap. 8. a Book concerning Marriage. Of these Works we have still Three remaining that are very considerable, The Exhortation to the Gentiles, the Pedagogue, the Eight Books of the Stromata, and the little Tract Entituled, What rich can be saved, which Johannes Mattheus Cariophylus, Arch-Bishop of Iconium, published from a Manuscript of the Vatican Library, whence Father Combefis made a new Version which he set forth, together with the Original Greek, in the last Volume of his Supplement to the Bibliotheca Patrum. [It was Printed also at Oxon in Twelves, 1683. Doctor Cave says, That it was published formerly under Origen's Name, being Printed by Michael Gheislerus, with Origen's Commentaries upon Jeremiah.]

The Exhortations to the Gentiles, is a Discourse written to convert the Pagans from their Religion, and to persuade them to embrace that of Jesus Christ. In the beginning of it, he shews what Difference there is between the Design of Jesus Christ, and that of Orpheus, and those ancient Musicians, who were the first Authors of Idolatry, by telling us that these drew in Men by their Singing, and the sweetness of their Musick, to render them miserable Slaves to Idols, and to make them like the very Beasts, and Stocks and Stones which they adored; whereas Jesus Christ, who from all Eternity was the WORD of God, always had a compassionate Tenderness for Men, and at last took their Nature upon him, to free them from the Slavery of Dæmons; to open the Eyes of those that were blind, and the Ears of those that were deaf; to guide their Paths in the way of Justice; to deliver them from Death and Hell; and to bestow on them everlasting Life; to put them in a Capacity of leading a Heavenly Life here upon Earth; and Lastly, that God made himself Man, to teach Man to become like unto God. Having thus represented the Advantages of the Christian Religion, he exhorts them in a few words, to embrace Vertue, Justice, Temperance, and to imitate the Example of Jesus Christ, that so they may become worthy of eternal Salvation. He afterwards shews the Falshood of the Pagan Religion: First, by discovering the Infamy, and Vanity of their Mysteries, which he enumerates and describes exactly. Secondly, by shewing the Original of Idolatry, and after what manner Men first invented those false Deities. 'Some, says he, contemplating the Stars, 'and admiring their Courses, deifyed them; so the Indians adored the Sun, the Phrygians the Moon, 'and others gathering with Pleasure the Fruits that grow out of the Earth, made a Deity of Corn, 'which they call Ceres, and another of the Vine, and that they call Bacchus. Others dreading Pu-'nishments, Afflictions, Miseries and Calamities, invented particular Deities, who were either the In-'struments of sending them upon Mankind, or else of diverting them from Men: Some Philosophers 'following the Fancy of the Poets, made Deities of the Passions, such as Love, Hope and Joy, and 'others placed the Vertues in the Rank of Gods, representing them by external Shapes; Hesiod and 'Homer in their Accounts of the Generation of the Gods, and Descriptions of their Actions have 'given Rise to a new sort of Theology. Lastly, the common People have made Gods of those, 'from whom they have received any considerable Benefit. After having thus discovered the Original of Idolatry, he shews the Folly of it, by proving that the principal Gods, as Jupiter, Mars, Vulcan, Æsculapius, &c. were Men like others, and that we know their Country, their manner of Living and Employments, and that we may see their Sepulchres to this Day: That the Poets have set down their Loves, their Wounds and their Crimes: That the wisest of the Heathens have owned the Falshood of these Deities: That the several Religions of the Pagans destroy one another: That it is a strange kind of Blindness, to adore Statues as real Deities. Then he goes on to the principal Design of his Work, which is to exhort Men to adore the true God, and to embrace the Religion of Jesus Christ: He shews that the wisest of the Philosophers, as Plato, Cleanthes, Pythagoras and Xenophon, have confest that there was but One true God; and that even the most ancient Poets, as Aratus, Hesiod, Euripides and Orpheus, have been obliged to acknowledge the same; and that the Sibyls, the Prophets, and the Books of Scripture teach only the Worship of One God. Afterwards he is very earnest to persuade Men to embrace the Christian Religion, in consideration of the great Advantages that it carries along with it, towards the Attainment of eternal Salvation, which they cannot otherwise hope for, and for preserving themselves from eternal Torments, which they cannot possibly avoid, but by believing in Jesus Christ, and by living conformably to his Laws. 'If you were permitted, says he, 'to purchase eternal Salvation, what would you not give for it? And now you may obtain it by Faith 'and Charity. There is nothing can hinder you from acquiring it, neither Poverty, nor Misery, nor 'Old Age, nor any other State of Life: Believe therefore, in One God who is God and Man, and re-'ceive eternal Salvation for a Recompence. Seek God, and you shall live for ever. Thus he concludes with a long Exhortation, wherein he most earnestly presses Men to quit their Idolatry and Vices, and to live and believe as the Christians do.

The Second Book Entituled the Pedagogue, is a Discourse entirely of Morality. It is divided into three Books. In the first he shews, what it is to be a Pedagogue, that is to say, a Conductor, Pastor, or Director of Men: He proves that this Quality chiefly and properly belongs only to the WORD Incarnate. He says that it is the part of the Pedagogue to regulate the Manners, conduct the Actions, and cure the Passions. That he preserves Men from Sins, and heals them when they have been already Guilty. That the WORD performs these Functions by forgiving our Sins, as he is God, and instructing Us as he is Man, with great Sweetness and Charity. That he equally informs

Men

Men and Women, the Learned and Ignorantt, becauſe all Men ſtand in need of Inſtruction, being all Children in one Senſe. Yet however, that we muſt not think that the Doctrin of the Chriſtians is Childiſh and Contemptible: But that on the contrary, the Quality of Children, which they receive in Baptiſm, renders them perfect in the knowledge of Divine Things, by delivering them from Sins by Grace, and enlightning them by the Illumination of Faith: And that ſo we are at the ſame time both Children and perfect Men, and that the Milk wherewith we are nouriſhed, being both the Word and the Will of God, is a very Solid and Subſtantial Nouriſhment. That the WORD guided the Jews in the Old teſtament by Fear; but that after it was Incarnate, it has changed this Fear into Love. The Reproaches, Afflictions and Puniſhments, which the WORD makes uſe of to chaſtiſe Men, are not Signs of his bearing any hatred towards them, but effects of his Juſtice, and of the Care which he takes to Correct them: That it is the ſame God, the Creator of the World, who is both Good and Juſt, that puniſhes and ſhews Mercy: That he is good upon his own Account, and juſt as to Men: That Reproofs and Chaſtiſements are for their Good; that there are two kinds of Fear, the Fear which Children have of their Father, or Subjects of their King; and the Fear which Slaves have of their Maſter. That both theſe Sorts of Fear are profitable to Men, but that the Firſt is by much the moſt perfect. That the WORD enclines Men to good by its Exhortations, and prevents them from Sinning, by its Threatnings: That he performed the Function of a Pedagogue by Moſes and the Prophets, and that he is at laſt come himſelf to give men ſuitable Remedies to their ſeveral Miſeries, and to Conduct them according to the Dictates of right Reaſon. That the whole Life of a Chriſtian is a continued Series of Actions, conformable to Reaſon, and that Sin is produced by the going out of that way.

S. Clement of Alexan. Chap. 5. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10. Laſt Chap.

In the 2d and 3d Book of the Pedagogue, S. Clement deſcends to the Recapitulation of Human Actions, and gives Rules for Temperance and Chriſtian Modeſty. In the former of theſe he ſhews, that the End and Deſign of Eating, ought not to be Pleaſure but Neceſſity, and that therefore we muſt avoid Exceſs both in the Quantity, and the Quality of our Meat. That Wine is not to be Drunk but with great Moderation, and that young Perſons particularly ought wholly to abſtain from it. He finds great Fault with Luxury in Houſhold-ſtuff and Moveables. He is of Opinion, that Vocal and Inſtrumental Muſick, ought to be baniſhed from the Chriſtian Feſtivals, and that we ſhould only celebrate therein the Praiſes of God. He is againſt immoderate Laughter, and uttering ſuch Words as are unſeemly. He requires that exact Modeſty be obſerved in the Countenance, and in Diſcourſe; he reprehends thoſe who put Crowns and Garlands upon their Heads, and who perfumed themſelves with Balm. He allows but little Sleep, and that in ſuch Beds, that are neither too ſtately nor too delicate. That it is not lawful to Marry but with a Deſign of begetting Children; That we ſhould not make uſe of Cloaths, but for the ſake of Decency. He declaims againſt Luxury of Apparel, againſt precious Stones, againſt Fantaſtical Dreſſes in Men or Women, and againſt publick Baths. He deſcribes and inveighs againſt all theſe things better than ever Juvenal, or any of the ancient Satyriſts had done before him. He intermixes his Satyr with ſeveral Curious Inſtructions, and deſcends to particulars like a Caſuiſt.

Book II. Chap. 1. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7. 8. 10. 11. and 12. Book III. Chap. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

He paſſes in the next Place to the Precepts of Vertue oppoſite to the Vices he has been reprehending: He ſhews, that there is none but the Chriſtian, who is truly Rich. That he ought to live in an entire Frugality. That he muſt not make uſe of any Exerciſes, and Pleaſures, no farther than is abſolutely neceſſary for his Health. He adds moreover divers Inſtructions, more particularly ſuited to the Women, to perſwade them to carry themſelves always Civilly, and Modeſtly, and more eſpecially in Churches. Laſtly, he makes a Collection of ſeveral Places of Scripture, which relate to Morality, and the Conduct of our Life, and concludes by exhorting Men to harken unto, and to obey the Precepts of Jeſus Chriſt, their Supreme and Sovereign Pedagogue, to whom he Addreſſes a Prayer, praiſing him with the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt, and returning him Thanks for making him a Member of his Church. Theſe Books are very profitable for thoſe that ſtudy Morality, and if the Caſuiſts of our Times had peruſed and conſidered them well, they had not fallen into that damnable Remiſneſs, wherein they have ſuffered themſelves to be overtaken: They might alſo be very uſeful to all Chriſtians, and I much wonder that no Perſon has undertaken to tranſlate them in this Age, wherein ſeveral Pious and Learned Men, have employed their Time and Labour in rendring intelligible to all People the moſt excellent Writings of the Fathers, by tranſlating them into our Language with a Clearneſs of Expreſſion, and Exactneſs of Style not to be imitated. But if any would undertake the Tranſlation of the Pedagogue, he muſt leave out ſeveral Paſſages, that are not fitting to be read by every Body, and accommodate ſome other Places to the Manners and Cuſtoms of our Times.

The Books Entituled Stromata (e) are ſo called, becauſe they contain ſeveral choice Thoughts (f) Collected from divers Places, and joyned together, ſo as to make a Variety ſomewhat like that in Turky-work

(e) The Books entituled Stromata.] This Book was called, as Euſebius tells us, The Stromatic Commentaries of Titus Flavius Clemens concerning the Gnoſticks, according to the True Philoſophy; This Title is at the end of the Firſt Book, oppoſing the Falſe Gnoſticks to the True ones, which are the Sober and Diſcreet Chriſtians.

(f) Choice Particulars.] The Word στρωματεις properly ſignifies a Sheet of Linnen, or a Bag to incloſe Pieces of Tapeſtry; it likewiſe ſignifies a certain Fiſh with Speckles on the Back. It is here taken for that neat Mixture we ſee in Tapeſtry, and it imports as much as Miſcellaneous Commentaries or Diſcourſes. Ruffinus tranſlates it, Opus varie contextum; Plutarch wrote a Book with this Title, and Origen wrote another after S. Clement.

S. Clement of Alexan.

Carpets. Let us ſee how S. Clement ſpeaks of his own Work, in the Beginning of his Fourth Book. 'Theſe Books, ſays he, are ſtor'd with Varieties, as their Name imports; we here paſs on continually 'from one thing to another, and we often mention things that are Foreign to our Subject. He afterwards compares this Work to a Meadow, a Tract of Land, or a Garden, wherein one may find all ſorts of Herbs, Flowers and Fruits, of which we may gather what we pleaſe. 'But not, as he 'ſays in another Place, to thoſe beautiful Gardens, where the Trees and Plants are ranged only to 'pleaſe the Sight; but rather to a thick and ſhady Mountain, where the Cypreſſes, the Linden-'Trees, the Lawrels, the Ivy, the Apple-Trees, the Olives, the Figg-trees, and other kind of Trees 'both fruitful and barren, are mixt together. He ſays that he has obſerved this Method deſignedly, 'that ſo he might not clearly diſcover our Myſteries to thoſe who were not yet initiated, and yet 'ſo as others might comprehend them, and might thence make their Advantage; as, ſays he, the 'Fruit-Trees of this Mountain, whereof we but juſt now ſpake, are concealed from thoſe who would 'rifle them, whereas the Labourer, who underſtands them, may pluck them up, and make a Garden, 'or a pleaſant Foreſt. Do not therefore expect, ſays he, in theſe Books, either Order or Politeneſs; 'ſince our Deſign was to conceal, and, if I may ſo ſay, to embroil Things, that ſo none but the In-'telligent, and thoſe who will take the Pains to inform themſelves, may be able to comprehend 'them: So that as S. Clement has not obſerved any Method in theſe Books, but intermixed ſeveral Notions all-a-long of Philoſophy, and Religion, it is a difficult Matter to make ſuch an Abridgment of them, as we have given of the Books of the Pedagogue. However we ſhall endeavour to give an Account of the principal Matters, which he there diſcourſes of.

In the Firſt Book, after having ſhewn how advantagious it is, for Perſons of Ability to Compoſe Books, he propoſes the Subject of his, ſaying that they ſhall contain the principal Verities of Religion mixt, or rather concealed under the Maxims of Philoſophy. Thence he takes occaſion to refute thoſe who find fault with Philoſophy; to ſhew the Profit and Advantage of it; to Diſcourſe of the Uſe that may be made of it: And he concludes by ſhewing that the Philoſophy of the Hebrews is the moſt Ancient of all, juſtifying this Truth by a moſt curious and exact Chronology.

In the Second Book he treats of Faith, and its Effects, which are Repentance, Hope and Fear; he proves that Faith is neceſſary; that it is not in us by Nature, but by Will; that it is God's Gift, but ſo as to depend upon our own Free-will; that true Repentance conſiſts in doing no more that which we are troubled for having done already; that there are two kinds of it, the Firſt is that of thoſe, who turned to the true Faith, to efface the Sins they committed, whilſt they were Heathens; the Second is that of thoſe, who have fallen after their Converſion, but yet have an Opportunity of obtaining Forgiveneſs, provided they are heartily ſorry for their Sin; but that thoſe who often fall into the ſame Sin, and by that means make a Circle of Repenting and Sinning, are like to thoſe who have no Faith: And that it is only a ſeeming, and no true Repentance, in thoſe who ask Pardon for thoſe very Sins which they never intend to reform. Upon occaſion of Repentance he Diſcourſes of Sin. He ſays that Men commit it freely, and that they are purified from it by Faith and Charity. That the Fear of God is very profitable for us, that it inſtructs us, that it cauſes us to avoid Sin, and that it incites us to Love. He commends Charity, Temperance and Hoſpitality. He condemns thoſe that plunge themſelves in ſenſual Pleaſures: And propoſes to them the Example of the Martyrs who ſuffered Fire, Torments, and Death it ſelf for the Defence of Juſtice and Truth. Afterwards he Diſcourſes of Marriage, and defines it to be a lawful Conjunction between a Man and a Woman, for the Propagation of Children. He approves of it, and ſhews its Advantages, telling us that it is never lawful to leave the Woman, in order to Marry another, upon any Pretence whatever.

He continues in the Third Book, to ſpeak againſt the Incontinence of the Nicolaitans, Carpocratians, Valentinians, and ſeveral other Hereticks, and he defends Marriage againſt the Marcionites, againſt Tatian, and the other Hereticks that blamed it, tho' he prefers Virginity before it as a greater good; Provided, ſays he, that it be kept merely for the Love of God, and for the obſerving his Commands. He maintains that Marriage is indiſſoluble, he does not entirely condemn Second Marriages, but blames them. He occaſionally tells a Story of Nicholas one of the Seven firſt Deacons, who is ſuppoſed to be the Author of the Nicolaitans, who having a handſom Wife, and being accuſed of Jealouſie, brought her, as they ſay, before the Apoſtles, and gave her leave to Marry whom ſhe pleaſed of them. But he excuſes Nicholas, and ſays, that thoſe who boaſt of being his Diſciples have put a wrong Conſtruction upon this Action, as well as upon his Words: That he was informed, that he never had any Commerce with any other Woman, but his Wife: That his Daughters remained Virgins, and his Son was very Chaſt. He ſays that the Apoſtles S. Peter, and S. Philip were Married, and that they had Children: That even S. Philip Married his Daughters; and he adds alſo, that S. Paul had a Wife, wherein he is miſtaken.

[Tho' it is uncertain whether S. Paul was ever Married, yet it is a raſh thing to ſay poſitively he was not. S. Clement alledges a Tradition in this Matter, which might eaſily be conveyed entire down to his time. It is plain, that the true Yoke-fellow, Philip. 4. 3. was a Woman; which others of the Ancients underſtood of his Wife, beſides S. Clement. His Expoſtulating with the Corinthians, and aſſerting that he had a Power to lead about a Siſter, or a Wife as well as S. Peter or any of the Apoſtles, may as well prove, that S. Paul juſtified his own Practice, 'as that he thought the thing ſimply lawful: eſpecially ſince he is there making a Defence for himſelf. The Queſtion however is very far from being certain in the Negative, and therefore at leaſt ought to be left undetermin'd.]

In the Fourth Book he treats of Martyrdom, and Chriſtian Perfection. He ſhews the Excellency of Martyrdom, and exhorts Chriſtians to undergo it, confuting the Hereticks, who held that Martyrdom tyrdom was no Vertuous Action: He makes the Perfection of Christianity, to consist in the Love of God and our Neighbour. He would have us love Sinners, and yet detest their Sin; that we should do good out of a Principle of Love, and not for Fear. 'For that Man, says he, that abstains from 'Evil only out of a slavish Fear, is not good voluntarily, but for Fear-sake; and he who would not 'have abstained but in Consideration of the Recompence, cannot be said to be Just with a good 'Heart. For in the one 'tis Fear, and in the other the Hope of a Reward, which renders them Just, 'or rather which makes them appear so to the Eyes of the World. He says that God inflicts Punishments upon Men for Three Reasons. First, that the Man whom he Chastises may become better. Secondly, that those who are to be saved, may take Warning by these Examples. Thirdly, lest he should be despised by Men, if he did not avenge Affronts and Injuries done to himself. S. Clement of Alexan.

In the Fifth Book, after having shewn that the way of instructing by Allegories and Symbols was very ancient, not only among the Jews, but also among the Philosophers, he proves that the Greeks took the greatest part of the Truths, which are in their Books, from the Barbarians, and principally from the Hebrews. This Book is full of Citations from the Poets, and the Heathen Philosophers.

In the Sixth Book, he speaks again advantagiously of Philosophy. Afterwards he begins to draw a Character of the True Gnostick, that is to say, to give the Idea of a Christian, that is perfectly Good and Wise. These are the principal Strokes of his Picture. The True Gnostick has the Command over his Passions. He is exactly Temperate, and allows his Body no more than what is necessary. He loves God above all Things, and the Creatures for God's-sake, and the Relation they bear to him, and nothing is able to separate him from this Love. He bears with Patience all unfortunate Accidents. He makes it his Business to know all things which relate to God, without neglecting human Learning. His Discourses are regular and to the purpose, full of Sweetness and Charity. He is never overcome with Anger. He prays continually by Charity, that unites him to God; First, begging of him the Remission of his Sins; and then the Grace not to sin any more, but to do Good. Afterwards S. Clement enlarges upon the Source or Spring, from whence this Gnostick derives this true Knowledge, and compleat Science. He says that it is the Holy Scripture, the Law and the Prophets, and in particular the Decalogue which he briefly explains; and Lastly the Doctrin of Jesus Christ foretold by the Prophets, preached throughout the World, and received notwithstanding all the Contradiction of Kings, and the great Men of this World, who opposed it with all their Might.

In the Seventh Book, he goes on to describe the Vertues of his Gnostick; he says that he employs himself entirely in honouring God, in loving him, in understanding, hearing and imitating his WORD, which was made Man for our Salvation; that he does it not only upon certain Days, but during the whole Course of his Life; that the Sacrifices by which he Honours him, are the Prayers and the Praises which he offers up at all times and in all Places; that he is Gentle, Courteous, Affable, Patient, Charitable, Sincere, Faithful and Temperate; that he despises the good things of this World, and that he is ready to suffer every thing for Jesus Christ; that he does nothing either out of Ostentation, or Fear, or the Desire of being rewarded, but out of pure Love to the Goodness and Justice of God: Lastly, that he is entirely Holy and Divine. Afterwards S. Clement Answers several Objections of the Greeks and Jews, who affirmed that the multiplicity of Heresies ought to hinder Men from the embracing the Religion of Jesus Christ. To which he Answers, that this multitude of Sects is likewise to be found among the Heathens, and the Jews; that it was foretold by Jesus Christ, that such a thing should happen among the Christians. That it ought not to make us forsake the Truth, but rather on the contrary to seek after it, with the greater Care and Diligence. That there is an infallible Rule to distinguish Truth from Falshood; that this Rule is the Holy Scripture, which being an incontestable Principle serves for a Proof of whatever we say. That it must be Confessed, that the Hereticks make use of it as well as the Catholicks. But then first they do not make use of all the Sacred Books. Secondly, those which they do use are corrupted. Thirdly, they chiefly urge ambiguous Passages, which they explain according to their own Fancy, by departing from the true Sense, and keeping only to Terms. Hence he takes occasion to condemn in general all Hereticks, who rejecting the Tradition of Jesus Christ, and his Apostles, and forsaking the Faith of the Church, have made themselves the Authors of particular Sects, by inventing new Doctrins, and corrupting the Truth. He says, that there is but only One Catholick Church, which is more ancient than all the Assemblies of the Hereticks; that it was founded by Jesus Christ, who dyed under Tiberius, and established it in the World by the Apostles, before the end of Nero's Reign. Whereas there was hardly so much as one Heresie older than Adrian's Time, and that they all bore the Name of their Author, or that of the Places and Countries where they first appeared, or from the Doctrin they taught, or the things which they honoured, which sufficiently discovers their Falshood and Novelty. He concludes by making the Description of these Books of the Stromata, and by promising to begin another Subject in the following Book.

The Last Book in our Editions, is a Collection of Logical Principles, which contains nothing that regards the Christian Religion, or that is worth giving an Account of. Photius observes, that in his Time there were some Editions, where this last Book was Entituled; What Rich Man can be saved? And that it began with these Words. Those who make Pieces of Oratory. But Eusebius distinguishes that Book from the Stromata.

S. Clement of Alexandria, does not start at all from the Doctrin of the Church in those Works of his, whereof we have already given the Abridgment. He does not only mention Three Divine

S. Clement of Alexan.

Persons, but he invokes them as One only God (g). Besides, he uses the Name of the most Holy Trinity. He says, That the WORD, which was from the beginning in God, which is God, and equal to God, by which he created the World, and instructed all Men, did at last become Man to save us by his Doctrin, by his Example, and by his Death. It is true, in another Place he says, That the Nature of the Son is the most Perfect, the most excellent, and that which approaches nearest to Almighty God, Words which would seem to imply as if he believed, that the Nature of the WORD was different from that of the Father: But we know well enough, that the Ancients had not yet made so exact a Distinction between the Terms Nature, and Person, and that they often took one for the other. And indeed his way of discoursing of the Excellency of the WORD, in this and other Places, sufficiently declares, that he did not believe that he was of a different Nature, taking the Word Nature in the same Sense as we at present. For he says, that the WORD is God, that it is without Beginning, that he is equal to the Father, that he is in the Father, that he created all Things, &c. Expressions which clearly discover what his Opinion was concerning the Divinity of the WORD. He seems however to follow the way of speaking of some of the Ancients, in saying that the WORD is Visible, that he may be known, and that it is by him that we know the invisible Father, of whom he is the Image; but it is an easie matter to accommodate these Expressions to the Doctrins of the Church, as we have shewn in our Critical Remarks upon several Authors already. He says, that the Blessed Mary remained a Virgin after she brought forth. He holds that the Dæmons sinned through Incontinency. He acknowledges Adam's Fall, and the Punishment of his Sin, which all Men have incurred. But he seems not well to have understood the Nature of Original Sin. 'Tis true, that in the Passage commonly alledged from him against Original Sin, he contradicts the Opinion of those who affirmed, that the Generation was Corrupted. But he speaks after such a manner as would make us think that he did not believe Original Sin, or at least, that he never considered it. Let them tell us, says he, how an Infant that is but just born has prevaricated, and how he who has already done nothing, could fall under Adam's Curse, &c. He often exhorts Men to do good by the Hopes of Eternal Happiness, and dissuades them from Evil, by the Fear of Everlasting Punishments, without speaking at all of the Opinion of the Millenaries. He holds, That without Faith in Jesus Christ none can be sav'd: But he says, That Jesus Christ, and the Apostles preached the Gospel in the Limbi to just Persons, as well Gentiles as Jews, that they might obtain this Faith, wherein they were before deficient. He ascribes much to Free-Will, he believes that our Salvation, and Faith which is the beginning hereof depends upon our selves, though not without the Assistance of Divine Grace (b). He speaks nobly of the Necessity and Efficacy of Baptism. 'Bap-'tism, says he, is called Grace, Illumination, Perfection, Washing, by which Name it is called, be-'cause it cleanses us from our Sins; it is called Grace because it remits the Punishment due for our 'Sins; Illumination, because it enlightens us with the Illumination of Faith; Perfection because it 'makes us perfect. And afterward, p. 95. These Bonds of Sin are immediately broken by the Faith 'of Man, and the Grace of God; Sins are remitted by this admirable Remedy of Baptism, and we 'immediately cease to be Sinners; from being Blind as we were before, we become clear-sighted, 'for what is taught to the Catechumens is purely Instruction to guide them to that Faith, which is 'thus internally conveyed by the Holy Spirit. We have given an account of the difference that he makes between the Remission of Sins committed after Baptism, and that which is obtain'd by Baptism. We have shewed that he allowed but one Repentance after Baptism, and that he rejects the Repentances of those Persons who often relapse into the very same Sins, as things of no value; that he approves of Marriage, and believes it indissoluble; that he blames Polygamy, and even second Marriages. He speaks but little of the Eucharist, and what he says of it is very obscure, because he endeavours to conceal this Mystery from those who were not Baptised. But he declares expressly in the Second Book of the Pedagogue, Chap. 2. That the Bread and Wine are the Matter of it, and condemns the Hereticks who used any thing else besides Bread, and Wine mingled with Water. He observes that in several Churches, after the Eucharist was distributed, it was left to the liberty of each of the Faithful to take a part of it. He often cites Apocryphal Books, as the Gospel according to the Egyptians, the Book of Hermas; yet in the mean time he only allows the Four Gospels to be Canonical. He admits of the Authority of Tradition, and that of the Church. These are the Opinions of S. Clement upon the Principal Articles of our Faith, which are conformable to the Doctrin of the Church, in all the main Points, and different only in some things of lesser Consequence. S. Clement of Alexan.

But this cannot be said concerning his Work of Institutions, which according to the Testimony of Photius contained several Errors, even contrary to what he had taught in his other Works. Let us see what this Learned Critick says of the Matter. The Hypotiposes, says he, were written upon some Passages of the Old and New Testament, which he explains and interprets briefly; but though he has in several Places very Orthodox and True Notions, yet in others he has some that are very Erroneous and Fabulous; For he says that Matter is Eternal, and he feigns Eternal Idea's produced by the Decrees of God; he places the Sun in the number of Created Beings; he holds the Metempsychosis; he pretends that there were several Worlds before Adam; he fancies Eve to be produced from Adam after an infamous manner, and different from that which is set down in the Scripture; he imagines, that the Angels having had to do with Women, begat Children of them; he thinks that the WORD was not really and truly Incarnate, but only in Appearance; he feigns two WORDS of GOD, the one Superior and the other Inferior, this last was that which appeared unto Men; he adds, that this WORD is not of the same Nature with the WORD of GOD, that it was not the WORD of the Father that was Incarnate, but a certain Vertue and Power of GOD proceeding from the WORD, which being a Spirit entred into the Souls of Men. He endeavours to prove these Opinions by Scripture. In a word, these Eight Books are full of such sort of Errors and Blasphemies; whether it be the Author of this Book that has written them, or whether it be any other who puts them out under his Name. The Intent and Design of the whole Work appears to be an Explanation of Genesis, Exodus, the Psalms, the Canonical Epistles, and Ecclesiasticus. The Author observes that he was the Disciple of Pantænus.

If this Work was so full of Errors, as there seems no reason at all to doubt after the Testimony of Photius who had seen it, it must needs have been composed by S. Clement, before he was throughly instructed in the Christian Religion, and had altogether quitted the Opinions of Plato; which seems very probable, for we cannot say that he was not the Author of these Books, which are attributed to him by all Antiquity, and there is no likelihood that they were falsified by the Hereticks in so many Places. Besids, that these are the Opinions of one who would accommodate the Platonick Philosophy to the Christian Religion, or rather of one who was half a Platonist and half a Christian. However, among the Ancients these Books have been had in sufficient Esteem and Reputation. Eusebius cites several Passages out of them. In the First Book, Chap. 12. of his History he brings one out of the Fifth Book, where it is said that Cephas, Matthias, Barnabas, and Thaddæus, were of the number of the Seventy Disciples of Jesus Christ. The same Eusebius in the Second Book, Chap. 1. produces another Passage taken out of the Sixth Book, where he says that Peter, James, and John (though they were preferr'd by Jesus Christ to the other Apostles) did not dispute about Precedency, but chose with one consent S. James the Just to be Bishop of Jerusalem. And another out of the Seventh Book, where he says, That these Three Apostles had the Spirit of Knowledge, which they communicated to the Seventy Disciples. In the 9th Chapter there is another Passage taken from the Seventh Book, where he says, That James the Brother of John by his Constancy converted his Accuser, and that they were both beheaded for the Faith of Christ. In the 15th Chapter, he says, that S. Clement in his Sixth Book of Institutions affirms, That S. Mark composed his Gospel by the Direction of S. Peter, and that this Apostle approved of it when it was finished. Lastly, Eusebius in his Sixth Book 14th Chapter tells us, That S. Clement in his Institutions explains all the Books of the Old and New Testament, not omitting even those of which many Persons doubted, as the Epistles of S. Jude, S. Barnabas, and the Revelation of S. Peter: That he says that the Epistle to the Hebrews was written by S. Paul, and translated by S. Luke: That S. Paul would not put his Name to it, because he was hated by the Hebrews. He sets down the Order of the Gospels; he says that the Gospels of S. Matthew and S. Luke were first written, that S. Mark composed his at Rome at the Instance of the Faithful, and by S. Peter's Order, and that S. John writ his last at the Desire of his Friends, to explain what was most Spiritual in Jesus Christ, the others having sufficiently spoken of his Body.

The famous Valesius has observed, That we have still a very considerable Greek Fragment of this Work at the end of S. Clement, Entituled, An Extract of the Oriental Doctrin of Theodotus. For it contains those very Errors, concerning Christ's Person, which Photius has observed in the Hypotiposes; and the Author says towards the end, that Pantænus was his Master. It is also likely that the other Fragment which follows, which is a Collection of Words and Expressions of Scripture, is likewise taken out of these Books, for besides that it is found with the Works of S. Clement, it is written after that manner in which Eusebius and Photius acquaints us, that the Work of S. Clement was composed, and it appears that it is the very same Design.

There is also another considerable Fragment of S. Clement taken from his Book, What Rich Man can be saved, in Eusebius, Book 3. Chap. 23. where he tells us a famous Story of S. John. He says that this Apostle coming to a City of Asia, recommended to the Bishop a young Man who seemed to have very good Parts: That this Bishop presently took care of him, and having sufficiently instructed him, he baptiz'd him; but afterwards neglecting to look after him as before, this young Man grew lewd, and became the Ring-leader of the Robbers; that S. John returning some years after, demanded of the Bishop the Trust which he had committed to his Charge, and let him know, that he required this young Man from him. The Bishop telling him that he was utterly lost, and that he was become the Head of the Thieves, this Holy Apostle being extreamly concern'd at this unfortunate Accident, immediately took Horse, caused himself to be taken by the Robbers, and to be brought before the Chief, who remembring him, immediately fled; but S. John running after him, made him acknowledge his Fault, promiſed to obtain for him Chriſt's Pardon, and brought him back along with him, and having put him into a Courſe of Repentance, he did not leave him till he was reconciled to the Church. We have this Book entire in the laſt Volume of the Supplement of the Bibliotheca Patrum, tranſlated by Giſlenius, and the Greek Text publiſhed by Cariophylus: 'Tis an excellent Diſcourſe, wherein S. Clement explains the Words of Jeſus Chriſt to the young Rich Man recorded by S. Mark, Chap. 10. And it ſhews, that in order to Salvation, 'tis not neceſſary for any one abſolutely to quit his Poſſeſſions and Riches, provided he makes a good uſe of them. Upon occaſion of this Queſtion, he diſcourſes of Love towards God, and towards our Neighbour, and of Repentance. By the way he ſays ſomething of the Advantage there is in having a Director, to reprehend us ſeverely for our Faults, and to give us ſuitable Remedies for our Amendment. And it was to ſhew the efficacy of Repentance, that he told this Story of S. John. We find under the Name of S. Clement, in the Bibliotheca Patrum, ſome Explications upon ſeveral Paſſages of the Old Teſtament, and Commentaries upon the Canonical Epiſtles. If theſe Fragments are really his, they muſt be taken from his Books of Inſtitutions, which is not very improbable, becauſe they have a near Relation to what Photius ſays of the Inſtitutions, and beſides they have the Genius of S. Clement.

There is no doubt but S. Clement was a Perſon of Extraordinary Qualifications. S. Jerom makes no Scruple of ſaying that no Man had ever more Knowledg than this Father; and it is certain, that of all the Ancients, there is none whoſe Books are ſo full of Profane Learning as his (i): He even ſhews too much of it for a Chriſtian Writer, and we may ſay that he was more a Philoſopher than a Divine, though he was by no means ignorant of our Religion, and perfectly underſtood the Holy Scriptures. But he is much more Emphatical upon the Moral than upon the Doctrinal Part of Chriſtianity; and he explains almoſt all the Paſſages which he cites, after an Allegorical manner in imitation of Philo Judæus. He writes almoſt always without Method and Coherence. His Style is careleſs; which may be particularly obſerved in his Stromata. For in his Exhortation to the Gentiles and his Pedagogue, he writes more ſtoridly, as Photius has obſerved, and he is all-a-long buoyed up with a certain Majeſtick Gravity, which is very delightful.

The Works of S. Clement have been Printed in Greek at Florence in the year 1550 for Torrenſis, by the Care of Petrus Victorius. They were tranſlated by Gentianus Hervetus, which Tranſlation was Printed at Florence by the ſame Perſon in the year 1551; at Paris in 1566, 1572, 1590, 1592, and in 1612; at Baſil in 1556, and with S. Irenæus in 1560, and 1566; at Amſterdam in 1613. Silburgius afterwards took Pains upon this Author, and having collected the Obſervations and Corrections of ſeveral Learned Perſons, cauſed it to be Printed in Greek by Commelinus in the year 1592, in Folio. Afterwards it was publiſhed in Greek and Latin by Heinſius, who reviſed the Tranſlation, and added ſome new Obſervations, and cauſed it to be Printed in Greek by the ſame Commelinus in the year 1616. This Edition was followed by thoſe of Paris in the year 1629, and 1621, which is the beſt of all; That of 1641 is not ſo Fair and Correct.

(i) Whoſe Books are ſo full of Profane Learning as his.] I believe the Reader will not think it tedious to read the followng Paſſage of Gentianus Hervetus concerning the Learning of S. Clemens. Do you deſire, ſays this Author, to read Hiſtories that are very ancient and very Curious? Read S. Clement who underſtood all Ancient Hiſtory ſo perfectly well, that one would think him to have been ignorant of nothing that had paſſed in the World. Have you an Eſteem and Veneration for the Verſes of the ancient Poets and the Anſwers of the Oracles? You cannot put too high a Value upon S. Clement, who quotes Paſſages from ſeveral ancient Poets, whoſe Works we have loſt. Would you be willing to know the Rites and Ceremonies which were obſerved in the Sacrifices of the Heathen Gods? Read S. Clement, who diſcovers the moſt hidden Myſteries of the Pagans. Beſides, Is there any one among the Chriſtians who has any Reſpect for the Superſtitions of the Heathens, who commends their Manners and Cuſtoms (and I wiſh to God there were no ſuch Perſons left) but if there be any, they may diſabuſe themſelves by reading S. Clement, who clearly makes out the Falſhood of the Pagan Religion, ſo that after having read it, they cannot but be aſhamed of their Folly. Have you a mind to underſtand the Opinions and Maxims of the ancient Philoſophers? Read S. Clement, who diſcourſes of the Original of Philoſophy, of all the Sects of Philoſophers, and of their Doctrin, yet ſo as he always prefers the Philoſophy of the Chriſtians before all others, and proves by invincible Arguments, that This is That which is only Divine, whereof God himſelf is the Author. Would you know the Tenets of the Hereticks who infeſted the Church in its Infancy? S. Clement explains them conciſely, and confutes them very ſolidly and ſubſtantially. Do you ſeek for Teſtimonies againſt the Hereticks of our Times? S. Clement will furniſh you with ſeveral. Have you a deſign to correct that abominable corruption of Manners in this preſent Age? There is no Author that reproves Vice more ſeverely, that exhorts more powerfully to the practice of Virtue, and that gives better Rules and Inſtructions for leading a Chriſtian Life. Laſtly, have you a mind to re-eſtabliſh the ancient Diſcipline of the Church? You cannot have too high an eſteem for the Learning and Sanctity of S. Clement, who being a Prieſt carried himſelf, and lived after ſo holy a Manner, that it were very much to be wiſhed, that there were more Perſons in this Age like him.

Miltiades;

Miltiades; The Two Apollonii; And Two Anonymous Authors, who wrote against the Heresies of Montanus and Artemo.

Miltiades, &c.

'TIS not known neither what was the Country, nor the Profession of Miltiades; he wrote a Book against the Montanists, wherein he particularly maintains, That a Prophet ought not to speak in an Ecstasie or Fury (a). Eusebius affirms, that he has left evident Proofs of his Skill, and the Pains which he took in the Study of the Holy Scripture, in those Books which he wrote against the Gentiles and the Jews, each of which was divided into two Volumes. And that besides these Discourses, he wrote an Apology for the Christian Philosophy, Dedicated to the Governours of the Provinces (b). This Author lived under the Emperor Commodus.

There were at the same time two different Authors, both of which were called Apollonius. The false is a Greek Author, who wrote against the Sect of the Montanists, wherein he confutes their last Prophecies step by step, and Censures the Practice and Manners of those Hereticks. Eusebius gives us a Fragment of it in Book V. Chap. 18. where he describes the Exorbitances of Montanus and his Prophetesses; he accuses them for taking Sums of Mony and Presents. He particularly reprehends two Persons of this Sect, who boasted of their being Martyrs. Besides Eusebius observes, that Apollonius says in this Book, that it was forty years since Montanus invented his Prophecies; that he makes mention of Thraseas, who was a Martyr in his time, and that he mentions a Tradition, that Jesus Christ had given Orders to his Apostles not to go out of Jerusalem for twelve Years.

The second Apollonius was of Rome, a Senator of that City, if we may believe S. Jerom (c). He was accused in the time of the Emperor Commodus for being a Christian, and was brought into the Judgment-Hall before Perennis the Præfectus Prætorio. His Accuser was condemned (d) according to the Law of the Emperor, which punished the Accusers of the Christians with Death, and Apollonius was sent back to justifie himself before the Senate; where he appeared, and made a very Eloquent Oration in Defence of his Religion, tho' notwithstanding that he was condemned to Death, because there was an Ancient Law which ordain'd, That those Christians, who were once judicially accused for their Religion, should not be acquitted if they did not forsake it. S. Jerome says, that he Composed this Oration to Present to the Senate. But Eusebius assures us on the contrary, that he spoke it before them. But whether he wrote it with a Design to speak it, or that the Christians had taken care to preserve it, it was extant in Eusebius's time among the ancient Acts of the Sufferings of the Martyrs.

The same Eusebius gives us a Fragment of an Anonymous Author against the Heresie of Montanus. This by some is attributed to Apollinarius, and by S. Jerome, sometimes to Rhodon, and sometimes to Apollonius. Tho' it was not written by either of these Authors, but by one more modern, who lived, as we have said, after the Death of Montanus and his Prophetesses. It was divided into five Books. Eusebius relates some Passages taken from the First, Second, and Third. In that which is taken from the first Book, the Author describes the furious Transports of Montanus and his Prophetesses, and those who pretended to Prophecy. In the Passages taken from the second Book, he says, That Montanus and Maximilla killed themselves; that Theodotus likewise threw himself down headlong; and that very Holy Bishops, as Zoticus of Comana, and Julian of Apamia, being willing to Convict the Prophecies of Maximilla of Imposture, were hindred by some who favoured that Sect. He adds, that Maximilla foretold, before she died, Wars and Persecutions, and yet that after her Death both Church and State enjoyed perfect Peace and Tranquility. In the Passage taken from the (a) In an Ecstasie of Fury.] This is taken from the Author against the Heresies of the Montanists, in Eusebius, Book 5. Chap 17. and the meaning of it is, that true Prophets ought never to deliver themselves in a Fury, nor to be out of their right Senses, as the Montanists were. This likewise is the Rule which S. Chrysostom gives for distinguishing the False Prophets from the True. Homil. 29 in Epist. ad Corinth. 8. And S. Jerom, in his Preface upon Nahum, Non enim loquimur in Extasi, ut Montanus, & Prisca, Maximillaque delirant, sed quod Prophetat liber est visionis intelligentis. S. Jerom here uses the Term Ecstasie in the same sense with the Anonymous Author.

(b) To the Governors of the Provinces.] Πρὸς τοὺς χοσμικοὺς ἄρχοντας. Eusebius and S. Jerom understood these Words of Emperors; but since there was but one in this Author's Time, it is more natural to explain this Expression by Governours of Provinces.

(c) If we believe S. Jerom.] Eusebius does not say, that Apollonius was a Senator, but S. Jerom affirms it in his Catalogue to Magnus. We cannot tell whether he knew it certainly, or whether it be only by Conjecture that he says so. But it is likely, that it was upon the account of his being a Senator, that the Præfectus Prætorio sent him back to the Senate to be Tryed there.

(d) His Accuser was condemned.] It was his Slave, if we may believe S. Jerom, and 'tis very probable, for he was condemned to have his Bones broken, the ordinary Punishment of Slaves.

third

third Book, he ſays, That the Martyrs, of which they boaſt, cannot juſtifie themſelves, ſince even the Marcionites likewiſe have made the ſame Pretences: But that the Martyrs of the Church do carefully avoid Communicating with thoſe of this Sect, as has been practiſed in the City of Apamia by the Martyrs named Alexander, and Caius, who were of Eumenia. Moreover in the following Chapter Euſebius relates a Paſſage taken from the ſame Book, where he ſays, That all the Prophets which have been ſince the time of the New Teſtament, ſuch as Agabus, Judas, Silas, the Daughter of Philip, Quadratus, were not agitated by the ſame Spirit of Prophecy as Montanus and Maximilla, whoſe Falſe and Lying Prophecies were made in a ſudden Heat, accompanied with Lewdneſs and Impudence, which took its Riſe from Ignorance, and ended in Involuntary Folly: But that in the ancient Prophecies, nothing like this was to be found. That ſince the time of Maximilla and Montanus, there has not been any Perſon of this Sect, who could boaſt of being a Prophet, whereas the true Gift of Prophecy ought to be always in the Church.

The other Author, whereof Euſebius gives us a Fragment without naming him, in the fifth Book of his Hiſtory, Chap. 28. had written a Diſcourſe againſt the Hereſie of Artemo, who believed, that Jeſus Chriſt was only a meer Man. It is related in this Fragment, that thoſe of this Sect affirmed, that till Victor's Days the true Apoſtolical Doctrin was preſerved, but that it was corrupted from the time of Zephirinus. 'Which poſſibly may be ſomewhat probable, (ſays this Author) if what they 'aſſert had not been firſt confuted by the Holy Scripture; and ſecondly by the Writings of thoſe 'Chriſtians who were more ancient than Victor, ſuch as Juſtin Martyr, Miltiades, Tatianus, Clemens, 'and ſeveral others that maintain in their Diſcourſes the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt. For who can be 'ignorant of the Writings of Irenæus and Melito, who have taught, that Jeſus Chriſt was God and 'Man at the ſame time? And even thoſe Hymns and Pſalms written by the Faithful ſince the begin-'ning of Chriſtianity, extol the Word of God, attributing Divinity thereto. So that ſince the Do-'ctrin of the Church has been Preached for ſo many Years, how can they ſay, that till Victor's time 'the whole Church was of their Opinion? Are they not aſhamed to invent this Calumny againſt 'Victor, who knew very well that Theodotus the Currier, who was the firſt Author of the Sect of 'thoſe that deny the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, was turned out of the Church by Victor himſelf? For 'if this Biſhop had been of the ſame Mind with Theodotus, how comes it to paſs that he Excommu-'nicated him upon the account of his Doctrin? And what probability is there, that Zephirinus, 'who ſucceeded Victor, and continued in the See of Rome for ten Years, ſhould make an alteration in 'the Doctrin of the Church? And thus it is that this Author confutes the General Principle of all Hereticks that ever were, or ever ſhall be, giving us an infallible Rule to convince them, which has been, and ſhall always be, the Cuſtom in the Church of God. For there was never any Age, wherein the Hereticks did not ſay, that the Church had changed its Doctrin, nor was there ever any time wherein they were not confuted firſt by Scripture, and ſecondly by Tradition, that is to ſay, by the Teſtimony of Authors, who lived before the Riſe of theſe Hereſies. Euſebius adds another Fragment from the ſame Author, where he ſpeaks of the Penance of a Confeſſor called Natalis, who ſuffering himſelf to be abuſed by Aſclepiodotus, and Theodotus the Goldſmith, the Diſciple of Theodotus the Currier, was tormented for ſeveral Nights as a Puniſhment for his Fault, and afterwards did publick Penance for the ſame in the Pontificate of Zephirinus, and ſo was Reconciled to the Church. To conclude, in this laſt Paſſage he deſcribes the Character of theſe Heretics, and he ſays, that they have corrupted the Scriptures, and overthrown the Rule of Faith; that when we object to them any Paſſages of Scripture, they try whether they can make thereof any Compound or Disjunctive Syllogiſms; that they ſtudy Geometry and Logick, and that they pervert the Simplicity of the Faith taught in the Holy Scriptures, by their falſe Subtilties, which is the Common Character of all Hereticks. We do not know who this Author is, nor what was the Title of his Book (e): But this Fragment ſet down by Euſebius plainly diſcovers, that he was a Learned Man, and well ſkilled in the Controverſie, and underſtood how to Reaſon cloſely againſt the Hereticks, and to give admirable Rules for their Conviction.

(e) We do not know who this Author is, nor what was the Title of his Book.] Nicephorus calls it the Labyrinth, and Theodoret, Lib. 2. Hæret. Fabul. confirms this Title. Photius, Cod. 48. attributes the Book of the Labyrinth to Caius, and others aſcribed it to Origen.

TER-

TERTULLIAN.

Tertullian.

TErtullian (a) was a Native of Africa, of the City of Carthage (b). His Father was a Centurion in the Troops which ſerved under the Proconſul of Africa (c). And there is no doub to be made, but that he was firſt a Heathen (d), but it is not known when, nor upon what occaſion he was entred into the Church (e). He flouriſhed chiefly under the Reigns of the Emperors Severus, and Antoninus Caracalla (f), from about the year of our Lord 194, till towards the year 216. And it is very probable that he lived ſeveral years after, ſince S. Jerom relates, that it was repo ted in his time, that he lived to an extream old Age (g). But we do not exactly know the time of his Dea h.

The Books that he wrote to his W.fe ſufficiently ſhew, that he was a Married Man, but we cannot gather from thence when he was Married. The l earned are divided as to this Matter, ſome pretending that he Married his Wife before he was a Chriſtian, and that he left her after he embraced Chriſtianity; others believing, that he was not Married till after he was Baptized. Which has been the occaſion that ſome have found a difficulty in clearing this Point, which at firſt ſight ſeems to be of no great moment, whether, as it is commonly believed, that Tertullian was ordained a Prie. within a little time after his Converſion; if he married his Wife after he was Baptized, and afterwards remained with her, it would ſeem that it might be concluded from thence, that in his time it was lawful for Prieſts to Marry. And this is that which has made Pamelius ſay, that Tertullian, before he was ordained Prieſt, made a Vow of Continence to his Wife. But becauſe it appears in the Books which he directed to her, that he ſtill lived with her when he wrote them, the Author of the Life of Tertullian and Origen has been obliged to ſay, that he might maintain Pame ius's Opinion, that theſe Books were written by Tertullian immediately after his Converſion: Though it is more probable, that Tertullian was not Married till after he was Baptized (h), and that he did not write theſe Books to his Wife till he was old (i), a little before he fell into the Errors of the Montaniſts.

(a) Tertullian.] He was called Q. Septimius Florens Tertullianus, which diſtinguiſhes him from the Conſul Tertullus and Tertullian the Martyr.

(b) And of the City of Carthage.] He teſtifies as much himſelf in his Book De Pallio, c. 2. and in his Apology, c. 9. Witneſs, ſays he, the Troops of our Country, ſpeaking of the Troops under the Proconſul of Carthage. S. Jerom confirms the ſame in his Chronicon, and in his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers.

(c) And ſays, that his Father was a Centurion of theſe Troops, which was no very conſiderable Employment.] Euſebius ſeems to ſay, that Tertullian was a Roman, and a Perſon of Quality, Hiſt. l. 2. c. 2. Τοῦτο Τερτυλλιανὸς τὰς Ρωμαίων νόμους ἠκριβωκὼς, ἀνήρ τε ἄλλα ἔνδοξος καὶ δὴ μάλιστα ἐπὶ Ρωμαίοις λαμπρὸς ὤν. What he ſays of Tertullian's being well ſkilled in the Roman Laws, has made ſome believe, that he was a Lawyer, and indeed there is a Lawyer of the ſame Name: But it is certain, that he is a different Perſon from our Tertullian; and Euſebius does not ſay, that he was a Lawyer, but that he was well verſed in the Roman Laws. What Euſebius adds of his Country and his Extraction, is by no means to be maintained, if we do not underſtand it of the Roman Writers; and that the Senſe muſt be, that Tertullian was one of the moſt Excellent of all the Latin Authors. Ruffinus has given this Senſe to this Paſſage of Euſebius by tranſlating it, Inter noſtros Scriptores admodum clarus. Pamelius ſays, that Tertullian was a Lawyer, but he brings no good Argument for it, relying only upon the Authority of Trithemius, who is a modern Author.

(d) But that at firſt he was a Heathen.] He himſelf ſays, ſpeaking to the Heathens in his Apology, We have been like-wiſe of your Party; Men are not born Chriſtians, but they become ſo. And in his Book De Spectaculis, and in that concerning the Reſurrection of the Fleſh, chap. 19. and 59. he ſays, That he had aſſiſted at thoſe Sights and Spectacles, and that he had ſpent part of his Life in Lewdneſs.

(e) But it is not known when, nor upon what occaſion he was converted to the Church.] Pamelius ſays, that he was converted by the Anſwer of an Oracle, and Father George of Amiens affirms, that it was by a Viſion, but neither of theſe are to be credited.

(f) And Antoninus Caracalla.] S. Jerom affirms, that he flouriſhed under theſe Emperours, and this appears by his Writings; ſome have ſaid, that he flouriſhed about the year 160, but they are miſtaken.

(g) To an extream old Age.] S Jerom, in his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, ſays, Uſque ad Decrepitam ætatem vixiſſe fertur.

(h) That he was not Married till after he was Baptized.] His Wife was a Chriſtian; and he does not ſay in any place of his Works, that ſhe was converted with him, or that ſhe had converted him; it is therefore more probable, that he Married her after he was a Chriſtian. For there is no likelihood, that while he was a Heathen, he ſhould Marry a Chriſtian Woman: and if ſhe had been converted with him, or that ſhe had converted him, he would without doubt have taken ſome notice of it in the Books which he wrote to her.

[His urging S. Paul's Authority and Command in his ſecond Book to his Wife, when he adviſes her to marry a Chriſtian if ever ſhe married again, is a ſtrong preſumption, that if he married after his Converſion, his Wife was a Chriſtian at that time.]

(i) Till he was pretty well advanced in Years. Theſe Books are compoſed in the form of a Laſt Will or Teſtament; In the firſt, he exhorts his Wife to preſerve her Continency after his Death; a ſign that ſhe had but little regard of it in his Life time. In the ſecond he tells her plainly, that it is a Duty to endeavour to maintain that Continency in their Widowhood, which they could not preſerve in their Married Eſtate: Which ſhews, that Pamelius's Opinion is nothing but a groundleſs Suppoſition. Theſe Books were written by Tertullian towards the end of his Life, as may be proved. Firſt by the Manner of the Compoſition, which is in form of a Laſt Will or Teſtament. Secondly, becauſe a Man ſeldom troubles himſelf to write to his Wife, what he would have her to do after his Death, but till he is in years. Thirdly, becauſe though Tertullian was not a thorough-paced Montaniſt when he wrote thoſe two Books, yet he ſeems to be leaning very much that way.

[This is not a neceſſary Conſequence.]

Tertullian. There is no Passage in his Writings from whence it can be concluded, that he was a Priest of the Catholick Church (k); but S. Jerom affirms it so positively (l), that there is no reason to question it. It is commonly believed, that he was a Priest of the Church of Rome (m): But being of Carthage, and having almost always remained there, he ought rather to be called a Priest of the Church of Carthage, than of Rome. He was not so happy as to preserve this Dignity to the end of his days, for after having continued in the Church for about 40 or 45 years, he separated from it in the beginning of the Third Century (n), to follow the Sect of Montanus and his Disciples.

As to the Reasons of his Separation some have said, that it was Jealousie that carried him to this Excess, because Victor was Preferred before him to the See of Rome; Others say, that he was angry because he could not get the Bishoprick of Carthage, which he put in for, and that this made him take up such a Resolution; And lastly, others have assigned different Reasons (o), which are yet less probable: But this is rather to divine, than to give the Reasons of Tertullian's Change; which are no where grounded upon the Testimony of any ancient Writer. That which has the most likelihood, is what is related by S. Jerom, that the Envy which the Roman Clergy bore him, and the Outragious manner wherewith they treated him, exasperated him against the Church, and induced him to separate from it. And besides, the extraordinary Austerity which appeared in the Sect of the Montanists, suited very well with his violent and severe Temper, which caused him to carry every thing to Extremities. And it was for this reason that he was so enraged against the Catholicks, and that he treated the Church with such Fury, after his Separation from it. It does not appear by his Books, that he ever afterwards returned from his Error, and none of the Ancients have affirmed it; but on the contrary, they have all spoken of him, as of a dead Man out of the Communion of the Church. It would therefore be a thing altogether against common Sense to imagine, as some have done, that he at last returned into the Bosom of the Church.

And this is an exact Abridgment of Tertullian's Life; let us now proceed to his Writings, and begin by examining the Order, according to which they were Composed, that so we may afterwards make a more exact Judgment of them. And by considering them in this manner with relation to the order of Time, they may be divided into two Classes: The first, comprising those which he composed whilst he was still a Catholick; And the second, those which he wrote after he was a Montanist. They are easily distinguished, because he never fails in his latter Books, of speaking of the Holy-Ghost of Montanus, of the Prophecies of the Montanists, and of their Extraordinary Fasts, of declaiming against Second Marriages, and against the Absolution which is granted by the Catholicks to those who fall into Sin after Baptism; or lastly, of Railing against the Catholicks whom he calls Psychici, that is to say, Carnal and Sensual. But we must consider them more particularly, and examine in what Years the several Books were written.

It is evident, that Tertullian wrote his Book Of Pennance, whilst he was yet a Catholick; for therein he expresly confutes one of the Principal Errors of the Montanists, by proving, that those who have committed Sins after their Baptism, may obtain Absolution from the Church, provided they do Penance. Erasmus questions, whether this Book be Tertullian's or no, because it is written more politely than his other Books; and the Authority of Erasmus has made Rhenanus reject this Discourse, though since 'tis quoted under Tertullian's Name by S. Pacianus an Author of the Fourth Century, (k) There is no Passage in his Writings from whence it can be concluded, that he was a Priest of the Catholick Church.] There is a Place in his Book de Animâ, c. 9. whence it may be concluded, that he preached in the Church of the Montanists, and that they related to him strange Visions. But as all the Montanists talked after this rate in their Assemblies, it cannot certainly be concluded from hence, that he was a Priest; and we have only the Authority of S. Jerome for it.

(l) But S. Jerome affirms it so positively.] In his Treatise of Ecclesiastical Writers, Cum usque ad mediam ætatem Presbyter Ecclesiæ permansisset, ad Montani Dogma delapsus est.

(m) It is commonly believed, that he was a Priest of the Church of Rome.] That which makes it believed that he was a Roman Priest, is what S. Jerome says of his falling into the Error of the Montanists, because he was provoked by Envy, and the Injuries which he received from the Clergy of that Church. But there is no necessity for all this that he should be at Rome, since there was a sufficient Intimacy and Correspondence between these two Churches, so that it might be easily known at Rome, what was said and done at Carthage, and though he had been then at Rome, yet it would not have followed, that he was Priest of that Church: None of the Ancients affirm it, but on the contrary, Optatus calls him a Carthaginian, as he calls Zephirinus Urbicus, that is, the Bishop of Rome: And also Victorinus Pataviensis. The Prædestinatus of Simondus calls him plainly a Presbyter of Carthage.

(n) In the beginning of the Third Century] The Epocha of his Change is certain, for we may easily fix it, because he says in his Book against Praxeas, that this Heretick being come to Rome, hindred the Bishop of that Church from acknowledging the Prophecies of Montanus, that he wrote against him at that time, and had obliged him to revoke his Opinion; that afterwards he acknowledged the Paracket, or Comforter. Now it is very likely, that Victor was this Bishop that rejected the Prophecies of Montanus; For Tertullian says, that Praxeas hindered him from consenting to these new Prophesies, by urging the Authority of his Predecessors, who could be no other than the Popes Anicetus and Eleutherus, in whose time these new Prophecies of Montanus first began to appear: So that Tertullian could not be turned till after the Pontificate of Victor, who was Pope from the Year 193, to the Year 201. He was a Montanist when he composed the Books against Marcion, which were written in the Year 207. So that Pamelius, who fixes his Change in the Year 210, is mistaken.

(o) Have given different Causes thereof.] Baronius is the Author of the first Opinion, ad An. 201. n. 9. Pamelius, in his Life of Tertullian, of the second. And there are others besides, who have assigned other Causes for his Change, which are all groundless.

there

there seems no reason to question its being Tertullian's: Besides, the difference of the Style is not very considerable, and it is no wonder that Tertullian, when he was a young Man, and newly Converted, should write a Book, upon which he bestowed so great pains, more politely than usual. Tertullian.

His Book of Baptism was written about the same time: For it is not only free from all the Errors of the Montanists, but even what he says, That Baptism is reserved to the Bishops, and that it is never permitted to Women to Teach or to Baptize, is expresly contrary to their Discipline.

Besides, we have no reason to doubt, but that he composed the Discourse of Prayer whilst he was yet a Catholick: For speaking therein concerning Fasts, he says, that there is no Solemn Fast among the Christians, but that which is before Easter; which is contrary to the Discipline of the Montanists, who observe several Lents. Besides, he cites in this Treatise the Book of the Pastor, which he rejected after he was a Montanist. We cannot exactly tell in what Year these Books were written, nor which of the three were Composed first.

His Apology for the Christian Religion was wrote about the year 200 (p), in the beginning of the persecution under the Emperor Severus. It is commonly believed, that he wrote it at Rome and Address'd it to the Senate: But it is more probable, that it was Composed in Africa (q), and indeed he does not address himself to the Senate, but to the Proconsul of Africa, and the Governors of the Provinces.

The Books concerning Patience, and the Exhortation to the Martyrs, may have been written about the same time: But that to Scapula was not composed till some years after as well as the Two Books to the Nations.

Afterwards, as he began to incline towards the Montanists, he wrote about the year 202, or 203, the Discourses concerning Publick Sights and Spectacles, and of Idolatry (r). This is the last of the two, the other being quoted Chap. 13. He was not yet a thorough-paced Montanist, but he began to imbrace their Opinions, though he had not yet openly left the Church. He still kept the same Opinions when he composed his Books Of the Ornament, and Dresses of Women (s): And two Books Dedicated to his Wife. His Book of The Testimony of the Soul has no certain Epocha (t); but as we do not find therein any Foot-steps of the Errors of the Montanists, we may believe that it was written by Tertullian before he separated from the Church.

And these are all the Works that can be attributed to Tertullian whilst he remained Orthodox, all the others being certainly written after his returning Montanist. His Books against Marcion are the (p) His Book of the Apology for the Christian Religion was written about the Year 200, from the Birth of Christ.] It is very likely that it was Composed about this time. M. Allix pretends, that it was not written till the Year 211, but his Reasons are but weak. He says, that he alludes in the 47th Chapter to the Book of Præscriptions; but though he here makes use of the term Præscribe, it does not thence follow, that this Book was Composed after that of the Præscriptions. The second Reason is taken from an Eclipse seen at Utica, in the Year 210, to which, says he, Tertullian alludes in the 20th Chapter; but he does not speak at all in this place of any particular Eclipse. The last and principal Reason of M. Allix, is that in the 4th Chapter of the Apology, he speaks of Severus, as if he were dead. Severus, says he, A Prince of great Constancy, has he not lately abolish'd by his Authority the Papian Law, which ordains, that one should have Children before the Age in which the Julian Law gives permission to Marry. But this might be said of Severus whilst he was yet living, and it is likely that he abolished this Law (if yet he did abolish it at all, for it was rather Constantine that did it,) in the beginning of his Reign. But what we read in the 5th Chapter, Who are those that have made Laws against the Christians, 'tis neither Adrian, nor Vespasian, nor Antoninus, nor Severus, might prove that he wrote after the Death of Severus, but we must read Verus, as it is in the latter Editions, and not Severus.

(q) It is more probable that it was composed in Africa.] Pamelius and several Authors are of Opinion, that he wrote his Apology at Rome, and that he addressed it to the Senate. But there is not one Passage in this Book, that gives any ground for this Conjecture. On the contrary, this Book is Addressed to the Chief Governours of the Cities. Tertullian speaks of Rome and the Romans, as not being in their City, nor with them. In Chap. 21, 24, 35, and 45. he speaks of the Proconsul, and there was not any at Rome. As to what we say, that it was not Addressed to the Senate, but to the Governors of the Provinces, the beginning of the Apology does evidently shew: Which is this, Si non licet vobis Romani Imperii Antistites, in aperto & in ipso vertice civitatis Præsidentibus ad judicandum palam despicere, & coram Examinare quid sit liquidum causæ Christianorum, si ad hanc solam speciem Auctoritas vestra de Justitiæ Diligentia in publico aut timet, aut erubescit inquirere. Si denique demesticis indiciis nimis onerata sectæ hujus infestatio obruit viam defensioni, &c. Those which he calls Imperii Antistites are the Governors and Proconsuls, and that which follows plainly shews it, for he says, that they preside in vertice civitatis, which does not signifie the City of Rome, which is always called Urbs; and what he adds, that it belongs to them to examine the Cause of the Christians, to try them, and to receive Informations against them, does evidently prove that he speaks of the Governours of Places. Secondly, he does not mention so much as one word of the Senate in the whole Book. Thirdly he speaks of the Proconsul, as of the Supream Magistrate, Chap. 45. Lastly, he always calls those to whom he Addresses this Work Præsides, a Title which properly agrees to the Governours of the Provinces.

(r) The Discourses concerning publick Sights and Spectacles and of Idolatry.] In the 5th Chapter of the Book concerning Idolatry, he alludes to the Joy at the Birth of Geta; He speaks in his Book concerning Publick Sights and Spectacles, Chap. 7. of the City of Rome, like a Person who was not there, so that this Book could not be made at Rome as has been believed.

(s) His Books of the Ornament and Dresses of Women.] The Latin Titles are, De cultu Muliebri, & de habitu Muliebri.

(t) His Book of the Testimony of the Soul has no certain Epocha.] It is was written after his Apology, as may be concluded from the 5th Chapter.

Tertullian. firſt of theſe laſt kind of Books (v); The Epocha of them is certain, for in the firſt Book, chap. 15. he ſays, That he writ it in the 15th Year of the Emperor Severus, that was the 207th after Chriſt. In the firſt of theſe Books he promiſes his Book of Præſcriptions (x): So that although this be a very excellent Diſcourſe, and that it contains nothing but what is Catholick, yet it muſt be confeſſed that he compoſed it when he was a Montaniſt, unleſs we ſhould ſay, that he kept it by him for ſome time unpubliſhed: However it be, it was compoſed when he wrote his Book concerning the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt, wherein he refers to the Book of Præſcriptions in the ſecond Chapter.

The Book concerning the Soul was written after the Books againſt Marcion, which are cited in the ſecond Chapter; but before the Book concerning the Reſurrection of the Fleſh, where he quotes his Book concerning the Soul, and alſo that concerning the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt. So that this is the Order of the Books compoſed by Tertullian after thoſe againſt Marcion. The Book of Præſcriptions, of the Soul, of the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt, of the Reſurrection of the Fleſh; theſe were all compoſed from the year 207 to the year 210.

His Scorpiacus (y), his Book De Corona (z), and that De Pallio (aa), were written about the ſame time, but we do not know the year. In his Book De Corona, he ſays that he had compoſed a Treatiſe concerning the Confeſſions, and Sufferings of the Martyrs. Baronius believes, that it is the Scorpiacus which he means: But I believe it is rather that Book concerning Flight in time of Perſecution. For his Scorpiacus was written againſt Hereticks, whereas that which he intended, when he wrote the Book De Corona, ought to have been againſt the Paſtors, who withdrew themſelves in time of Perſecution.

The Book againſt the Jews was written towards the end of the Reign of Severus, in the year 209. as appears by what he ſays of the State of the Roman Empire in the ſeventh Chapter (bb). We do not certainly know the time when thoſe Books were written againſt Praxeas, againſt Hermogenes, and againſt the Valentinians, but only that they were written by Tertullian when he was a Montaniſt (cc). Neither can we give any account of the time of his writing the following Treatiſes in Defence of the Montaniſts againſt the Church; His Diſcourſe of Chaſtity, of Feſts, of Monogamy, his Exhortation to Chaſtity, of Flight in time of Perſecution, and that wherein he proves, That Virgins ought to be veil'd. S. Jerom adds to theſe, Six Books of Extaſie, and a Treatiſe againſt Apollonius, which are loſt.

I have now nothing to conſider, but the ſmall Treatiſe addreſſed to Scapula, which we certainly know when it was written, for it was after the Death of Severus under Antoninus Caracalla, about (v) His Books againſt Marcion are the firſt of this laſt ſort.] It is evident that he was a Montaniſt, when he Compoſed the Books againſt Marcion; this appears by the 28th Chapter of his Firſt Book, by the 24th of the Third Book, by the 22d of the Fourth Book, and by the 15th of the Fifth Book. In the Fourth Book, Ch. 22. he calls the Catholicks Pſychici.

(x) He promiſes his Book of Præſcriptions.] Lib. 1. cap. 1. Alius libellus hanc gradum ſuſtinebit adverſus Hæreticos, etiam ſine tractatu Doctrinarum revincendos, quod hoc ſit de Præſcriptione novitatis; We may affirm, that it was written before, and that he only publiſh'd it then, that he might confirm ſome Arguments in his Books againſt Marcion. Which has given occaſion to ſome, to think that this Book was written by Tertullian, whilſt he yet was Orthodox, becauſe he ſpeaks ſo Advantageouſly for the Church againſt Novelties. But he makes uſe of the very ſame Principles in his Book againſt Marcion, and againſt Praxeas. The Catalogue of the Hereticks, where he puts the Montaniſts in the Number of Hereticks, is not Tertullian's; ſo that reaſon which might contribute to make it believed, that he wrote his Præſcriptions whilſt he was a Catholick, is of no conſequence.

(y) The Book entituled Scorpiacus.] This Book of Scorpiacus was written after the Books againſt Marcion, as may be ſeen by the 5th Chapter.

(z) The Book de Coronâ.] It was written upon occaſion of a Donative granted by the Emperors Antoninus Caracalla, and Severus, to the Soldiers, about the Year, 209.

(aa) The Book De Pallio.] Scaliger pretends that this was his firſt Work; and Salmaſius on the contrary ſays, that it was written when he was made Prieſt. The firſt believes, that the Cloak was a Habit for all Chriſtians. And the ſecond maintains, that it was only a Habit for the Prieſts; but both of them are miſtaken, for the Chriſtians and Prieſts wore both long and ſhort Garments indifferently, according to the Cuſtoms of the Places where they were. The Cloak was a Habit for Philoſophers, and ſuch as made Profeſſion of a more auſtere Life than ordinary. What is ſaid in the ſecond Chapter of his Book De Pallio, that the triple Virtue of the Emperor had intirely routed the Barbarians, and procured Peace and Tranquility to the People, can no otherwiſe be underſtood, but of the latter end of the Reign of Severus, who enjoyed a moſt profound Peace after he had defeated all his Enemies, and taken in as Partners in the Governments, his two Sons Caracalla and Geta, and this is what Tertullian calls Triplex Imperii Virtus, as when he ſays, Barbari excluſi, he alludes to the Wall which Severus cauſed to be built in Britain, to put a ſtop to the Incurſions of the Barbarians.

(bb) What is ſaid concerning the State of the Roman Empire, in the Seventh Chapter.] He aſcribes in this place the flouriſhing Condition of the Empire, the Germans beaten back, the Britains hemmed in and ſecured, the Moors beſieged by the Roman Legions, &c. Which agrees to the time of the Emperor Severus, though this cannot be underſtood, but of the latter end of his Reign, when after he had Conquered all the Barbarians, he cauſed that Wall to be built, which we juſt now mentioned, and diſperſed the Roman Legions about the Frontiers of the Empire, as Dion Caſſius obſerves.

(cc) We do not certainly know the time when theſe Books were written againſt Praxeas, &c.] It is evident, that the Book againſt Praxeas was Compoſed after he was a Montaniſt, ſupra. In his Book againſt Hermogenes, he accuſes this Heretick of Pretending to be Married, &c. which is a Reproach exactly agreeable to the temper of the Montaniſts; And in the Book againſt the Valentinians, he commends Proclus or Proculus, a famous Montaniſt. This Book was written after his Book againſt Hermogenes, for he obſerves there, that he had already written againſt this Heretick.

the year 213 (dd). And the two Books to the Gentiles were compoſed about the ſame time (ee). And this is the Chronology of all the Works of Tertullian.

There are ſome others which are falſly attributed to him: And amongſt theſe we are to reckon the ſmall Catalogue of Hereſies, which is at the end of the Book of Præſcriptions. For firſt of all, it is of a different Style. Secondly, it was not to be found in the old Manuſcript of Agobardus, which is the moſt ancient Manuſcript of Tertullian's Works, nor in another old Manuſcript, which Rhenanus made uſe of for the firſt Edition of Tertullian. Thirdly, in thoſe Manuſcripts where it is to be found, it is ſeparated from the Præſcriptions, and ſometimes in ſtead of being at the end, it is placed in the beginning, and ſo Trithemius both ſaw, and quoted it. Fourthly, the Præſcriptions have a Concluſion before this Catalogue, wherein Tertullian does not promiſe to make ſuch an Abridgment of the Hereſies, but to write againſt them all ſeparately. Fifthly, 'tis the Work of ſome Author that lived after S. Epiphanius, from whom he borrows the Hiſtory of Marcion, and perhaps he may have taken from S. Jerom what he ſays concerning the Jews.

There goes likewiſe under Tertullian's name a Letter concerning Jewiſh Meats, but it is of a quite different Style, and the places of Scripture are there quoted after another manner than they are in Tertullian's Works, which plainly ſhews that it is none of his: 'Tis a Letter of a Paſtor to his Church, written in the time of Perſecution. S. Jerom attributes to Novatian a Letter concerning Jewiſh Meats, which in all probability is this very Treatiſe that bears the ſame Title.

There is likewiſe attributed to Tertullian, a Book concerning the Trinity, which is none of his: For beſides the difference of the Style, that Author mentions the Hereſie of Sabellius, which was after Tertullian's time. S. Jerom obſerves, that Novatian writ a Book of the Trinity, wherein he had made an Abridgment of Tertullian's Book; and he adds, that ſeveral Perſons attributed Novatian's Book to S. Cyprian. The Book of the Trinity, whereof we ſpeak, might poſſibly be this Abridgment of Novatian, eſpecially ſince Ruffinus obſerves, that Novatian's Book was corrupted by the Macedonians, which agrees with this Treatiſe whereof we ſpeak, in which there are Errors concerning the Divinity of the Holy-Ghoſt.

There paſs alſo under Tertullian's Name ſeveral Poems, which are no more his, than they are Virgil's or Homer's. The Poem called Geneſis, ſeems to be that which Gennadius attributes to Salvian Biſhop of Marſeilles (ff), that concerning the Judgment of God was, perhaps, compoſed by Verecundus (gg) an African Biſhop, mentioned by Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis, in the ſeventh Chapter of his firſt Book of Illuſtrious Men. In the Poem againſt Marcion (hh), there are ſome Opinions different from thoſe of Tertullian. There is likewiſe a Poem to a Senator in Pamelius's Edition, one of Sodom, and one of Jonas and Ninive in the Bibliotheca Patrum, of which we do not know the Authors; the firſt is ancient, and the other two ſeem to be written by the ſame Author. Beſides, S. Jerom affirms, that Tertullian writ ſeveral other Treatiſes, which were loſt in his time, and amongſt others, a Book Of the Habits of Aaron, whereof this Father ſpeaks in his Letter to Fabiola. He quotes likewiſe a Book Of the Circumciſion, another Of thoſe Creatures that are Clean, and of ſuch as are Unclean, a Book concerning Extaſie, and another againſt Apollonius; Tertullian himſelf cites ſeveral other Treatiſes of his own compoſing, as in his Book Of the Soul, a Diſcourſe concerning Paradiſe, and in his Book Of the Teſtimony of the Soul, chap. 2. a Diſcourſe Of Deſtiny; and in another place, a Book concerning The Hope of the Faithful, and another againſt Apelles. He had alſo compoſed a former Work againſt Marcion, which being loſt in his own time, he was obliged to write a new one. Laſtly, he wrote the Diſcourſes Of Baptiſm, Of Publick Sights and Spectacles, and that wherein he proves, That Virgins ought to be veil'd, in Greek.

But we have ſaid enough of Tertullian's Works as to what relates to Criticiſm and Chronology, we will now look upon them with relation to what they contain. And conſidering them thus, we may (dd) About the Year 213.] Severus, ſays he, the Father of Antoninus, had ſome regard for the Chriſtians.

(ee) The two Books to the Nations compoſed about the ſame time.] In the Firſt Book, Chap. 17. he alludes to the Titles of Antoninus Caracalla, who cauſed himſelf to be called Parthicus and Germanicus; and in the ſame place, Chap. 9. he ſays, That there was not yet elapſed 300 Years from the Death of Jeſus Chriſt to his own time, which ſhews, that the Third Age was then already advanced. Beſides, that theſe Books were written ſince his Apology, which is the Subject of this, and which he here enlarges, and poliſhes, and puts into order in theſe two Books, wherein we may find ſeveral Phraſes and Expreſſions taken from the Books which he wrote after he was a Montaniſt.

diſtin-

Tertullian. diſtinguiſh them into three Claſſes: The firſt, comprizing thoſe which were written againſt the Gentiles. The Second, thoſe which were made againſt Hereticks. And the Third, thoſe which relate to Diſcipline and Manners. The firſt Book of this firſt Claſſis is his Apology againſt the Gentiles, wherein he ſhews the Injuſtice of thoſe Perſecutions and Sufferings which they inflicted on the Chriſtians, and the Falſhood of thoſe Accuſations which were laid to their Charge; and at the ſame time proves the Excellency of their Religion, and the Folly of that of the Heathens. He begins, by ſhewing that there is nothing more unjuſt or oppoſite to the very intent and deſign of Laws, than to Condemn without Underſtanding, and to Puniſh without conſidering whether there be any juſt Ground for ſuch a Condemnation. And yet that this is put in practice every day againſt the Chriſtians, that they are Hated, Condemned, and Puniſhed meerly upon the account of their being Chriſtians, without ever conſidering or giving themſelves the trouble to be informed what it is to be a Chriſtian. That there are indeed ſome Laws made by the Emperors, which forbid Men to be Chriſtians, but that theſe Laws are Unjuſt, ſubject to Alteration, made by Evil Emperors, and contrary to the Opinions of the Juſteſt and Wiſeſt amongſt them. He afterwards confutes the Calumnies which were ſpread abroad againſt the Chriſtians, as that they uſed in their Night-Meetings to cut a Child's Throat, and to devour it; and that after they had put out the Candles, they had filthy and abominable Converſations among themſelves. He ſhews, that there is not only ſo much as the leaſt Proof of theſe Crimes alledged againſt them, but that their Life, their Manners, and the Principles of their Religion, were directly oppoſite to theſe Abominations. 'We are, ſays he, beſet daily, we are continually betrayed, 'we are very often ſurprized and oppreſſed, even in the very time of our Meetings; But did they 'ever find this Child dead, or a dying? Was there ever any one that could be a Witneſs of theſe 'Crimes? Has ever any one of thoſe who have betrayed us diſcovered theſe things? Beſides, he preſſes the Heathens further, by ſhewing that theſe Crimes were frequently committed amongſt themſelves, that they have ſlain Children in Africa in Honour of Saturn, and that they have ſacrificed Men in other places, that their Gods have been guilty of a thouſand ſhameful and abominable Practices; whereas the Chriſtians are ſo far from killing a Child, and drinking its Blood, that they do not ſo much as eat the Fleſh of thoſe Beaſts that have been ſtrangled, that they are ſuch inveterate Enemies to all kind of Inceſts, that there are ſeveral amongſt them who preſerve their Virginity all their Lives. After having thus confuted thoſe Calumnies which were ſet on foot, on purpoſe to render the Chriſtians odious; he gives an Anſwer to that Objection which was made to them, That they did not own the Pagan Deities, and that they did not offer up Sacrifices to them for the Proſperity of their Emperors; from whence they concluded, that they were guilty of Sacriledge and Treaſon. He anſwers in a word, that the Chriſtians did not pay any Honour to the Gods of the Heathens, becauſe they were not true Gods, and he appeals, for a Teſtimony of this, to the Conſciences of the wiſeſt of the Heathens themſelves. He evidently demonſtrates that their pretended Gods were Men, and for the moſt part Criminals, that were dead, and that their Images cannot be Adored without the greateſt Folly and Madneſs in the World, that even the Wiſeſt of the Heathens deſpiſed them. He occaſionally confutes what has been objected by ſome to the Chriſtians, that they worſhipped an Aſſes Head, and adored Croſſes. And from thence he takes occaſion to explain the Doctrin of the Chriſtians. 'We Adore, ſays he. One only God, the Creator of the World, who 'is Inviſible and Incomprehenſible, who will Recompence Good Men with Everlaſting Life, and 'Puniſh Wicked Men with Eternal Torments, after he has raiſed them from the Dead. He proves this Truth by the whole Creation, which ſo evidently demonſtrates that there is a God: 'That it is, 'ſays he, the greateſt Wickedneſs that can poſſibly be conceived, not to acknowledge him, of whom 'tis impoſſible that we can be ignorant, even by the very Dictates which Nature inſpires into all 'Men, which oftentimes cauſe them to Invoke the True God, as when we ſay, If God thinks good, 'if God pleaſes, God ſees us, and the like. And this he calls, The Teſtimony of a Soul that is natu-'rally Chriſtian: Teſtimonium Animæ naturaliter Chriſtianæ. Laſtly by the Antiquity of the Books of Moſes, which are more ancient than all the Writings of the Greeks, and by the Authority of the Prophets, who foretold thoſe things that were to come to paſs. Then after having proved the Unity of God, which the Jews acknowledge as well as the Chriſtians, he goes on to that Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, which is peculiar to the Chriſtians: He ſays that the Chriſtians do not look upon him as a mere Man, but as God, who is the WORD of God begotten of the ſame Subſtance, that he is thus God and the Son of God, and that his Father and He are One; that the WORD coming down into the Womb of a Virgin, (as was formerly foretold) took Fleſh upon him, and was born God-Man: He only deſires them to conſider it as a Fable like theirs till he has proved it by Invincible Arguments: Which he preſently does by the Authority of the Prophets, who have plainly foretold Jeſus Chriſt by the Miracles which he wrought by that extraordinary Eclipſe which happened at his Death, that is taken notice of in the very Records of the Heathens; and laſtly, by his Miraculous Reſurrection. 'And all theſe Things, ſays he, are Authorized by the Teſtimony of Pi-'late, who being already a Chriſtian in his Heart, wrote them to Tiberius Cæſar, and the Cæſars had 'then been Chriſtians, if it had been poſſible either that the World could ſubſiſt without Emperors, 'or that the Emperors could be Chriſtians. He adds to theſe Proofs, that of the Eſtabliſhment of the Church notwithſtanding Perſecutions; and that which may be drawn from the Confeſſion of the Heathen Gods, that is to ſay, the Dæmons who ſubmitted themſelves to Jeſus Chriſt, and were againſt their wills driven out of the Bodies of thoſe that were Poſſeſſed only by the name of Jeſus Chriſt. And here he makes a Digreſſion, to prove, that the Romans owed not their Greatneſs and Proſperity to their Gods; from whence he concludes, that the Chriſtians are not guilty of Treaſon, ſince

since the Gods, whom they will not own, have not any Power to Succour and Preserve the Emperors. 'But, says he, we Invoke for their Prosperity the Eternal, the True, and the Living God, Tertullian. 'who gave them their Life and their Empire, who alone has power over them, and who alone is 'above them; and after whom they are the Chiefest. They are Great, only because they acknow-'ledge themselves Inferior to him, Ideo magnus est, quia Cælo minor est. 'Tis this God to whom the 'Christians pray with their whole Hearts, for all the Emperors, that he would grant them a long 'Life, a peaceable Reign, a faithful Council, valiant Soldiers, an obedient People, and in a word, all 'that a Man and an Emperor can possibly desire. He adds, that the Christians have greater Obligations upon them for the Performance of this, than other Men. First, because the Holy Scripture enjoyns them to it; and Secondly, because being perswaded that the World should end together with the Roman Empire, they desired to retard those Calamities which were to happen at the end of all Things, by praying for the Preservation of the Empire. That it is true, that the Christians do not swear by the Genii of the Cæsars, nor by their Health, which is more precious than those Genii who are only Dæmons, and that they do not Solemnize the Festivals of the Emperors, but that this is only for fear of falling into Idolatry. That in other things they are more Obedient, and better Subjects than other Men, though they have the Power in their hands, if they had a mind to defend themselves. 'We have been, says he, but a little time in the World, yet we are to be met with in all 'places; you may find us in the Cities, in the Villages, in the Armies, in the Courts of Justice, in 'the Senate, and in the Markets. We have left you your Temples alone to your selves. What Wars 'might not we be capable of Undertaking? And with what Resolution might not we carry them on, 'though we had not near so many Troops as you; we, who die daily with so much Joy, were it 'not a Law amongst us to suffer our selves, rather to be killed, than to kill others. Si non apud istam 'Disciplinam magis liceret occidi quam occidere. But how could the Heathens object, That the difference of Religion could cause any disturbance in the Commonwealth, or make Parties and Factions? He says, that the Christians have no Ambition, nor Pretentions in this World, as they are Christians; are so far from forming any Parties against the Government, that they think upon nothing less than State-Affairs. And that he might perswade the whole World of this Truth, see the Description which he makes of the Christians of his time, and of their Assemblies. 'We make up, says he, a 'Body that is united by the Bond of the same Religion, the same Discipline, and the same Hope. 'We assemble our selves, and compose, if I may so say, a Body of an Army, to force Heaven by 'our Prayers, and this Violence is very acceptable to God. We pray not only for our selves, but 'also for the Emperors; for their Ministers, for the Magistrates, for the good of the State; for 'the Peace and Quietness of the Empire; and lastly, for the retarding the end of the World. Be-'sides, we assemble our selves to Read the Holy Scriptures according to our different Wants and 'Necessities, for our Instruction, and Information in our Duty. These Sacred Oracles are of signal 'Use for the preserving our Faith, the confirming our Hope, and the regulating our Manners, by 'the Meditation upon its Precepts. And 'tis in these Assemblies that the necessary Exhortations 'and Reproofs are to be expected. The Judgments which are there delivered, are given with all 'the Equity and Circumspection imaginable; because those who pass Judgment are verily perswaded, 'that Almighty God takes notice of them. Their Censures are all Divine, and 'tis a great Presumption of God's future Judgment against any One, when he has committed any Sin, for which he 'deserves to be separated from the Communion of Bread, and from Prayer, and the Assembly of 'the Faithful; and in a word, to be deprived of all manner of Communion of holy Things. 'Those who preside among us, are the most Ancient, and such whose Probity is very well known; 'and this Honour is not to be purchased for Money, but it is bestowed upon pure Virtue; for all 'those Concerns which relate to God, are not to be valued at a Price. If we have any kind of 'Treasure, it is not to be look'd upon as a Blessing that is any ways dishonourable to our Reli-'gion, as if it was to be purchased upon any account. Every one contributes according to his 'Ability what Alms he pleases, and when he pleases, which yet is commonly done Monthly. None 'are compelled; every one gives freely what he will. These Contributions are the Contributions 'of Piety, for we do not employ them in making merry Meetings, or in other unnecessary Expen-'ces: But to maintain and bury Orphans, and poor People, to relieve old Men and infirm Persons, 'to assist the Faithful who were exiled into the Islands, or condemned to work in the Mines, or con-'fined in Prison, for having embraced the Faith of Jesus Christ. We all call our selves Brethren, 'not only because we are all Brethren by the Right of Nature, but because we all acknowledge 'One and the same God for our Father, because we have all one and the same Spirit which sancti-'fies us: And lastly, because all things are common among us, but our Women. Our Feasts are 'called Agapæ, that is to say, Entertainments of Love and Charity. They were not Instituted for 'debauched Parasites, but for the Entertainment of the Poor, being assured that God has a more 'especial Regard for them. And if the Reason of the Institution of these Feasts is wholly Sacred, 'the Consequences of them are equally so. There is nothing here to be seen, that is any ways con-'trary to Civility and Modesty. They do not sit down at Table, till they have refreshed and nou-'rished the Soul by Prayer; they eat no more than what is necessary to suffice Nature, and they 'drink no more than what is fitting and convenient for chaste and regular Persons; they take care 'not to glut themselves, so as to hinder their rising in the night to worship God. They discourse of 'such things as are profitable, because they look upon themselves, as in the Presence of God, who is 'a Witness of every thing that we say. The Supper is concluded with Prayer, and they do not break 'up in a Tumult or Disorder; but they retire regularly and with great modesty, as it is not hard for 'such

Tertullian.

'ſuch Perſons to do, who take greater care to nouriſh their Souls, with that holy Diſcipline, in which 'they are inſtructed, than their Bodies with the Victuals which they eat. After having thus deſcribed the Aſſemblies of the Chriſtians, he ſhews, that thoſe Calamities and Misfortunes which happen in the World, are unjuſtly attributed to them, as if they were the cauſe of them. He maintains, that 'tis theſe are the Men who divert and prevent them, and that they are very far from being any ways the occaſion of attracting them. He concludes, by proving that we admire thoſe Virtues in the Philoſophers, which are diſcernible in a much more excellent and higher Degree in the Chriſtians.

The Two Books to the Nations are almoſt of the very ſame Subject with the Apology. And Tertullian repeats therein the greateſt part of the things which he had ſaid before in his Apology, but he puts them in another Order, explaining and enlarging upon them: So that the difference between theſe two Books is this, that the firſt is written with Heat, and without much Study; and the ſecond is a Methodical Treatiſe, and compoſed with great Conſideration. The Second Book to the Nations was written againſt the falſe Gods of the Heathens, wherein he gave an exact Account of the Deities of the ſeveral prophane Religions, and ſhewed how exceedingly fooliſh a thing it is to own them; but this Book is ſo imperfect, and there is ſo little Coherence in all that we have extant of it, that it cannot be of any great advantage to us.

In the Book of The Teſtimony of the Soul, he enlarges upon one Proof for Religion, which he had advanced before in his Apology, that the Soul does naturally, and even againſt its will, acknowledge, that there is but one God, and that there is another Life after this. He proves it by thoſe Notions which Nature hath inſpired into us, and which are ſo deeply engraven in our Minds, that nothing is able to efface them: So that they often come from a Man, when he thinks of them the leaſt. As when one ſays without any reflection, God grant it, what pleaſes God, God help me, good God, &c. Expreſſions that manifeſtly ſuppoſe, that the Soul is penetrated with the knowledge of a God, as the Fear which we naturally have of Death, the deſire of leaving behind us a Name to Poſterity, and that Compaſſion which we have for the Dead do evidently ſuppoſe, that there is another Life after this. Now theſe Notions being natural to the Soul, and to be found in every Body, it muſt neceſſarily follow, that they come from God. And this is the Subject which Tertullian enlarges upon very ingeniouſly in this Little Treatiſe.

The Book to Scapula, was compoſed to diſſwade the Governour of Africa from the Perſecution which he had raiſed againſt the Chriſtians. He begins, by repreſenting to him, that the Chriſtians rather wiſhed for Martyrdom, than feared it; and that therefore it was not out of any Apprehenſion he had of them, that induced him to direct this Diſcourſe to him, but the earneſt Deſire which he had for the Salvation of the Heathens, becauſe the Religion of the Chriſtians obliges them to love their Enemies, and to endeavour to convert them from the Error wherein they are at preſent. He afterwards tells him, that the Chriſtians adore that God whom Mankind knows by Nature; he repreſents to him, that it ought to be left to the free Direction of Men to embrace that Religion, which ſeems to them to be moſt agreeable to Truth: That another Man's Religion does neither hurt nor good to any body: That it is not an Act of Religion to conſtrain Men to embrace a Religion, which they ought to chuſe voluntarily. Non eſt Religionis cogere Religionem, quæ ſponte ſuſcipi debet, non vi. He adds, that the Life of Chriſtians is unblameable; that they pay an entire Obedience to the Emperors; that they were never found engaged in a Party with the Rebels. 'They are, ſays he, Enemies to no Man, and 'leaſt of all to the Emperor, very well knowing that it is their God who has eſtabliſhed him, they 'love, honour, and reſpect him, moſt heartily wiſhing his Preſervation, and that of the Empire, as 'long as the World ſhall continue; We therefore honour the Emperor after that manner, which is 'lawful for us, and which only can be of advantage to him; that is to ſay, as a Man who is next 'under God, and who has received from God every thing that he has. We likewiſe offer Sacrifices 'for his ſafety, but they are Sacrifices of Prayer: For God does not ſtand in need of Incenſe, 'nor of the Blood of Victims. After having thus vindicated the Chriſtians from the Crime of High-Treaſon, he diſſuades Scapula from the Perſecution againſt Chriſtians, by the Examples of thoſe who have been puniſhed for perſecuting of them, and likewiſe by the Examples of thoſe who have had ſo much moderation, as to permit them to enjoy their Liberty and Tranquility. And theſe are the Books written by Tertullian, in defence of the Chriſtian Religion againſt the Gentiles.

This muſt be owned to have been a great piece of Ingenuity in a Doctor of Sorbon, when the Perſecution of the Hugonots was at the height in France.

There is but one Book of his againſt the Jews, wherein, Firſt, he proves, that the Law of Moſes, and its Ceremonies, were eſtabliſhed but for a time, and that they were to ceaſe at the coming of Jeſus Chriſt. And Secondly, that the Meſſiah expected by the Jews, and foretold by the Prophets is already come, and that this is Jeſus Chriſt. Which he evidently makes out from the Prophets, who foretold the time of his Coming, and the circumſtances of his Life and Death. He obſerves, that the Original of the Jews miſtake aroſe from their confounding his laſt Coming, wherein he will appear in great Power and Glory, with his firſt Coming, wherein he was ſeen in great Humility, and took upon him the mean Condition of other Men.

Although the Book of Præſcriptions againſt the Hereticks is not, in the order of Time, the firſt that Tertullian has written againſt them, yet it is ſo, as to the Order of the Matters which it contains; becauſe it is deſigned againſt all Hereſies in general, whereas the others are only againſt ſome particular Hereſie. This Book is entituled, Of Præſcriptions, or rather, Of Præſcription againſt the Hereticks; becauſe herein he ſhews, that their Doctrin is not to be admitted by reaſon of its Novelty. Before he enters upon the Matter, he endeavours to obviate the Scandal of thoſe, who admire, admire, how there could be any Hereſies in the World, how they could have been ſo great and ſo powerful; and how it comes to paſs that ſo many conſiderable Perſons in the Church, have been ſeduced to embrace them, by ſhewing that Hereſies have been foretold, that they are neceſſary Evils for the Tryal of our Faith, and that we muſt not judge of Faith by Perſons, but of Perſons by their Faith; Ex perſonis probamus fidem, an ex fide perſonas? After having given this neceſſary Caution, he lays down the firſt Principle of Preſcription. "We are not allowed, ſays he, to introduce any thing "that is new in Religion, nor to chuſe by our ſelves, what another has invented. We have the Apo- "ſtles of our Lord for Founders, who were not themſelves the Inventors, and Authors of what they "have left us; but they have faithfully taught the World the Doctrine which they received from "Jeſus Chriſt. Hereſies have riſen from Philoſophy and humane Wiſdom which is quite different "from the Spirit of Chriſtianity, We are not allowed to entertain our Curioſity, nor to enquire af- "ter any thing that is beyond what we have been taught by Jeſus Chriſt and his Goſpel, Nobis curioſi- "tate opus non eſt poſt Chriſtum Jeſum, nec inquiſitione poſt Evangelium. And when we have once be- "lieved, we are to give credit to nothing any farther than as we have already believed. And here it is, that he Anſwers the Objection of the Hereticks, who urged this Paſſage of Scripture, Seek, and you ſhall find; by telling us, that it is not permitted to ſeek when we have once found; that it would be a Labour to no purpoſe, to ſeek for Truth among all the Hereſies; and laſtly, that if it be permitted to ſeek, it is after having admitted the Rule, that is to ſay, the principal Articles of Faith, which are contained in the Creed. But as the Hereticks did often alledge the Holy Scripture, in Defence of themſelves; he proves that the Church was not obliged to enter into a Diſcuſſion of thoſe Paſſages which they quoted; that this way of confuting them is very tedious and difficult, becauſe they do not acknowledge all the Books of the Scriptures, or elſe they corrupt them, or put a falſe Interpretation upon them; which renders the Victory that is to be obtained over them uncertain and difficult. He ſays then, that it is to better purpoſe to underſtand perfectly, who it is, that is in Poſſeſſion of the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt; who thoſe Perſons are, to whom the Scriptures were committed in Truſt; and who are the firſt Authors who have given an Account of our Religion. He goes back even to Jeſus Chriſt, who is the Source and Original of this Religion, and to the Apoſtles who received it from him. He ſhews that it is impoſſible, that the Apoſtles ſhould preach any other Doctrin, than that of Jeſus Chriſt, and that all the Apoſtolical Churches ſhould embrace any other Faith, than that which the Apoſtles had delivered to them; from whence he concludes, that it muſt of neceſſity follow, that that Doctrin, which is Conformable to that, which is found to be the Faith of all the Churches, muſt be that which was taught by Jeſus Chriſt: And that on the contrary, that that which is oppoſite thereto, muſt be a Novel Doctrin. He farther confounds the Hereticks by the Novelty of their Opinions. It is evident, ſays he, that the moſt ancient Doctrin is that of Jeſus Chriſt, and by conſequence that alone is true, and that, that on the contrary, which had not any Date till after his Aſcenſion, muſt be falſe and ſuppoſititious. Having laid down this infallible Rule, he proves the Doctrin of the Hereticks to be of a later Date than that of the Church, becauſe the Authors of the Hereſies were after the Eſtabliſhment of the Church, from which they have ſeparated themſelves. That the ſeveral Sects of the Hereticks cannot reckon their Original from the time of the Apoſtles, nor ſhew a Succeſſion of Biſhops, from their Times, as the Apoſtolical Churches can, with whom they do communicate. That though they could pretend to ſuch a Succeſſion, yet the Novelty of their Doctrin condemned by the Apoſtles, and the Apoſtolical Churches would convince them of being Cheats and Impoſtors, and that what they have added, taken away, or changed in the Books of the Holy Scripture, does farther diſcover, that they invented their Doctrin after theſe Books were compoſed. That laſtly, their Diſcipline and Conduct, which is abſolutely Humane, and Earthly, without Order, and without Rule, renders them every way contemptible. I have exactly ſet down the Reaſonings of Tertullian in this Work; becauſe, as himſelf obſerves, they are not only proper to confute the Hereſies that were in his Time, but alſo to diſprove all thoſe that ſprang up afterwards, or that ſhould ariſe hereafter, even to the end of the Church. Tertullian.

I ſhall not enlarge ſo much upon the Works which were written againſt thoſe Hereſies which are now extinct. The moſt conſiderable, is, that which he compoſed againſt Marcion, which is divided into Five Books. This Heretick maintained that there were two Principles, or two Gods; the one Good, and the other Evil; The one Perfect, and the other Imperfect; that this laſt is the God whom the Jews worſhip, who created the World, and delivered the Law to Moſes; whereas the firſt is the Father of Jeſus Chriſt, whom he ſent to deſtroy the Works of the Evil One; that is to ſay, the Law and the Prophets, which Marcion rejected. He affirmed likewiſe, that Jeſus Chriſt was not Cloathed with true Fleſh: And by conſequence, that he did not ſuffer really, but only in appearance. Theſe are the Errors which Tertullian confutes in this Work. In the Firſt Book, he ſhews that the unknown God of Marcion, is only a Fantaſtical and Imaginary Being. In the Second he proves, that that God, the Creator of the World, whom the Jews worſhipped, is the Only true God, and the Author of all Good. After having demonſtrated this Truth by invincible Arguments, he reſolves thoſe Difficulties which are raiſed by the Marcionites againſt God's Conduct in the Old Teſtament. He explains for Example, Why he has permitted Sin? Why he ſuffers Sinners? Why he puniſhes Men ſo ſeverely? Why he ſeems ſometimes to alter his Conduct and Deſign, &c. In the Third Book he ſhews, that Jeſus Chriſt is the Son of God, who is the Creator of the World, and the Author of the Law, that he has been foretold by the Prophets, and that he took upon him true Fleſh, by taking upon him our Nature. In the Fourth Book he ſhews, that it is the ſame God, both in the Old and in the New Teſtament. He reconciles the pretended Contradictions alledged by Marcion, and ſhews Tertullian. that the whole Life of Jeſus Chriſt was foretold, and figured in the Old Teſtament. That Jeſus Chriſt has explained and confirmed the Prophets, and perfected the Precepts of the Law. In a word, he proves at the end of this Book, that Jeſus Chriſt is the Son of God, the Creator of the World, by the Doctrin of the Prophets, by his own Doctrin, by his Inclinations, by his Vertues, by his Opinions; and laſtly, by his Reſurrection. In the Laſt Book, he ſhews from the Epiſtles of S. Paul, that it is the ſame God, that is preached both in the Old and in the New Teſtament, and that Jeſus Chriſt is the Son of the Creator of the World. There are in this Book two difficult Paſſages concerning the Euchariſt, which have given Subject to very great Diſputes; of which I ſhall not ſpeak in this Place, contenting my ſelf to refer the Reader to thoſe, who have diſcourſed of them at large, that ſo I may paſs on to the other Works of Tertullian.

After having maintained the Unity of God againſt Marcion, he defends the Trinity of Perſons againſt Praxeas. This Heretick came from Aſia, to diffuſe the Poiſon of his Error in Rome, he was naturally of a very unquiet and uneaſie Temper, and beſides was vainly puſt up with the falſe Opinion of being a Martyr, which Quality he took upon him, becauſe he was for a ſhort time impriſoned for the Faith. Being come to Rome, under the Pontificate of Victor, he prevented this Pope from acknowledging the New Prophecies of Montanus; beſides he made him, if we believe Tertullian, revoke the Communicatory Letters which he had granted to the Montaniſts. He begun to divulge his Hereſie in the City of Rome, and afterwards went into Africa, where he made ſome Proſelytes; but he was convinced by a Catholick (which without doubt muſt be Tertullian) and obliged to put down in Writing a Recantation of his Error. So after he had concealed his Doctrin for ſome time, he publiſhed it anew, and Tertullian, who had confuted him before, whilſt he was yet a Catholick, wrote againſt him, after he fell into the Error of the Montaniſts. He eſtabliſhes in this Book, the Diſtinction of the WORD, and the Trinity of Perſons againſt the Hereſie of Praxeas, who acknowledged but One Perſon in God, making no Diſtinction between the Father and the Son, and by conſequence maintained, that the Father made himſelf Man, and ſuffered for Us. Tertullian oppoſes to him the Rule of Faith, which obliges us to acknowledge only One God in Three Perſons, which are all Three of the ſame Subſtance, and have all one and the ſame Power; and that it was the Perſon of the Son, who was incarnate, and died for Us. He ſhews that this Trinity of Perſons, does no ways prejudice the Unity of the Godhead, as the Unity of the Godhead does no ways hinder the Trinity of Perſons. That the Son is of the Subſtance of the Father, and that the Holy Ghoſt proceeds from the Father by the Son. That the WORD which was from all Eternity in God, and who did, as it were, come out of him to create and govern the World, as a Perſon ſubſiſting, who nevertheleſs has not a different Subſtance from that of the Father, ſo that it does not follow from hence, that we believe Two Gods, and Two Lords; that it is the Son, and not the Father, who made himſelf Man, without ceaſing to be God, and that the Properties of humane Nature, are only to be found in Jeſus Chriſt. In a Word, he explains very handſomly in this Treatiſe, the Faith of the Church, concerning the Myſteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation. It muſt be owned, that in ſome Places he expreſſes himſelf after a manner, not very agreeable to that which has been uſed in the following Ages (i). But we muſt pardon theſe kind of Expreſſions in the Ancients, who wrote before thoſe Terms, which they made uſe of, were fixt and limited to a certain Senſe.

But it is a difficult matter to excuſe him, where he ſeems to aſſert, as well in this Book, as in other Places of his Works, that God had a Body, or rather that he was Corporeal. Yet there are ſome Authors that vindicate him from this Error, and this has occaſioned a Queſtion, which is ſo common, and if I may ſay it, ſo trivial, that I do not think it neceſſary to ſay any thing of it in this Place.

Hermogenes was another African Heretick, who maintained that Matter was Eternal, and that God did not create it when he made the World, but that he only made uſe thereof, to form Things as we ſee. He ſuckt this Error from the Philoſophy of the Stoicks, and defended it by Syllogiſms, connected according to their Methods of Reaſoning, which made Tertullian ſay in the Treatiſe which (i) He expreſſes himſelf after ſuch a manner as is not very agreeable to that which has been made uſe of in the following Ages.] He ſays firſt, that the WORD was begotten of the Father, when God created the World; but he acknowledges at the ſame time, that he was in God, and a Perſon diſtinct from the Father from all Eternity. And ſo the whole Ambiguity lies in the Term Generation, which he does not underſtand of the Eternal Proceſſion of the Son, but of a certain Prolation or Emiſſion without, which he ſuppoſes was done at the Inſtant of the Creation of the World, becauſe it is by the WORD that God Created it, and doth ſtill govern it. And this appears evidently in Tertullian's Book, and we ought not to wonder, if in his Book againſt Hermogenes, he ſays, that there was a certain time, when the Father was not the Father, and when he began to be the Son, becauſe he believed that he had not the Quality and Name of Son, 'till this World was Created, though he was in God before, and diſtinguiſhed from the Father from all Eternity. Secondly, he ſays, that the Father is inviſible, and the Son viſible; but in that Senſe which we have explained, that is to ſay, that the Son, who has always rendred himſelf viſible to Men, by taking ſeveral Forms, under which he has appeared to them; and Laſtly, by making himſelf Man. Thirdly, He ſeems in ſome Places to inſinuate, that even the WORD, as it is the WORD, is inferior to the Father; but this muſt be underſtood of an Inferiority, which the Divines call of Original, that is to ſay, (as he explains it himſelf) becauſe he has received all from the Father; for he ſays expreſly in ſeveral places, that the Father and the Son are of one and the ſame Subſtance. Fourthly, He ſometimes makes uſe of the Word Subſtance, to ſignifie the Perſon Subſiſting, which is an uſual thing among the Ancients before the Council of Nice, and even among ſome of them after it.

he composed against him, that the Philosophers were the Patriarchs of the Hereticks. He there discovers the Fallacies of the Sophisms of this Heretick, and shews that our Religion teaches us, that God created even that Matter, whereof he made the World. Tertullian.

The Book against the Valentinians, is rather a Satyr and Raillery, than a serious Confutation of the Extravagant Sentiments of these Hereticks. Valentinus, the first Author of this Sect, separated from the Church out of spight, because hoping to be Elected a Bishop, by reason of his Wit and Eloquence, he was put by to prefer another Person, who had suffered for the Faith of Jesus Christ in times of Persecution. After he had separated from the Church, he invented, or rather revived an old Opinion, according to the Principles of which, he feigned a Succession, and imaginary Generation of a kind of Deities. His Disciples refined upon his Notion, and formed quite different Systems. But as all these Fancies were impertinent and ridiculous, so they took great Care to conceal them, lest if they should discover them, all the World should be presently sensible of their Extravagancy: 'Tis this which Tertullian upbraids them with. If you teach the Truth, says he to them, why don't you discover " it? It persuades by teaching, and it teaches by persuading; it is not ashamed or shewing it self; on " the contrary, 'tis ashamed of nothing, but of being concealed. You reproach us for our Simplicity; " it is true, we love it, because it is by this means, that we know, and make known the Will of " God. But 'tis no wonder that the Hereticks should blame this Simplicity, and should so carefully conceal their Principles; for they were so extravagant, that the bare Discovering of them would be sufficient to render them ridiculous: 'Tis this which Tertullian does in this Work. " I undertake, " says he in this Book, to discover to the Eyes of all Men, the hidden Mystery; but though I profess " to relate the Opinions of these Hereticks, without making a particular Confutation, yet I hope I " shall be pardoned, if I cannot forbear censuring them in some Places. What I do is nothing but a " Sport before a real Combat; I shall rather shew them where I could strike them, than lay them on. " But if there are found some Passages that may excite Laughter, 'tis because the very Subject causes " it. There are many things which deserve to be jeered and ridiculed at this rate, lest if we should " confute them seriously, we should seem to lay too great Stress upon them. Nothing is more due to " Vanity than Laughter; and to Laugh, does properly belong to the Truth, because it is pleasant, " and to Sport with its Enemies, because it is certain of the Victory.

And these are all the Books which are particularly against the Hereticks; there are others, in which Tertullian likewise confutes some Errors, and defends some Catholick Truths, though they were not written against any Hereticks in particular. Such are the following Books.

The Book of the Flesh of Jesus Christ, wherein he proves against the Hereticks Marcion, Apelles and Valentinus, that Jesus Christ took upon him true Flesh, like to ours, in the Womb of the Virgin.

The Title alone of the Book of the Resurrection of the Flesh, is enough to discover, that it was written against the Sadducees, and against the Hereticks who denied the Resurrection.

The Scorpiacus, so called, because it is a Remedy against the Poison of Hereticks, like Scorpions; defends the Necessity and Excellency of Martyrdom against the Gnosticks.

The Book of the Soul, written against the Opinions of the Philosophers, and the Hereticks, treats at large of the Nature of the Soul, and its Qualities. But it is full of false Principles and Errors. He pretends that the Soul is Corporeal, and that it takes a certain Form of Body, though it be invisible; He confutes the Opinion of Plato, concerning Reminiscency, or the Faculty of Remembring, and Pythagoras's Transmigration; he affirms, that the Soul does not come from Heaven, but that it is formed with the Body, and that as the Body of the Parents produces a Body, so their Soul produces a Soul. That all Souls, and even those of the Martyrs, which some have excepted, are disposed of after Death, in a certain Subterraneous Place, where they receive Refreshment and Torment, according to the Good or Evil which they have done: And that they expect the Resurrection, and the Day of Judgment, which will render them entirely Happy, or entirely Miserable to all Eternity. There are likewise in this Treatise, some other particular Opinions; as for Instance, that the Soul and Breath are the same thing; that that which is unreasonable in the Soul, comes from the Devil; that every Soul has its Dæmon; that all Dreams are not vain.

The Book of Baptism is divided into two Parts; the First relating to Doctrin, and the Second to Discipline. In the First he defends the Necessity and Efficacy of the Sacrament of Baptism against the Hereticks called Caiannites; he proves that the Waters of Baptism do procure to us Forgiveness of our Sins, and of the Punishment which they deserve. " What can there be, says he, more miracu- " lous, than to see that by washing the Body by an external Baptism, we efface at the same time, the " Mortal Stain of the Soul, and when that Stain is once taken away, the Punishment is likewise re- " mitted to us? He afterwards discourses of the Imposition of Hands, and of the Unction which followed after Baptism, to make the Holy Ghost descend upon the Faithful, and to draw down upon them the Blessings of Heaven. " We do not receive, says he, the Fulness of the Holy Ghost by Wa- " ter; but it prepares us for receiving it by washing us from our Sins. And as S. John prepared the " Way of the Lord, so the Angel which is present in Baptism, prepares the Way for the Holy Ghost, " by the Absolution of our Sins, which we obtain by Faith, which is confirmed and sealed by the " Invocation of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost. When we come out of the Font we are anointed; " and this Unction, which is performed on our Flesh, is profitable to our Soul, as external Baptism has " a spiritual Effect, which is to deliver us from our Sins. Afterwards, there is the Laying on of " Hands, to draw upon us the Holy Ghost, and this most Holy Spirit descends voluntarily from " Heaven, into purified and blessed Bodies. In the Second Part, he discourses of several Questions Tertullian. concerning Baptiſm, which relate to Diſcipline. The firſt is concerning the Baptiſm of S. John, whether it were from Heaven, or from Earth? He ſays, that it was from Heaven, becauſe it was ordained by Heaven: However, That it did not beſtow any thing that was Heavenly, but that it made way for Heavenly Things, by bringing us to Repentance; and that it neither conferred the Holy Ghoſt, nor Remiſſion of Sins. The Second, is concerning the Neceſſity of Baptiſm, upon which he ſtarts a conſiderable Objection, taken from what there might ſeem that the Apoſtles, of whoſe Salvation no doubt can be made, were never Baptized. To this he Anſwers, That poſſibly they might have been Baptized, though we find no mention of it; and in the Second place, that that Familiarity which they had with Jeſus Chriſt, the Greatneſs of their Faith, and the Ardency of their Charity, might ſupply in them the Defect of Baptiſm, ſince Jeſus Chriſt has promiſed the Remiſſion of Sins, and Salvation to thoſe Perſons who had Faith, though they were not Baptized. That nevertheleſs, there is no doubt to be made, but that at preſent, Baptiſm is neceſſary to Salvation; and that though formerly a Man might be ſaved only by Faith in one God, yet that now we muſt believe in Jeſus Chriſt, and that it was neceſſary, that this Faith ſhould be ſealed by Baptiſm, that Jeſus Chriſt had made a Law for it, and preſcribed the Manner, ſaying, Go and teach all Nations, baptizing them in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt. And that this Sentence of the Goſpel: If a Man be not born again of Water, and the Holy Ghoſt, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, does invincibly eſtabliſh the Neceſſity of Baptiſm.

The Third Queſtion is, Whether one may Baptize more than once? He ſays expreſly, that there is but one Baptiſm, that it never ought to be reiterated. He excepts however the Baptiſm of Hereticks; Who, ſays he, are not able to give it, becauſe they have it not. And therefore it is that we have a Rule among us to Re-baptize them. He adds, that Martyrdom is a kind of Second Baptiſm, which is inſtead of the Baptiſm of Water, when any Perſon has not received it, and which repairs it, when that Grace is loſt, which it conferred.

This is alſo ingenuouſly taken notice of, becauſe the Church of Rome allows Women to Baptize in Caſe of Neceſſity.

The Fourth Queſtion is, concerning the Miniſter of Baptiſm: He ſays, the Biſhop has Power of Adminiſtring it, and after him the Prieſts and Deacons; nevertheleſs, with his Permiſſion, to ſet a higher Value on the Prieſthood. That in Caſe of Neceſſity, any Man may adminiſter it, and that we ſhould be Guilty of the Loſs of a Soul, if we did not afford it that Grace, whereby it may be ſaved; there are none but Women, to whom he ſeems abſolutely to prohibit the Adminiſtring of Baptiſm, in any Circumſtance whatſoever.

The Fifth Reflection, is concerning the Condition of thoſe who are to receive Baptiſm. He ſays, that it is not to be Adminiſtred raſhly, and that it is good ſometimes to put ſome Stop to it, that thoſe who receive it may be the better diſpoſed. He would chiefly have this Diſcipline obſerved in reſpect to Infants, and though he ſuppoſes that they are capable of receiving Baptiſm, yet he will not allow them to be Baptized without Neceſſity. " What Neceſſity is there, ſays he, to expoſe God-fathers to the " Hazard of Anſwering for thoſe whom they hold at the Fonts; ſince they may be prevented by " Death, from being able to perform thoſe Promiſes which they have made for the Children, or elſe " may be diſappointed by their evil Inclinations? Jeſus Chriſt ſays, indeed, Hinder not little Children from " coming to me; but that they ſhould come to him as ſoon as they are advanced in Years, as ſoon as they " have learnt their Religion, when they may be taught whither they are going, when they are be- " come Chriſtians, when they begin to be able to know Jeſus Chriſt. What is there that ſhould com- " pel this innocent Age to receive Baptiſm? And ſince they are not yet allowed the Diſpoſal of Tem- " poral Goods, is it reaſonable that they ſhould be entruſted with the Concerns of Heaven? For the " ſame Reaſon, he farther ſays, it is proper to make thoſe, who are not Married, wait for ſome time, " by reaſon of the Temptations which they have to undergo till they are Married, or have attained " to the Gift of Continency. Laſtly, he ſays, Thoſe who ſhall duly conſider the great weight and " Moment of this Divine Sacrament, will rather be afraid of making too much haſte to receive " it, than to defer it for ſome time, that ſo they may be the better capable of receiving it more " worthily.

The Sixth, Is concerning the proper time for Adminiſtring of Baptiſm. He ſays, That it may be done at any time; but that the ſolemn Days for performing it, are the Times of Eaſter and Penticoſt.

Laſtly, he ſays, That thoſe who are deſirous to dip themſelves Holily in this Water, muſt prepare themſelves for it by Faſtings, by Watchings, by Prayers, and by ſincere Repentance.

And this is what the Second Part contains, wherein there are but two Errors, the Firſt whereof concerning the Baptiſm of Hereticks, is common to him, with ſeveral others; and the Second, which relates to the Baptiſm of Infants, is particular to him alone, and we ſhall not find any of the Ancients ſpeaking after the ſame manner.

The Book of Penance is the Firſt of thoſe which relate meerly to the Diſcipline of the Church, therein he diſtinguiſhes two ſorts of Penance; the firſt is that which is performed before Baptiſm; and the ſecond is that of thoſe, who being ſo unhappy, as to fall into Enormous Sins after Baptiſm; do recover themſelves by a laborious Penance. In the Firſt Part, he ſhews the Neceſſity there is of proving and preparing Ones ſelf, for a long time, for the Reception of this Grace of Baptiſm, by a true Repentance. He fears not to ſay, That Baptiſm is to no purpoſe, if we have not repented of our Sins, and amended them, and that it is great Preſumption to imagine, that having led a diſorderly Courſe of Life till the very Day of Baptiſm, we ſhould be made Holy all of a ſudden, and that we should cease from Sinning immediately after we have received this Sacrament. 'Can it be believed, 'says he, that the Reformation is made just at the time when we are absolved? No certainly, it is Tertullian. 'made at the time when the Pardon is yet in suspence, and that we are afraid still of the Punishment, 'though we had not as yet deserved to be delivered from our Sins, that we might be in a Capacity 'of deserving it. When God still threatens us, and not when he has pardoned us------I confess that 'God grants Remission of Sins, to those who receive Baptism, but they must take Pains to be made 'worthy of it; for who would be so bold, as to confer this Sacrament on a Person, of whose Repen- 'tance he has any reason to make a Doubt? You may impose upon the Minister, and so procure Bap- 'tism, by false Pretences; but God, who knows the Hearts, keeps his own Treasures himself, and 'does not grant his Grace, but only to those that are worthy of it; so that none can imagine that he 'may sin more freely, because being yet but a Catechumen, he shall receive the Remission of his 'Sins in Baptism; for this Sacrament is the Seal of Faith, and Repentance is the Beginning and Stamp 'of Faith. Lastly, We are not washt from our Pollutions by Baptism, only that we might sin no 'more, but because we have our Heart already purified: Quia jam corde loti sumus. The Second Part of this Treatise, is of Penance after Baptism, called Exomologesis. He declares at first, that he finds it difficult to discourse of this Second Repentance, which is the last Hope that remains to those who have committed any Crimes, that is to say, Enormous Sins after Baptism: 'Lest, says he, by 'treating of this new Means of recovering our selves from Sin, which God offers to us; it might 'seem as if we would open a Way for Sinning afresh. However, he says, that God foreseeing Man's 'Infirmities, and the Devil's Temptations, was willing, that though the Gate of Remission was shut, 'and the Grace of Baptism refused for ever to those who had forfeited their Baptismal Innocence; 'they should yet have one Remedy left, which is a second Repentance, but that it is granted to them 'but once. He afterwards describes the laborious Exercises of this publick Penance, called Exomo- 'logesis. 'Tis, says he, an Exercise instituted to humble and abase the Sinner. It makes him lead a 'Life that is proper to prevail with God for Mercy; it makes him lie in Sackcloth and upon Ashes, 'entirely to neglect his own Body; it overwhelms his Mind with Grief and Sorrow; it reduces him 'to drink nothing but Water, and to eat nothing but Bread, and to take no more than what is neces- 'ry for his Sustenance; it obliges him to prolong his Prayers, and to feed them, if I may so say, by 'Fastings: It causes him to break out into Sighs, Groans and Tears, to cry Day and Night to the 'Lord, to cast himself at the Priest's Feet, and to prostrate himself before God's Favourites. Lastly, 'To conjure all his Brethren to pray to God for him, and to appease his Wrath by their Prayers. After having thus described the Fatigues of this Exomologesis, he shews the Necessity of it, and reproves those who were ashamed to embrace it, when they had committed Sins after Baptism.

His Book of Prayer, is a Discourse partly Moral, partly Ecclesiastical; for in the First Part, he explains the Lord's Prayer; and in the Second, he discourses of some particular Ceremonies, used in the Prayers of the Christians. First, he advises the Christians to be reconciled to their Brethren, to free their Minds from all sort of Trouble and Passion, to purifie their Hearts from all Sin, before they betake themselves to Prayer; Secondly, He says that the Christians do not use to wash their Hands before Prayer, but that in Praying, they commonly lift them up towards Heaven. Thirdly, That it is not necessary to take off our Cloaks when we Pray, nor to sit always after Prayer. Fourthly, That we ought to Pray with a modest Countenance, lifting our Hands towards Heaven. Fifthly, That our Voices must be low, that we must not speak louder than is necessary, to be heard. For, says he, it is not the Sound of our Words that God gives Ear unto; but he regards the Intention of our Heart. Sixthly, That when we fast in private, and for the sake of Devotion, we must not abstain from the Kiss of Peace, as when it is a solemn Fast against the time of Easter. Seventhly, That the Stationary Days, that is to say, those Days when several of the Faithful continued in Prayer and Fasting till Three a Clock in the Afternoon; we must not abstain from assisting at the ordinary Prayers, as if it was necessary to break our Fast, as soon as we have received the Body of Jesus Christ. 'Your Sta- 'tion, says he, will be more solemn. Receive the Lord's Body, and keep it, and so you shall be 'Partakers of the Sacrifice, and you will perform your Devotion the better.

In his Book concerning Idolatry, he shews, that the Crime of Idolatry is not only committed by Sacrificing to Idols, but also several other ways, of which he gives us a very pretty Account. He pretends, that all those Workmen who make Pictures, representing the False Gods; that the Astrologers, who have given to the Planets the Names of the Heathen Gods, and who attribute to them any Power and Efficacy; Professors of Rhetorick, who commend the Gods of the Heathens; the Merchants, that furnish Commodities for the Adorning the Temples and offering Sacrifices to the Gods, are all guilty of Idolatry. He maintains, that it is not lawful for the Christians to Feast on those Days which the Pagans Solemnize in Honour of their Gods, nor to adorn their Houses with Torches and Laurels, in Honour of their Princes and Magistrates; that they may be allowed to go to the Weddings of their Kinsfolks, though Sacrifices be offered there; but that this is only to satisfie that Duty to which we were obliged, upon the Account of our Relation. That it is likewise lawful for Servants to follow their Masters to the Sacrifices, and for Christians to render to Heathen Emperors that which is their Due. But that they ought not to accept of Offices, nor bear Arms, at least, that they cannot do it without countenancing of Idolatry. Lastly, he does not acquit those of Idolatry, who attribute the Name of God to the pretended Deities of the Heathens, or who swear by their Name, whether it be through Custom or otherwise. And all this is grounded upon this most certain Principle, That all those who any ways favour the Wicked in their Vice, or contribute to Wickedness in any manner whatsoever, are themselves guilty; but Tertullian seems to stretch it a little too

Tertullian. far in ſome Particulars, and to lay too great a Streſs upon the Rigour of Things which might be excuſed: As for Example, To bear Arms for the Defence of the Empire, to Adorn their Houſes with Torches and Laurels, in Honour of their Princes, and to make uſe of ſome ways of Speaking that are Cuſtomary, though they may have ſome Affinity to Idolatry.

And to the ſame purpoſe, defending in his Book De Corona Militis, the Action of a Soldier, who had refuſed to put a Crown upon his Head; he maintains that it is abſolutely prohibited to the Chriſtians to Crown themſelves, and even to bear Arms. He ſpeaks in this Diſcourſe very advantageouſly of Cuſtom and Tradition, and relates ſeveral remarkable Examples of Ceremonies, which he pretends to be derived from Tradition. 'To begin, ſays he, with Baptiſm, when we are ready to enter into the Water, and even 'before we make our Proteſtations before the Biſhop, and in the Church, That we renounce the Devil, all 'his Pomps and Miniſters; afterwards we are plunged in the Water three times, and they make us anſwer 'to ſome Things which are not preciſely ſet down in the Goſpel; after that they make us taſte Milk 'and Hony, and we bath our ſelves every Day, during that whole Week. We receive the Sacra-'ment of the Euchariſt, inſtituted by Jeſus Chriſt, when we Eat, and in the Morning-Aſſemblies, and 'we do not Receive it, but from the Hands of thoſe that preſide there. We offer Yearly Oblations 'for the Dead, in Honour of the Martyrs. We believe that it is not lawful to Faſt on a Sunday, and 'to pray to God kneeling. From Eaſter to Whitſontide we enjoy the ſame Priviledge. We take 'great Care not to ſuffer any Part of the Wine and Conſecrated Bread to fall to the Ground. We 'often Sign our ſelves with the Sign of the Croſs; if you demand a Law for theſe Practiſes, taken 'from the Scripture, we cannot find one there; but we muſt anſwer, That 'tis Tradition that has 'eſtabliſhed them, Cuſtom that has authorized them, and Faith that has made them to be obſerved.

The Book concerning Flight in time of Perſecution, is a further Mark of the extream Rigour of Tertullian, for there he maintains, That it is abſolutely Prohibited to Fly in time of Perſecution, or to give Mony not to be Perſecuted.

The Book De Pallio, is a ſmall Treatiſe, wherein he endeavours to prove, that he had reaſon to quit the Toga, or the long Roman Gown, and to wear a Cloak; he ſhews therein a great deal of Wit and Learning, and it ſeems as if he Compoſed it, rather to ſhew what he was capable of ſaying upon ſo trivial a Subject as this is, than ſeriouſly to defend the Action.

In his Book concerning Publick Sights and Spectacles, he diſſuades the Chriſtians from thoſe Sights and Spectacles, ſhewing how theſe Pleaſures are both ſhameful and dangerous to thoſe who have Renounced the Pomps and Pleaſures of the World, and Idolatry.

There is no need of giving the Reaſons why he wrote thoſe Books concerning the Ornaments and Dreſſes of Women, ſince the Titles themſelves do ſufficiently ſhew againſt what Abuſe they were written: So likewiſe the Title of the Book, that Virgins ought to be Veiled, does diſcover the Subject; but we are not to underſtand it only of Virgins Conſecrated to God; for Tertullian's Deſign is to prove, that young Women ſhould be Veiled, that is to ſay, that they ſhould have their Face covered in the Church: Which he undertakes to prove, contrary to the Cuſtom of his Country, where only married Women were Veiled. And upon this Account he ſpeaks againſt this Cuſtom, and maintains, that it cannot preſcribe againſt Truth; which is true, when it relates to Doctrin, but not when it concerns only a Matter of Diſcipline, which is but of little Conſequence.

In the Firſt Book written to his Wife, he Exhorts her not to Marry again; and in the Second, he adviſes her, that in caſe ſhe will Marry again, to take a Chriſtian for her Husband.

The Treatiſe of Patience is an excellent Exhortation to the Practice of this Vertue: In which Diſcourſe, Tertullian ſets forth, with a great deal of Eloquence, all the Motives and Arguments which might induce Chriſtians to Patience, and diſſuade them from Impatience.

The Diſcourſe directed to the Confeſſors, whom he calls Martyrs, according to the ancient way of ſpeaking, is likewiſe a very powerful Exhortation to thoſe who were in Priſon upon the Account of the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt, to encourage them to bear with Patience their Chains and Torments, and to perſevere with Conſtancy to the End; nothing can be more Pathetical and Moving than this little Diſcourſe.

I have now nothing more to do, but to ſpeak of thoſe Books which Tertullian Compoſed againſt the Church, in Defence of the Montaniſts, and they are Four: His Book of Modeſty, of Monogamy, an Exhortation to Chaſtity, and A Treatiſe of Faſts. In his Book of Modeſty, he endeavours to prove againſt the Church, that it has no Power to Remit the Sins of Fornicators and Adulterers, and that when Men are once fallen into theſe Crimes after Baptiſm, they cannot be any more admitted into the Communion of the Church, how Penitent ſoever they may be. In his Book of Monogamy, and the Exhortations to Chaſtity, he abſolutely condemns ſecond Marriages, as being Adultery. Laſtly, In his Diſcourſe of Faſts, he commends the Exceſſive Faſts of the Montaniſts, who made ſeveral Lents, obſerving the Stationary Faſts, as if they had been expreſly enjoyned, making them to continue till Night, and not eating upon thoſe Days any thing but Bread and Fruits, nor drinking any thing but Water. In all theſe Books, excepting his Book of Exhortation to Chaſtity, he formally attacks the Church, and the Catholicks, whom he calls Pſychici, and ſpeaks every where very advantageouſly of Montanus and his Propheteſſes, believing that the Holy Ghoſt had inſpired them to ſet up and eſtabliſh a more perfect Diſcipline. For as to what relates to the Rule of Faith, that is to ſay, to the principal Doctrins of Religion, Tertullian and the firſt Montaniſts were of the ſame Opinion with the Church: And therefore it is, that in this Book againſt Praxeas, he ſays, that he always believed in One only God, in three Perſons, and that he ſtill believes it more firmly, ſince he has been inſtructed by the Paraclete or Comforter: And in his Book which he wrote, to prove that Virgins ought to be Veiled, he ſays, that excepting the Rule of Faith, which is immoveable, and can no ways be changed, Manners and Cuſtoms that relate to Matter of Diſcipline may be reformed and altered. That it is this which the Paraclet has done by the Miniſtry of Montanus, who has inſtructed Men in a much more perfect Diſcipline than that which the Apoſtles had taught them, that Juſtice was with him in the Cradle while he was an Infant: That the Law and the Prophets were as it were the Infancy, that the Gospel was as it were the Youth, but that there was no compleat Perfection to be found, but in the Inſtructions of the Holy Ghoſt, who ſpake by Montanus; for Tertullian and the firſt Montaniſts do not believe that Montanus was the Holy Ghoſt, but only that the Holy Ghoſt had inſpired him, and ſent him to Reform and Perfect the Diſcipline of the Church; and they did not attribute this Priviledge only to Montanus, but alſo to ſeveral of his Diſciples, and principally to Women; and they would have it believed, that there were among them ſeveral Perſons who had Revelations, and propheſied Things to come. Theſe Perſons were ſometimes ſtrangely agitated, ſometimes they fell into an Extaſie. This Sect gave a reſpectful Attention to all that they ſaid, either while they were thus agitated, or after they came to themſelves, as it was believed that theſe were ſo many Revelations, of which it was not lawful to make any doubt; they allowed them to ſpeak in their Aſſemblies when they would, and they believed that they had more Power and Authority than Prieſts and Biſhops. And this was the Reaſon that there was but very little Order and Rule obſerved in their Aſſemblies. But as to other things, they practiſed a very ſevere and auſtere Diſcipline; they for ever condemned not only thoſe, who after their Baptiſm had committed Murder or Idolatry, but alſo thoſe who had fallen into Fornication and Adultery, to lie under a perpetual Excommunication; They impoſed new Faſts, and obſerved them very ſtrictly, eating nothing but Bread and Fruits. They condemned ſecond Marriages; and they believed that it was not lawful to flee in Times of Perſecution. As ſoon as ever this Sect appeared in the World, it deluded a great many Chriſtians by that outward Shew of Perfection and Sanctity which it carried along with it. For on the one hand, the Auſterity of their Lives added Weight and Credit to their Revelations; and on the other hand, the Revelations cauſed their Diſcipline to be embraced. Several good Men were immediately brought into the Snare, and in a ſhort time we find the Churches of Phrygia, and afterwards other Churches divided upon the Account of theſe new Propheſies. Even the Biſhop of Rome himſelf was impoſed upon by them, and granted them Communicatory Letters, which he preſently Revoked, being ſenſible of his Error. The Chriſtians of the Church of France were more circumſpect as to this matter, and wrote to Pope Victor and the Churches of Aſia concerning theſe new Propheſies, giving ſuch a Judgment of them as was very diſcreet and agreeable to the Faith; as Euſebius tells us: But we do not certainly know what it was that they wrote, though it is very likely that they diſapproved of theſe new Revelations, wiſhing nevertheleſs, that they would treat with Gentleneſs and Moderation, thoſe who had ſuffered themſelves to be ſurprized by Error, that ſo they might be induced to return into the Boſom of the Church. At length the Biſhops of Aſia having met together ſeveral times, to examine theſe new Propheſies, conſidering of what Conſequence it was to put a Stop to their farther Progreſs, condemned them, and Excommunicated as well thoſe who were the Authors of them, as thoſe that followed them. And this is all that I thought neceſſary to ſay concerning the Sect of the Montaniſts, and the Condition in which it was in Tertullian's time. We will now return to our Author, and ſpeak of his Genius, his Style, and the Judgment that ought to be paſſed upon his Writings. Tertullian.

He was of a very quick, ſprightly and ſharp Temper, but he had not all that Exactneſs and Clearneſs that might have been wiſhed. There is very often more Glittering than Solidity in his Reaſonings: He rather ſtrikes and dazles by his bold Expreſſions, than convinces by the Force of his Arguments. His Thoughts are far fetch'd, and ſometimes lofty enough; the Turn which he gives them is high, but not very natural. He oftentimes ſtretches things too far. He is warm, and tranſported almoſt upon every thing. He is full of Figures and Hyperboles. He was very well furniſhed with Knowledge and Learning, which he ſufficiently knew how to make uſe of to good purpoſe. His Excellency conſiſted in Satyr, his Jeſts are very ingenious and biting. He attack'd his Adverſaries very cunningly, and overthrew them by a multitude of Reaſons; which are interwoven, and, as it were, linked one within another. Laſtly, if he does not perſuade by his Reaſonings, he at leaſt forces Conſent by that pompous way of Expreſſion whereby he ſets them out. His Style is Conciſe, his Expreſſions Emphatical, and there are in his Writings almoſt as many Sentences as Words. Yet Lactantius had reaſon to take notice of three conſiderable Defects in him. 'Tertullian, ſays he, was very well vers'd 'in the fine Learning, but his Style is neither fluent nor polite, but very obſcure. In loquendo parum facilis, parum comtus, & multum obſcurus. Theſe three Faults in Style are common to him, with the greateſt part of the African Writers (k), but we may ſay, that they are in a very high Degree in Tertullian, and that there is not any Writer, whoſe Style is more harſh, leſs polite, and more obſcure than his. All his Works are ſubject to theſe Defects, ſome more, and ſome leſs. He is more clear and conciſe in his Polemical Diſcourſes, more obſcure and harder in his common Places; as in the Book De Pallio, which is one of the obſcureſt Pieces of Antiquity. His Book of Penance is the moſt Polite of all. The moſt excellent, and the uſefulleſt of his Works, are, his Apology, the Præſcriptions, his Books of Penance, of Baptiſm, of Prayer, and his Exhortations to Patience, and to Martyrdom.

After what we have ſaid already, it is an eaſie matter to judge the true Character of Tertullian; But it is not ſo eaſie to determine, whether he be more to be Commended, or Blamed: For firſt of all, if we were to make a Judgment, in relation to the Service which he did the Church, it would be difficult to ſay, whether he has done more Hurt or Good. For on the one hand, he vigorouſly defended its Doctrin againſt ſeveral Hereticks, he maintained in ſome of his Works very conſiderable Points

(k) Theſe three Faults in Style are indeed to be found in the greateſt part of the African Writers. We muſt except Minutius, S. Cyprian and Lactantius, they had quite worn off that way of Writing, tho' S. Cyprian ſtill retains ſome reliſh of it.

Tertullian. relating to Diſcipline; and laſtly, he all along Eſtabliſhed an excellent Morality: But on the other hand, beſides that he always had ſeveral Errors, he formerly oppoſed the Diſcipline of the Church after he ſeparated from it. And if we judge in the ſecond Place by the Temper of the Man, there is ſo much of Good and Ill in it, that we cannot tell which of the two ought to carry it. Laſtly, If we make a Judgment of him by his Style, we cannot tell whether he is to be Commended for what he has that is Great and Surprizing, or to be Blamed, becauſe of its other Defects and Imperfections. And thus Learned Men have always been, and are ſtill extreamly divided (l) in the Judgments which (l) And thus Learned Men have always been, and are ſtill extreamly divided.] We ſhall here ſet down ſome Judgments made by the Ancients and Moderns concerning Tertullian: S. Cyprian, by the Relation of S. Jerome, who was told it by a Prieſt that had heard it from a Secretary of S. Cyprian's, uſed every Day to read ſomething of his Works; and when he called for his Book, he ſaid, Give me my Maſter. And in truth S. Cyprian has imitated him, and has borrowed a great many things from him. He has likewiſe compoſed the greateſt parts of his Works with the ſame deſign as Tertullian, as his Book of Idolatry, in imitation of Tertullian's Apology. His Books De Diſciplina & habitu muliebri, de zelo & livore, de Oratione Dominica, de opere & eleemoſynis, were written in imitation of thoſe of Tertullian upon the ſame Subject. Euſebius ſays of Tertullian, That he was one of the ableſt of the Latin Writers, and that he has obtained a great Reputation in all the Churches.

Lactantius paſſes the Judgment which we have already related, which is not very advantageous to him. S. Hilary ſays in his Commentary upon S. Matthew, That the Error into which he fell, has taken away the Authority of his Books, which deſerved Approbation. Conſequens error hominis detraxit ſcriptis probabilibus Authoritatem.

S. Jerome ſpeaks ſometimes very advantageouſly of him, as in his Catalogue, where he calls him a Man of a quick and ſharp Wit; and in his Epiſtle to Magnus, he ſays, That there was not any Author, who had more Learning and Subtilty; but in other places he reprehends his Errors and Defects. In his Apology againſt Ruffinus, he ſays, I commend his Wit, but condemn his Hereſies; and in his Book againſt Helvidius, who oppoſed to him Tertullian's Authority, he makes this Anſwer, What I have to ſay to you concerning Tertullian, is, that he is not of the Church. Eccleſiæ hominem non eſſe.

S. Auſtin commends Tertullian's Style, and always condemns his Error; in his Book De Geneſi ad Literam, he ſays, That Tertullian having an excellent Apprehenſion, did ſometime diſcover the Truth, and that he could not forbear ſometimes to eſtabliſh it even againſt his own Opinion.

Vincentius Lirinenſis gives a Character of Tertullian in theſe words; 'Tertullian, ſays he, was among the Latins what Origen was among the Greeks, that is to ſay, 'the firſt and the moſt conſiderable Man they had. In 'word, Is there any Author more knowing and better 'verſed, both in Eccleſiaſtical and Prophane Learning? 'Has he not compriz'd in his vaſt and prodigious Memory 'all the Philoſophy of the Sages, the Maxims of the different 'Sects, with their Hiſtories, and what elſe appertained 'to them? Did he ever undertake to attack any thing 'which he has not almoſt always, either pierced by the 'Vivacity of his Wit, or overthrown by the Force and 'Weight of his Reaſonings? And who can ſufficiently 'extol the Beauties of his Diſcourſe, which is ſo well 'guarded and linked together by a continual Chain of 'Arguments, that he even forces the Conſent of thoſe 'whom he cannot perſuade? His Words are as ſo many 'Sentences. His Anſwers are almoſt ſo many Victories, 'as has been ſufficiently experienced by the Marcions, 'the Apelles's, the Praxeas's, the Hermogenes's, the Jews, 'the Gentiles, the Gnoſticks, and a great many others, 'whoſe Blaſphemies he has ſilenced by great numbers 'of Books that have been as ſo many Thunderbolts 'which have reduced them to Aſhes. And yet tho' 'he has had all theſe Advantages, he did not continue 'in the ancient and univerſal Faith of the Church, and 'he has proved himſelf leſs Faithful than Eloquent. 'At laſt he altered his Judgment and his Error, as has 'been obſerved by that bleſſed Confeſſor S. Hilary, by 'which means he has taken away that Authority from 'his Writings, which otherwiſe they would have deſerv'd.

I ſhall take no notice of the Judgment of Tritkemius, Rhenanus, Politian, Pamelius, Rigaltius, and ſome other Moderns, which every Body may conſult upon occaſion, and I ſhall conclude with the Judgments given by two of our French Authors, who have both given us Characters of Tertullian, but in a different way.

The firſt is the famous M. Balſac, in a Letter written to Rigaltius, which is the Second of the Fifth Book. 'I expect (ſays he) the Tertullian which you are pub'liſhing, that he may learn me that Patience, for 'which he gives ſuch admirable Inſtructions; He is 'an Author to whom your Preface would have recon'ciled me, if I had had an Averſion for him, and if 'the Harſhneſs of his Expreſſions, and the Vices of 'his Age had diſſuaded me from reading him; but I 'have had an Eſteem for him for a long time, and as 'hard and crabbed as he is, yet he is not at all un'pleaſant to me. I have found in his Writings, 'that Black Light which is mentioned in one of the 'ancient Poets, and I look upon his Obſcurity with the 'ſame Pleaſure, as that of Ebony which is very bright 'and neatly wrought. This has always been my Opi'nion; for as the Beauties of Africa are not leſs ami'able, though they are not like ours; and as Sophoniſba 'has eclipſed ſeveral Italian Ladies, ſo the Wits of 'that Country are not leſs pleaſing with this foreign 'ſort of Eloquence, and I ſhall prefer him before a 'great many affected Imitators of Cicero: And 'though we ſhould grant to the niceſt Criticks, that 'his Style is of Iron, yet they muſt likewiſe own to 'us, that out of this Iron he has forged moſt excellent 'Weapons; and that he has defended the Honour and 'Innocence of Chriſtianity; that he has quite 'routed the Valentinians, and ſtruck Marcion to the 'very Heart.

The ſecond Character of Tertullian, Recherche de la Verite. is that which Father Mallebranche gives us in his Search after Truth, in his Second Book. Chap. 3. 'Tertullian, ſays he, was with'out doubt a Man of extraordinary Learning, but he 'had more Memory than Judgment. He excelled more 'in his Fancy and Imagination, than in Judgment and 'true extent of Thought. There is no doubt to be 'made, but that at laſt he was an Enthuſiaſt, in that 'ſenſe which I have explained it, and that he had al'moſt all the Qualities which I have attributed to 'theſe Fanaticks. That Reſpect which he had for the 'Viſions of Montanus, and for his Propheteſſes, is an 'unqueſtionable Proof of the Weakneſs of his Judg'ment. That Fire, thoſe Heats, thoſe Enthuſiaſms 'upon little Subjects, do evidently diſcover the Extra'vagancy of his Fancy: How many Irregular Tran'ſports are there in his Hyperboles and Figures? How 'many Pompous and Magnificent Reaſons, which 'prove only by their glittering, and which perſuade 'only by ſtunning and dazling of the Underſtanding! He afterwards endeavours to ſhew that this is a true Picture, by making ſome Excerptions out of his Book De Pallio, which he thinks to be the moſt proper Book to juſtifie what he affirms.

they have given, and which they ſtill give of this Author; which makes me believe that it is better to commend the Good, and to blame what is amiſs, than to pretend to make an abſolute Judgment, which would be always ſubject to a thouſand Diſputes. Tertullian.

In the laſt place, to ſpeak briefly of the Editions of Tertullian, there has hardly been any Author oftner Printed, and upon whom more Perſons have beſtowed their Pains. For which, two Reaſons may be given, the Corruption of the Manuſcripts, and his Obſcurity, and theſe two Reaſons are likewiſe the cauſe one of the other; for his Obſcurity induced the Tranſcribers, who did not underſtand him, to alter ſome Words, that they might make ſuch a Senſe as they themſelves underſtood: And the Corruptions of theſe Tranſcribers have been ſo far from clearing his Meaning, that they have rendred it ſtill more obſcure; which has been the occaſion that this Author has given ſo much Trouble to all thoſe that have hitherto ſet out any Editions of any part of his Works.

Rhenanus was the firſt who publiſhed Tertullian's Works, which were firſt Printed at Baſil in the year 1521. from two Manuſcripts which he had got out of two Abbeys in Germany; and the ſecond time in the year 1528. I have a great Eſteem for the Arguments and Notes, which this excellent Perſon, who was very well vers'd in all parts of Learning, and in Eccleſiaſtical Antiquity, has put at the beginning of the greateſt part of Tertullian's Works: And I think that no Man has laboured more ſucceſsfully than he in the Explication of this Author; and that Rigaltius has very well obſerved, that Rhenanus wanted nothing to have made his Work compleat, but more Manuſcripts. Yet his Notes have been Cenſured by the Spaniſh Inquiſition, and they have been put at Rome in the Index Expurgatorius, becauſe of ſome Remarks which were a little too free upon the Abuſes that were common in his time: But this ought not to diminiſh the Eſteem we ought to have for him. We likewiſe find Editions of Tertullian, printed at Baſil in the years 1525, 1536, 1539. But they are plainly Copies of the firſt Edition, wherein nothing is altered but the year. The third Edition of Rhenanus is the beſt, it was Printed at Baſil in Folio in the year 1550. In this Edition, there are ſome Books corrected by Gelenius out of a Manuſcript from England. The fourth was likewiſe Printed at Baſil in 1562. The fifth is of Paris, Printed by Guillard in 1545. The ſixth was Printed upon a very curious Letter in the year 1566, Printed at Paris in two Volumes in Octavo, for Volchelus, and Audoenus Parvus. Laurentius de la Barre ſet forth a new Edition of Tertullian, Printed at Paris in 1580. Then Pamelius Publiſhed Tertullian with new Commentaries: His firſt Edition was in the year 1579, Printed at Antwerp. It was followed afterwards by that of 1583, Printed at Paris for Sonnius; and it was afterwards Printed at Antwerp by Plantin, in 1584; at Heydelberg for Commelin in 1596, and 1599; at Cologne in 1617; at Geneva in 1597, 1601, 1607; at Zurich by Belley in 1657; at Paris in 1608, in 1616, in 1634, in 1658, in 1664; and at Roan in 1662. The Commentaries of this Author are both Learned and Uſeful, but he digreſſes too much from his Subject, and he often brings in things which are of no uſe for the underſtanding of his Author. Tertullian's Works have been likewiſe Printed according to Pamelius's Edition with Junius's Notes, at Franeker in 1597. In the year 1627, Rigaltius Printed nine Treatiſes of Tertullian at Paris in Octavo, more Correct, from a Manuſcript preſented by Agobardus, who lived in the Ninth Century, to the Church of Lions, whereof he was Biſhop, and he collated it with the various Readings of a Manuſcript of Monſieur Montchal. In 1584, Latinus publiſhed his Conjectures to reſtore ſome Places of Tertullian, which he pretended were corrupted. Pancirollus alſo had taken Pains upon Tertullian, but he publiſhed nothing. Fulvius Urſinus Collected ſeveral various Readings from Manuſcripts, and put them in the Margin of one of Pamelius's Editions of Tertullian which Rigaltius uſed. Johannes Woerus has likewiſe made ſome Notes upon Tertullian, as well as Albaſpinæus, who wrote ſeveral upon ſome Paſſages relating to Diſcipline and Penance. Pithæus, Mercerus, Junius, Salmaſius, Richerius, Theodorus Marſilius and ſome others, have made Remarks upon his Book De Pallio, Printed ſeparately at Paris in 1576, and 1594, with Junius's Notes; In 1600, with thoſe of Salmaſius; in 1625, Jacobus Gothofredus publiſhed from the Manuſcript of Agobardus the two Books to the Nations, which were never Printed before. They were Printed at Geneva for Chouet, together with the Commentaries of that Learned Lawyer.

La Cerda the Jeſuit undertook to make a Continued Commentary upon Tertullian's Works, more ample than thoſe which had been hitherto made: He began this Work, and cauſed two Volumes of it to be Printed at Paris in 1624, in 1630, and in 1641; but he never finiſhed it, and his Commentaries are only upon part of Tertullian's Book; and beſides they are long and tedious, becauſe he explains ſeveral things which need no Explication, and he very-often leaves his Subject.

After all theſe, the Learned Rigaltius having Reviſed Tertullian's Works from the Manuſcript of Agobardus, and making uſe of the various Readings Collected by Urſinus, Pithæus, and Junius, publiſhed the Text of Tertullian more Correct in very many Places, and added ſome ſhort Notes, to examine which of the two Readings is the trueſt, to reject or confirm ſome Conjectures, and to explain the moſt Difficult and Uncommon Words; and he has annexed at the end longer Obſervations, to explain the difficult Paſſages, or to clear ſome ancient Practices; or laſtly, to diſcover ſome Point of Learning which was more difficult to be cleared. 'Where, if, ſays he, you find any Opinions that are 'a little too free, as about the Confeſſion of Secret Sins, about the Face of Jeſus (which he believes 'was not at all Comely, grounding it upon the Teſtimony of Tertullian, and ſome others of the Ancients) and upon the Wax-Tapers which are lighted up in the Churches in the Day-time, you muſt 'not think that I have taken notice of them any otherwiſe, than as they were neceſſary to explain 'Tertullian's Notions, and not any ways to reprehend the Doctrin of the Catholick Church, or to 'diſapprove of the Opinions of thoſe Fathers, who lived after his time. Words by which Rigaltius endeavours to excuſe thoſe Opinions, which were too freely inſerted ſometimes by him in his Notes, Tertullian. as well upon S. Cyprian as Tertullian; but I do not know whether this Excuſe will ſatisfie every Body, for it muſt be confeſſed, that there are ſome Places, wherein he ſufficiently ſhews, that he ſpeaks according to his own Opinion, rather than according to that of his Author, and in which he even digreſſes from his Subject, to make Obſervations which are ſometimes not very agreeable to the preſent Practice of the Church: But though we might have ſome reaſon to tax ſome of his Notes as to what relates to Divinity; yet we muſt confeſs on the other ſide, that the Notes and Remarks which he has made relating to Criticiſm, Grammar, and the Explication of ſome difficult Paſſages of Tertullian, are very excellent. However he is generally blamed for being too bold in his Conjectures, and that he has not been exact enough in Reviſing his Author from ancient Manuſcripts; and laſtly, that he has inſerted his Conjectures, and other Men's into the Text, without the Authority of any Manuſcripts.

The Bookſeller, who printed the Tertullian of Rigaltius in 1634, being willing to make the Work as Compleat as he could, Printed in 1635, in a Volume by it ſelf, the Notes and Commentaries of thoſe who had taken Pains upon Tertullian before him, that ſo we might have all that had been done upon this Author, excepting the Commentaries of La Cerda. This Volume joyned to the Edition of Rigaltius's Tertullian of 1634, which was afterwards Reprinted in 1641, is the perfecteſt Edition of this Author.

It has been ſince Printed in 1664, which is not ſo large, but more Commodious, wherein they have put in the Margin the entire Notes and Obſervations of Rigaltius, together with others ſelected from thoſe of Rhenanus, Pamelius, Albaſpinæus, La Cerda, and Salmaſius, &c. together with the Corrections of Mercerus. Priorius, who had the Care of this Edition, has put at the beginning a Preface, which he calls, A Diſcourſe concerning the Life and Errors of Tertullian, that is not exactly done, any more than this Author's Notes; which have not found a general Eſteem among the Learned.

I do not ſpeak of the Edition of Tertullian publiſhed by Father George, which he cauſed to be Printed at Paris in 1648, and 1650, in three great Volumes, which he has Entituled Tertullianus Redivivus, becauſe there is nothing in this Edition worth taking notice of; and thoſe long and tedious Commentaries which this Capuchin has made, can be of no Advantage to the Ignorant, nor of any Uſe to the Learned.

It would be a deſirable thing to have a new Edition of Tertullian Printed, the Text whereof ſhould be exactly agreeable to the beſt Manuſcripts, without inſerting the Conjectures of particular Perſons. And they ought likewiſe to add a Choice Collection of thoſe Notes which are the moſt uſeful, taken from all the Commentators; And laſtly, they ſhould not range the Books according to the Order of Time, but according to the Order of the Matters, as we have done in giving an Abridgment of the Books, and to prefix at the beginning, the Life of Tertullian, and a Criticiſm upon his Writings; like that which we have done here in French, but larger, and more exact.

CAIUS.

Caius. CAIUS a Prieſt of the Church of Rome (a), lived in the time of the Popes Zephirin and Victor, that is to ſay under the Emperors Severus and Antoninus. He wrote a Treatiſe by way of Dialogue (b) againſt a famous Montaniſt called Proclus or Proculus (c), wherein he reprehended, and accuſed this Heretick for giving Credit too raſhly to thoſe new Prophecies, and at the ſame time confuted his Reaſons. Euſebius ſpeaks of this Treatiſe in three Places: The firſt is in Chap. 25. of the Second Book of his Hiſtory, where he quotes a Fragment of it relating to the Sepulchers of S. Peter and S. Paul, which were to be ſeen at Rome in this Author's Time. The ſecond is in Chap. 28. of the third Book, where he ſpeaks of the Heretick Cerinthus in theſe Terms. 'Cerinthus 'tells us in ſome Revelations which he had written, as if he had been a great Apoſtle, prodigious 'Things, which, as he ſaid, he had learnt from the Angels, aſſuring us, That after the Reſurrection, 'Chriſt ſhould have an Earthly Kingdom, and that Men ſhould live in Jeruſalem, where they ſhould 'enjoy Carnal and Senſual Pleaſures, and ſpend a Thouſand Years in continual Marriages and Jollity. The third place wherein Euſebius ſpeaks of Caius is in his Sixth Book, Chap. 20. where he ſays, that Caius condemning the Boldneſs by which the Enemies of the Church do counterfeit ſome Books of Scripture, reckons but 13 Epiſtles of S. Paul, not counting that which was written to the Hebrews among the number of this Apoſtle's Writings. Laſtly the ſame Euſebius in his Third Book, Chap. 21. recites ſome Words relating to the Daughters of Philip the Deacon, taken from this Author's Dialogue.

(a) A Prieſt of the Church of Rome.] Euſebius and S. Jerom tell us plainly, that he was a Prieſt, and that he lived in Zephyrin's time; but they do not ſay that he was a Roman. His Treatiſe was Compoſed in Greek; Photius is the Firſt, who affirms expreſly, that he was a Prieſt of the Church of Rome; and he adds, that he was ordained Biſhop of the Gentiles.

(b) By way of Dialogue.] Euſebius calls it, βιβλίον διαλέξεως, that is to ſay, a Book of Dialogues; and Caius and Proclus, ſeem to have been the Perſons who ſpake therein, for Euſebius in his Third Book, relates the Words of Proclus taken from this Dialogue.

(c) Proclus or Proculus.] The Sect of the Montaniſts was divided into two Parties, the one were κατὰ φρύγιλον, and the others κατὰ Ασκηλω, as it is obſerved in that ſmall Abridgment of Hereſies, at the end of Tertullian's Præſcriptions. It is thought that this Proclus was the ſame with Proculus the African, who was likewiſe a Montaniſt, and of whom Tertullian ſpeaks; but this is not likely; for he, againſt whom Caius writes was a Greek, and was called Proclus, and not Proculus.

Euſebius

Euſebius and S. Jerome make no mention of the other Works of Caius, but the Learned Photius tells us, That he had likewiſe compoſed a Treatiſe againſt the Hereſie of Artemon, who believed that Jeſus Chriſt was only a meer Man, and that he was the Author of a Book Entituled, The little Labyrinth (d), from whence Euſebius has taken the Paſſage concerning the Penance of Natalis. Photius likewiſe attributes to him a Treatiſe Of the Univerſe, or Of the Nature of the Univerſe, or of the Cauſes thereof, which went in his Time under the Name of Joſephus; Let us ſee what he ſays of it. 'This Work con-'tains two little Books, wherein he ſhews that Plato contradicts himſelf; he convinces the Philoſopher 'Alcinous (e) of ſeveral Falſities and Abſurdities concerning Matter and the Reſurrection; he oppoſes 'his own Opinions to thoſe of this Philoſopher, and ſhews that the Jews are a much more ancient Peo-'ple than the Greeks; he believes that Man was compounded of Fire, Earth, and Water, and of a 'Spirit which is called the Soul, of which he ſpeaks in theſe Terms: God has formed this Spirit to-'gether with the Body, and taking the principal part from thence, he has cauſed it to penetrate and 'fill up all it's Members; ſo that extending it ſelf throughout the whole Body, he has taken the form 'from thence; but it is of a colder Nature than Matter, of which the Body is compounded. This 'Opinion which ſuppoſes that the Soul is Corporeal, (if nevertheleſs he acknowledges no other Soul 'in a Man than his Spirit) this Opinion, I ſay, is quite different from the Doctrin of the Hebrews, 'and does not agree with the Greatneſs of his other Notions. To conclude, as the ſame Photius adds, '(from whom we have only tranſlated his Words) he ſpeaks of Jeſus after a very Orthodox Manner. For he calls him Chriſt, and ſpeaks of his ineffable Generation from the Father, after ſuch a manner as is no ways to be reprehended; which gives us occaſion to doubt whether this be the Work of Joſephus or not; though the Style very much reſembles that of this Hiſtorian. He adds alſo afterwards, that he has found and obſerved that this Book was written by Caius Author of the Labyrinth; but that not bearing the Name of it's Author, ſome have attributed it to Juſtin Martyr, others to Irenæus; though in reality it was compoſed by Caius. The Proof he brings for it, is, That the Author of the Labyrinth, whom he believes to be Caius, ſays, towards the End, that he was the Author of the Book concerning the Nature of the Univerſe; but this Argument is not abſolutely convincing. For it is not certain, that Caius was the Author of the Book of the Labyrinth, which ſome have attributed to Origen, and 'tis likely enough, that there might be two ſeveral Books of different Authors, which might have very near the ſame Title.

Caius.

(d) The little Labyrinth] We have obſerved, that Euſebius does not Name the Author of this Fragment, but that Theodoret aſcribes it to the Author of the Labyrinth, and on the other hand, Photius informs us, that Caius was the Author of that Book, and proves it, becauſe the Author of the Labyrinth ſays, That he wrote a Treatiſe concerning the Univerſe, whence it would follow, that it was Caius who was the Author of this Fragment; but I ſhould rather believe it to be taken out of the Book, which he Compoſed againſt Artemon. Euſebius ſays, That the Book from whence he produces this Fragment, was written againſt his Hereſie, and the Paſſages which he brings from thence do clearly ſhew it.

(e) The Philoſopher Alcinous.] He wrote a Treatiſe, wherein he makes a Compariſon between Ariſtotle and Plato.

HIPPOLITUS.

HIPPOLITUS, who was according to the Relation of ſome, Biſhop of Oſtia in Italy (a), and according to others Metropolitan of Arabia, ſuffered Martyrdom (b), under the Reign of the Emperor Alexander. He made himſelf conſiderable by the Commentaries which he Compoſed upon the Holy Scripture (c). Euſebius and S. Jerom aſſure us, that he had written upon the Six days Work, upon Geneſis, Exodus, the Canticles, the Pſalms, the Prophet Zachary, the Prophet Iſaiah, upon ſome Places of Ezekiel, upon Daniel, the Proverbs, Eccleſiaſticus, and Apocalypſe; and that he Compoſed Two Treatiſes, the One concerning Saul, and the other concerning the Witch of Endor. Beſides theſe Works upon the Scripture, he likewiſe wrote a Treatiſe con-

Hippolitus.

(a) Biſhop of Oſtia in Italy.] S. Jerom, in his Catalogue, ſays, that he does not know of what City he was Biſhop. Gelaſius, in his Book De duabus Naturis, citing Hippolitus, ſays, That he was Metropolitan of Arabia. Nicephorus makes him Biſhop of Pontus: It is more likely that he was a Biſhop of Arabia, than of Italy: For it is certain that he was of the Eaſt, and S. Jerom obſerves in one of his Homilies, that Origen was his Scholar; ſome have ſaid, that he was the Diſciple of S. Clemens, and this is very probable.

[Monſieur le Moyne's Conjecture, that Hippolitus was Biſhop of Portus Romanus, now called Aden in Arabia, is moſt probable; for it was an eaſie Miſtake for thoſe who knew nothing of this Arabian Portus, to imagine, that he was called Portuenſis from the Portus Romanus, by Oſtia in Italy, eſpecially ſince there has been ſo current a Tradition of his ſuffering Martyrdom in Italy.]

(b) Suffered Martyrdom.] S. Jerom, in the Preface to his Commentaries upon S. Matthew, calls him a Martyr, and in the Martyrologies, he is rank'd in the Number of Martyrs. It is certain, that he ſuffered Martyrdom in Italy, and perhaps at Oſtia: His Acts are forged and counterfeit. It is affirmed herein, that he ſuffered Mertyrdom under Claudius, it ſhould have been under Alexander; and Ulpianus, who is mentioned in theſe Acts, perhaps may be Ulpius, who was Governour of Rome in the Time of this laſt Emperor.

(c) Which he compoſed upon the Holy Scripture.] S. Jerom ſays, that Origen being excited by his Friend Ambroſius, undertook to write Commentaries upon the Sacred Scripture, in imitation of Hippolitus.

Hippolitus. cerning Antichriſt, a Diſcourſe concerning the Reſurrection, a Work againſt all the Hereſies, and one in particular againſt that of Marcion; a Diſcourſe concerning Eaſter, wherein he has given a kind of Chronicle, to the Firſt Year of the Emperor Alexander; and a Paſchal Cycle for Sixteen Years. He likewiſe made one or two more Homilies in the Praiſe of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, which he recited in the Preſence of Origen, who followed and imitated him in the Works, which he compoſed upon the Holy Scripture. There is a Catalogue of his Works upon the Side of a Statue found near Rome, where his Paſchal Cycle was affixt; ſeveral Books are here omitted, mentioned by Euſebius and S. Jerom; but there are others (d) of which they have not ſpoken: The Catalogue is this. The Works of Hippolitus, upon the Penitential Pſalms, concerning the Witch of Endor, upon the Goſpel of S. John, and the Apocalypſe, concerning the Gifts of God, Apoſtolical Tradition, a Chronicle, a Book written to the Grecks, another upon Plato, or concerning the World, an Exhortation to Severina, a Demonſtration of the Time of Eaſter in a Table, Odes upon the whole Scripture, a Diſcourſe of God, of the Reſurrection of the Fleſh, of Good, and from whence Evil proceeds. This Catalogue does not appear to me, to be ſo faithful and exact, as that of Euſebius and S. Jerom, who own beſides, as well as Honorius Auguſtodunenſis after them, that Hippolitus writ ſeveral other Treatiſes, whereof they had not any Knowledge And we have now almoſt entirely loſt, even thoſe of which Euſebius and S. Jerom have given the Catalogue.

There goes indeed under his Name, a ſmall Diſcourſe, Printed at Paris in Greek, with the Verſion of Picus Mirundala, in the Year 1557, and afterward in 1660, and inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, with this Title; Of the end of the World, Antichriſt, and the Second Coming of Jeſus Chriſt. But it is very uncertain, whether this be the Treatiſe of Antichriſt (e) attributed to Hippolitus, and mentioned by Euſebius; The Title being different from that related by Euſebius; the Style mean and Childiſh: And Laſtly, The Fables and Falſhoods which it contains, give us ſufficient Ground to doubt it. There is another Treatiſe of Chriſt and Antichriſt, which bears the Name of Hippolitus, publiſh'd in Greek by Gudius, which Father Combefis has cauſed to be Printed in Greek and Latin, in the laſt Volume of the Supplement to the Bibliotheca Patrum. Though this Treatiſe be more ancient than that which was publiſhed before under Hippolitus's Name, yet does it not appear to me worthy of this Author. Thoſe that read the Commentary upon the Hiſtory of Suſanna, and the Greek Fragment upon Daniel, which are Printed in the ſame Place, will paſs the ſame Judgment upon them.

The Demonſtration againſt the Jews, publiſht in Latin by Turrianus, and inſerted by Poſſevinus into his Apparatus, is a Fragment of ſome Homily, or of ſome other Book of that Nature. It is not certain, whether it be written by Hippolitus. There was found at Baſil, a Treatiſe upon the Apocalypſe, attributed to Hippolitus; but it is doubted whether it be his, becauſe of the meanneſs of the Style, and the little Learning there is in it, as Sixtus Senenſis has obſerved. The Collections, or rather the Extracts taken by Anaſtaſius the Library-Keeper, out of the Sermons of Hippolitus, upon ſome Points of Divinity, and upon the Incarnation, againſt Bero and Helix, Hereticks of the Sect of the Valentinians, publiſhed by Turrianus and Caniſius, and related in Greek by Anaſtaſius, in his Collections ſet forth by Sirmondus, ſeem to be very ancient; but it is not certain whether they belong to Hippolitus. We muſt make the ſame Judgment of the Homily, Entituled, Of One Only God in Three Perſons, and of the Incarnation, againſt the Hereſie of Noetus, which is publiſhed by Veſſius, with the Works of Gregorius Thaumaturgus; but though it was not really written by Hippolitus, yet it contains the Principles of the Ancients concerning the Trinity (f).

That Little Work, Of the Lives of the Twelve Apoſtles, which Father Combefis cauſed to be printed from a Manuſcript in the King's Library, in his Supplement to the Bibliotheca Patrum, is not Hippolitus's, and contains ſeveral Fictions of the Modern Greeks (g), relating to the Deaths of the Apoſtles.

(d) But there are other Works.] 'Tis very like that it is a Collection of Homilies, which was extant in Theodoret's time, who cites ſeveral of them, which perhaps might make a part of his Commentaries upon the Scripture.

(e) It is very uncertain whether this be the Treatiſe of Antichriſt.] The Books of Hippolitus were Entituled, Of the Reſurrection, and of Antichriſt, according to the Relation of Euſebius, and S. Jerom: This is Entituled, Of the End of the World, &c. This Style is mean and Childiſh, whereas that of Hippolitus was grave and lofty. This Treatiſe begins with ἐπειδὴ γάρ. There are a great many triffling Conjectures concerning the Birth, and the Life of Antichriſt; he believes that he is to be a Devil; he ſays that S. John is not dead, which is contrary to the ancient Tradition: He cites the Apocalypſe inſtead of Daniel; he holds that the Souls of Men have been from all Eternity, which agrees with Origen's Opinion: In a Word, this Treatiſe is worth very little.

(f) The Principles of the Ancients concerning the Trinity.] Theſe Principles are, that the WORD was from all Eternity in the Father, as being his Wiſdom, his Power, and his Counſel; that when he deſigned to create the World, he did, if I may ſo ſay, put him without him; and this is that which they call Generation: That it is by him that he created the World; and that he governs it; that it is he who made himſelf viſible to Men; who ſpake to the Patriarchs and the Prophets; who gave the Law; and who at laſt became Incarnate; that conformable to this Oeconomy, we acknowledge Three Perſons in God, which nevertheleſs make but one only God; that the WORD before he took Fleſh had not perfectly the Quality of the WORD, and that we may ſay, that he was begotten of the Father; That we ought to believe that the WORD deſcending from Heaven into the Womb of the Virgin Mary, took therein a Reaſonable Soul, and every thing belonging to human Nature, Sin only excepted, and all this in order to ſave Man, who fell by the Sin of Adam, and to render him Immortal, &c.

(g) Several Fictions of the modern Greeks.] Such as theſe following, that S. Andrew was Crucified upon an Olive Tree: That the Relicks of S. John were not found in his Sepulchre; that S. Bartholomew was Crucified with his Head downwards; that S. Thomas Preached among the Magi; that he was run through in four places with a Launce made of Deal in the City of Salamis, that Thaddæus preached the Goſpel in Meſopotamia; Things which are taken from the Fictions of the Modern Greeks, as from Sophronius and others.

We

We muſt ſay the ſame of a Book written much upon the like Subject, concerning the Seventy two Diſciples (b) of Jeſus Chriſt, which was in the Library of Cardinal Sirletus, which Baronius mentions in his Notes upon the Martyrology upon the Ninth Day of April. Hippolitus.

Photius had read Hippolitus's Book againſt the Hereticks, and gives us this Account of it. 'I have 'read the little Book of Hippolitus, who was Diſciple of S. Irenæus, againſt Two and Thirty Here- 'ſies: He begins with the Doſitheans, and he goes on as far as Noetus and the Noetians. He ſays that 'all theſe Hereſies have been confuted by S. Irenæus, and that he has Collected in this little Book, the 'Reaſonings and Arguments of this Father. His Diſcourſe is clear and ſerious, and he ſays nothing but 'what is to the purpoſe, though he has not all the Beauties of the Attick Style. He affirms ſome things 'which are not true, and among others, that the Epiſtle to the Hebrews was not written by S. Paul. 'It is ſaid, that he made ſeveral Homilies to the People, as well as Origen, who was his Friend, and 'that he wrote ſeveral other Books. The ſame Author, in another Place, mentions the Commentary of Hippolitus upon Daniel. 'He ſays, That though he does not literally explain this Propher, 'yet he does not let ſlip any part of his Senſe, that is conſiderable, that he interprets things according to 'the manner of the Ancients, and not with that Exactneſs which has been ſince obſerved; but that he 'is not to be cenſured for that, becauſe it is not reaſonable to expect from thoſe who lay the Foun- 'dation of any Science, that they ſhould omit nothing that might be ſaid upon it; but on the contra- 'ry, we ought to commend them, becauſe they were the firſt Diſcoverers, for thoſe things which 'they firſt found out: That as for the reſt, Hippolitus was miſtaken, in pretending to fix the time of 'the End of the World, and of the coming of Antichriſt, which Chriſt would not diſcover to his 'Diſciples, even then when they deſired it of him very earneſtly. He pretended, ſays he, to fix it five 'hundred years after the Death of Chriſt, as if the World was to laſt but Six thouſand Years; which 'is too nice a Subtilty. His way of Writing is clear and plain, and very proper for a Commentary, 'though he departs from the Rules, and the Purity of the Attick Dialect. We have likewiſe a Ho- 'mily which he made concerning Jeſus Chriſt and Antichriſt, wherein, though he follows the ſame 'way of Writing, yet he is more plain, and favours more of Antiquity. And theſe Paſſages of Photius, do not only diſcover the Subject of thoſe Works of Hippolitus which he had read, but alſo the Style and Character of the Author.

The Paſchal Cycle for Sixteen Years, compoſed by Hippolitus, whereof Anatolius, Euſebius, S. Jerom and Victorius have made mention, was found round about a Marble Statue that was dug out of the Ground in the Year 1551, near Rome (i), and carried into the Vatican Library; and afterwards it there are two Cycles, for Eight Years each; on the Right ſide is that of the 14 Days of the Moons, and on the Left, that for the Sundays. On the ſide of this Cycle, there is a Catalogue of Hippolitus's Works, which we have already ſet down. This Canon is the moſt ancient Paſchal Cycle that we have.

(b) Concerning the Seventy two Diſciples.] This is manifeſtly the ſame with the falſe Dorotheus.

(i) Near Rome.] Near the Church of S. Laurence, in a Place where there was in all probability a Chappel to Hippolitus. The Statue is of Marble, repreſenting Hippolitus ſitting in a Chair, on the Sides of which,

[The Catalogue of Hippolitus's Works, taken from the Roman Marble, is ſo very uncorrect in Monſieur Du Pin, that I ſhall tranſlate it anew from the Greek Copy, with ſome few Notes upon it to explain it.]

Commentaries upon the Pſalms.
Of the Witch of Endor.
Commentaries upon the Goſpel according to S. John, and the Revelations.
Of Spiritual Gifts.
Apoſtolical Tradition.
Chronicles; or Chronological Accounts of Time (a).
Againſt the Greeks, and againſt Plato, or concerning the Univerſe.
An Exhortation to Severina (b).
A Demonſtration of the Time of Eaſter, as it is in the Table.
Odes upon all the Scriptures (c).
Of God and the Reſurrection of the Fleſh.
Of Good, and whence cometh Evil.

(a) Accounts of Time.] This Dr. Cave joyns with the next Line, and ſo makes but one Title thus, Chronicles to the Greeks: But as the Marble lies in Gruter, (from whom Dr. Cave tranſcribed it) Χρονικῶν, makes one Line, and πρὸς Ἕλληνας another; now for the moſt part one Line makes a whole Title, where the Conjugation καὶ does not connect more together, eſpecially where a compleat Senſe can be made by ſuch a Diviſion: But here the καὶ πρὸς Πλάτωνα muſt be joyned with πρὸς Ἕλληνας, and a Diſcourſe upon a Philoſophical Subject, concerning the Univerſe againſt Plato and other Greek Philoſophers, has no great Coherence with a Chronology.

(b) Severina.] This according to Monſieur le Moyne is faulty, and ſhould be read πρὸς Σεβῆρον Αὐ, to Severa Auguſta; and his Reaſon is, becauſe Theodoret ſpeaks of a Letter written by this Hippolitus to a certain Queen Πρὸς βασιλίδα τινα. This Reaſon is not ſufficient to me, for Inſcriptions upon Marbles, when drawn by skilful Men, are Copyed by the Graver with more Care than ordinary Books by Tranſcribers: And becauſe we cannot tell who this Severina was, therefore it does not follow, either that Hippolitus did not write ſuch a Letter to her; or that he might not write another to the Empreſs, which Theodoret might have ſeen and quoted.

(c) All the Scriptures.] This Du Pin has rightly tranſlated; Le Moyne tells us, that it ſhould be πάσας τὰς αἱρέσεις, upon all Hereſies. Hereſies ſeem to be as improper things to write Hymns upon, as one would wiſh. But the Hiſtorical Parts of Scripture will afford Matter enough for the loftieſt Genius to work upon. Dr. Cave does deſervedly throw aſide Le Moyne's Conjecture, though it ſeems ſtrange that he ſhould not diſcern that the received Reading was true.

Scaliger's Conjecture of the two firſt Lines, which are almoſt all eaten away, is too raſh; he takes the Letters ιας and νιας to be parts of the Words ψαλμος μετανοιας, from whence he concludes, that Hippolitus wrote Commentaries upon the Seven Penitential Pſalms; but (as Dr. Cave obſerves, that Word applied to thoſe Pſalms was unknown in that Age, and what to put in the room of it, is hard to aſſign, and ſo I left it out.

was

Hippolitus. was publiſhed by Gruter, by Scaliger, and by Bucherius; who cauſed it to be Printed, together with the Cycle of Victorius of Aquitain, in the Year 1633. Mabillon obſerves in his Voyage into Italy, that he ſaw at Rome in Cardinal Chigy's Library, an Ancient Greek Manuſcript, containing the four great Prophets, wherein there is a Commentary of Hippolitus upon the Dream of Nebuchadnezor.

Iter Italicum.

Laſtly, Theodoret quotes and produces ſome conſiderable Fragments of Hippolitus, (k) concerning the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, taken from ſeveral of his Homilies, and from his other Treatiſes upon the Holy Scriptures.

(k) Laſtly, Theodoret relates ſome conſiderable Fragments of Hippolitus.] He cites ſome from an Oration upon theſe Words of Iſaiah, Dominus paſcit me, &c. from his Sermon upon Hannah and Elkanah, from a Homily upon the beginning of Iſaiah, from a Book concerning the Diſtribution of Talents; and laſtly, From a Letter to a Queen (which ſome believe to be Mammea, the Mother of Alexander, others, one called Severa) whoſe Name is mentioned in a Catalogue of this Author's Works, which was on the ſide of his Statue; from an Oration upon Canticles, from an Interpretation of the Second Pſalm, and from the Three and twentieth Oration upon the Two Thieves. See the Tradition related by Theodoret at the end of his Three Dialogues.

GEMINIANUS or GEMINUS.

Gemminianus or Geminus.

WE joyn Geminianus, or Geminus (a), a Prieſt of Antioch to Hippolitus the Martyr, becauſe they both flouriſht under the Reign of Alexander, and becauſe he is ſpoken of in Euſebius's Chronicon in the ſame Place, where Hippolitus is mentioned. We know nothing of the Works of this Author. Only S. Jerom aſſures us, that he left behind him ſome Pieces, which were Monuments of his Parts.

(a) Geminianus or Geminus] He is called by Euſebius in his Chronicon Geminianus; and by S. Jerom, in his Catalogue of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, Geminus.

ALEXANDER.

Alexander.

A Lexander, a Biſhop in Cappadocia, being come to Jeruſalem, to viſit the Holy Places that are there, when Narciſſus, who governed that Church, was not capable himſelf alone, by reaſon of his great Age, to diſcharge all the Duties of the Epiſcopal Office; the Chriſtians of that City retained Alexander, and made him his Coadjutor, by the Conſent of the Biſhops of the neighbouring Churches. It is ſaid that they had a Revelation, and heard a Voice, adviſing them to chuſe him Biſhop; and indeed there needed nothing leſs than a Miracle, to authorize an Election ſo extraordinary as this (a) and for which there had yet been no Precedent. He governed this Church joyntly with Narciſſus, as his Collegue. See what he ſays of it at the Concluſion of a Letter, written to the Antinoites. 'Narciſſus, who held before me the Epiſcopal See, and who is now united '(b), with me in Prayers, being a Hundred and ſixteen Years old, ſends you Greeting, and exhorts 'you to be all of one and the ſame Mind.

Alexander being in Priſon in the Time of the Perſecution under Severus, wrote likewiſe a Letter to thoſe of Antioch, wherein he Congratulates them upon the Ordination of Aſclepiades, who ſucceeded Serapion in that See: He ſent this Letter by Clemens, as it is believed of Alexandria (c). Beſides, he wrote a Letter to Origen, of which Euſebius recites a Fragment in the 14th Chapter of the 6th Book of his Hiſtory, where he ſays, that he was a Friend of Pantænus, and of Clement of Alexandria, and that theſe Men made him acquainted with Origen. And laſt of all, he ſent a Letter to Demetrius, Biſhop of Alexandria, which he wrote along with Theoctriſtus, Biſhop of Cæſarea, in favour of Origen, wherein he proves by ſeveral Examples, that Biſhops may invite thoſe that are proper for inſtructing the People, to Preach in their Preſence: He wrote beſides ſeveral other Letters, of which we have nothing remaining. He ſuffered Martyrdom at Cæſarea in the time of the Perſecution, under the Emperor Decius.

(a) An Election ſo extraordinary as this.] There were two things in this Ordination which were New, and contrary to the Laws of the Church. The firſt was the Tranſlation of a Biſhop to another See: The Second, the making a Coadjutor to a Biſhop whilſt living.

(b) Who is now united.] It appears by this, that Alexander was not only Coadjutor, but that he alone had the Care of the Church, that Narciſſus did not concern himſelf with any thing, and that he had no more than barely the Honour.

(c) As it is believed of Alexandria.] S. Jerom believes that it was S. Clement of Alexandria, and this may very well be; For he lived 'till this time, and he was intimately acquainted with Alexander, to whom he Dedicated a Book concerning the Eccleſiaſtical Rule. Euſebius, Lib. 6. cap. 13.

JULIUS AFRICANUS.

Julius A-fricanus.

Julius Africanus, who was of Paleſtine (a), tho' older than Origen (b), is believed to have been the Diſciple of Heraclas, becauſe being drawn by his Reputation, he came to Alexandria to confer with him (c). He was deputed by the Emperor Alexander (d), to cauſe the City of Emmanus to be repaired, which was afterwards called Nicopolis. He particularly applied himſelf to Chronology and Hiſtory, and compoſed an exact Chronicle (e), divided into five Books, from the Beginning of the World, to the Third Year of the Reign of Heliogabalus (f), wherein he gave a brief Account of the moſt remarkable Accidents from the beginning of the World, to the time of Jeſus Chriſt, and related in few Words all that had happened ſince Chriſt's Time, to that wherein he wrote. We have not this famous Work at preſent under Africanus's Name. But Euſebius has inſerted it almoſt entire in his Chronicon, altering and adding ſome few things, and Correcting ſome of his Miſtakes. We have ſtill ſome of his Fragments in two Works, publiſht by Scaliger, of which one is Latin, and is called Chronological Extracts, taken out of Euſebius and Africanus; and the other is Greek, and Entituled, A Collection of Hiſtories.

Beſides this Chronicle, he wrote two Letters upon two important Queſtions relating to the Scripture: The firſt directed to Ariſtides, was written to reconcile that ſeeming Contradiction which is found in the Account given of the Genealogy of Jeſus Chriſt by S. Luke and S. Matthew. Euſebius gives us a conſiderable part of this Letter, in the Firſt Chapter of the Seventh Book of his Hiſtory. And in order to reconcile this Difference, he has recourſe to that Law of Adoption, that took Place among the Jews, and which obliged the Brothers to Marry their Brothers Wives who died without Children. He ſays then, that Matthan, who deſcended from David by Solomon, married a Wife named Eſtha, by whom he had Jacob: But that after the Death of Matthan, this ſame Woman married Melchi (he ſhould have ſaid Matthat) who deſcended from David by Nathan, of whom ſhe had a Son named Heli, and that ſo Heli and Jacob were Brothers by the Mother's-ſide; and that Heli dying without Children, Jacob was obliged to marry his Widow, of whom he had Joſeph the Huſband of Mary, who was by conſequence natural Son to Jacob, and the Son of Heli according to the Law; and deſcended from Solomon by Jacob, and from Nathan by Heli. This way of reconciling the Evangeliſts, as to the Genealogy of Jeſus Chriſt, is very eaſie, and has hardly any Difficulty in it; but that every Body may readily comprehend it, we ſhall repreſent it in the following Table.

(a) Who was of Paleſtine.] Some have confounded him with Sextus Africanus of Lybia; but this is an Error: For our Author was of Paleſtine, and lived there, whereas the other was only of Lybia.

(b) Older than Origen.] In the Letter which he wrote to Origen, he calls him his Son, and he continues his Chronicle no farther than to the Time of Heliogabalus, which ſhews that he was older than Origen.

(c) To confer with him.] Heraclas was undoubtedly Biſhop of Alexandria, when he came into this City. He ſays as much himſelf in his Chronicle, according to the Relation of Euſebius, Lib. 6. Cap. 3. and of Bede de Sex. æt. P. 86. of Ado, and others.

(d) By the Emperor Alexander.] This Embaſſy was under Alexander the Son of Mammea, and not under Heliogabalus. That which made Euſebius miſtake, is becauſe Africanus's Chronicle went no farther than the time of Heliogabalus.

(e) And compoſed an exact Chronicle.] Euſebius gives it the Name of a Chronography, and S. Jerom ſtyles it a Hiſtory of the Times: Photius and Bede call it a Chronicle. It contained the Origin and Succeſſion of all the Monarchies and Commonwealths, and he annext to the end thereof, a kind of Table, called a Canon, wherein he diſpoſed under every Year, what he had before obſerved Succeſſively. S. Baſil cites a Paſſage from thence, relating to the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, in the 29th Chapter of his Book, de Spiritu Sancto.

(f) The Reign of Heliogabalus.] Photius, who had ſeen it, ſays that his Chronicle went no farther than the Reign of Macrinus. But the Computation of Years, and a Fragment related by Scaliger, clearly ſhew, that he continued it to the Time of Heliogabalus.

Julius Africanus.

DAVID

SOLOMON, And his Deſcendents, related by S. Matthew.		NATHAN, And his Deſcendents, related by S. Luke.
MATTHAN, The firſt Husband.	ESTHA, The Wife of both.	MELCHI, Or rather MATTHAT, The Second Husband.
JACOB, The Son of Matthan, the firſt Husband.	THEIR COMMON WIFE, Whoſe Name we do not know, Firſt married to Heli, of whom ſhe had no Children, and afterwards to Jacob, his Brother.	HELI.
The Natural Son of Jacob.	JOSEPH.	The Son of Heli, according to the Law.

The Second Letter of Africanus, relating to the Hiſtory of Suſanna, was written to Origen, who had in a Conference cited the Prophet Daniel, to vindicate the Innocence of Suſanna. Africanus writes to him, that he admires that he does not look upon this Part of Daniel as Fictitious, and that this whole Hiſtory is no more than a Fable. The Reaſons which he brings for this Opinion, are very Learned and Ingenious, and there was a Neceſſity for ſo great a Man as Origen to anſwer him; and yet it ſeems as if Africanus wrote to him, rather to be inſtructed in the Truth, than with any Deſign of Diſputing againſt him.

There is likewiſe attributed to this Author, a Work Entituled, The Ceſti, which is cited under his Name, not only by Suidas, and Sincellus; but likewiſe by Photius, and even by Euſebius, in the Sixth Book, Chap. 31, of his Hiſtory: If that Paſſage, which is not to be found in Ruffinus's Verſion, nor in S. Jerom, be not foiſted in. But it is more likely that this is the Work of another Africanus (g). We do not know whether he, of whom we ſpeak, wrote any thing elſe, nor when he died.

(g) Is the Work of another Africanus.] Theſe Books, Entituled Ceſti, were Diſcourſes containing nothing but Prophane Learning, they were ſo called à Ceſto Veneris: They treated of Herbs, and particularly of thoſe that had any Faculty in procuring Love. The Author of this Book was of Lybia; he called himſelf Sextus Africanus, or rather Africanus Ceſtus. He was probably a Heathen, as the Title, and the Subject of this Work ſufficiently ſhew. There is a Book attributed to one Africanus, cited by Politian, under the Name of Ceſtus, being a Manuſcript in the King's Library, but not the ſame which Photius ſpeaks of: It was lately publiſhed.

MINUTIUS FELIX.

Minutius Felix.

Minutius Felix, a famous Lawyer at Rome, (a) who lived in the beginning of the Third Century (b), wrote an excellent Dialogue, Entituled Octavius, in defence of the Chriſtian Religion. 'Tis a Conference between a Chriſtian, whom he calls Octavius, (c) and a Heathen named Cecilius, where Minutius ſits at Judge. Cecilius ſpeaks firſt againſt the Chriſtian Religion, and begins by laying down this Maxim, That every thing is uncertain and doubt-

(a) A Lawyer at Rome.] Not only Lactantius and S. Hierom aſſure us that he was of this Profeſſion; but this likewiſe appears by the beginning of his Dialogue, where he ſays, That it being Vacation Time, he had no Buſineſs at the Hall.

(b) In the beginning of the Third Century.] The Ancients do not fix preciſely the time wherein he lived. S. Hierom, in his Catalogue, wherein he keeps the Order of Time, places him between Tertullian and S. Cyprian. It is evident that Minutius has taken ſeveral Thoughts from Tertullian, and that S. Cyprian, in his Book Of the Vanity of Idols, has tranſcribed in ſeveral Places the Words of Minutius. This makes it probable that he was an African, and his Style ſavours a little of Africa.

(c) Octavius.] He is alſo called Januarius, and Cecilius is named Natalis; and Minutius Felix, Marcus. It would be rather to divine, than to believe, that theſe were the Januarius and Natalis, Biſhops of Africa, who lived in S. Cyprian's time: It would have been more likely that Octavius and Cecilius were imaginary Names in the Dialogue, if we had not been told that they are their proper Names.

ful,

ful, and that therefore it is a great piece of Rashness, especially in the Christians, who are an ignorant and stupid sort of People, to pretend to establish their Opinions as certain and infallible Truths: That there being no Providence that governs the World, and all things being dubious, it is the best way to stick to the Religion of our Ancestors. That the Roman Empire was first established, and afterwards arrived to its present Height by the Religion of the Gods; that they never contemned the Omens and Presages of the Sooth-sayers, without repenting of it; and that their Oracles certainly foretold things that were really to come to pass. Afterwards he attacks the Religion of the Christians, and in particular, he accuses them of worshipping an Asses Head, adoring Crosses, and other things which were yet more dishonourable. He upbraids them for those Crimes of which the Heathens themselves were justly accused; to wit, the Murthering of Children, the Committing of Incests. He reprehends in them as a Crime, that excessive Love which they had for one another. He finds fault with them, because they had no Temples, Altars nor Statues. He tells them, that they can neither see themselves, nor shew to others that God whom they adore; that they feign that he sees all things, but that it is impossible that he should be able to take care of every particular thing, if he has the Charge of the whole Universe lying upon him. He pretends that it was to no purpose that the Jews adored and honoured this God: He scoffs at the Hopes of the Christians. He looks upon the Resurrection, Hell and Heaven to be Fables, like those of the Poets. He says, that Men being necessarily Good or Evil, 'tis ridiculous to believe that God will punish or reward them for their Actions. He examines the Condition of the Christians in this Life, which is to be Poor, Ignorant, subject to Diseases, Persecuted, exposed continually to Racks and Tortures: 'Which shews, says he, that their God 'either cannot, or will not relieve them, and by consequence that he is Impotent or Malicious. That on the contrary, the Romans, who do not adore the God of the Christians, are not only Powerful, and Lords of the whole World; but they likewise enjoy all those Pleasures, from which the Christians are forced to abstain. He concludes by advising the Christians not to seek any more after Heavenly Things, and not to flatter themselves vainly with the Knowledge of them; maintaining that all things being uncertain and doubtful, it is better to suspend our Judgments, than to judge rashly, for fear of falling into Superstition, or utterly destroying all Religion. After some Reflexions of Minutius Felix, Octavius answering Cecilius's Discourse, observes how he has argued after a very inconstant manner, sometimes admitting a Deity, and sometimes seeming to doubt thereof. 'Which he has not 'done, says he, out of any Craft or Cunning, this sort of Artifice not suiting with his Candid and Frank 'Temper; but that has happened to him which usually happens to a Man who is Ignorant of the 'Way, when he sees several Paths, he stands in suspence, not daring to chuse any, and not being able 'to follow them all. In like manner, as he adds, he who has no certain Knowledge of the Truth, is 'always in doubt, and suffers himself to be led by the first Suspicion, without being able to stop him-'self. He afterwards reprehends all the Reasonings of Cecilius, and he answers every one in particular. After having shewn that Poverty and Ignorance, which was upbraided to the Christians, could be no ways prejudicial to the Truth; he proves the Divine Providence, by the Order and Beauty which is seen in the Universe, and by the admirable Perfections of all the Creatures. And he shews, that it could be no other than God, who has created all things, governing them by his WORD, ruling them by his Wisdom, and bringing them to perfection by his Power: That he is not to be seen, because he is more subtil than the Sight: That he is not to be comprehended, because he is greater than all the Senses: That he is infinite and immense: That the Bounds of our Understanding are by much too shallow to have a perfect Knowledge of him: That it is only he who comprehends himself; that it is impossible to give him a Name suitable to his Perfections: And yet that all Men do naturally know him: That the People stretching out their Hands to Heaven, invoke only this God, and that the Prophets and Philosophers have acknowledged him. He afterwards shews, that the Antiquity of their Fables ought not to give them any Authority: That they have not only so much as the least appearance of Truth, but that they are Impertinent and Ridiculous, and that he must be void of common Sense, who gives any Credit to them: That we are not to attribute the Establishment nor Encrease of the Empire, to the Religion of the Romans, since it was founded at first by Parricide, and by the Rapes of strange Women, and that it afterwards grew to its Greatness by Uncleanness, by Sacriledge, and by unjust Wars: That very often their Commanders contemned the Auguries; and that nevertheless they were successful in what they undertook: That the Answers of their Oracles were very often false and ambiguous, and that we are not to wonder, if by a great Chance they sometimes hit: That the Dæmons, who are impure Spirits, made use of these Superstitions to destroy Mankind; and to set them at a greater Distance from God, after they were already lost by their Vices and disorderly Desires: That 'tis these Spirits who answer in their Statues, who possess Men, and agitate them so furiously; but being conjured by the Name of the only true God, they are obliged to go out of the Bodies of those whom they have tormented. He afterwards confutes the Calumnies wherewith they asperst the Christians: He says, That if it were true, they ought not to be compelled to deny their Religion, but rather to own those Incests, Impieties and Murders wherewith they were accused: That the Christians are too well instructed, to adore an Asses Head, and too Chast, to commit Uncleanness in the Celebration of their Mysteries: But that there is a Religion among the Heathens, in which they worshipped Beasts, and committed execrable Villanies without Punishment; that they are not the Christians, but the Heathens, who place their Hopes in mortal Men, and in inanimate Statues, and who were frequently guilty of Murders and Incests: That the Christians do neither adore nor desire Crosses, and that they are so far from shedding Man's Blood, that they dare not so much as to eat that of Beasts: That they are modest and reserved, not only in Body but in Mind: That they commonly Marry but once, and that they have no other Deſign in their Marriage, but the having of Children: That their Repaſts are not only very Chaſt, but alſo very Sober: That there are ſeveral Chriſtians who preſerve a perpetual Continency, and yet without any Vanity upon that Account: That though they refuſe to bear any Offices, yet they are not for all that of the Scum of the People: That their Number encreaſes continually, which is a certain ſign of their Virtue: That they do not diſtinguiſh themſelves from others by any outward Mark, but by their Innocence and Modeſty: That they love one another, and call one another Brethren, becauſe they have all one and the ſame God for their Father: That they have neither Statues, nor Altars, nor Temples, becauſe the Majeſty of God cannot be repreſented by Images, nor encloſed in Houſes built by the Hands of Men, and that it is better to conſecrate our Mind, and our Heart as his Temple. Nonne melius in noſtra dedicandus eſt mente, in noſtro Conſecrandus Corpore? That the Sacrifices and Victims which he requires, and which we ought to offer up to him, are Juſtice, Purity and Innocence: That though God be inviſible, yet he is diſcovered by his Omnipotence: That he knows all things, and nothing can be concealed from him: That he protected the Jews ſo long as they honoured him; and 'twas only for their Sins that they have drawn upon themſelves his Anger and Vengeance. After having thus diſcourſed of the Object of the Chriſtian Worſhip, he goes on to the Proof of the other Points of their Doctrin. He ſhews, That the Learned do agree, That the World ſhall have an End: That Pythagoras and Plato believed one part of the Reſurrection when they taught the Immortality of the Soul, and the Metempſychoſis: That it is not more difficult for God to raiſe up Men after their Death, than it was for him to produce them out of nothing: That all the Revolutions of Nature are as ſo many Images of the Reſurrection: That ſeveral had rather be annihilated for ever, than to riſe again to endure Eternal Torments; and that they were confirmed in their Opinion by the Impunity which they enjoyed in this Life: But that the Judgment of God will be by ſo much the more Rigorous, as it is ſlower in Puniſhing: That theſe Torments ſhall be exceſſive, and ſhall have neither End nor Bounds: That the Fire which ſhall burn the Body without conſuming it, ſhall nouriſh it (if I may ſo ſay) and make it to ſubſiſt to all Eternity: That it is ſufficient not to know God, to be Condemned to ſuffer theſe Pains, becauſe it is not a leſs Sin to be ignorant of him, than to offend him: But that the Heathens ſhall not be Puniſhed only for this Ignorance of God, they being guilty of ſeveral Crimes; that they cannot excuſe themſelves by alledging Deſtiny, ſince Man is a free Agent, and that Deſtiny is nothing elſe but the Execution of God's Decrees, which are regulated according to Men's Actions: That that Poverty which is ſo frequent among the Chriſtians, makes for their Glory; that the Evils and Perſecutions which they ſuffered, are no Proof that God has forſaken them, but that he tries and purifies them: That it is a Spectacle well becoming God, to behold a Chriſtian ſtoutly contending with Pain, ſtanding firm and ſtedfaſt in the midſt of Torments, inſulting over his Executioners and Judges, freely reſiſting even Princes and Emperors, and yielding only to God. 'You exalt, ſays he, to the Skies, a 'Scevola, who after having miſſed of his Aim in killing a King, voluntarily loſt his Hand, and ſaved 'his Life by this couragious Action. But how many Perſons are there among us, who have ſuffered 'without Complaining, not only their Hand, but their whole Body to be burnt, though they could 'have delivered themſelves from theſe Torments, had they pleaſed? What do I ſay? Even our Sons 'and our Daughters laugh at your Gibbets, at your wild Beaſts, and at all your Puniſhments. And 'ought not this to convince you, that it is impoſſible that they would have endured theſe Pains to no 'purpoſe; or that they could be able to ſuffer them without God's Aſſiſtance? And do not think 'that thoſe Perſons are happy, who being utterly ignorant of God, are loaded with Honours and 'Riches. Theſe are unfortunate Men, who are raiſed up, that their Downfal might be the greater, 'theſe are Victims which are fatened for the Sacrifice. For what ſolid Good can be had without 'God, ſince Death ſhews that all the reſt is no more than a Dream? This being ſo, a Chriſtian may 'indeed ſeem to be miſerable, but can never be really ſo: Chriſtianus videri poteſt miſer, non poteſt eſſe. He adds, that they abſtain from Pleaſures, from publick Sights, and from the Pomps of the World, becauſe all theſe things are contrary to good Manners, and that their Life is more unblameable than that of the Philoſophers, who ſeem to be wiſe by their Diſcourſes, and by their outward Appearance, but were by no means ſound at the Bottom.

After Octavius had thus anſwered all the Objections of Cecilius, the laſt acknowledges himſelf convinced by his Arguments: I do not expect, ſays he, the Determination of our Arbitrator; we are equally victorious, Octavius triumphs over me, and I triumph over Error. I ſubmit my ſelf therefore to God, I acknowledge his Providence, and I do publickly declare, that the Religion of the Chriſtians, among the Number of whom I place my ſelf from this preſent, is the only way that diſcovers the Truth.

This Dialogue is Elegant, the Expreſſions are Select, the Words proper, the Turn agreeable, the Reaſons are ſet forth to advantage, and beautified with a great deal of Learning. In a word, this ſmall Treatiſe ſhews, as Lactantius has obſerved, that Minutius had been a very excellent Defender of Religion, and of the Truth, had he entirely applied himſelf to this Study. But this is rather the Production of one who would divert himſelf from Buſineſs, than a Book written with great Aſſiduity and Diligence. He flouriſhes upon his Subject without treating of it thoroughly. He takes more pains in ſhewing how ridiculous the Opinions of the Heathens are, and in confuting them by their own Authors, than in explaining and proving the Doctrin of the Chriſtians. Beſides, he does not appear to be very well ſkilled in the Myſteries of Religion, and he ſeems to have believed, that the Soul ſhould die with the Body (d).

(d) That the Soul ſhould die with the Body.] He ſays, That there is nothing after Death, as there was nothing before the Production; and that being made of nothing, it ſhall likewiſe be renewed of nothing.

This

This Discourse passed a long time for the Eighth Book of Arnobius; for it being found together with the seven Books of Arnobius in an ancient Manuscript of the Vatican Library, it was printed four times (e) under his Name, before any Body knew its true Author. The Learned Lawyer Balduinus was the first that found out this vulgar Error, and caused this little Treatise to be printed by it self in the Year 1560, at Heidelberg, with a learned Preface, wherein he restores it to its true Author. But though we owe to this famous Lawyer the Honour of having first made this Discovery; yet 23 Years after, Ursinus caused Arnobius's Works to be printed at Rome, whether he had not seen Balduinus's Edition, or whether he had a mind to attribute all the Honour of this Observation to himself, separated this Book of Minutius from those of Arnobius, without taking any notice that it had been done before, ascribing to himself by this means the whole Credit of the Discovery. Some time after, in the Year 1603. Wowerius caused it to be printed at Basil by Frobenius, with very useful Notes, for the understanding of this Author. In 1610, it was printed at Francfort in Octavo, according to Balduinus's Edition. Afterwards Elmenhorstius caused it to be printed at Hambourg with some new Observations in the Year 1612. adjoining thereunto the Preface of Balduinus. The Year following, Heraldus the Lawyer published at Paris an Edition of Minutius in Quarto, which was more correct than the others. Lastly, Rigaltius reviling it very diligently from a Manuscript in the King's Library, being the same which was in the Vatican, put it forth in the Year 1643, with very learned and curious Notes; and it was re-printed at Amsterdam in 1645, together with Julius Firmicus. This Edition of Rigaltius was followed in the Edition of S. Cyprian of 1666. to whose Notes they have added part of those of Wowerius, Elmenhorstius, Oizelius, and those lately made by Priorius. Lastly, All these Notes were printed together with the Text, after the manner which they call Variorum, in the Year 1672. Minutius Felix.

S. Hierom says, That in his time there was a Book concerning Destiny attributed to Minutius Felix: But though this might be the Work of an elegant Author, yet it was not written with the same Style with this Dialogue. It is true, that Cecilius promises in this Dialogue, to treat more largely of Destiny upon another occasion: But to tell whether he did it or no, or whether this Treatise that was extant in S. Hierom's Time, was the same which he promised, or rather, whether this Promise gave occasion to some other Author to forge a Discourse thereof under Minutius's Name, are things which we cannot positively determine.

(e) Four times.] The first by Sabeus, according to the Manuscript of Rome, in the Year 1542. The second in Germany by Gelenius. The third in Holland, at Leyden, in the Year 1552. The fourth at Basil, by Erasmus, in 1560.

AMMONIUS.

AMmonius, a Christian Philosopher, the Master of Plotinus and Origen (a), flourished in Alexandria (b), where he publickly taught Philosopy in Alexander Severus's Reign. Porphyry falsly accuses him for having quitted the Christian Religion, in which he had been educated: For it is certain, as Eusebius and S. Hierom observe, That he always continued stedfast in the Doctrin and Precepts of Christianity. 'Witness, says Eusebius, those excellent Works that he has left behind 'him, which are so many authentick Monuments of his Faith and his Ability; as the Book intituled, 'The Agreement between Moses and Jesus Christ, and all the other Pieces which may be found in the 'Hands of studious Persons. In the Number of these Works we may reckon a Gospel composed out of all the Four: Which was a kind of Harmony and Concord which he had drawn up with a great deal of Pains and Study, as is testified by Eusebius in his Epistle to Carpianus, placed at the beginning of his Canons upon the Evangelists. Which has given occasion to S. Hierom to affirm, That Ammonius writ Canons like those of Eusebius. But they were not, properly speaking, Canons which Ammonius composed; for the Canons were no more than Indices of the Places of the Gospels, which are contained in One, Two, Three or Four of the Evangelists; whereas Ammonius's Harmony or Concord contained the entire Text of the Four Evangelists, which Eusebius made use of in making his Canons, which referred to this Concord, and were a Table to it. Trithemius likewise attributes Canons to Ammonius, but they are those of Eusebius. We have at present in the Bibliotheca Patrum an Harmony of the Four Evangelists, falsly attributed to Tatianus by Victor of Capua; which Cardinal Baronius, Father Labbe, and several other Learned Men do ascribe to Ammonius. It is certain, that this was not written by Tatianus, who retrenched the Genealogies of Jesus Christ, which are to be found in this Concord. It bears the Name of An Harmony, and it is ascribed in the Title to an Alexandrian, which made Baronius conjecture that it was written by this Ammonius, who was of Alexandria, and whose Works bore the Title of An Harmony. Zacharias, Bishop of Chrysopolis, who lived in the Twelfth Century, and made Commentaries upon Ammonius's Harmony, has followed this Word for Word, which confirms Baronius's Conjecture. Ammonius.

(a) Master of Plotinus and Origen.] Porphyry says, in Plotinus's Life, That this Philosopher, when he was twenty years old, came to hear Ammonius; that he was his Disciple for eleven Years; and that he had another Disciple named Origen. But, as we shall observe elsewhere, this is a different Person from the famous Origen. Nevertheless, Eusebius assures us, That our Origen was likewise his Scholar, and it seems undeniable, and we must needs confess, that there were two Origens, who were Disciples to Ammonius.

(b) Flourished in Alexandria.] There was another Ammonius, a Philosopher likewise, who lived after the Council of Chalcedon. He was somewhat older than Origen, and a Platonist.

ORIGEN.

Origen.

ORigen (a) was born in the City of Alexandria, about the Year 185, from the Birth of Chriſt. (b) Beſides the Name of Origen, he had moreover that of Adamantius. (c) His Father, who was called Leonidas, educated him in the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and did not only cauſe him in his Youth to learn the politer Learning, with all the profane Sciences, but he particularly ordered him to apply himſelf to the underſtanding of the Holy Scripture, before any other kind of Learning, giving him every day ſome Portions thereof to learn and repeat. And it hapned very luckily, that the Son's Inclination exactly anſwered the Father's Deſign; for he purſued his Study with a moſt extraordinary Zeal and Fervency; and as he was endowed with a quick Apprehenſion, and very great Sagacity, he did not content himſelf with that Senſe which at firſt view preſented it ſelf, but he afterwards endeavoured to dive into the myſterious and allegorical Explication of the Sacred Books, and ſometimes would even puzzle his Father by asking him the meaning of ſome Paſſages of Scripture, which obliged this good Man ſeemingly to reprehend him, and to adviſe him not to ſoar above the reach of his Underſtanding, and to content himſelf with the moſt clear and natural ſenſe of the Scripture; though inwardly he was extreamly joyful, and returned Thanks unto God with all his Heart, for his great Mercy, in beſtowing on him ſuch a Son. But that theſe Opinions may not be attributed either to the blind Love of a Father for his Child, or to that Affection which Euſebius, who relates theſe things, had for Origen, it may be ſufficient to obſerve, That S. Hierom, even then when he wrote againſt Origen, with the greateſt Earneſtneſs, was obliged to acknowledge, that he had been an extraordinary Perſon from his very Infancy. Magnus vir ab infantia, Ep. 65. ad Pammachium de erroribus Origenis. When he was a little more advanced in Years, he had for his Maſter in Philoſophy, the famous Ammonius (d), the Chriſtian Philoſopher; and in Divinity, the learned S. Clemens of Alexandria. He was not above ſixteen or ſeventeen years of Age, when the Perſecution began at Alexandria, in the 10th Year of the Reign of Severus, and the 202d from the Birth of Chriſt. His Father being ſeized and impriſoned upon the account of the Chriſtian Faith, he would alſo have offered himſelf to the Perſecutors, out of the great Zeal he had to ſuffer Martyrdom; but his Mother oppoſed it very ſtiffly, and was even forced to hide his Cloaths, to prevent him from going abroad to put his Deſign in Execution: And being thus detained againſt his Will, he wrote a Letter to his Father to exhort him to Martyrdom, wherein he expreſſes himſelf thus: Stand ſtedfaſt, my Father, and take care not to alter your Opinion upon our Account. Leonidas being animated by his Son's Exhortation, couragiouſly ſuffered Martyrdom, and was beheaded within a little while after. His Goods having been confiſcated, Origen remaining with his Mother and Brethren, was reduced to extream Poverty; but a certain Lady of Alexandria, who was very rich, whether out of Compaſſion to his Miſery, or out of the reſpect ſhe had for him, afforded him all kind of Aſſiſtance, and even took him into her Houſe. There lived with her at the ſame time a famous Heretick of Antioch, whom ſhe had adopted for her Son, who held Conferences in her Houſe, where a great Number, not only of Hereticks, but alſo of Catholicks, were preſent. But though Origen was obliged of neceſſity to converſe with this Man, yet he would never hold Communion with him in Prayer, keeping exactly to the Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions, and teſtifying the Abhorrence that he had for the Doctrin of the Hereticks. However, in a little time he put himſelf into ſuch a Condition, as not to ſtand any longer in need of his Ladies Aſſiſtance; for applying himſelf entirely, after his Father's Death, to the Study of Human Learning, he taught Grammar, and by his Employment he got a ſufficient Competency to maintain himſelf.

(a) Origen.] There is not any Eccleſiaſtical Author, whoſe Life we have more exactly. Euſebius, who was his great Admirer, has deſcribed it very particularly. 'Tis from him that we have taken, without citing him, almoſt all that we have related concerning him. We muſt add thereunto S. Hierom in his Catalogue, and in ſeveral other Places. Ruffinus againſt S. Hierom; S. Epiphanius in the 64th Hereſie; Photius in the 118th Volume, where he has given an Abridgment of the Apology of Pamphilus, and what Origen ſays of himſelf, Tom 6. in Matth. & alibi. We have alſo made uſe of the Aſſiſtance of the Moderns, and particularly of that famous Work of Huetius, intituled Origeniana; of the Life of Tertullian and Origen, written in French by a worthy Man; which we ſay as much to do them Juſtice, as to take off from our ſelves the Imputation of being a Plagiary. [Our Author means Dr. Allix, Treaſurer of the Church of Sarum, who had a great Eſteem paid to him in his own Country for his extraordinary Learning, till the late Perſecution forced him hither for Relief.

(b) Was born in the City of Alexandria, about the Year 185 from the Birth of Chriſt.] S. Epiphanius ſays, That he was an Alexandrian. Euſebius ſays, That he was ſeventeen Years old at the time of the Perſecution of Severus, which was in the Year 202 from the Birth of Chriſt, and by conſequence he was born in 185.

(c) He had moreover that of Adamantius.] Photius believes that he had this Name by reaſon of the ſtrength of his Reaſonings. S. Hierom ſays, That he had it becauſe he reſiſted Errors like a Diamond. But this is only gueſſing: We may ſay the ſame of thoſe who ſeek for the Etymology of the Name of Origen, out of a needleſs Curioſity.

(d) He had for his Maſter in Philoſophy, the famous Ammonius.] There were two Origens Diſciples to Ammonius: The firſt of whom, Porphyry ſpeaks of in the Life of Plotinus and Longinus, who wrote nothing but a ſmall Treatiſe of Dæmons, and lived but to the Reign of Gallienus, and who was Porphyry's Diſciple and Friend, which does not agree with our Origen, as has been obſerved by Valeſius and Huetius.

Whilſt

Whilst he followed this Profession, the Chair of the School at Alexandria becoming vacant by the Retreat of S. Clement, and by the Flight of all those who were dispersed by the Persecution, some of the Heathens, who were willing to be converted, made their Application to him, though he was not then above eighteen years old. The two first of his Disciples were Plutarch, and Heraclas his Brother, who succeeded Demetrius in the See of Alexandria. At length, the Reputation and Number of those that were converted by him increasing every Day more and more, Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, confirmed him in the Employment of Catechist, or Professor of Sacred Learning in the Church of Alexandria. When he saw himself setled in this Charge, he left off teaching Grammar, not being willing to depend upon any other Profession for his Subsistence: He sold all his Books that treated of human Learning, contenting himself with four Oboli a Day, which were allowed him by the Person who purchased them. Origen.

And then it was that he began to lead a very strict and severe Life, which contributed no less than his Learning to attract to him a great number of Disciples, notwithstanding the Fury of the Persecution, which being then begun at Alexandria, under the Government of Lætus, continued still with greater Violence under Aquila his Successor. He had several of his Disciples there, who suffered Martyrdom in the same Place; among others, Plutarch, Serenus, Heraclides, Hero, &c. And he was himself very often exposed to the Rage of the Heathens, when he went to the Assistance and Encouragement of the Martyrs. He then carried his Austerities so far, as to commit an Act of that Excess, as to be blamed even by those who have been his greatest Defenders, and which he himself afterwards condemned, though he might do it upon a good Motive (e), and out of an excessive Zeal for Charity. For as his Employment obliges him to be often with Women, whom he instructed as well as Men, that he might take away from the Heathens all pretence of Suspicion of any ill Conduct by reason of his Youth, he resolved with himself to execute to the Letter that Perfection which he was persuaded was proposed by Jesus Christ in these Words of the Gospel; That there are some who make themselves Eunuchs for the Kingdom of Heaven. He was willing to keep this Action private, and did all he could to conceal it from his Friends: But it was presently discovered; and being come to the Knowledge of Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, he commended his Zeal, and the Fervency of his Faith, and bad him not be discouraged upon that Account, but to continue more earnestly in the Instruction of the Catechumens.

In the mean time, Origen's Reputation increased daily more and more, and procured him so great a Number of Disciples, that he himself alone was not able to manage it: And therefore he committed to his Friend Heraclas the Care of those who were to be instructed in the first Principles of Religion, reserving to himself such as were advanced to a higher Degree of Knowledge. It was about this time, in the beginning of the Reign of Antoninus, that he went to Rome (f), under the Pontificate of Zephirinus; and much about the same time, he likewise composed that great and famous Work, called the Tetrapla; which was a Bible, wherein by the side of the Hebrew Text, he had transcribed in different Columns, the Translation of the Septuagint; that of Aquila, that of Symmachus, and that of Theodosion, distinguished by Verses; and he added thereunto afterwards two other Versions without any Authors Name, and a Seventh only upon the Psalms, which he found at Jerico in a Barrel: And these Versions, with the Hebrew, written both in Hebrew and Greek Characters, make up that Book which is called the Hexapla (g). These Works mightily increased his Reputation, and drew from all Parts into Alexandria a great Number of learned Persons to converse with Origen, and to be instructed by him. Ambrose was one of this Number: He anathematized the Heresie of Valentinus, in which he had been engaged, to embrace the Orthodox Faith. Origen was afterwards obliged several times to leave Alexandria: For first he was sent for by an Arabian Prince, who wrote to Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, and to the Governour thereof, to send him to him to be instructed by him; and a little while after, this City being cruelly harrass'd by the War which the Emperor Antoninus Caracalla made against its Inhabitants for having affronted him by their Jears and Scoffs, Origen retired into Palestine; and being come to settle in the City of Cæsarea, the Bishops of that Province desired him to expound publickly the Scripture in that Church, and to instruct the People in their Presence, though he was not yet a Priest; to which Request of theirs he complied. Now whether Demetrius envied him this Honour, or whether he was persuaded that they had violated the Rules of the Church, he wrote to these Prelates, telling them, That it was a thing unheard of, and that it had been never practised till then, that Lay-men should Preach in the Presence of Bishops. But Alexander of Jerusalem, and Theoctistus of Cæsarea, writing back to him, proved by several Instances, That this had been often put in Practice. In the mean time, Demetrius had written to Origen to come home; and having also sent some Deacons to press his Return, he was obliged to betake himself again to his first (e) And which he himself afterwards condemned, though he might do it upon a good Motive.] Eusebius, his great Advocate, speaks of it in such a manner as shews he was ashamed of it. The Passages where Origen himself has condemned it, are in the 15th Sermon upon S. Matthew, Chap. 19. Ver 12. and against Celsus, Book 7. We do not know whether he made use of Iron, or of some particular Simple; nor is it any great matter if we did know it.

(f) In the beginning of the Reign of Antoninus, that he went to Rome.] Baronius places this Voyage under Heliogabalus, and says that Origen was sent for to Rome by Mammæa; but he is mistaken, for Mammæa caused him to come to Antioch, and not to Rome.

(g) That Work which is called the Hexapla.] See Valesius upon Eusebius, where he proves that the Hexapla do comprehend six entire Versions, and that the seventh was only upon the Psalms. Eusebius writes, that they were composed at this time. S. Epiphanius believes that they were made at Tyre. As they are great Works, and tedious to compose, 'tis likely that he began them then, and finished them afterwards.

Origen.

Employment. Some time after, he was again diverted from it by Order of the Princess Mammæa, who caused him to come to Antioch, that she might see, and discourse with him: But staying with her but a little while, he returned to Alexandria, and fell again to work upon the Holy Scripture, with the Assistance of his Friend Ambrose, who furnished him with Copyers. He continued there till the Year 228, when he departed from thence with Letters of Recommendation from his Bishop, to go into Achaia about some Ecclesiastical Affairs (b). It was in this Voyage, as he passed through Palestine, that he was ordained Priest by the Bishops of this Province, being 42 years old. This Ordination of Origen by Foreign Bishops extreamly incensed his Diocesan Demetrius against him, it having been done without his Permission. He wrote every where Letters against him, upbraiding him for the Action which he had committed in his Youth. However, Origen returned to Alexandria, where he continued to write his Commentaries upon the Sacred Scripture. It was then that he published his five Books of Commentaries upon the Gospel of S. John, eight Books upon Genesis, Commentaries upon the first Five and twenty Psalms, and upon the Lamentations of Jeremiah; his Books de Principiis, and his Stromata.

All this while the Bishop of Alexandria was not at all appeased, but continued to persecute him: And in a Council which he assembled in the Year 231. it was ordained, That Origen should go out of Alexandria; that he should not be permitted to teach there any longer, nor so much as to live there; but that nevertheless he should not be deprived of his Dignity of Priesthood. Origen being banished from Alexandria, retired to Cæsarea, his ordinary Place of Refuge, where he was very well received by Theoctistus, Bishop of that City, and by Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, who undertook to defend him, and commissioned him to expound publickly the Scripture, hearing him as if he had been their Master. But Demetrius not being satisfied with the first Judgment given against Origen, accused him in a Council of the Bishops of Egypt (i), and having caused him to be Deposed, and even to be Excommunicated, according to S. Hierom, wrote at the same time to all Parts against him, to procure his being thrust out of the Communion of the Catholick Church. For when once a Priest was Excommunicated, and deposed by his Bishop by the Consent of the Bishops of the Province, he could not be any longer received in any Church. There was no need of examining whether it was justly or unjustly that he had been condemned in his Province. So that it is no wonder if all the Bishops of the World, excepting those of Palestine, Arabia, Phœnicia and Achaia, who were particularly acquainted with Origen, and with whom he had a most familiar Intimacy, should consent to his Condemnation; and if Rome it self, having assembled its Senate against him, says S. Hierom, that is to say, its Clergy, did condemn him after the Example of his own Bishop. We believe, says S. Augustin, upon a Subject almost like this, whatsoever we are informed of by Letters from a Council, and we must not do otherwise. For those who had not any particular Knowledge of Origen, ought to believe him guilty; and those who knew him, that they might not violate that Order of Discipline, ought to consent to his Excommunication, after it was once signified to them by his own Bishop. And so it was that Marcion being excommunicated by his Father, and his Bishop, and being come to Rome, desiring to be received there into Communion, received this Answer from the Clergy of that Church: We cannot receive you, without the Consent of your Father; for as there is in the Church but one and the same Faith, so there ought to be therein but one and the same Spirit, and one and the same Discipline. Therefore, by a great Number of Canons and Ecclesiastical Constitutions, it was absolutely prohibited to any Bishop whatever, and even to the Bishop of Rome himself, to receive into Communion those Priests who had been Excommunicated by their Bishops upon any Pretence whatever. Nevertheless Origen found, as we have said, some Protectors, especially in Palestine, where he continued to explain the Scripture at Cæsarea with great Reputation, both in the Life-time, and after the Death of Demetrius, who lived not long after he had condemned Origen. All sorts of Persons, not only from that Province, but even from remote Countries, came to be his Disciples. The most famous were, Gregory, Sirnamed afterwards Thaumaturgus, who was Bishop of Neocæsarea, and his Brother Athenodorus. But though after Demetrius's Death, the Persecution which he had raised against Origen abated a little, yet he was always looked upon as a Person Excommunicated by all the Egyptians, and the Sentence which was given against him by Demetrius continued under his Successors (l), Heraclas and Dionysius, though the first had been Origen's Disciple, and the second had a great Esteem for him. In this time he went on with his Commentaries upon S. John, and began to compose some upon Ezekiel and Isaiah.

(b) About some Ecclesiastical Affairs.] This Business was without doubt to confute Heresies which were at that time very numerous in Achaia, as S. Hierom and Ruffinus relate. 'Tis probable it was in this Voyage that he wrote, whilst he was at Nicomedia, (as he himself observes) his Letter to Africanus concerning the History of Susanna. It was likewise at this time that he convinced two Hereticks of falsifying the Conferences which he had with them, and of making him say what he never said. Ruffinus relates this in the Book de Adul. lib. Orig.

(i) Accused him in a Council of the Bishops of Egypt.] Photius, Cod. 118. makes mention of these two Councils, and S. Hierom. lib. 2. in Ruff. c. 5.

(l) The Sentence which was given against him by Demetrius continued under his Successors.] Gennadius says, That Theophilus reports that Heraclas drave Origen out of the Church; and the Author of the Life of S. Pachomius, says the same thing, as well as Peter of Alexandria, cited by Justinian in his Letter against Origen. It is most certain that the Sentence given against him was not revoked, and that not one of the Egyptians would have any thing to do with them.

After

After the Death of Alexander, under whoſe Reign all this hapned, his Succeſſor Maximinus ſtirred up a Perſecution againſt the Church in the Year 235. Ambroſe, Origen's Friend, and Theoctiſtus, Prieſts of Cæſarea, having been taken and brought before this Emperor, upon the account of the Chriſtian Religion, Origen ſent them an Exhortation to Martyrdom. Nevertheleſs, he concealed himſelf during this Perſecution, and retired for ſome time to the City of Athens, where he finiſhed his Commentaries upon Ezekiel, and went on with the Commentaries upon the Song of Solomon, which he finiſhed when he returned to Cæſarea in Paleſtine, from whence he went afterwards to Cæſarea in Cappadocia, where he remained ſome time with Firmilian, who invited him thither. Origen.

Under the Reign of Gordianus, which began in the Year 238, Beryllus, Biſhop of Boſtra, in Arabia, fell into a very groſs Error, affirming, That our Lord, before his Incarnation, was not a Perſon ſubſiſting. Some Biſhops being aſſembled to convince him of this Error, they cauſed Origen to come thither alſo. After that ſeveral Biſhops had had Conferences and Diſputes with this Biſhop, Origen being deſired to enter the Liſts with him, diſcourſed him at firſt familiarly, being willing to be throughly informed of his Opinion; and after having perfectly underſtood his Error, and the Grounds upon which he pretended to maintain it, he convinced him by ſeveral Reaſons, and ſet him again in the right Way, forcing him to acknowledge his Error. The Records of all that paſſed in this Affair were preſerved for a long time after, wherein were to be ſeen the Sentiments of Beryllus, the Opinions of the Biſhops who met there, the Queſtions propoſed to him by Origen, and the whole Conference which they had together in his Church. S. Hierom takes notice, That in his Time, Origen's Dialogue with Beryllus was extant. This Biſhop having acknowledged his Error, preſerved the Purity of his Faith even to his Death, and had an extraordinary Kindneſs for Origen, to whom he wrote ſeveral Letters. S. Hierom places him among the Number of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers.

Afterwards Origen was called, under the Reign of Philip, to another Aſſembly of Biſhops, which was held againſt ſome Arabians, who maintained, That the Souls of Men died, and were raiſed again with their Bodies. After having ſpoke in the Preſence of them all, upon the Queſtion which was in agitation, he defended the Truth, and attacked this Error with that Force of Argument, that he cauſed all thoſe to change their Opinion, who had fallen into the Miſtake.

He was then Threeſcore Years old, or thereabouts, and yet this did not hinder him from carrying on his Works with the ſame, or rather with greater Diligence; for he did not only compoſe ſeveral Books in his Study, but he made almoſt every Day Diſcourſes to the People, and for the moſt part without any time allowed to prepare them, which were nevertheleſs ſo well eſteemed, that the Tranſcribers took them after him as he delivered them, and publiſhed them afterwards. This Employment did not take him off from compoſing ſeveral conſiderable Books; as his Eight Books againſt Celſus, Twenty five Volumes upon S. Matthew, Twenty five Volumes of Commentaries upon the Minor Prophets, a Letter to the Emperor Philip, and one to Severa his Wife (m). S. Hierom ſays, That he wrote alſo a Letter to Pope Fabianus, wherein he ſets forth his Recanting of the Errors which he had written, and laid the Blame of them upon Ambroſe. If this be ſo, he did it to make this Pope favourable to him, that he might get again into the Communion of the Roman Church. He wrote alſo at this time againſt the Hereticks called Helceſaitæ.

Afterwards, in the Perſecution of Decius, which was about the ſame time, Origen ſuffered with great Conſtancy for the Faith. He was ſeized, put into Priſon, loaded with Irons; he had for ſeveral Days his Feet in the Stocks, where they were cruelly extended, even to the greateſt Extremity: They threatned him to burn him alive, and they rack'd him with ſeveral ſorts of Tortures, to try his Patience to the utmoſt; but he endured all with an undaunted Reſolution (n). Being come out of Priſon, he held ſeveral Conferences, and wrote Letters worthy of a Holy Confeſſor of Jeſus Chriſt. Laſtly, After having laboured ſo much, and ſuffered with ſuch great Credit and Glory, he died in the beginning of the Reign of Gallus, (m) A Letter to the Emperor Philip, and one to Severa his Wife] Some have believed that this Emperor was a Chriſtian, and ſay that Babylas deprived him from the Communion of the Church till he had repented for the Murthers which he had committed; but this Story is very uncertain.

(n) But he endured all with an undaunted Reſolution.] S. Epiphanius accuſes him for approaching to the Heathen Altars, and for making as if he would offer Incenſe to the Gods: But this Story, and almoſt every thing that Epiphanius ſays concerning Origen, is fabulous, and invented by ſome Enemy to Origen, who deceived S. Epiphanius, a Man eaſily impoſed upon. To ſhew that this Story is falſe, 'tis ſufficient to obſerve, that even Origen's greateſt Enemies, as Theophilus, S. Hierom, Juſtinian, &c. who have omitted nothing to cry him down, have taken no notice at all of it; and that his Defenders, Euſebius and Pamphilius, are ſo far from excuſing him from this Crime, that they have on the contrary commended his Conſtancy and Reſolution. 'Tis true, S. Epiphanius does not ſay that this hapned in the Perſecution of Decius, as Nicephorus does; but in what time ſoever they fix this Accident, it is equally overthrown by the Obſervation we juſt now made. It is alſo leſs probable, when it is referred to the time of Maximinus's Perſecution; for what likelihood is there that Origen, after having committed ſo groſs a Fault, ſhould be honoured, as he was, by the Biſhops of Paleſtine?

Origen. in the Year Two hundred fifty two, from the Birth of Chriſt, and in the ſixty ſixth Year of his Age (p).

Though what we have remaining at preſent of the Works of Origen, makes up ſeveral conſiderable Volumes, yet they are nothing in compariſon to what he has wrote (q). Euſebius had made an exact Catalogue of his Works, in the Apology which he made for him, under the Name of the Martyr Pamphilus; and S. Hierom did the ſame in one of his Letters. But both of theſe Catalogues being loſt, we have no knowledge of any, but thoſe that have been cited by the Ancients; which ſtill are much more in number than thoſe which we have now remaining.

We may diſtinguiſh Two kinds of Works written by Origen. The One are upon the Sacred Scriptures, and the Others are ſeparate Treatiſes upon different Subjects. He had compoſed three ſorts of Books upon the Scripture, not to mention his Hexapla and Tetrapla, which were rather a Collection than a Work; to wit, Commentaries, Scholia, and Homilies. In his Commentaries, he wholly gave up himſelf to that Heat and Fire which was natural to him, to penetrate the height and depth of the Scripture, and the moſt myſterious Interpretation thereof, the better. His Scholia were, on the contrary, only ſhort Notes to explain the difficult Places. Theſe two kinds of Works were more for the Learned, than for the uſe of the People; whereas the Homilies, which the Latins call Treatiſes, and which we call Sermons, were Moral Inſtructions upon the Holy Scripture. We have none of the Scholia remaining, nor have we hardly any of the Homilies in Greek; and thoſe which we have in Latin, are tranſlated by Ruffinus and others with ſo much Liberty (r), that it is a difficult matter to diſcern what is Origen's own, from what has been foiſted in by the Interpreter. A great part likewiſe of his Commentaries are entirely loſt. The following Table will preſent you in one View thoſe Works which we know to have been compoſed by Origen upon the Scripture, what we have left of them in Greek, and what we have only remaining of them in Latin.

(p) He died in the Year 252 from the Birth of Chriſt, and in the 66*th Year of his Age.*] According to Euſebius, Lib. 7. cap. 11. he died in the firſt Year of the Reign of Gallus; and S. Hierom, in his 65th Epiſtle, written 400 Years after Chriſt, ſays, That it was 150 Years after Origen's Death. It is certain, according to Euſebius, that in the Year 202 Origen was ſeventeen Years old, and that in the third Year of the Emperor Philip he was above ſixty Years old. So that if we ſuppoſe him to have lived but ſixty ſix years, as S. Hierom aſſures us in his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, he muſt have died in the beginning of the Reign of Gallus, in the Year 252; but if he lived ſixty nine Years, as Euſebius writes, he muſt have lived to the end of the Reign of Gallus; that is to ſay, till the Year 254 or 255.

(q) Yet they are nothing in compariſon to what he has written.] It is certain that he compoſed a very great Number of Books; and he made them with that eaſe, that he could hardly find Scribes enough, as both his Friends and Enemies agree. S. Hierom in his 65th Letter to Pammachius, ſpeaking of Origen, ſays, Who is there of you that can read as many Books as he has compoſed? And in another place, he ſays, That he compiled an innumerable Company of Books. Theophilus ſays the ſame thing. Euſtathius ſays, That he filled the World with his Works. Vincentius Lyrinenſis affirms, That none has written more than him; and it is upon this Account that he had the Name given him of Chalcenterus and Syntaſticus. S. Epiphanius and Ruffinus ſay, That he writ 6000 Volumes. S. Hierom ſeems to diſpute it, telling us, That there is not the third part of them in Euſebius's Catalogue. By the Word Volumes, we muſt not underſtand ſuch Tomes as are now adays, but only ſmall Works; ſo every Homily, every part of a Book, is in this ſenſe a Volume; ſo that we need not admire, though he had written 6000 Volumes.

(r) Are tranſlated by Ruffinus and others with ſo much Liberty.] Ruffinus ſays it himſelf in the Concluſion to his Verſion of the Commentaries upon the Romans; and S. Hierom alſo ſomewhere upbraids him with it. And beſides, this appears by the Tranſlation it ſelf, which is full of Figures and Alluſions to Latin Words, of Terms taken in another ſenſe than what they were in Origen's Time, where the Trinity and other Myſteries are expreſſed in ſuch Terms as were not uſed till after the Council of Nice, and where there are Points of Diſcipline more modern than Origen's Age; which has given occaſion to thoſe who have not conſidered the Liberty that Ruffinus took of adding or leaving out what he pleaſed, to doubt whether the greateſt part of theſe Works were Origen's or no. The Liberty which Ruffinus has given himſelf is ſtill more evident, by what he has written in the Prologue to his Verſion of the Commentary upon the Epiſtle to Romans, which he ſays he has Abridged by above the half. S. Hierom's Verſions are not more exact; and the moſt faulty of all is that of an ancient Tranſlator, who has interpreted the Commentaries upon S. Mathew.

The Books of Origen, of which we have any knowledge, and by whom they are cited.	The Books or Fragments of Origen, which we have in Greek, and whence they are taken.	The Latin Books of Origen, and their Translators.	Proofs and Notes upon the Table. Origen.

S. Epiphanius, and after him Cedrenus and Suidas, say, That Origen writ upon all the Books of the Holy Scripture. We shall here give the several Books in order, of which there remains now any knoweldge.

Thirteen Tomes of Commentaries. and two Books of Mystical Homilies upon Genesis. S. Hierom apud Rufinum invect 2. & Ep. ad Damasum. Euseb. lib. 6. cap 24. But these thirteen Tomes went no farther than Ver. 15. of the 4th Chap. where it is written, Omnis qui occiderit Cain, &c. S. Hierom ibidem ad Damasum, q. 1.

Two Books of Mystical Homilies upon Genesis. Idem Ibid.

Pamphilus in his Apology produces a small Fragment of his Preface upon Genesis.

Commentaries upon Exodus in the Philocalia, cap. 26.

Item. Some Scholia.

And twelve Homilies.

Scholia's upon Leviticus, and sixteen Homilies. Ruffin. invect. 2. & in Prologo Homil. in Num.

Commentaries upon Deuteronomy, which he cites himself, Tom. 32. in Joan. and in the 8th Homily upon S. Luke. Cassiodorus had seen eight Books of them, de Inst Divin. c. 7.

Some Homilies. Ruffin. Prolog. ad Ursat.

Six and twenty Homilies upon Joshuah.

Nine Homilies upon the Books of Judges.

Two Homilies upon the Kings: One upon the first Chapter of the first Book;

And the 9th Intituled, De Engastrimytho

Cassiodorus had seen another upon the first Book of Kings, one upon the Second, and a very long one upon the second Book of Chronicles. Lib. Decretal. Div. cap. 2.

He composed several Homilies upon Job; witness Eustathius in Diagnestico de Engastrimytho; and S. Hierom Ep. 75. The first of whom tells us, That he had said some things very childish concerning the Names of Job's Daughters: And the second, that he had said some things concerning the Stars, and against the Devil, which the Church does not receive.

He was the first that made Commentaries upon all the Psalms, as S. Hierom tells us, Ep. 89. S. Hilary has copied Three Fragments of Tomes, some Commentaries upon Genesis, related by Eusebius in his Books de Præparatione.

The first upon Ver. 12. of the first Chapter of Genesis, taken from the 7th Book.

The second taken out of the Third Tome, upon Ver. 14. taken from the 6th Book, and in the 22d Chapter of the Philocalia.

The third, which is in the Philocalia, cap. 14. is extracted out of the same Tome upon the 16th Verse.

Some Fragments taken from the Philocalia, cap. 16 & 17.

Some Commentaries upon Exodus, and upon Leviticus, (2).

A Fragment of the 20th Homily upon Joshuah, in his Philocalia, cap. 12.

The Homily de Engastrimytho was taken from a Manuscript of the Vatican Library, and published by Leo Allatius in 1629. with Eustathius in Hexameron, who wrote against this Homily of Origen's. The Subject of this Discourse is, to enquire whether the Witch of Endor did really raise the Soul of Samuel, or whether the Devil only appeared in his shape. Origen maintains the first Opinion, and Eustathius the second, Authors are divided hereupon.

A Fragment upon the first Psalm, taken from S. Epiphanius, Hæres. 64. Three others taken from the Philocalia, cap. 2 & 3.

Another Fragment containing the Catalogue of the Sacred Books, taken from Eusebius's History, lib. 6. cap. 25.

Another from S. Epiphanius, Ibid.

Seventeen Latin Homilies upon Genesis, translated by Ruffinus (1). It is doubted whether they be not extracted from the two Books of Mystical Homilies, because they seem to be of the number of those which were made ex tempore, and transcribed by the Writers. The last Homily is imperfect.

Twelve Homilies upon Exodus, translated by Ruffinus.

Sixteen upon Leviticus, attributed falsly to S. Cyril, translated also by Ruffinus.

Eight and twenty Homilies upon Numbers, which are doubtful, because they were translated by Ruffinus with great liberty (3).

Six and twenty Homilies upon Joshuah; to which there is a Preface attributed to S. Hierom; but 'tis more likely to be by Ruffinus, as well as the Translation of this Work, both because of the conformity of Style in the Prologue and in the Version, as because he owns them in the conclusion of the Commentaries upon the Epistle to the Romans.

Nine Homilies upon Judges, all translated by Ruffinus for the same Reasons.

The first Homily upon the Kings, which is in all probability done by the same Interpreter.

Nine Homilies upon the Psalms, translated by Ruffinus.

(1) In the Prologue to Ursatius, which is written by Ruffinus. he says, That he has collected and translated into Latin, the Homilies of Origen upon the whole Pentateuch; so that though this Version in Merlin's Edition bears S. Hierom's Name, yet it was made by Ruffinus, as Erasmus and Genebrard acknowledge. The Author of the Conclusion to the Version of the Commentaries upon the Epistle to the Romans, which is also Ruffinus, says positively, That he had translated Origen's Homilies upon Genesis, Exodus and Leviticus: They are those that follow.

(2) There is in the Philocalia, cap. 1. a Passage taken from the second Homily upon Leviticus, which is not to be found in those Latin Homilies which we have. He must therefore necessarily have written more than sixteen. Besides, in those which we have, Hom. 4 & 6. he cites more of them.

(3) The Style is Ruffinus's, who has made a Preface thereto; in which he affirms, and also in his Prologue to Ursatius, That he has collected in this Work, and disposed in order, all that he could find of Origens upon Numbers, whether they were written in Homilies or Scholia so that this Work is more Ruffinus's than Origen's; and we must not wonder, if we therein find some Explications which appear to be of a Latin Author, and later than Origen.

Origen.

Works of Origen.

and imitated them in ſeveral places. Trithemius ſays that he had ſeen them.

He alſo wrote Homilies and Scholia upon the Pſalms, as the Author of the Commentaries upon the Pſalms, attributed to S. Hierom, aſſures us.

A Commentary upon the Proverbs, cited by Pamphilus.

Two Commentaries upon the Song of Songs: One was made when he was young;

The other, which he Compoſed when he was older, divided into Ten Tomes, in which he has out-done himſelf; upon which account, S. Gregory Niſſen ſays, That he has taken extraordinary pains upon this Book of Scripture, In Proœmio lib. Canticorum.

Thirty Books of Commentaries upon Iſaiah.

Five and Twenty Homilies.

And ſome Scholia. Hier. lib. 1. Apol. adverſus Ruffin. cap. 3. & in Proœmio Comment MSS Euſebius Book 6. chap. 32. ſays, That the Thirty Tomes went as far as the Viſion of the four-footed Beaſts.

Several Homilies upon Jeremy: Caſſiodorus and Rabanus Maurus tell us, That there were 45 of them.

Five Tomes of Commentaries upon the Lamentations of Jeremiah; Euſebius.

Five and twenty Books of Commentaries, and ſome Homilies upon Ezekil; Euſebius Book 6. chap. 32.

Some Commentaries upon Daniel; Orig. Tract. 24. in Matth.

Five and twenty Volumes of Commentaries upon the leſſer Prophets. S. Hierom. de Scriptorib. Eccleſiaſt. lib. 6. cap. 35. The Commentaries upon Hoſea and Zachary are a part of them. S. Hierom makes mention of two little Books of Origen upon Hoſea, in the Preface to his Commentary upon the Prophets: but he did not explain it entirely, as it appears by S. Hierom, and by the Philocalia.

Greek Works or Fragments of Origen.

Item. One upon the 4th Pſalm, taken from the Philocalia, cap. 25.

One upon the 40th Pſalm, Ibid.

And laſtly, one upon the 82d Pſalm, taken from a Homily; Euſebius Hiſt. lib. 6. cap. 38.

A Fragment taken from his firſt Commentary upon the Canticles, in the Philocalia, chap. 27. And one taken from his ſecond, chap. 26.

Nineteen Homilies upon Jeremiah, falſly attributed to S. Cyril, and publiſhed by Corderius, twelve whereof are tranſlated by S. Hierom.

A Fragment of the 39th taken from the Philocalia, chap. 1.

A Fragment extracted from the 20th Tome, taken from the Philocalia, chap. 11.

A Fragment of the Commentary upon Hoſea, in the Philocalia, chap. 8.

Latin Works of Origen.

Two paſſages taken from the Commentary upon the Canticles, in the Apology of Pamphilus, tranſlated by Ruffinus, in S. Hierom Tom. 4.

Huetius believes, that the Latin Book upon the Canticles ought not to be divided into Homilies, ſince it is a continued Commentary, and that it is the very Commentary of Origen tranſlated by Ruffinus.

Sixtus Senenſis, and ſeveral others, think that it is by a Latin Author. See the Remark here at the ſide (4)

Two Homilies tranſlated by S. Hierom word for word.

Two paſſages taken from his Commentary upon Iſaiah. One upon the 1 Chap. and the other upon the 28th chap. in the Apology attributed to Pamphilus in the 4th Tome of S. Hierom.

Nine Homilies tranſlated by S. Hierom (as the ſame S. Hierom in his Catalogue, and the conformity of the Style, makes it appear.) The 9th is imperfect, to which there is added the end of the 9th Homily upon Jeremiah.

Fourteen Homilies upon Jeremiah, tranſlated by S. Hierom, twelve whereof are alſo in Greek; but the Tranſlation differs very much from the Greek, and the Homilies are diſpoſed without any order.

Fourteen Homilies upon Ezekiel, tranſlated by S. Jerome, as the Prologue, Style, S. Jerome's own Teſtimony in Catalogo aſſures us, and Ruffinus Invect. 2.

S. Jerome inſerted into his Commentaries upon Daniel, Origen's Scholia, taken out of his 10th Book of Stromata.

Proofs and Notes upon the Table.

(4) Not only the Proteſtant Criticks, as Perkins, Coke, Rivet, and others, do reject this Work after Eraſmus and Amerbachius, but likewiſe Sixtus Senenſis, and ſeveral Papiſts. In ſome Editions it is attributed to S. Ambroſe, in others to Peter Lombard, others, as Merlin, Genebrard, and Huetius, believe it to be that of Origen; and even Blondel in his Apology is of this Opinion, as well as Aubertin. The Reaſons againſt it are, That it appears to be by a Latin Author, 1. Becauſe in his Prologue he cites the Greeks as ſtrangers to him. 'Tis anſwered, That he oppoſes the Greeks, not to the Latins, but to the Chriſtians. 2. 'Tis ſaid, That the Author ſpeaks as if he had Written in Latin; for he explains the three Greek Names of the three parts of Philoſophy; Generales Diſciplinæ, ſays he, quibus ad ſcientiam perveniturtres ſunt, quas Græci Ethicam, Phyſicam, & Theoriam appellaverunt, (nos has dicere poſſumus Moralem, Naturalem, & Inſpectivam) nonnulli ſane etiam Logicam, quam nos rationalem poſſumus dicere. And in another place he ſays, That the Greek word ἀγαπᾶν ought to be Tranſlated by diligere, and ἀγαπη by dilectio. 'Tis anſwer'd, That theſe Explications are by the Interpreter. A third Reaſon, which is more conſiderable, is, That S. Hierom in his Prologue upon Origen's two Homilies upon the Canticles, which he Tranſlated, ſaith, That Origen in the ten Tomes explain'd the Tranſlations of the Septuagint, of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodoſion, and the fifth Verſion; which is not to be found in this Work; But this perhaps was left out by Ruffinus; beſides, it may be ſaid that this Commentary here may be accommodated to all theſe Verſions; ſo the Reaſons which are for the Negative are but weak, whereas thoſe which are for the Affirmative are very ſtrong. Firſt, It is certain that Origen did write upon the Canticles. Secondly, This Commentary has the Character and Style of Origen, which gives an allegorical and figurative ſenſe to every thing. Thirdly, There are ſome Sentences and Thoughts exactly like thoſe which are in the Homilies Tranſlated by S. Hierom. Fourthly, It explains the Hebrew words, and draws from thence a myſtical ſenſe, after Origen's way. Fifthly, He here cites his other Works. Sixthly, He has peculiar Notions concerning the Soul and the Angels. And laſtly, That which is a convincing Proof, is, That the Greek Fragment of Origen upon the Canticles, cited in the Philocalia, is found here, though interpreted with a great deal of liberty. That it is a continued Commentary, and not Homilies, is proved by the Style, becauſe there is a Preface written by the Author; and beſides, all Origen's Homilies have a like form of Concluſion, whereas this Commentary is continued without this Concluſion. Ruffinus is the Author of this Tranſlation; and it is certain that it was not S. Hierom, who ſays in the Prologue of the two Homilies, That this Tranſlation would require too much leiſure, pains, and expence, and that he durſt not undertake it. Gennadius ſays, That all Origen's Works which were not tranſlated by S. Hierom, were done by Ruffinus; and indeed the Style of it is very like Ruffinus's.

(5) Five and twenty Tomes of Commentaries upon S. Matthew, with Homilies and Scholia. Euseb. lib. 6. cap 36. and S Hierom in Proæmio Comment. in Matth.	A Fragment of the first Tome upon S. Matthew, in Eusebius lib. 5. Hist. cap. 25. Another taken from the first Tome in the Philocalia, chap. 6. The Commentaries from the 13th Chap. Ver. 36. to th 22d Chap. Ver. 33. are published by Huetius, who has copied them from a Manuscript in the Queen of Sweeden's Library; and from another in the King's Library, from the 11th to the 16th Tome, and comprizing the 17th.	A Fragment of the first Tome upon S. Matthew, in the Apology of Pamphilus. Another of the 7th Tome, ibid. Bullinger cites some passages thereof, in Disput. contra Casaubonum, p. 2. Decamb. 3. p. 19. taken out of the Commentary upon the 6th Chap. and the 23d. The Translation of the Commentaries upon S. Matthew, from the 13th Chap. Ver. 16. to the 27th, Ver. 66. is improperly divided into 36. Homilies, made by Erasmus from the 13th Chap. Ver. 36. to the 16th Chap. Ver. 20. The remainder is an Ancient Version, of which we do not know the Author (5).	(5) In the Preface attributed to S. Hierom upon the Homilies on S. Luke, there are 36. Ruffinus in his second Invective reckons 26 of them. We had better keep to the Account of Eusebius and S. Hierom. (6) Some have attributed it to S. Hierom; but he himself says in his Prologue upon S. Luke that he would not undertake it. In his 65th Epistle, he says, That no Person dar'd till his time to interpret the Books de Principiis, and the Tomes of Origen, therefore it is not ancienter than S. Hierom. Neither was it done by Ruffinus, who in his Version of the Apology of Pamphilus, translates some passages of this Commentary, and relates them after a different manner than what is to be found in this Version, which differs very much from the Text; and and it is quite another Style from that of S. Hierom, and of Ruffinus. 'Tis probably later than Gennadius, who says that all that we have of Origen in his time was Translated by S. Hierom, or Ruffinus. Aquinas relates some passages of them word for word, in his Catena aurea: So that this Author is between Gennadius and Aquinas, and nearer the first than the last, because he cites a passage of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, Tract 8. which was not quoted by Origen; which shews its Antiquity, besides the Style and the Terms are old. Huetius, from whose Observations we have taken all this, believes that it was made in Cassiodorus's time, and that it might be ascribed to Epiphanius Scholasticus, the Author of the Tripartite History, were not the Style quite different: Therefore he attributes it to one Bellator, a Friend of Cassiodorus, who had Translated several Greek Books, and particularly some of Origen's Homilies at the desire of Cassiodorus.
Commentaries upon S. Luke. 5 Tomes. S. Hierom. Prol. Hom. in Lucam. Origen T. 13. in Matt. Nine and Thirty Homilies upon S. Luke. Id. ibid & in Catalogo. Two and Thirty Tomes of Commentaries upon S. John. Ruffin. Invect. 2. Some Homilies upon the Acts.	There are but 9 Tomes upon S. John extant, 1.2.6.10.13. 19.20.28.32. Ferrarius published a Version divided into 32 Tomes, taken from a Venetian MS. Huetius published the Greek from a MS. in the Kings Library. A Fragment of the 4th Tome. Philocal. c. 4. Another of the 5th Tome. Ibid. c. 4. A Fragment of the Comments upon the Acts. Ib. c. 7.	Nine and thirty Homilies upon S. Luke, Translated by S. Hierom (7).	(7) He mentions it in the Catalogue of his Works, and in his Prologue to Paula & Eustochium; and it is quoted by Ruffinus in his Invective. Ruffinus upbraids him for having omitted and alter'd, in Translating Origen's Homilies upon S. Luke, those Passages which were against the Divinity of the Son; and that when he quoted this Passage, Ecce enim ut facta est vox, &c. he observes that he added, Principium substantiæ ejus; which is to be found in the 4th of those Homilies that we have still extant. Lastly, according to the report of Ruffinus, S. Hierom Translated seventy of Origen's Homilies. Now he had Translated 14 upon Jeremiah, 14 upon Ezekiel, and 9 upon Isaiah, as appears by his Prologue upon Ezekiel; and there remains, to make up the 70, these 39 upon S. Luke; besides that those which we have under his Name, are written according to the Style and manner of Origen. It is objected in the first place, That there are therein several Greek words turn'd into Latin: for example, it is observed, That κεχαριτωμένη, that is to say, gratia plena; That ἄλογος, that is, sine ratione, That cadaver comes a casu; That in the Greek there is an Article. Homily 22. and Homily 25. Answ. These Explications are put in by the Interpreter. There are the like in those Books which we have at present in Greek, and which are undoubtedly his, and in the ancient Translators, as in him that interpreted S. Irenæus, &c. Secondly, It is objected, That the Holy Ghost is there called the Third Person. Ans. Origen often said, That the Father, and the Son and the Holy Ghost were 3 Hypostases, and the Latins have Translated the word Hypostasis by that of Person: for example, Ferrarius Translated that Passage of the second Tome in Joan. after the same manner. Third Objection: He makes a Dialogue between the Devil and Jesus Christ, and makes them hold long Discourses together. Ans. This is exactly Origen's way. Fourth Objection: He makes use of the Authority of Isaiah and the Psalms against the Sadducees, in the 39th Homily; whereas Origen said that the Sadducees admitted only the Law, and by consequence he would not have made use of any other Books against them. Answ. Origen never said that the Sadducees did not admit the Prophets, but only that they did not make use of them to prove the Doctrins of Faith.
Commentaries upon the Epistle to the Romans, which were to the Number of 15 Tomes, according to Ruffinus in the Preface to his Version; or twenty according to Cassiodorus. Some Commentaries upon the first Epistle to the Corinthians; Hom. 17. in Luc. & Hier. Ep 52. Some Commentaries, Homilies and Scholia upon the Epistle to the Galatians. S. Hierom in Proæmio Commentar. Ep. ad Galat. & Ep. 89 ad August. Three Tomes upon the Epistle to the Ephesians. Lib. 1. Apol. ad Ruf. 4, 5.	A Fragment of the first Tome of the Commentary upon the Epistle to the Romans, chap. 24. of the Philocalia. Another taken from the 9th Tome, in the 9th chap. of the Philocalia.	Ruffinus Translated 15 or 20 Tomes of Origen's Commentaries upon the Epistle to the Romans (8).	(8) Ruffinus abridg'd them into half the Compass, as he acknowledges in his Preface. Some attribute this Version to S. Hierom; but unjustly: for in the conclusion he strikes at S. Hierom in these Words: Some perhaps may ask me why I put my Name, and may enquire why I have not set down, for example, The Commentaries of Hierom upon the Epistle to the Romans. And he adds, That he Translated the Books of S. Clement; and that we should not think that it was done by Hierom, he puts the Name of Clement in the Title, which shews that this Translation was done by Ruffinus. We have also two Latin Passages taken from the Apology of Pamphilus.

Works of Origen.	Greek Works or Fragments of Origen.	Latin Works of Origen.	Proofs and Notes upon the Table.
A Commentary upon the Epiſtle to the Coloſſians. Apolog. de Pamphilo.		Fragments of Commentaries upon the Epiſtles to the Coloſſians and to Titus, in the Apology of Pamphilus.
One upon the Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians. Hier. Ep. 52.		S. Hierom, in the Epiſtle to Minerius & Alexander, relates a Fragment of the Commentaries of Origen upon the Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians.
One upon the Epiſtle to Titus. Apolog. Pamph.		Laſtly there are ſome Fragments of a Commentary upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, in the Apology of Pamphilus.
Some Commentaries and Homilies upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews.	Euſebius lib. 6. cap. 25. relates a Fragment upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews.
He promiſed a Commentary upon the Apocalypſe, Tom. 3 in Matth.	All theſe Greek Fragments are exactly collected by Huetius in the two Volumes which he has publiſhed, containing all that remains in Greek of Origen's Works upon the Scripture; and tis to him that we are indebted for almoſt all the Remarks that are here. He has not inſerted the Fragments which are in the Catenæ, becauſe he believes they are not of any great Authority.

The other Treatiſes of Origen are not near ſo many in Number as his Works upon the Holy Scripture: and yet they were very conſiderable: for not to mention his Commentaries upon the Philoſophers, which Euſebius ſpeaks in of in the 6th Book, Chap. 18. of his Hiſtory, he wrote (s) 2 Books of the Reſurrection; the Treatiſe de Principiis, divided into 4 Books; 10 Books of Stromata, (t) witneſs the ſame Euſebius, Chap. 24. The Book of Martyrdom, mentioned in the 28 Chapter. The 8 Books againſt Celſus in the 36 Chap. The Letter to Africanus, concerning the Hiſtory of Suſanna; to which we may add, the Diſpute which he had with Beryllus, which was extant in Euſebius's Time, (u) and ſome Diſcourſes and Letters which Euſebius collected, and divided into three Books, as he declares in the ſame 5th Book, Chap. 36. S. Hierom mentions almoſt all his Works; and beſides theſe, two other Dialogues of the Refurrection, and a Treatiſe explaining the Hebrew Names of the New Teſtament, which he added to that of Philo, concerning the Explanation of thoſe of the Old. (x) And alſo in the Apology of Pamphilus, there is mention made of a Treatiſe concerning Prayer, compoſed by Origen. Theodoret often cites our Author againſt divers Heretick: (y) but we muſt not therefore think that he compoſed ſo many expreſs Treatiſes againſt theſe Hereticks: they are only ſome Paſſages of his Works, where he confutes ſeveral Errors, whilſt he is writing upon other Subjects.

The Chief of all theſe Books is the Diſcourſe againg Celſus, divided into eight Books, which were publiſhed in Greek long ſince, with the Tranſlation of Gelenius, and the Notes of Hæſchelius, and of one Chriſtoph. Perſona, printed at Rome in the Year 1471, and afterwards very correctly in England in (s) He wrote two Books of the Reſurrection.] S. Hierom in Ruffin. lib. 2. Invect. ſays, That Origen compoſed two Books and two Dialogues of the Reſurrection. The ſame in his 6th Epiſtle cites the 4th Book of the Reſurrection. Methodius wrote againſt this Work.

(t) The Treatiſe de Principiis, divided into four Books, and ten Books of Stromata.] This laſt Book was compoſed in imitation of that of S. Clement of Alexandria; witneſs S. Hierom, Ep. 84. Who ſays, That Origen compared therein the Opinions of the Philoſophers and Chriſtians, and proved our Doctrins from Plato, Ariſtotle, Numenius and Cornutus. In the tenth Book he explained the Epiſtle to the Galatians, and ſome Paſſages of Daniel.

(u) And ſome Diſcourſes and Letters which Euſebius had collected.] Euſebius has related a Fragment of that which he wrote to his Father, being then very young, lib. 6 cap. 2. Item, of another againſt thoſe who accuſed him of applying himſelf too much to the Study of Human Learning, Chap. 19. He makes mention in the 28th Chapter of the Letters which he wrote in the time of the ſixth Perſecution; afterwards in the 36th Chapter, of a Letter to the Emperor Philip, and of one to Severa his Wife; and laſtly, of one to Fabianus, and of ſeveral others, cited at large in the 39th Chapter. S. Hierom in his Catalogue, cites the three laſt, together with a Letter to Beryllus. Ruffinus cites a Letter to his Friends, Lib. de Adult. lib. Origenis; where he complains that ſome had falſified his Writings. In the 13th Chapter of Philocalia, there is part of one ſet down to Gregory Thaumaturgus; Cedrenus and Suidas have preſerved a Fragment of another Letter.

(x) Concerning the Explanation of thoſe of the Old.] S. Hierom in Præfat. ad lib. Hebr. Nom. The Author of the Orthodox Queſtions, attributed to S. Juſtin, Queſt. 82, and 86.

(y) Theodoret often cites our Author againſt divers Hereticks.] Lib. 1. cap. 2. He ſays, that he wrote againſt Menander. In the 4th Chapter againſt Baſilides and Iſidorus; in the 7th againſt the Helceſaites; Euſebius ſays, concerning theſe laſt, That it was in his Homilies. In the 19th Chapter, againſt Apelles; in the 3d Book, Chap. 2. againſt the Nazareans. He attributes to him in the 5th Chapter, the little Labyrinth againſt Theodotus, which is by another Author.

1658. The Exhortation to Martyrdom has been lately publiſhed by Meurſtenius, the Greek Profeſſor at Baſil, together with the Letter to Africanus, concerning the Hiſtory of Suſanna, which was formerly ſet forth in part by Heſchelius, in the Year 1602. We have likewiſe the Verſion of the four Books de Principiis, compoſed by Ruffinus. But he has taken ſo much Liberty (aa), that we cannot diſcern what is Origen's own. There are ſome Latin Fragments of the Books of the Reſurrection, cited in the Apology of Pamphilus, which we have only in Latin. The Letter to S. Gregory Thaumaturgus is entire in Greek in the Philocalia. Ruffinus relates a Fragment of a Letter to thoſe of Alexandria, where he complains that they had corrupted his Books. S. Hierom accuſes him for having omitted, that in this ſame Letter Origen railed at Demetrius, Biſhop of Alexandria, and at thoſe others who had condemned him. Euſebius alſo produces, as we have already ſaid, ſome Fragments of two Letters. The Book of Prayer, which Huetius had promiſed, has been lately publiſhed in Greek and Latin in England. This Work was addreſſed to Ambroſe and Tatianus, and it may be divided into three Parts. In the firſt, he treats of the Neceſſity, the Advantage, and the good Effects of Prayer. In the Second, he diſcourſes of the different kinds of Prayer, and particularly explains the Lord's Prayer. In the Laſt, he ſpeaks of the Circumſtances and Conditions which ought to precede, accompany and follow our Prayers. Laſtly, We may joyn to Origen's Works the Philocalia, which is a Collection of ſeveral Paſſages of Origen, relating to the Holy Scripture, made by S. Baſil, and S. Gregory Nazianzen, and publiſhed by Tarinus in the Year 1618, and the Book of the Apology of Pamphilus, of which we have the Tranſlation done by Ruffinus, which is amongſt S. Hierom's Works in the Fourth Tome. Origen.

We ought alſo to have reckoned here the Dialogue againſt Marcion, which bears his Name, if it was not more probable that it was compoſed by another Author (bb), who has introduced Origen in this Dialogue defending the Churches Cauſe, and therefore has given it Origen's Name, as Cicero gave that of Lælius and Cato to his Books of Friendſhip and Old Age.

(aa) But he has taken therein ſo much Liberty.] He declares it himſelf in his Preface, where he ſays, that he has retrenched and added ſeveral things concerning the Trinity. The Paſſages out of theſe Books, related in the Apology, are quite different from this Verſion, as well as thoſe which are in the Philocalia.

(bb) If it was not more probable that it was compoſed by another Author.] This Dialogue is a Diſpute againſt the Marcionites, and the Valentinians, wherein he introduces Origen, defending the Doctrins of the Church; Megethius, and Marcus taking the Part of the Marcionites; Droſerius, Valens, and Maximus, that of the Valentinians, and Eutropius as a Judge between them. We have three different Verſions of it, that of Perionius, that of Picus, printed in 1655, and that of Humfredus in 1557, which is much the exacteſt. But it has been lately publiſhed in Greek by a Learned Engliſh-man, who pretends that it is Origen's. Huetius after Halloixius and Rivet believes that it is not Origen's, and this Opinion ſeems the moſt probable. 'Tis indeed cited in the Philocalia, as a Work of Origen's: But it is poſſible that S. Gregory and S. Baſil might have been deceived, becauſe it bears his Name: or that believing that this Book containing nothing but Origen's Opinions, and going under his Name, they might quote it in a Work wherein they made a Collection of his Opinions. Beſides it appears by the Title, that they had taken this Paſſage from Euſebius, who relates it word for word as it is in the Philocalia, in his 7th Book de Præparatione Evangelica, as taken from the Treatiſe of one Maximus περὶ ὕλης, that is to ſay, concerning Matter; and at the end they add the following Remark: This is extracted from Euſebius's Book, De Præparatione Evangelica; the Author thereof is Maximus, a famous Writer among the Chriſtians, as Euſebius obſerves; but it is likewiſe found almoſt in the ſame Terms in Origen's Dialogue againſt the Marcionites and other Hereticks, in which Megethius is the Diſputant, and Eutropius the Judge. This Obſervation makes it appear, that the Authors of the Philocalia believed that this Paſſage did really belong to Maximus, relying upon Euſebius's Authority; but having alſo found it in a Dialogue which bears Origen's Name, they believed that they might cite it as his, without examining whether he was the Author of it; for 'tis a thing very unlikely to affirm, that Origen had taken this Paſſage from Maximus, to inſert it into his Dialogue, ſince it is already in Euſebius in form of a Dialogue, though the Names be ſuppreſſed. So it ſeems that we may ſay that Maximus was the Author of this Dialogue, wherein he introduces Origen, diſputing, againſt the Hereticks, and Eutropius as Judge. But there are conſiderable Difficulties raiſed againſt this Hypotheſis. The firſt, That Maximus was more ancient than Origen, as appears by Euſebius, who in the firſt Book of his Hiſtory, Chap. 27, places him amongſt the Authors, who flouriſhed under the Emperours Commodus and Severus. The Second is, That it is not likely the Treatiſe of Maximus ſhould be this Dialogue, becauſe it was Entitled concerning Matter, and he only proved therein, that Matter was a created Subſtance, whereas this Dialogue contains ſeveral other Points of Religion. We may anſwer to the firſt Reaſon, That Euſebius was not exact in ſetting down the Times of Authors, and eſpecially of thoſe about whoſe Lives he was not particular. The ſecond Objection is more difficult; though we may ſay, that Euſebius having extracted out of this Book of Maximus, only what relates to the Original of Evil, and the Creation of Matter, he gave it the Title of περὶ ὕλης, & unde ſit malum, though it treated of other Subjects; beſides that, this Dialogue was chiefly deſigned to confute the Error of the Marcionites, who admitted of ſeveral Principles for the Explaining the Cauſe of Evil, and that of the Valentinians, who made Matter Eternal. Which agrees with what Euſebius ſays in his Hiſtory, that Maximus compoſed ſeveral Volumes concerning that famous Queſtion among the Hereticks; From whence comes Evil? and to prove that Matter is a created Subſtance; for though there are other things diſcourſed of in this Dialogue, yet theſe are the two Principal Heads. Nevertheleſs, as the Paſſage which is related by Euſebius, and in the Philocalia, does not agree exactly with what is in this Dialogue, and that the Names of Origen, and the other Diſputants are not there to be found, 'tis likely they were added after the Death of Maximus and Origen. There are likewiſe in this Dialogue ſome Things which might,

(Whom our Author means by this Engliſh-man I know not. Weſtenius, the Greek Profeſſor at Baſil, was the firſt that publiſhed it at Baſil, Gr. Lat. in 1674. 4°.)

Origen. might give occaſion to conjecture, that it is more Modern than any of theſe Authors. For it having been objected in the Firſt Part, that the God of the Creation, who has the Hearts of Kings in his Power, muſt of neceſſity be a wicked God, ſince he ſuffered the Chriſtians to be perſecuted: He anſwers, Theſe pitiful Shifts which you make, might have had ſome probability in former times, and there might have been ſome neceſſity then of returning an Anſwer to them, which might have been done very eaſily: But now we have a Religious Prince, what have you to ſay? Will you ſay that it is another God who rules his Heart, ſince this Godly Prince governs us much better than the others, and yet after a quite contrary manner; for he eſtabliſhes what the others would have deſtroyed, he overthrows the Images and Temples which the others honoured. Which ſhews that this Dialogue was compoſed in Conſtantine's time; for to ſay that this is to be underſtood of Philip, is to affirm a thing of which there is no likelihood; becauſe ſuppoſing that he was a Chriſtian, of which we are not aſſured, it was moſt certain that he did not make Profeſſion thereof, and we cannot ſay of any Emperor before Conſtantine, that he overthrew Idolatry, and deſtroyed Temples and Idols. So the moſt probable Opinion is, That this Dialogue was compoſed in the beginning of the Fourth Age by one of Origen's Diſciples, who has inſerted Maximus's Dialogue into his Diſcourſe. Beſides, there is another Reaſon not to attribute it to Origen, which is taken notice of by Huetius; which is, that we find ſome Notions that are very Orthodox, and quite different from Origen's Errors, concerning the State of Innocence, Man's Body, the Soul, and the Reſurrection.

But we muſt reckon amongſt the Suppoſititious Books two different Commentaries upon Job, Printed in Latin under Origen's Name; the firſt divided into three Books, which concludes about the middle of the third Chapter of Job. We do not certainly know whether it was compoſed in Latin, or whether it was tranſlated from the Greek (ee): however, 'tis certain that it was not written by Origen (dd), but by ſome other Author, who lived ſince the Time of Arius (ee), and one that was an Arian himſelf.

The other Commentary upon the Book of Job, tranſlated by Pericnius from a Manuſcript of the King's Library, is alſo by an Arian (ff), but different from the firſt, though he commends the Martyr Lucian as well as Origen; and ſpeaks of the Manichees. The four Homilies upon Job, which were publiſhed under Origen's Name in the firſt Edition by Genebrard, were left out in the ſecond, becauſe they are not Origen's, no more than S. Chryſoſtom's, to whom they are ſtill attributed. It is obſerved in a Letter prefixed to Eraſmus's Edition, that there were ſtill remaining under Origen's Name, ſome little Notes upon Job, which they would not inſert in his Works, becauſe they appeared to be of a quite different Style and Genius.

There is in the King's Library, a Commentary upon S. Mark, aſcribed likewiſe to Origen, which is certainly none of his (gg).

The ten Homilies upon ſeveral Paſſages of the Goſpel, collected by Merlinus, are all written by others (hh), being written after a quite different manner, and almoſt all of them compoſed by a La-

(cc) Whether it was compoſed in Latin, or whether it was tranſlated from the Greek.] Eraſmus, Aubertin, and Cook are of Opinion that it was Latin, becauſe the Phraſe and Manner of Expreſſion is Latin; but this might proceed from the Intrepreter. That which makes it believed that the Author was rather a Greek, is the Prologue which is in the Interpreters Name; which Eraſmus rejects as Suppoſititious.

(dd) 'Tis certain that it was not written by Origen.] He ſays ſome things contrary to what Origen affirms. For Example, in the Second Book, he ſays that Jeſus Chriſt preached three years and a half; and Origen, in his Book De Principiis, Cap. 2. and Hom. 32. in Lucam, ſays that he preached but a Year and odd Months.

(ee) But by ſome other Author, who lived ſince the time of Arius.] He calls the Church that believes the Trinity, a Sect and a Hereſie. He rejects the Word Trinity and ὁμοούσιος: He commends the Martyr Lucian, who died a long time after Origen, and whom the Arians extolled as their Patron: Upon which Arius calls Euſebius of Nicomedia, Colluthianus: And this ſufficiently ſhews how groſly they are miſtaken, who have attributed theſe Commentaries to S. Hilary.

(ff) The other Commentary upon the whole Book of Job, is alſo by an Arian.] He condemns the Term ὁμοούσιος; and calls the Catholicks Homouſiaſts; He commends Lucian the Martyr; and it is different from the Firſt, becauſe he makes Moſes to be the Author of the Book of Job, and the Firſt only make him to be the Interpreter. Whereas Origen, in his Sixth Book againſt Celſus, ſays, that Moſes wrote nothing but the Pentateuch. It is of a different Style from the Treatiſes of Origen, and he confutes thoſe who believe the Stars to be animated, which is Origen's Opinion.

(gg) A Commentary upon S. Mark, aſcribed likewiſe to Origen, which is none of his.] It is of a quite different Style. He ſays he will collect the Opinions of the Ancients. In ſome Manuſcripts it is attributed to S. Cyril; in others to Victor of Antioch: It has been Tranſlated, and Publiſhed under this Name by Pelanus. He cites Origen, Euſebius, S. Chryſoſtom, Apollinarius, and Theodoret; and he mentions the Novatians.

(hh) The Ten Homilies are all of other Authors than Origen.] They have been collected in ſeveral Places, and put into order by Merlinus. They are all written in a different Style from Origen's; and compoſed by a Latin Author: They have all Deſigns that are quite differing from thoſe of Origen's Homilies; They are full of Quibbles upon Words, and of affected Rhetorical Figures, which is not to be found in Origen's Works. In the Firſt, he ſays, That Jeſus Chriſt was born of the Virgin, without opening of her Womb; The contrary to which is taught by Origen, in his 54th Homily upon S. Luke. The Second diſcourſes of the Arians and the Manichees; and therein the Term ὁμοούσιος is defended; therein likewiſe are cited the Books attributed to S. Dionyſius. The 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 10th Books are all filled with vain Repetitions, Antitheſes, Quibbles upon Words, Synonima's and Alluſions, which prove that it is a Latin Author, they are of the ſame Style of the Firſt. The 9th is compoſed of Three Parts (as Huetius has obſerved.) The Firſt is Part of Origen's 34th Diſcourſe upon S. Mathew. The Second is taken from S. Hierom's 8th Book upon Iſaiah; and the Laſt from the 17th Chapter of St. Gregory's Ninth Book of Morals.

tin. The Book concerning Sighs, or Penance, attributed to Origen, and placed by Gelaſius among the Number of the Apocryphal Pieces, is without doubt counterfeit, as well as his Preface. Morellus cauſed to be printed under Origen's Name, in the year 1601, ſome Scholia upon the Lord's Prayer, and upon the Hymn of the Bleſſed Virgin, and of Zachary; but the Bibliotheca Patrum, &c. (ii) informs us, That they were written by Petrus Laodicenſis. Beſides, there were found in the Vatican Library, ſome Homilies upon Jeremiah, ſome whereof were printed by Chifletius in the Year 1623, which alſo are none of his. The Book concerning Cœlibacy of the Clergy, which is amongſt S. Cyprian's Works, bears the Name of Origen in a Manuſcript of the King's Library (kk), but 'tis the Work of a Latin Author. It is ſaid alſo, That there are in Libraries ſome Treatiſes under this Author's Name (ll), which are very dubious, they not being cited by the Ancients, and being for the moſt part upon ſuch Subjects, upon which it is not likely that Origen ſhould have written. Origen.

I ſhall not ſtand to ſet down in particular the ſeveral Editions of Origen's Works, as well in Greek as in Latin, having already taken notice of the greateſt part of them: It ſhall ſuffice me to ſay, That all Origen's Works that are in Latin, have been collected by Merlinus, and afterwards by Eraſmus, and printed in two Volumes at Paris in the Year 1512, and at Baſil in the Years 1526, 1545, and 1571. That Genebrard has ſince made a larger Collection, printed at Paris in 1574, 1604, and 1619; and at Baſil in 1620. That all the Greek Fragments of Origen's Books upon the Scripture, are publiſhed with a Tranſlation by the Learned Huetius, and printed in France in two Volumes, in the Year 1667, but that he has not yet ſet forth the other Works of Origen, as he promiſed. That his Books againſt Celſus, and the Philocalia were printed in England in 1658. That Wetſtenius, Greek Profeſſor at Baſil, cauſed to be printed there, in 1674, the Dialogue againſt Marcion, the Exhortation to Martyrdom, and the Letters of Africanus and Origen, concerning the Hiſtory of Suſanna; and laſtly, That the Book concerning Prayer has been lately printed in England. So that to have all Origen's Works, as well thoſe which we have only in Latin, as thoſe in Greek, we muſt have Genebrard's Edition, Huetius's two Volumes, the Books againſt Celſus, with the Philocalia, printed in England in Quarto; the Quarto Volume ſet forth by Wetſtenius, and the little Treatiſe concerning Prayer, lately printed in England.

It would be very tedious, and to little purpoſe, to give here an Abridgment of all Origen's Works, and particularly of his Homilies, and his Commentaries upon the Scripture, which are almoſt all full of Allegories and Morality; beſides, having only the Verſion of the greateſt part of the Homilies, we cannot be certain whether that which relates to Doctrin and Diſcipline, be Origen's own, or Ruffinus's: I ſhall therefore content my ſelf to give a Summary of his Doctrin upon the principal Points of our Religion, examining at the ſame time whether he be guilty of thoſe Errors of which he is accuſed.

If we had had his Books of Principles in Greek, we might eaſily have been informed of all his Opinions; for theſe Books contained the Abridgment of Doctrin: But ſince we have only Ruffinus's Tranſlation, in which he himſelf confeſſes that he altered and omitted ſeveral Paſſages, wherein Origen diſcourſes concerning the Myſtery of the Trinity, which he believes were corrupted by the Hereticks, we cannot be aſſured of Origen's Doctrin from this Verſion, except it be in thoſe things for which he is condemned: ſo that we muſt have recourſe to thoſe Works of Origen which we have in Greek.

Origen's Notions concerning the Nature and the Attributes of God are very Orthodox; he believes that he is a Spiritual, inviſible, Simple, and Eternal Eſſence. He is wrongfully accuſed for believing that God had a Body, ſince he ſays directly contrary in ſeveral places, and proves it by many convincing Arguments. He diſcourſes admirably concerning the Knowledge and the Providence of God. Some have accuſed him of having ſet Bounds to his Power, becauſe he ſays, That he is called Omnipotent only becauſe he governs all things, and not becauſe he can create any thing new. Juſtinian cites in his Letter to Mennas, a Paſſage taken from the ſecond Book of Origen's Principles, where he ſays that the Power of God is finite, and that he made all the Creatures that he can govern. Ruffinus alſo taxes him of this Error. He ſeems indeed to have believed that God created that Matter from all Eternity, whereof he has made the World, and of which he will make ſucceſſively ſeveral other Worlds.

The Ancients are extreamly divided as to the Judgment that is to be given of Origen's Doctrin concerning the Trinity.

(ii) But the Bibliotheca Patrum, &c.] Michael Chifleri tells us in the Preface to his Commentary upon Jeremiah, Printed in the Year 1623, that he found four and twenty of them, and that the Laſt was the Treatiſe of S. Clement, What Rich Man can be ſaved? He ſets down Eight.

(kk) Bears Origen's Name in a Manuſcript of the King's Library.] By Vincentius Bellovacenſis, and ſome others. Pamelius is of this Opinion. In other Manuſcrips it is attributed to S. Hierom and S. Auguſtin. Some have believed, that it was Tranſlated from Greek, but it is, as we ſhall ſhew hereafter, written by a Latin.

(ll) Laſtly, They ſay that there are in Libraries other Treatiſes under this Author's Name.] There is a Book concerning the Aſtrolabe, which was ſaid to be in the Vatican Library; the Breviary or Abridgment of Origen, a Book concerning Preaching or Catechizing, &c. And beſides this, there are ſeveral of Origen's Fragments in the Catenæ Græcorum Patrum: But it would be an endleſs Labour to collect them all. Huetius, who neglected this Toil, thinking it to be too Great, by reaſon of the Multitude of the Catenæ, and to be to no purpoſe, by reaſon of their little Authority; tells us that Father Combefis, a Man of indefatigable Pains, having undertaken it, he has referred us to the Collection which he has made of them. 'Tis probable he did not think them worth publiſhing.

S. Hierom

Origen.

S. Hierom, John Biſhop of Jeruſalem, S. Epiphanius, S. Auſtin, and after them Theophilus, Juſtinian, and the fifth Council, have accuſed him of ſeveral Errors about this Myſtery: On the contrary, Didymus, S. Athanaſius, S. Baſil, S. Gregory Nazianzen, and an anonymous Author, of whom Photius ſpeaks in the 117th Volume, S. Chryſoſtom and Ruffinus have either cited him againſt the Arians, as an Author who had Orthodox Notions concerning the Trinity, or defended him againſt the Accuſations of his Enemies; the One by giving a favourable Senſe to his Words, and the Others by maintaining that thoſe Paſſages which were found not to be agreeable to the Faith of the Church were added; and that there were other contrary Expreſſions, which were entirely conformable to the Doctrin of the Church. It is certain that in Ruffinus's Latin Verſions which we have of the Book de Principiis, and the Apology of Pamphilus, and of his other Works, the Doctrin of the Trinity is explained after a very Orthodox manner. But we muſt confeſs, that we cannot rely upon Ruffinus's Credit, who acknowledges that he added and altered ſeveral Paſſages relating to the Trinity. It is true, he ſays he has taken what he has added from other Places of Origen; but S. Hierom denies it, and we are not obliged to believe Ruffinus upon his own Word. So likewiſe we ought not to give Credit entirely to what S. Hierom ſays againſt Origen, ſince he was as violent againſt him, as Ruffinus was paſſionate for him. Therefore, Neither believing his Enemies, nor his zealous Defenders, let us conſult thoſe Pieces of his Works which we have in Greek. And here ſtill we are in a Labyrinth, from which it will be difficult to extricate our ſelves. Herein we find ſome things which appear no leſs contrary, than the Opinions themſelves of the Authors who have written for and againſt him. He often ſpeaks very excellently of the WORD, which gives us reaſon to believe that he was perſuaded of his Godhead: He ſays, That he was from the beginning in the Father; That he is the Image of the Father; That he was begotten of the Father from all Eternity; That he is a Subſiſtence, and a Perſon diſtinguiſhed from the Father; That he is the Wiſdom of God, and that he is God himſelf; That he never leaves his Father; That thoſe are in an Error, who deny that the Godhead of the Father and the Son is the ſame, though their Subſtance be different; That he is God, Θεὸς, though he be not the Source and Original of the Godhead, as the Father is, whom upon that account he calls Αυτόθεος. That he is above all Creatures; That we may addreſs our Vows and our Prayers to Him, as to God the Father; That he is only known by the Father; That he ought to be honoured as the Father, and that he has the ſame Power. Laſtly, S. Athanaſius cites two formal Paſſages for the Eternity of the WORD, and for his Equality with the Father; and S. Baſil alſo cites one which is very clear for the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt.

Tom. 1. Comment. in Joan. p. 17, 19. p. 30. ibid. & Homil. 6. in Jerom p. 28. Tom. 2. 47, 48. ib d. lib 2 cont. Celſum. lib. 6. cont. Celſum, & lib. 8.

But, on the other ſide, in his Books we meet with many Expreſſions which are very harſh, little conformable to the Orthodox Doctrin, and which ſeem to favour the Arians. He ſays, That the Word is an Hypoſtaſis different from the Father; and he takes the Word Hypoſtaſis to ſignifie Nature and Subſtance. He ſays likewiſe, That the Father and the Son are One in Concord and in Will; and that the laſt is not properly God, ὁ Θεὸς, but only called God, becauſe he is the Image and Reſemblance of the Divinity; That the WORD and the Holy Ghoſt were made by the Father; That we muſt not compare the Father with the Son; and that the Father is greater than the Son, who is inferior to Him, though he be ſuperior to all Creatures, as the Sun-beam is inferior to the Sun; and laſtly, That the WORD is the Miniſter of the Father. Theſe Expreſſions, and ſome others like them, are hard indeed; but when there are Contradictions in Authors, we ought always, in my Opinion, to take the moſt favourable Side. Beſides, That it is more eaſie to put a good Conſtruction on theſe laſt Expreſſions, which were very common before the Council of Nice, than to put a bad one upon the Firſt: For, without making uſe of Ruffinus's way of defending him, who ſays that theſe Places are either added or corrupted; and without alledging in his Excuſe, that being to diſpute againſt the Sabellians, he was obliged to make uſe of ſome Terms which might ſeem to favour the oppoſite Error; without making uſe, I ſay, of theſe general Defences I believe we may explain in a very Catholick Senſe, thoſe Expreſſions which I have juſt now related. When he ſays, That the Father and the Son were Two Hypoſtaſes; he underſtands by the Word Hypoſtaſis, all that is oppoſed to nothing; and he had no other Deſign than to maintain againſt the Sabellians, That the WORD was not a Vertue or a Quality from the Father, but a Perſon ſubſiſting. It is certain, That in Origen's Time the Word Hypoſtaſis and Subſtance were ſynonymous Terms; but ſo too by the Word Subſtance, was often underſtood a Perſon ſubſiſting; and ſome Catholick Authors, not only before the Council of Nice, but even afterwards have affirmed that the Father was a Subſtance, the Son a ſecond Subſtance; underſtanding, as S. Hilary obſerves, by Subſtance, the Perſons ſubſiſting. In the ſecond place, Origen does not ſay that the Son is a Creature: He does not deny but that he is God, but he only denies that he is God of himſelf, as the Father is, Αυτόθεος; and this is what he would explain by the Compariſon of the Sun and the Sun-beam, which the Fathers, who lived after the Council of Nice, thought to be very proper for the explaining the Myſtery of the Trinity. And thus it is, that going upon this Principle, he ſays, That the Son is inferior to the Father, and that the Father was greater than the Son; not that he believed them to be of a different Nature, ſince he owned that they are One and the ſame Divinity, and One and the ſame Subſtance; That the Son was equal to the Father, and that he was in him from all Eternity; but becauſe the Son derives his Divinity from the Father, who is the Source of the Godhead. As to what he ſays, That the Son is the Miniſter of the Father; That the Father made uſe of him in making the World; and that the Son was created. Theſe are Expreſſions that are too common among the Ancients, to be particularly objected to Origen as a Crime. Origen.

S. Hierom accuſes Origen, for ſaying, That the Son, in compariſon of the Father, was not Goodneſs it ſelf, but only the Image and Repreſentation of Goodneſs; and Huetius confirms this to have been Origen's Opinion by ſome of his Greek Paſſages. The ſame S. Hierom upbraids him alſo for affirming that the Son in compariſon of the Father, was a leſſer Light; That he was not the Truth, but the Image of the Truth; That he was Viſible, and the Father Inviſible; but we may eaſily diſcern that theſe Expreſſions, as harſh as they may ſeem, being conſidered ſeparatly, were meant by Origen in a good ſenſe, he having no other Deſign than to prove that the Father was the Source and Original of Goodneſs and Truth; and that the Son received it from him; and that in this ſenſe he was the Image of the Father's Goodneſs, the Brightneſs of his Godhead: Expreſſions which in this ſenſe are very Orthodox. As to what he ſays, that the Father is Inviſible, and the Son Viſible, we have ſhewn in other Places what the Ancients, meant by this way of Speaking.

Epiſt. ad Avitum.

Tom. 2. in Joan. p. 56. Tom. 6. pl. 130. Lib. 5. contra Celſum. Tom. 15. in Mat.

Laſtly, It is eaſie to anſwer what S. Epiphanius and ſeveral others object to Origen. That he denied that the Father was Viſible to the Son, and to the Holy Ghoſt: For he affirms ſo expreſly in ſo many Places. That the Father is perfectly known of the Son, and even of the Holy Ghoſt, that he muſt of neceſſity have had ſome meaning, when he ſeems to aſſert the contrary. Ruffinus anſwers this Objection, That he denied that the Father was viſible to the Son, as Bodies are viſible to Bodies, that he might confute the Error of the Valentinians, who believed that God was Corporeal; and he cites a Paſſage of Origen, where he diſtinguiſhes betwixt Seeing and Knowing, and affirms, That we may ſay that the Son knows the Father, but that we cannot ſay that he ſees him, becauſe Seeing is the Property of a Body. I ſhall not make any anſwer to other more trivial Objections, becauſe it is eaſie to ſatisfie them, as well by what we have juſt now ſaid as by what we have obſerved upon the other Fathers. (a) There are no very conſiderable Objections made againſt Origen's Doctrin concerning the Incarnation; for though he be accuſed of ſeveral Errors, he affirms ſo poſitively, in all his Works, That the WORD had taken a Body and a Soul like ours, in the Womb of a Virgin, by the Operation of the Holy Ghoſt; That Jeſus Chriſt had true Fleſh; That he really ſuffered, That he is altogether God and Man, in that the Human Nature was united with the Divine Nature in one and the ſame Perſon: That it is impoſſible to accuſe him of any Error concerning the Myſtery of the Incarnation. Perhaps, as he was of Opinion, That the Souls were in Heaven before they came down into their Bodies, he might think the ſame thing of the Soul of Jeſus Chriſt. But this was only a particular Error, for which he was not very earneſt.

He is accuſed of believing that the Death of Chriſt was of Advantage to all reaſonable Creatures, as Angels, Devils, and even inſenſible things; and 'tis certain that he does aſſert this wild Notion in ſeveral places of his Works. He has feigned a Spiritual Death of Jeſus Chriſt in the other World, which has given occaſion to tax him for holding that Jeſus Chriſt died ſeveral times. He believed that Chriſt did not come out of the Virgins Womb by Penetration; and he accuſes the Virgin Mary of Diſtruſt. But theſe are but ſlight Errors, and common among the Ancients.

As he believed that the only Point of Faith relating to the Angels, was, That there were ſuch Beings, and that neither Scripture nor Tradition had determined any thing as to their Nature and their Number; ſo he has taken the Liberty to deliver his own Thoughts hereupon: He imagins that they are Corporeal, though inviſible, having nevertheleſs a Spiritual Soul. He ſays, That the good Angels have a finer, and the Evil ones a groſſer Body. The Principle from whence he has drawn this Concluſion, is, That all intelligent and ſpiritual Creatures having been created in Heaven with a perfect Freedom of Will, they have been afterwards, for a Puniſhment of their Faults, confined to Bodies more or leſs groſs, according to the Quality of their Crimes, and ranked in ſuch and ſuch Orders or Degrees of Creatures inferior one to another: yet ſo, nevertheleſs, as that after having ſuffered this Exile, if I may ſo ſay, for ſome Ages, they may by living vertuouſly, return to the place from whence they were baniſhed. (b) And going upon this Principle, he affirms, That men may become Angels, and Angels Men; That the Angels being free, do often commit Faults; That the Devils ſhall one day be delivered; That the Angels are guilty of ſeveral Offences in their Adminiſtration of things here below, for which they are immediately rebuked, and for which they ſhall be judged in the Day of Judgment. All theſe Fancies, and ſeveral others, are the Conſequences of Plato's Doctrin, to which Origen was wonderfully addicted. We muſt nevertheleſs acknowledge, that he does not propoſe theſe things as Doctrins of our Religion, but only as his Opinions and Conjectures.

(b) This is the Principle of the Platoniſts. Theophilus, Juſtinian, S. Epiphanius, Methodius, and an anonymous Author in Photius, aſcribed it to Origen. He plainly aſſerts it in his firſt Book of Principles, C. 6. Tom. 15. & 13. in Matt.

(c) He ſays in ſeveral Places, That the Angels take care of Men; That every Chuch, every Society; and laſtly, every Man has his Guardian-Angel; and even in ſome places he ſays, That every one has his good and evil Angel; in other Places, That ſeveral Angels have the Care of one particular Perſon; and in others, That they take care of inanimate Things. Though he denies that we ought to addreſs to the Angels the ſame Prayers, and the ſame Adorations as to God, yet he allows that they may be prayed unto, and honoured according as the deſerve.

Concerning the Soul, he ſays in the Preface to his Books of Principles, that it is not determined by the Tradition of the Church, whether it be produced by another Soul, or whether it comes from elſewhere; whether it be Eternal, or created at a certain time; whether it animates the Body, or whether it be only confined there. This is what he ſays in the Language of an Eccleſiaſtical Author: But following the Principles of Plato's Philoſophy, he holds, That Souls are intelligent Creatures, which have been from Eternity, which are ſent into Bodies as into a Priſon, for a Puniſhment of their Sins; That they paſs from Body to Body; That they become Angels; and laſtly, That they are in a continual Motion. He aſſerts all theſe things in his ſecond Book of Principles, Chap. 6, and 7. and in ſeveral other places of his Works.

(e) He holds it as an Article of Faith, That there is a Free-Will in all reaſonable Creatures; from whence it follows, That though a Man may be excited to Good by ſome Cœleſtial Power, and ſpurr'd on to Evil by the Devil, yet he is never conſtrained to do Good or Evil. This is what he ſays agreeably to the Doctrin of the Church; but he extends this Liberty, by following Plato's Principles, to all ſorts of Conditions; and he pretends, That an intelligent Creature is, and will always be free to do Good and Evil, in whatſoever State and Condition he is; for in this he makes Free-Will to conſiſt. (f) He does not ſeem to have made any Diſtinction between Adam's State, and that of Mankind after the Fall.

He attributes very much to Free-Will, and Nature, and he ſpeaks but very little of Grace, which he believes was infuſed into Souls according to the Merits which they have, before they are confined in Bodies; and afterwards it is augmented according to the Good and Evil which they do in making uſe of their Natural Liberty. He aſcribes in ſeveral Places the Converſion of a Man, and all the Good which he acts, to Free-Will; and allows hardly any thing to Grace, ſo that it was not without Reaſon that S. Hierom accuſes him for having furniſhed the Pelagians with Principles; though yet in ſome places he ſpeaks very advantagiouſly of Grace, and of the Aſſiſtance of God. He is taxed for holding, That Men may arrive to ſuch a Degree of Perfection, that they ſhall be no more ſubject to Temptation, nor commit any more Sins: And indeed there are ſome Relicks of this Error in his Books.

(h) When he explains that Paſſage of the Fifth Chapter of the Epiſtle of S. Paul to the Romans, he diſcourſes of Original Sin after a very obſcure manner; as if he doubted of it: And we muſt not wonder after this, that he did not admit of any other Predeſtination, than that which has reſpect to Merits.

He admits of two Reſurrections; That of the Righteous, and that of the Wicked. He acknowledges the laſt Judgment, wherein Men and Angels ſhall be judged: but he ſeems to make a doubt in what Place it ſhould be, if all Men were there to be judged. (k) He ſays, That Jeſus Chriſt ſhall appear there, but that we neither know the Place where he will appear, nor the Manner how. He rejects the Opinion of the Millenaries. He confeſſes that Good Men ſhall again be recompenced with Eternal Bleſſedneſs, and the Wicked puniſhed with Eternal Fire; but he deſtroys the Simplicity of this Faith by Reaſoning too much on this Subject. He believes that all Men, even the moſt Holy, ſhall paſs through the Fire: That after Men have paſſed through the Fire, the Wicked ſhall be caſt into Hell, that is to ſay, into the Loweſt Place, and they ſhall be there tormented with Eternal Fire. Fire Fire (as (l) he Explains it in other Places) is Remorse of Conscience, and Vexation of Spirit. (m) He make Blessedness to consist in an Union with God. He says that Souls come to it by degrees; that after they are separated from their Bodies, they are for some time upon Earth, in order to be purified, that afterwards they are taken up into the Air, and instructed by Angels, that they pass through several Places, where they remain for some time, and that at last they come to the Highest Heaven, in comparison whereof the Firmament is but a Hell; that the more they retain of Earth in them, the longer they are upon this Journey: That the Souls which are arrived at this Sovereign Degree of Bliss, may fall from it, and that they are sent back again into Cœlestial Bodies, or others, and that they afterwards return from whence they were driven: That so Blessedness may have an End, and that Torments shall have a Conclusion likewise. (n) He says in his Preface to the Book de Principiis, that God Created the World, that it had a Beginning, and that it must have an End; but that it is not determined by Tradition, what it was before, and what it will be after. He imagines that it was made, if I may so express it, to be a Place of Banishment for all Intelligent Creatures. He makes no difficulty of asserting, that there were more Worlds before this, and that there shall be more after it. He says, That God always had the Matter upon which he wrought, which supposes that it is Eternal, since God Created it from all Eternity.

(o) He says, That the Earthly Paradise was in Heaven, and he has explained of Souls which were there, that which is said in Genesis concerning Adam and Eve. He understands by the Fig-Leaves, wherewith they covered themselves after the Fall, the Mortal Bodies to which the Souls were chained,

It may be concluded from all, that we have already said concerning Origen's Doctrin upon the Tenents of our Religion, that although he professed to believe the Doctrin of the Church, (p) yet he sets up some Philosophical Principles, the Consequences of which were found contrary to what was taught by the Christian Religion; which obliged him, in order to accomodate these things which were so directly opposite one to the other, to invent several Opinions that were very far from the Simplicity of the Faith. So that me must distinguish in Origen what he says according to the way of Speaking used by the Church in his Time, and what he says according to the Principles of Plato's Philosophy, and then we need not wonder, if after having acknowledged the Truths of Christianity, he should lose himself by advancing such Platonick Notions as are destructive to them. And this, in my Opinion, is the reason of his principal Errors, which are all of them founded upon three Principles taken from the Platonick Philosophy; which are: First, That Intelligent Creatures have always been, and shall eternally exist. Secondly, That they have always been free to do Good and Evil. And Lastly, That they have been precipitated into the Lower Places, and confined to Bodies for a Punishment of their Sins. Let any one throughly Examine all Origen's Errors, of which we have just now spoken, and he will easily perceive that they all proceed from this, that he was willing to accommodate the Truths of the Christian Religion to these Platonick Principles.

There are besides some other slighter Errors in Origen, into the greatest part of which he fell by confining himself too much to the Allegorical Sense of the Scripture; for Example, (q) Explaining Christ's Words concerning the Power of Binding and Loosing, which he granted to St. Peter, he seems to reserve this Power to those Bishops and Priests who imitate the Virtues of this Apostle; and in the same Sense he says, that all Spiritual Men are this Rock, upon which Jesus Christ has built his Church. So likewise (r) explaining that Passage of Scripture, where it is said: Not that which goeth into the Mouth defileth a Man, he speaks of the Eucharist after so Obscure and Allegorical a manner, that it is very difficult to comprehend his Meaning. (s) He likewise explains Allegorically whas is said of the Eucharist in other Places of the Word of God. It is easie however to defend him against the Protestants upon the Subject of the Real Presence, since he acknowledges in the Eighth Book, that the Loaves which are offered in the Church are made a Holy Body by Prayer, Σῶμα γινομένους διὰ τῆς ἐυχῆς ἁγίου τινός. We might easily bring other Examples of the Oversights that he has committed, endeavouring too much to Spiritualize the Words of the Scripture, but I shall pass them over in Silence.

He speaks of the Sacred Scripture after a very excellent manner, as of a Book written by Persons who were inspired by God. His Passages upon this Subject have been collected by St. Basil, and St. Gregory Nazianzen, in a Book which they have Entituled Philocalia. (t) He distinguishes the three Senses of Scripture, but he applies himself particularly to the Allegorical Interpretation, and he affirms that there are some Places which have no literal Meaning. He proves that every Body ought to read the Scripture.

Origen.

Now for ſome Points of Diſcipline which may be obſerved in his Works. The Chriſtians aſſembled together in his Time in the Churches, not only on Sundays, and Feſtivals, but alſo on other Days. (u) He often ſpeaks againſt thoſe who neglected to do it, and who did not hear the Word of God with due Reſpect. There were Prieſts and Biſhops in his Time, who were choſen by the People. And their Duty was to teach the People, they inſtructed the Catechumens, and prepared them for Baptiſm for a conſiderable time. They Baptized the Children; and Baptiſm was never reiterated; they anointed thoſe who were Baptized with Oyl. They obſerved Lent; and alſo faſted Wedneſdays and Fridays. They expelled out of the Church, ſuch as committed Publick Crimes after Baptiſm: And (x) he obſerves in his Book againſt Celſus, that there were ſome Perſons ſet apart on purpoſe to take care of the Manners of the Faithful. They allowed of Penance but once, and that rarely too. Excommunication was the greateſt Eccleſiaſtical Penalty. Nevertheleſs, It was not doubted but that thoſe who were unjuſtly Excommunicated, might be ſaved. Simony alſo was Prohibited.

In his time Sins were confeſs'd to the Prieſts, and they examined thoſe who were to teach in Publick. They believed that one ought to live a very Holy Life, to approach the Bleſſed Sacrament, and that as it was very advantagious to thoſe who received it Worthily, ſo it was Damnation to thoſe who received it Unworthily. They did not admit Perſons that were twice Married to Holy Orders. They concealed the Myſteries, and principally of the Euchariſt from the Infidels and the Catechumens. They Prayed to God on their Knees, and turning towards the Eaſt. They celebrated Good-Fryday, Eaſter, Whitſontide, and Sundays, with very great Solemnity.

And theſe were the Principal Points of Diſcipline, that can be obſerved in the Books of Origen: It would be too tedious to take notice of Points of Morality that he diſcourſes of in his Homilies, which are filled with them. We ſhall here preſent you only with ſome of them.

He ſays, that we ought not to make uſe of Marriage, but only for the Sake of having Children: that he who does Good out of ſervile Fear, ſhall be leſs rewarded than him who does it out of Love. (y) There are in his Homilies upon Exodus, a great many curious Allegories upon the Neceſſity of Renouncing the World, and leading a Chriſtian Life. He ſays, that Pharaoh repreſents the World, who ſlew the Male Children, that is, the righteous, and preſerved the Females, that is to ſay Vicious and Effeminate Perſons; and he makes a pretty Moral upon the Allegory. He ſays, that Ægypt is the Type of the World, from whence we muſt depart, not only in Body, but in Mind, by renouncing it entirely. There are a great many other Allegories and Moral Thoughts of the ſame Nature. He diſtinguiſhes two ſorts of Sin; Great Sins, and Leſſer Sins. He ranks among the number of leſſer Sins, ſuch as may prove Mortal; and by great Sins, he underſtands ſuch, for which we can do no Penance but once. He gives ſeven Remedies for Sins, Baptiſm, Martyrdom, Alms-deeds, Forgiving of our Enemies, the Converſion of our Brethren, Charity, and Labourious Penance, and laſtly, that Repentance and Unction of which S. James ſpeaks. (z) He ſays, that we muſt not preſently reprehend publickly the Sin of our Brother, but that we ought firſt to rebuke him in Private, afterwards before one or two Witneſſes; and laſtly, if he did not reform, then we are to tell it to the Church. (a) He ſhews that true Faſting is an Abſtinence from Sin, and that we ought to Faſt in order to Feed the Poor. His Homilies upon Numbers, Joſhuah, Judges, are more filled with Allegories than Morality. Thoſe which he compoſed upon the Pſalms have more Morality in them: He there diſcourſes of Humility, of Prayer, of Patience, of Meekneſs, of the Proſperity of the Wicked, of Repentance, of that Holineſs which is required to Communicate worthily, of the Choice of a Guide. His other Homilies are mixed with Morality and Allegories: His large Commentaries have more Learning in them. He therein handles ſeveral Queſtions very learnedly, and makes very judicious Remarks upon them. He gives ſome Explications upon the Holy Scripture, that are very curious and ingenious: But he goes too far upon the Letter, to find out Allegorical Senſes; and he amuſes himſelf in Explaining too ſcrupulouſly all the Words of Scripture, that he might the better give them a Myſtical Senſe. He is a Great Enemy to Hereticks, he attacks them as often as he diſcourſes of any Subject that has any relation to their Errors. He does not let any of them eſcape; ſometimes he writes againſt Simon, Baſilides, Carpocrates, Valentinus, Marcion, and Montanus: At other times he attacks the Ebionites, the Helceſaites, the Encratites, the Ophites, and the Sabellians. (b) He acknowledged for Canonical Books of the Old Teſtament, only thoſe which were in the Canon of the Hebrews, to the Number of Two and Twenty: (c) He ranks the Book of Eſther, in this Number, and joyns the Book of Ruth with the Book of Judges, and Baruch with that of Jeremiah. As for the Books of Maccabes, Judith, Tobit, Eccleſiaſticus, and Wiſdom, he commends them as Good Books, profitable for Catechumens, but ſuch as are out of the Canon of the Books of the Sacred Scripture.

Scripture. He calls them nevertheless in some places Divine Books. He cites the Book of Wisdom under the Name of the Scripture. He cites likewise the Maccabees, and the Book of Ecclesiasticus, which he affirms to be among the Books of Solomon. We have already taken notice of his Opinion concerning the History of Susanna. He receives as Canonical Books of the New Testament, the Four Gospels, the Fourteen Epistles of St. Paul; (d) He says however, concerning that to the Hebrews, that the Thoughts of this Epistle are St. Paul's; but that it was Composed by some other Person, and that there is none but God who knows the Author of it, though some attribute it to S. Clemens, others to S. Luke. He says that there is but one Epistle of S. Peter, which was received by all the Churches, but that we may grant the Second likewise to have been his. He says the same thing of the Two last Epistles of S. John. He cites the Epistles of St. Jude, and St. James in his Commentary upon the Epistle to the Romans. He likewise quotes the Revelations, and attributes them to St. John. Besides these Books, he often cites Apocryphal Writings, as the Gospels according to the Ægyptians, and according to the Hebrews; the Book of Hermas, the Epistle of S. Barnabas, the Book of Enoch, and even some Heretical Books, as the Apocalypse of S. Paul, a Book concerning the Twelve Apostles, the Doctrin of S. Peter, the Acts of S. Paul, the History of Isaiah, and some others.

Origen.

Origen had very quick Parts, a very strong and Extensive Phancy: but he relied too much on the Vivacity of his Genius; and often lost himself out of too great earnestness to fathom, and subtilize every thing. He had a very happy invention, and a much more happy delivery of what he had invented: But he had not that exactness in his Inventions, nor all that Gracefulness in the Delivery as might be wish'd. He carried on his Work with so great ease, that he is said to have Dictated to Seven or Eight Persons at a time, and he was so ready in Expressing himself, that he made the greatest Part of his Homilies Extempore. Upon which account his Style was not very Correct, nor Coherent; He had a vast Memory, but he often trusted too much to it. He was a Person of most profound Learning; and he particularly Studied Plato's Philosophy, which he understood to Perfection, and indeed he was too much addicted to it for a Christian. He understood likewise the Maxims of the other Philosophers. He had apply'd himself mightily to the Study of Humane Learning: He was neither Ignorant of History, nor Mythology, and he had as great knowledge in all the Profane Sciences, as those who had Studied nothing else all their whole Lives. But he particularly excell'd in the knowledge of the Holy Scripture, to the Study of which he entirely addicted himself. He had Learned it all by heart, and that he might not neglect any thing which might be of use for the understanding the Letter thereof, he carefully Examined all the Versions of the Bible, which were in his time, and compared them all together with the Hebrew Text, adding thereto a Literal Commentary upon the most difficult Places. He was not very well skill'd in the Hebrew; yet he knew enough of it to understand it, and to observe the Differences of the Text, and the Translations; but he did not keep to the Literal Explication of the Bible. He thought it necessary for the setting off of the Holy Scripture to the best advantage, which appeared but plain and simple to the Heathens, and for the rendring it of greater use to all the World, to give Mystical or Allegorical Interpretations of every thing in it. And herein imitates the way of Philo and Aristobulus, and followed the Genius and Manner of the Platonists. We have already taken notice, that Hippolitus explained the Scripture Allegorically, and that it was in imitation of him that Origen undertook this way of Writing. St. Clement of Alexandria his Master, is also full of Allegories, and 'tis not to be denied but that the Hellenistical Jews, and the Primitive Christians made very frequent use of them: But Origen has carried on an Allegory as far as it can possibly go, and he has furnished Matter to all the Greek and Latin Fathers who have imitated him, and have hardly done any thing else than copy him. This way of explaining the Holy Scripture by continual Allegories, seems to me to be very defective. For though it may be good sometimes to awaken, if I may so say, the Auditor, and to direct him by such kind of Allegories, yet they become useless and tedious, when they are perpetual; and the Mind, which requires great Application for the comprehending of them, is tired, and soon loses the Consequence both of Reasoning and Thought: Besides, that by minding only the Allegorical Sense, we neglect the Literal, which is oftentimes more excellent, and of greater Advantage than all the Allegories in the World, that divert the Mind without instructing it, and strike the Imagination without affecting the Heart. Lastly, If in explaining the Holy Scripture, we should only stick to the Allegory, as Origen has done, it might give occasion to believe, that the Scripture taken barely in the Literal Sense would be but of very little Advantage, which is a very great Error. 'Tis therefore a very ill way of defending Origen in this Point, to say with a modern Author, that he seems to have been excusable in this, because he had learned by Experience, that the Letter of the Scripture was but of little use for instruction. For this is to make him assert a thing which is very false, the Letter of the Scripture being of exceeding use for instruction, and even more profitable than any Allegory, which is not to be us'd, but only now and then to awaken the Auditors.

Origen's Books against Celsus an excellent Work, and stored with extraordinary Learning. He answers the Objections of Celsus, who of all the Heathens that have written again the Christian Religion, has made the most cunning ones, and proposed them the most maliciously, very solidly. He establishes by convincing Proofs, the History of Jesus Christ, his Miracles, his Divinity and Resurrection. He confutes the Calumnies and Impostures of Celsus, and of the other Heathens against the Christians; ſtians; and Laſtly, he proves the Truth and Excellency of the Doctrin and Religion of Jeſus Chriſt. This Book is written very Politely, and with great Care and Exactneſs. 'Tis not only the beſt of Origen's Works, but alſo the moſt accompliſh'd and beſt Compoſed Apology for the Chriſtians which we have of all the Ancients. The Books of Principles were likewiſe written with great Care, and they had been of very great uſe, if he had contented himſelf to explain the Principles of Religion according to Scripture and Tradition, without mixing therewith his own Philoſophical Notions. His Commentaries upon the Scripture are more Polite than his Homilies, they are full of Learning, but they are not very Exact, and we may obſerve therein a great many Fancies which are uſeleſs, obſcure, and perplexed. Often after having begun one Explication, he paſſes to another, without finiſhing the firſt. His Homilies are plainer and intelligible, but their ſtyle is leſs Elegant.

Origen.

The Treatiſe concerning Prayer is an Excellent Piece of Devotion. It contains a great many Excellent Principles of Morality, and is full of very profitable Inſtructions. We may alſo find there ſeveral Curious Remarks relating to the Diſcipline of that Time. But it is not abſolutely free from the Errors and Defects which we have obſerved in the other Works of Origen. As this Diſcourſe is very Inſtructive and not very much known, I have thought it convenient to give a Summary of it.

Origen begins it by a Common Place, to wit, that there are an Infinite Number of Things which we cannot know without being enlightned from Heaven. He applies this Reflection to his Preſent Subject, ſaying, that it would be impoſſible for him, without the Aſſiſtance of Heaven, to explain how we ought to Pray, what we ought to ſay when we Pray, and what are the moſt Proper Times for Prayer. That he who treats of this Matter, muſt be enlightned by the Heavenly Father, inſtructed by the Son, and inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt: That in order to Pray as we ought, 'tis not ſufficient to repeat ſome certain Prayers, but we muſt have Good Diſpoſitions; and that our Prayer may be acceptable to God, it muſt be accompanied with a Conſcience, Pure, and without Blemiſh. Afterwards entring upon his Subject he obſerves that the Greek Word Ευχη, which ſignifies Prayer, is mentioned in Scripture the firſt time, in that Place where it is ſaid that Jacob coming from Meſopotamia, made a Vow to offer unto God the Tenth of all that he ſhould bring from that Country. He adds that the Word is often taken in this Senſe, to ſignifie a Promiſe or Vow of Performing a Thing, if God grants us what we ask of him in our Prayers. But he obſerves at the ſame time that there are other Places where it is taken for Prayer it ſelf; and he ſets down ſome Examples wherein it is taken in both Senſes.

After having ſpoken of the word Prayer, he treats of the neceſſity of the thing it ſelf: He confutes the Arguments of thoſe who pretended to maintain that it was to no purpoſe to pray; he obſerves, that this Error could not be maintained by any but notoriouſly-wicked Perſons, and by Atheiſts, who deny God's Providence: but that the Devil endeavouring by all means to ſpread deteſtable Doctrins among thoſe that bear the Name of Chriſt, had put it into the hearts of ſome perſons to reject every thing that is ſenſible in Religion, to deſpiſe the Holy Euchariſt and Baptiſm, and to neglect Prayer as a uſeleſs thing. Now theſe are the Reaſons which theſe Perſons bring for their Opinion: Firſt, God knows every thing, ſay they, therefore what need is there of Praying? Secondly, He does not only know what muſt happen, but he ordains it; therefore what neceſſity is there of asking that of him, which ſhall infallibly come to paſs? Thirdly, If we are Predeſtinated before our Birth, it is to no purpoſe to pray, ſince we ſhall be neceſſarily Sav'd or Damn'd. Fourthly, God being immutable, we do but deceive our ſelves in believing that we are able by our Prayers to make him alter his Decrees. Origen, in anſwer to theſe difficulties diſtinguiſhes Three ſorts of Things which are in motion. The firſt are thoſe that are moved by a Foreign Power, ſuch as, Inanimate Beings. The ſecond are thoſe that are moved by their own Nature, but without Knowledge, as Animals and Plants. The Third are thoſe that move themſelves, and determine themſelves, as Intelligent Creatures. He proves, That theſe are free, and that Preſcience and Predeſtination does not at all deſtroy this Liberty, becauſe God ordains nothing relating to free Actions, but what he has foreſeen that intelligent Creatures would do freely: And that ſo Preſcience is not the cauſe of Things, nor of Actions which are done freely; but it only ſuppoſes that theſe things will be, or will not be; and that the knowledge which God has of them, is followed by the Decree, whereby he is reſolved to grant or not to grant his Grace, to hear or not to hear; That he foreſees the Good and Evil which Men ſhall commit; That he knows whether they will repent or no; and that, in conſequence of this knowledge, he Predeſtinates or Reprobates them. He adds, That God has appointed Angels over Men to preſerve them, as long as they deſerve it. One might here take notice of his particular Opinion concerning the Sun, the Moon, and Stars, which he ſays are intelligent and free Agents.

After having confuted the Reaſons of thoſe who reject Prayer, he ſhews the advantage of it. He ſays in the firſt place, That he who prays, puts himſelf in a condition of preſenting himſelf before God, and of converſing with him; That in order to this, he ought to drive away all evil Thoughts, to baniſh all earthly Affections, to raiſe up his mind towards Heaven, to forget Injuries, to pardon his Enemies, and by no means to repine againſt God. From hence he concludes, That Prayer cannot be of any advantage, if it be not preceeded with great preparation. Secondly, He aſſures us, That Chriſt Jeſus, the High-Prieſt of our Offerings, prays with us; That the Angels pray with him, and that the Saints which are departed pray with us, (and this here is one of the moſt ancient and excellent Monuments to prove the Interceſſion of Saints.) His words are theſe: The Souls of the Saints which ſleep among the number of the Juſt, pray with us, as it is ſaid in the Book of Macchabees---- And ſince the imperfect Knowledge which we have in this World is made perfect in the other Life, 'tis a very great Abſurdity not to believe the ſame thing of the other Virtues, and principally Charity towards our Neighbour, which we ought to believe to be much stronger in the Saints than in mortal Men, who are subject to Weaknesses and Imperfections. He adds, That every faithful Person has his Angel that hears him, and preserves him whilst he prays. Lastly, He proves the necessity of continual Prayer, by the Example of Jesus Christ, by that of Just Persons, and by the reckoning up of those Benefits and Graces which have been bestowed upon Men from their Prayers: He exhorts the Faithful to pray for spiritual and heavenly Things, rather than for earthly and sensual Goods, such as Beauty, Nobility, Riches: He shews the meanness and the vanity of these things. Origen.

He distinguishes four kinds of Prayers, after the Apostle S. Paul in his first Epistle to Timothy. The δέησις, that is to say, Supplication, which is to ask any Good of which we stand in need. The second called προσευχή, is according to Origen, a request that is made in any danger, with assurance of obtaining what we desire: He observes, that this kind of Prayer is commonly joined with Doxology, that is to say, with Praising of God's Holy Name; The third ἔντευξις, is a Prayer made by a Person who has great confidence that he shall obtain what he asks, he being much in God's Favour. The last is, Giving of Thanks for the Benefits which we have received. He gives Examples taken from the Holy Scripture, of each of these kinds of Prayer.

This first Part of his Treatise concerning Prayer, is followed with an Explication of the Lord's Prayer.

He makes two Observations upon these first words, Our Father, The first is, That it is only in the New Testament, where there is given to God with assurance the Title of Our Father. The second, That if we would say these words as we ought, we must be of the number of the true Children of God, that is to say, Free from Sin, and in a state of Grace.

He says upon these words, Which art in Heaven, That we must not understand them in a gross sense, as if God was in Heaven after a corporael manner.

Upon these words, Hallowed be thy Name, That it is not as if God were not Holy in himself, but only that we desire that men should acknowledg this Holiness in his Conduct. He observes, That this and the following Forms are in the Imperative, but that it is taken for the Optative Mood. And from hence he takes occasion to confute Tatian, who affirmed that these Words of God in Genesis Let there be light, was not an express Command, but only a simple Wish. By these other Words, Thy kingdom come, the faithful Person prays the Lord, That the Kingdom of Jesus Christ, which is in him, may be perfected and compleated by the expectation of the Day of Judgment. By these, Thy will be done, we desire of God, That men may fulfil God's Will upon Earth, as it is accomplished in Heaven; or else, That the Wicked, being represented by the Earth, should perform God's Will, as it is already done by Just Persons. Origen would not have us understand these following words, Give us this day our dayly bread, of bodily Bread; but he understands them of the Doctrin of Jusus Christ, who is our Bread and our Nourishment. He observes, that the word ἐπιούσιος, Supersubstantialis, which we render by DAILY, is not to be met with in any Author; and that it is peculiar to the Evangelists. In order to explain it, he tells us, That as bodily Bread is changed into our Substance, so this Bread of the Word Communicates its Nature and Efficacy to our Souls. By Daily Bread, he means Eternity. Upon these Words, And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us, he explains the several Duties of Men. He says, That they owe to themselves the good of their Souls, that they owe very much to their Guardian Angels, but that they are above all things indebted to Jesus Christ, and to the Holy Ghost; that every Condition and every Estate has its peculiar Duties. There is one Duty, says he, of a Wife, another Duty of a Widow, another of a Deacon, another of a Priest, another of a Bishop, whose Charge is much the greater, and he shall render an exact Account to God, who will punish him very severely, if he does not acquit himself well of his Duty. He adds, That as we are indebted to others, so others are indebted to us; and that if we call to mind those Duties wherein we have been wanting towards others, we shall easily pardon those who have been deficient therein towards us, as God forgives us the faults which we have committed against him; That the Priests forgive in the Name of Jesus Christ the Sins of Men; but that, in imitation of the Priests of the Old Law, they must be instructed by the Holy Ghost who those are for whom they ought to offer up Sacrifices, when, and after what manner they must do it. Wherefore he blames those who not being sensible of what is beyond their Power, boast of their being able to pardon Idolatry, and to forgive Adultery and Fornication; which shews, that at that time they refused Communion to Idolaters in some Churches. Upon these words, And lead us not into temptation, Origen says, That it is impossible to pass through this life without temptations; and he proves it, by giving a Catalogue of those temptations to which we are exposed in all conditions and at all times: from whence he concludes, That we ought not to pray not to be tempted, but only not to sink under temptation. He observes, That God suffers us to fall therein, for a punishment of our sins. He here delivers his Opinion of those Souls that were always free, which were sent into this world for a punishment of the faults which they had committed in the other life. He afterwards discourses of the advantage of temptations, for the trial and proving of our Vertue. Lastly, Upon these words, But deliver us from evil, he says, That God does not deliver us from all the troubles and afflictions of this life, but that he makes us support them with patience.

After having explained the Lord's Prayer, he discourses of the temper and disposition of mind that is requisite for Prayer, of the place where we are to pray, and of the time proper for Prayer. He would have him that is to pray, to recollect and prepare himself, that so he may perform it with the greater attention and fervency; and that after having purified his mind from the thoughts of this World, and banished from his heart all passions and earthly affections, he should reflect upon the excellency of the Origen. the life to come; That he ſhould drive from his heart all thoughts of hatred and enmity; That he ſhould lift up his hands and eyes towards Heaven, when nothing hinders him; for he allows ſick Perſons to pray ſitting or lying. He obſerves that kneeling is neceſſarily when we ask God pardon for our Sins. Concerning the place of Prayer, he ſays that every place is proper to pray in, but that Cuſtom will have it that we ſhould chuſe the moſt retired part of the Houſe for our Prayers; and that we ſhould prefer the place which is ſet apart for the Aſſemblies of the Faithful, where the Angels are preſent, where we may be ſenſible of the Efficacy of Jeſus Chriſt, of that of the Holy Ghoſt, and of the Suffrages of the Saints departed. He would have us always turn our ſelves towards the Eaſt, whether we be in our Chamber, or in an open place. Laſtly, He diſtinguiſhes four Branches, or Common Places of Prayer; The Doxology, which ought to be ſaid, ſays he, at the beginning of Prayer, praiſing and glorifying the Father of Jeſus Chriſt through the Holy Ghoſt; It ought to be followed with Thankſgiving; Afterwards we muſt make a Confeſſion, or an Accuſation of ourſelves for our Sins; to which we ought to add the craving of Heavenly Benedictions for us and our Friends. Laſtly, We muſt conclude our Prayer by praiſing God through the Son in the Holy Ghoſt. And this is a great part of what is contained in this Treatiſe of Origen's, which ſufficiently ſhews it to be of great uſe. There is nevertheleſs one paſſage which may create a great deal of difficulty to thoſe that read it: For he therein affirms, That we ought to addreſs our Prayers only to God the Father, and not to Jeſus Chriſt becauſe the Son of God being different from the Father, 'tis abſurd to direct our Prayers to him. This expreſſion is very harſh, and difficult to excuſe: yet we may ſay, That he would have us addreſs our Prayers to the Father alone, for fear we might ſeem to acknowledge ſeveral Gods; and that when he ſays, That Jeſus Chriſt is an Eſſence different from the Father, he takes the term Eſſence for Perſon. And indeed he owns in ſeveral other places, and principally in the fifth and eighth Book againſt Celſus, That we may and ought to direct our Prayers to Jeſus Chriſt. Be the thing as it will, it cannot be denied but that he has aſſerted in this place ſeveral Propoſitions favourable to the Opinion of the Arians, on which it is difficult to put a good Conſtruction.

There is nothing more for me to do, to compleat all that relates to Origen, than to give an Account of the Quarrels and Diſputes which aroſe in the Church after his Death, upon the Account of his Perſon and his Writings: But this not being a Subject which any ways relates to the Deſign which I have propoſed in this Work, I do not think it neceſſary to engage my ſelf in this Relation, which otherwiſe would be but of very little uſe.

AMBROSE and TRYPHON, Diſciples of ORIGEN.

Ambroſe and Tryphon. AMBROSE would not have deſerved to be reckoned amongſt the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, had he not been Origen's Friend, and contributed very much to the Publiſhing of his Works, both by furniſhing him with Amanuenſes, and by continually preſſing him to his Work. He had been a Marcionite, and though he was converted, yet he retained ſome of his Errors, (if we believe St. Hierom.) However he was ordained Deacon, and generouſly confeſſed the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, with Theoctiſtus the Prieſt in the time of the Emperor Maximus. He was a Perſon of Quality, and wanted not Parts, which he ſhewed in ſome of his Letters to Origen, that were extant in St. Hierom's time, but now are all loſt. He died before Origen, and S. Hierom ſays that he was blamed becauſe, though he died Rich, yet he left nothing to his Friend, who was Poor.

Tryphon who was likewiſe Origen's Diſciple, and who had written ſome Letters to him, was looked upon in St. Hierom's time as a Man very well verſed in the Learning of the Sacred Scripture, which ſtill appears, ſays this Father, by ſeveral Works which he had compoſed; but more particularly by a Treatiſe concerning the Red Heifer in the 19th Chapter of Numbers, and upon the Diviſion of the Sacrifices made by Abraham in the 15th Chapter of Geneſis: From whence it appears that Origen's Diſciples following their Maſters Genius, applied themſelves wholly to Allegories.

[It is moſt probable, that Tryphon's Commentaries, are, in imitation of his Maſter Origen's, Allegorical; yet it is only probable, at leaſt, for any thing, that M. Du Pin has to ſay againſt it: and when things are loſt, to determine concerning them poſitively, is only beating the Air; and though we our ſelves know how little weight can be laid upon our words beyond conjecture, yet it may lead others into miſtakes, who think we can prove what we ſay, though we do not.]

BERYLLUS.

Beryllus. BERYLLUS Biſhop of Boſtra in Arabia, after he had been, as we have ſaid, undeceived of his Error by the Conference which he had had with Origen, wrote ſeveral ſmall Treatiſes, and particularly ſome Letters, wherein he returned Origen Thanks for his Converſion: The Conference which Origen had with him upon the occaſion of his Error was Extant in Saint Hierom's time; but at preſent we have nothing of his remaining.

Saint

Saint CYPRIAN.

SAint Cyprian (a) was by Birth an African, and taught Rhetorick with great Reputation (b) before he was a Christian. (c) He was converted by the Persuasion of a Priest called Cecilius, from whom he took afterwards his Sirname. From the time that he was a Catechumen, he made a Resolution within himself to live continently, believing, as his Deacon Pontius tells us, who has written his Life, that it was almost impossible otherwise to come to the Knowledge of the Truth. Presently after he was Baptized, he sold all his Goods to assist the Poor. He was afterwards ordained Priest, and after the Death of Donatus Bishop of Carthage, he was elected Bishop in his Place in the Year 248 (d), by the Suffrages of the Clergy, and the People of Carthage, and the Choice was confirmed by a great number of Bishops, who were then assembled in that City. The Persecution of Decius beginning two Years, or thereabouts, after his Ordination; the Heathens being enraged because he encouraged his People to stand firm to the Religion of Jesus Christ, demanded him several times in a full Theatre, to expose him to the Wild Beasts. And this obliged him to retire from Carthage, according to the Command which he believed he had received from God in a Vision. In this Retreat he wrote several Letters to his People, his Clergy, the Confessors, and the Clergy of Rome, of which we may see a Catalogue, with an Account of their Subjects in the Sequel of this History. When the Fury of the Persecution abated, S. Cyprian came back to Carthage, and called a Council there the 15th of May, in the Year 251, wherein he, with the Bishops his Collegues, regulated whatever related to the Penance of those who had fallen in the time of Persecution, either by taking Tickets or Testimonials from the Magistrates, certifying that they had committed Idolatry; by offering Incense publickly upon the Altars of their Gods, or by eating the Meat which was Sacrificed to them. For the first they ordained that they should be reconciled; but for the Latter, they judged it necessary to leave them still under Penance, and not to allow them Reconciliation till they became dangerously sick, provided also that they had begun to do Penance before they fell sick. As for those who staid till they were seized by some desperate Distemper, before they desired to undergo their Penance, it was thought expedient wholly to refuse them Absolution, because then, says S. Cyprian, 'Tis not so much their Sorrow for their Sin, as the Fear of Death that obliges them to desire it. Quia eos non tam Delicti Pœnitentia, quam Mortis Admonitio petere compellit. As for those Ecclesiasticks, who had fallen into Idolatry, it was ordained that they should for ever be excluded from the Clergy, that they should communicate no more with the Faithful but as Laymen, and that even some of them should be obliged to undergo the Severities of Penance. They Excommunicated Felicissimus and those of his Party, who had disturbed the Tranquility of the Church of Carthage, in S. Cyprian's Absence. Perhaps it was at this Synod that Privatus, a Heretick of the Colony of Lambesa, presented himself, who had been already Condemned in a Synod of Ninety Bishops, and seeing himself so far rejected, that they would not so much as hear him make his Defence, embraced the Party of Felicissimus. The Council, after they had made these Regulations, wrote a Synodal Letter to Cornelius, lately Elected Bishop of Rome, who assembled likewise a Synod of Sixty Bishops and several Priests, who followed the Rules of the African Council in the ordering of publick Penance, and Excommunicated Novatian, who joining himself to Novatus, refused the Grace of Reconciliation to those Persons, who had once fallen into any Sin, and caused himself to be ordained Bishop of Rome, in opposition to Cornelius, by three Bishops, whose Credulity and Easiness he had abused in this Matter. This for a time made a kind of a Schism in Rome, for Novatian drew to his Party, not only some Priests, but also the Confessors who were ready to suffer Martyrdom. The Heads of both Parties being desirous to obtain the Favour of S. Cyprian, and of the other African Bishops, wrote Letters to them, and sent their Deputies into Africk. But Novatian's were received very ill, and the African Bishops, who had for some time suspended their Judgment, and ceased to send Letters of Communion to either of the two Parties, till they were informed of the Matter by two of their own Brethren, whose Names were Caldonius and Fortunatus, whom they had dispatched to Rome on purpose to learn the true State

S. Cyprian.

(a) Saint Cyprian.] His own Name was Thascius, as appears by the Letter to Pipin, and the Acts of his Passion.

(b) Before he turned Christian] This is all we are able to say of what concerned him before his Conversion, because Pontius the Deacon in his Life, and S. Jerom in his Catalogue tells us no more of him. What Baronius has cited, taken out of the Oration of S. Gregory Nazianzen, concerning one S. Cyprian a Martyr, does not belong to our Bishop of Carthage: 'Tis commonly believed that S. Gregory speaks of another S. Cyprian, but 'tis a great deal more probable, that the Greeks, who knew but little of what passed in the West, feigned these Circumstances in the Life of S. Cyprian Bishop of Carthage, as it was a familiar thing with them to adorn and set off the Lives of Saints, with several uncertain and fabulous Narrations.

(c) He was Converted.] His Conversion might happen towards the Year 246. Having been Baptized at Easter or at Whitsontide, he writ his Letter to Donatus in Autumn. He tells us in his 59th Letter to Cornelius, which was written in the Year 252, that it was four Years since he had been made a Bishop. Thus he was Bishop 10 Years. He calls Donatus his Predecessor.

(d) The Year 248.] The Persecution under Decius began at the end of the Year 249, or else at the beginning of the Year 250.

S. Cyprian. of the whole Affair: After they were fully inſtructed by them, and two other African Biſhops, who were preſent at the Ordination of Cornelius, after what manner he had been ordained, decided it in Favour of him, and ſent him Letters of Communion, having firſt confirmed the Judgment he had paſſed againſt Novatian in Italy. The Judgment of the Church in Africk, and the Eloquent Letters of S. Cyprian, brought the Confeſſors of the Roman Church over to Cornelius's Party. Thus the Novatians finding themſelves cried down in Italy, to be revenged upon S. Cyprian, raiſed Diſturbances in Africk, where they cauſed one Maximus, a Deputy of Novatian, to be choſen Biſhop; and on the other ſide, Feliciſſimus the Deacon, an Enemy to S. Cyprian, got Privatus of Lambeſa, whom we have already mentioned, to ordain, in oppoſition to him, one whoſe Name was Fortunatus, and afterwards came into Italy, to get his Ordination ratified there by Cornelius, and by the reſt of the Italian Biſhops, pretending that this Fortunatus had been ordained by five and twenty Biſhops, and that S. Cyprian favoured the Party of the Novatians. Cornelius immediately rejected Feliciſſimus, and thoſe of his Faction, but at laſt being either frighted by their Menaces, or elſe ſhaken by their Diſcourſes, he entertained ſome Suſpicions to the Prejudice of S. Cyprian, and writ to him after a very diſobliging manner; to this the Saint returned a vigorous Anſwer, expoſing his Weakneſs, and acquainting him with the Malice of his Enemies.

In the mean time, while Feliciſſimus endeavoured to create a Miſunderſtanding between S. Cyprian and Cornelius, that Holy Man aſſembled a Council of Sixty ſix Biſhops at Carthage in April, in the Year 252, wherein ſome Eccleſiaſtical Regulations were made concerning a certain Prieſt, whoſe Name was Victor, whom his Biſhop had received to Grace contrary to the Deciſion of the Council, and alſo concerning the Baptiſm of Infants. About the ſame time he oppoſed one Fortunatianus a Biſhop, who ſtill held his Biſhoprick, though he had Sacrificed to Idols, and offered to reconcile thoſe, who after they had held out for ſome time, at laſt yielded to the violence of Torments, and who had undergone Penance for this their Tranſgreſſion three whole Years.

S. Cyprian after this, having had ſeveral Revelations, which inclined him to believe that the Church was to be Perſecuted within a ſhort time, was of Opinion, that in order to prepare the Chriſtians for this new Aſſault, it would be neceſſary to fortifie them with the Euchariſt, and to that Effect, to reconcile them to the Church. So in the Year 253, he aſſembled a Council of ſeveral Biſhops, who were all of the ſame Judgment, and ſignified their Reſolution to Pope Cornelius, that he might uſe the ſame Conduct in his own Church. Soon after happened the Perſecution of Gallus. Pope Cornelius was ſent into Baniſhment, and ſuffered Martyrdom the very ſame Year. Lucius, who ſucceeded him, was immediately baniſhed, from whence he returned after the Death of Gallus, in the beginning of the Year 254; but he did not long enjoy the Comforts of Peace, but ſuffered Martyrdom, after he had held the See of Rome for the ſpace of Eight Months only. Stephen was elected in his Place towards the end of that Year, or the beginning of the next. Under this Pope the celebrated Diſpute about the Validity of the Baptiſm of Hereticks was warmly diſcuſſed between the Churches of Africa and Rome. S. Cyprian being conſulted in the Year 255 by Januarius, and the other Biſhops of Numidia, whether it was neceſſary to re-baptize thoſe, who after they had been Baptized by Hereticks, deſired to be re-united to the Church, returned this Anſwer, as did ſeveral African Biſhops aſſembled in Council, that no Baptiſm could be valid out of the Church; that it was abſolutely neceſſary to Re-baptize thoſe who had received the Baptiſm of Hereticks; and in one Word, that this Queſtion had been already decided by the African Biſhops their Predeceſſors. Quintus having alſo ſent the ſame Demand to S. Cyprian, he made the ſame Anſwer, and ſent him the Deciſion of this Synod, which was moreover confirmed in another African Council held in 256, which wrote to Stephen about it, to exhort him to embrace this Diſcipline. But he was ſo far from ſubmitting to the Reaſon of the Africans, whether becauſe he imagined they had a Deſign to condemn the Roman Church, or becauſe he thought this Queſtion was of too great Conſequence, that he was enraged againſt S. Cyprian and his Collegues, and uſed their Diſputes ill: Nay, he prohibited all Chriſtians belonging to his Church, to receive or lodge them, depriving them not only of Eccleſiaſtical Communion, but alſo refuſing them the common Civilities of Hoſpitality. The Letter he writ back was full of Injuries and Invectives, and his Deciſion was compriſed in theſe Terms: 'If any one 'comes to you, of whatſoever Hereſie he is, let there not be made the leaſt Alteration in what has 'been regulated by Tradition, but only impoſe Hands upon him, and ſo receive him. This Letter being brought into Africk, S. Cyprian moved at the Proceedings of Stephen, ſent his Letter, with a Refutation of it, not only to Pompey of Africk, but alſo to Fermilian, and the other Biſhops of Cappadocia, who were all of the ſame Opinion with S. Cyprian, touching the Baptiſm of Hereticks. Firmilian having received it, writ a long Letter, wherein he amply refutes the Opinion and Letter of Stephen, and eſtabliſhes the Diſcipline which S. Cyprian defended; ſaying, It had been obſerved in his Country by an immemorial Cuſtom, and confirmed in two numerous Synods held at Iconium and Synnada. As ſoon as S. Cyprian had received this Letter, he aſſembled a Synod at Carthage, in which the Letter he had writ to Jubaianus upon this Queſtion was openly read, and all the Biſhops gave their Suffrages in favour of S. Cyprian's Opinion. Thus I have delivered in a few Words, the Hiſtory of this famous Quarrel between two great Biſhops, both of whom the Church ſtill reverences as Saints.

However, if I may be allowed to make ſome Reflections upon their Opinions and Conduct, I ſhall not ſcruple to obſerve after S. Auſtin, that S. Cyprian ſhewed a great deal more Moderation in this Diſpute, and that we can by no means excuſe that Heat and Paſſion which ſo far tranſported Stephen: For though the firſt maintained his Opinion vigorouſly, yet he did it with abundance of Candor, and always always declared he would leave other Bishops the Liberty to do as they judged convenient, and openly professed he would separate himself from the Communion of no Body upon the score of this Controversie, Neminem separantes, said he often, aut a Communione submoventes. Whereas on the other hand, Pope Stephen not only asserted his Opinion with a world of Heat and Rigour, but also treated those Bishops unworthily, who followed a Practice different from his own, calling them false Christians, false Apostles and Seducers, and refusing their Deputies not only the Communion of the Church, but even Lodging and Hospitality. As for what respects the Merits of the Cause, though 'tis commonly believed that the Pope had the Truth on his Side, yet there is sufficient reason to doubt whether he did not in the heat of his Opposition to S. Cyprian, carry things too far on the other side, and whether the Opinion of S. Austin, which the Church has since embraced, That we ought to receive those Persons without Baptism, who have been baptized by Hereticks in the Name of the Trinity, and to re-baptize those who have not been baptized according to that Form: Whether this Opinion, I say, does not steer the middle Course between Stephen's, (f) who seems to have maintained, that all those who had been baptized by Hereticks should be received without Re-baptization, which way soever they were baptized, a quacunque hæresi, and S. Cyprian's, who asserted that all such ought to be re-baptized. Be it as it will, 'tis certain (g) that S. Cyprian never altered his Opinion; that the Greek Churches were for a long time after him (h divided upon this Question; that the Council of Arles (i) first decided it in the West; that it is not unprobable that this was the Council which S. Austin (k) calls the full Council, which first decided this Controversie; that S. Austin followed its Decision, and proves it at large in his Books against the Donatists; that the Western Church has embraced this Opinion, and that though (l) the Eastern Churches have not agreed with her absolutely in this Point, yet they always made a distinction between Hereticks, and differently received them. It would be no difficult matter to justifie all this; but as this is no proper place to discuss this Question, so it would carry us too far from our Subject. The Reader need only consult our Annotations, to be better satisfied. S. Cyprian.

To compleat what remains of S. Cyprian's Life, it would be necessary here to transcribe the ancient Acts of his Passion, and what his Deacon Pontius has related concerning it; but the Description of his Martyrdom does not concern the Subject or Design of this Work; and therefore I shall only observe, that towards the beginning of Valerian's Persecution, in the Year 257, on the 30th of August, he was banished to Curubis, a City about ten or twelve Leagues distant from Carthage, by the Command of Aspasius Paternus, the Proconsul; that after he had tarried there eleven Months, he was

(f) Between that of Stephen, who seems to have maintained.] What induces us to believe that Stephen was of this Opinion, is, in the first place, because he makes no distinction at all, but says plainly, a quacunq; Hæresi. Secondly, Because S Cyprian and Firmilian take Stephen's Words in this sense; now who can imagine that they would have engaged themselves in a Dispute, without so much as knowing the Opinion of their Adversary? Thirdly, There were scarce any Hereticks before Stephen, who Baptized in the Name of the Trinity, so that it had been only a Chimerical Question about a thing which had never been practised, to dispute whether it were necessary to Re-baptize those who had been Baptized in the Name of the Trinity by Hereticks, since there were almost no Hereticks that used to Baptize after that manner. Fourthly, The ancient Author of a small Book written against the Opinion of S. Cyprian, makes no mention of this Distinction of Hereticks, but generally approves all Baptism whatever given in the Name of Jesus Christ. Fifthly, S. Augustin never cites Stephen's Decree for his Opinion; on the other hand, he opposes the Opinion of Stephen and S. Cyprian; and in his sixth Book de unico Bapt. c. 14. he tells us, Stephen maintained that no Body was to be Re-baptized, in nullo iterandum Baptisma. There are several other Reasons which I pass over in silence.

(g) S. Cyprian never altered his Opinion.] There is not the least probability that S. Cyprian altered his Opinion. In the time of the Council of Arles, the Africans still continued this Practice, and in Optatus's time they distinguished between Hereticks and Schismaticks, receiving the latter without Baptism, but Re-baptizing the former.

(h) Divided upon this Question.] Denis of Alexandria in Eusebius testifies that the Eastern Churches were divided upon this Question. S. Athanasius rejects the Baptism of Hereticks. S. Basil, in two Canons of his Letter to Amphilochius, examines the different Customs of several Churches about this Question, and inclines to the Party of those who reject the Baptism of Hereticks as invalid.

(i) First decided it in the West.] The Council of Arles, 1. c. 8. De Afris qui propria lege utuntur ut Rebaptizent.

(k) Calls the full Council.] This Question has been discussed with mighty Heat in our time, though it be but of small Importance. It is certain that the Council of Arles has decided it agreeably to the Opinion of S. Austin, and that the Africans gave the Name of a full Council to Councils consisting of more than one Province, as was that of Arles. However it is, the Council of Nice has not decided this Question, but only ordained that the Paulianists should be Re-baptized. Now it is not certain whether they Baptized in the Name of the Trinity or no: And St. Athanasius himself seems to affirm the contrary; besides that, though they had not Baptized in the Name of the Trinity, yet we cannot say that this Council has determined the Question.

(l) The Eastern Churches.] Those of the East did not make use of S. Austin's Distinction either in the Council of Constantinople, or in the Council that was held in the Emperour's Palace; but they distinguished between three sorts of Hereticks. Those that were to be Re-baptized, as the Paulianists, add the ancient Hereticks, together with the Eunomians and Sabellians, who did not observe three Immersions. Secondly, Those that were to be anointed, such as were the Arians, the Macedonians, the Novatians, the Quarto decimani, and the Apollinarians: And lastly, those who had nothing more to do than barely to make an Abjuration, as the Eutychians, the Nestorians, the Severians, the Acephali, and the Monothelites.

S. Cyprian. re-called by the Proconſul Galerius Maximus, who confined him to his own Gardens near Carthage; that being informed that the Proconſul had ſent ſome Soldiers to ſeize and carry him to Utica, he retired into a private Place, that he might not ſuffer Martyrdom out of his own Church, or after any other manner than in the Preſence of his own People; and that at laſt being come back again to his Gardens, after the Proconſul's return to Carthage, he was apprehended, and carried before him; where after he had generouſly made Profeſſion of the Chriſtian Faith, he had his Head cut off in a Place called Sexti, near the City of Carthage, on the 14th of September, in the Year 258, under the Conſulſhip of Tuſcus and Baſſus.

The firſt (m) Letter which S. Cyprian writ to Donatus, contains a Relation of a Conference he had with that Friend a little after his Baptiſm: Wherein, after he has ſpoke of the marvellous Effects of that Sacrament, he eloquently lays open the Perils we run in this World, the Crimes and Injuſtices that are there committed, and afterwards ſhewing the Excellence and Happineſs of thoſe Perſons who conſecrate themſelves to the Service of God; he exhorts his Friend to live a retired Life, to renounce the World, and to apply himſelf diligently to Reading and Praying. This Letter, which we are to conſider as the Firſt-fruits of S. Cyprian's Works, is written in a very gay florid Style, by no means ſuitable to the Matter in hand, as S. Auſtin obſerves in his Book of the Chriſtian Doctrin; adding, That this Martyr did not follow the ſame manner of Writing in his other Letters, but that he took up a more maſculine and graver way of Writing, and which was more becoming a Chriſtian. Theſe Letters are divided according to the Order of Time (n) into five Claſſes: The firſt comprehends thoſe which he wrote in his firſt Exile. The ſecond thoſe which he wrote under the Pontificate of the two Popes, Cornelius and Lucius. The third, thoſe which he wrote under the Pontificate of Stephen. The fourth thoſe which he wrote during his laſt Exile, towards his latter End. The fifth, thoſe of which we cannot ſet down the preciſe time when they were written, which are but few. But beſides this general Order, which it is to obſerve, we are to take notice what Letters follow each other immediately, and this indeed has been attempted by Pamelius, but with very little Succeſs. The Order he has followed, has been reformed by a Learned Perſon, who has tranſlated S. Cyprian's Letter into our Language, in the Preface which he ſets before his Tranſlation. And laſtly, He that publiſhed a new Edition of S. Cyprian in England, has diſpoſed them in a new Order, according to the Series of Time. We ſhall follow either of them as we ſee convenient.

The firſt of thoſe Letters that were written in the firſt Exile of S. Cyprian, in all probability is that which is the fourth in Pamelius's Edition, addreſſed to his Clergy, that is to ſay, to his Prieſts and Deacons,, wherein he exhorts them to acquit themſelves in his Abſence of their own Functions and his, ſo that nothing may be defective in relation to Order and Diſcipline: He recommends to their Care thoſe Chriſtians who were impriſoned for the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt, to aſſiſt them in their Neceſſities, and to adviſe the Chriſtians not to go in Multitudes to the Priſons, for fear of provoking the Pagans; that the Prieſts, who went to offer the Sacrifice of the Altar in Priſon, ſhould go thither each in their Turns, along with a Deacon; and laſtly, that the Chriſtians ſhould accommodate themſelves to the Times, and take care, as much as in them lay, to ſoften the Rigour of the Perſecution.

[What Du Pin renders to offer the Sacrifice of the Altar in S. Cyprian, is only to offer. It is well enough known that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was called a Sacrifice, the Lord's Table, an Altar, and the Adminiſtration Offering in S. Cyprian's Time; and it has been as often proved by all that have given an Account of the Belief of the Fathers in this Matter, That their Opinion was widely diſtant from that of the Church of Rome in this Point.]

This Letter was ſoon followed by another, mentioned by him in his ſixth Epiſtle, wherein he commends the Confeſſors for their Courage, and exhorts them to do nothing unworthy of ſuch glorious beginnings. Monſieur Lombert is of Opinion that it is loſt, whereas the Editor of the Engliſh pretends that it is the eighty firſt Letter which Pamelius ſuppoſes to have been written during his laſt Exile; but it is more probable that this Letter was written in his firſt, becauſe he there excuſes his Abſence, which he would never have done in his laſt, where he was (o) detained againſt his Will.

It happened at this time, that a Subdeacon of Carthage, named Clementius, who had gone to Rome towards the beginning of the Perſecution, came back to Carthage, bringing two Letters with him from the Clergy of Rome, during the Vacancy of that See by the Death of Fabian: One of them was

(m) The firſt Letter.] 'Tis rather a Treatiſe than a Letter, but all S. Cyprian's Works were called Letters, as it appears by Ruffinus in his Apology. S. Pacian calls the Book de Lapſis, a Letter, Ep. 3. ad Sempronianum. S. Auſtin likewiſe not only calls the Treatiſe to Donatus, but the Book of Unity, the Treatiſe of Zeal and Envy by this Name; and in ſome other places he gives the Title of the Book to the Letters. It is an eaſie matter however to diſtinguiſh the Letters from the Treatiſes; We leave the Treatiſe to Donatus among the Letters, though it is a Treatiſe.

(n) Into five Claſſes.] In the Engliſh Edition before the other Letters of S. Cyprian, we find four that are ſaid to have been written before his Retirement, but they bring no Proofs or Conjectures ſtrong enough to ſupport this Opinion, and therefore we had better own that we cannot tell when they were written.

(o) Detained againſt his Will.] The five and thirtieth Letter is placed after this, in the Edition lately put out in England, but it ſeems to me to have been written towards the end of the Perſecution, becauſe he there ſpeaks of his Return. We are to paſs the ſame Judgment upon the Sixth, and Seventh, and the Fifth, which were all written at the ſame time.

directed

directed to S. Cyprian, and gave him Intelligence of the Martyrdom of Fabian Biſhop of Rome; the other was addreſſed to the Clergy of Carthage, exhorting them to take care of the Flock of Jeſus Chriſt in the Abſence of their Paſtor, and encouraging the Faithful to continue ſtedfaſt in the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and to raiſe up thoſe who had the Misfortune to fall; to look after the Priſoners, the Needy, the Widows, and Catechumens; to reconcile the relapſed Penitents at their Death to the Church, and to bury the Bodies of the Martyrs. It reproached the Paſtors who abandoned their Flock in the time of Perſecution; which Paſſage ſeems indirectly to condemn S. Cyprian's Retreat. This Letter is the ſecond in the Order of Pamelius. S. Cyprian.

S. Cyprian anſwered this Letter of the Roman Clergy, by congratulating them for the glorious Martyrdom of S. Fabian; and having received a Copy of the Letter which the Clergy of Rome had writ to his, though it was both without Inſcription and Subſcription, yet he ſent to Rome to know whether this Letter was really writ by the Clergy of that City, giving them to underſtand that he was concerned at their ſeeming to diſapprove his Retreat: This is the third Letter. Some time after this, the Proconſul coming to Carthage, perſecuted the Chriſtians after a cruel manner, cauſing ſome of the Priſoners to be put to Death, and among the reſt, Mappalicus, who ſuffered Martyrdom on the 17th day of April. S. Cyprian being informed of this, made uſe of their Example to encourage the other Confeſſors to imitate their Conſtancy and Generoſity; and this he did in the 8th Letter. At the ſame time alſo he writ the 36th, addreſſed to his own Clergy, to whoſe Care he recommends the Confeſſors that were in Priſon, requiring them to inter the Bodies of thoſe who died there, to reverence them as Martyrs, and to ſend him word of the Day of their Death, that he might offer Sacrifices in remembrance of them. Some of the Chriſtians being then returned home from their Exile, without receiving Orders to do it, S. Cyprian writ a Letter to them, which is the 8th according to Pamelius's Account, wherein he takes occaſion to blame their Conduct.

[Mr. Dodwell, in his 5th Diſſertation upon S. Cyprian, tells us what kind of Sacrifices theſe are: They could not be offered as Propitiations, becauſe the Church believed the Martyrs were already Bleſſed. They were only Anniverſary Celebrations of the Memory of the Martyrdom of thoſe who ſuffered ſo glorioufly for the Faith. Thus all the Saints were alſo remembred in the Diptychs of the Church: Thus the Patriarchs, Prophets, Apoſtles, and the Bleſſed Virgin her ſelf, though no Man ever thought they could ſtand in need of the Prayers of the Faithful. But the Chriſtians were careful, even in the moſt Primitive Times, to pay all poſſible Honours to the Memories of thoſe who made a glorious Confeſſion of the Faith. The Acts of S. Polycarp's Martyrdom, which are the oldeſt we have, ſhew how ſolicitous the Chriſtians of Smyrna were to have his Aſhes, not to worſhip them, as they themſelves declare, but by paying the laſt Reſpect to them that was poſſible, to ſhew how willing they ſhould have been to ſuffer in the ſame Cauſe, if they had had an equal Call. Nay, all Chriſtians that dy'd in the Communion of the Church, had in thoſe early Ages ſome Honours paid to them after their Death. Therefore S. Cyprian commanded that no Honour ſhould be paid to Geminius Victor, becauſe he had left Geminius Fauſtinus, a Prieſt, his Executor by his Will: And ſo Du Pin's Words, when he ſpeaks of this Buſineſs afterwards, are to be underſtood; for the ſame Phraſes are uſed, when he ſpeaks of the Commemoration of Martyrs Aniverſaries, and of this of Geminius Victor there forbidden.]

The Perſecution that ſtill continued, as it augmented the Number of Martyrs, ſo it augmented the Number of the Lapſed, that is to ſay, of thoſe Chriſtians who were ſo weak as to deny the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and offer Incenſe to Idols, or elſe ſuch as, to avoid Perſecution, got Certificates or Atteſtations under the Hands of ſome Judge, to certifie that they had ſacrificed. Now thoſe who had once fallen away, being thrown out of the Church, and excluded from Communion, addreſſed themſelves to the Martyrs, whoſe Credit and Authority in the Church at that time was extraordinary, who gave them Tickets, wherein they deſired that they might be admitted to Reconciliation. They writ to S. Cyprian on the ſame account, praying him to take this their Deſire into conſideration, and to receive theſe Perſons whom they recommended, whenever the Church ſhould be in Peace. But ſome of them happening to abuſe theſe Tickets of the Martyrs, demanded to be reconciled immediately, and addreſſing themſelves to Feliciſſimus, and ſome other Prieſts, who were Enemies to S. Cyprian, received Abſolution from their Hands. S. Cyprian being informed of theſe irregular Proceedings, after he had continued ſome time in ſilence, writ a Letter full of Zeal and Earneſtneſs to his Prieſts and Deacons (this is the ninth) wherein he ſeverely reproves the Prieſts, who forgetting their Rank, and the Duty they owed their Biſhop, had raſhly abſolved thoſe who had fallen into Idolatry. He reproaches them with deceiving the Faithful, inaſmuch as they reconciled them before they had done Penance for their Tranſgreſſion: He remonſtrates to them, that if in Sins of leſs Scandal and Conſequence, it is neceſſary to undergo publick Penance for ſome conſiderable time, before the Party offending is re-admitted into the Church, by Impoſition of Hands from the Biſhop and Clergy, it is a ſtrange perverting of Diſcipline, to admit theſe to the Communion, who, though they have ſhamefully denied the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and ſacrificed to Idols, yet have undergone no Penance for their Crime, nor received the Impoſition of Hands of the Biſhop and Prieſts; that as for the Martyrs, they were excuſable, becauſe they did not know the Law; but that thoſe who gave them this falſe Reconciliation were highly to be blamed: That it was a ſcandalous thing for Eccleſiaſticks to abuſe the eaſie Temper of the Martyrs, whom they rather ought to have diſſuaded, in caſe they requeſted any thing which was contrary to the Diſcipline of the Church, but that indeed the Martyrs had demanded nothing like it, ſince they only writ to him to grant the Favour of Reconciliation to thoſe, to whom they had given Tickets, when the Perſecution ſhould ceaſe. At laſt he threatens ſome of his

Clergy

S. Cyprian. Clergy who had shewn themselves rash, indiscreet and presumptuous upon this Occasion, if they continued in their Obstinacy, to forbid them to Offer, till such time as they gave an account of their Behaviour before himself, and the Confessors, and the Congregation of the Faithful. He writ likewise at the same time to the Confessors, to advise them not to be so free of their Tickets, or give them to all Petitioners, but to inform themselves better of the Character of those Persons, to whom they designed this Indulgence; and then dissuades the People from soliciting their Admission into the Church with so much precipitation, by making them sensible that a rash Absolution was so far from appeasing God's Anger, that it would rather draw his Vengeance down upon them. These Letters are the Tenth and Eleventh.

His Clergy returning him no Answer, obliged him to write a second Letter to them, wherein, after he has complained of their Silence, he gives the Priests and Deacons leave to reconcile those, who having fallen into Idolatry, had received Tickets from the Martyrs when they were dying; and orders them to Baptize the Catechumens that were in danger. This Letter is the Twelfth in Pamelius's Order, and was written towards the beginning of the Summer, 250. His Clergy sending him word, that they did not fail to advise those that had fallen, not to be over hasty, but to undergo Penance; and yet, notwithstanding all the Remonstrances they made, there were some among them who daily pressed them; he answered as he did before in his former Letter, that they ought to reconcile those who had received Tickets from the Martyrs, when they were dangerously Sick; but that others, though they had received Tickets, ought to wait till the Bishops could assemble to fix this Business by common Consent. This Letter is the Thirteenth.

About this time having received Information, That the Letter, a Copy whereof he had by him, without any Subscription, came from the Clergy of Rome, he writ to them to justifie his Retreat, and give them an Account of the Pastoral Care he had of his Flock, all the while he was absent. This he does in his Fourteenth Letter, wherein he at large acquaints the Clergy of Rome with all that had passed upon the Occasion of the Lapsed; and tells them of the Resolution he had taken conformable to theirs, not to give Absolution to those that had fallen, except they were in danger of Death, till such time as several Bishops could meet to deliberate upon the Affair, by communicating the same to other Churches.

At the same time (p) Celerinus, a Confessor at Rome, writ a Letter to Lucian, a Confessor at Carthage; wherein he desires him to pray to God for his Sister, who having fallen away in the Persecution, was enjoyn'd Penance: This is the Twentieth. Lucian sends him word again, that he had reconciled all those who had fallen, pursuant to the Order he had received from the Martyr Paul, but upon condition that they would apply themselves to their Bishop, and do publick Penance for their Fault: This is the Twenty first Letter; and indeed this Lucian had given Tickets in the Name of Paul and Mappalicus, to all the Lapsed, who presented themselves before him, after he was informed of the Penance they had done after their Fall, and had writ to S. Cyprian, desiring him to acquaint the Bishops with it: This Letter is the Fifteenth. S. Cyprian having received it, sent word immediately to his Clergy, that since the Demand of the Confessors concerned all the Bishops, he durst not prevent them, or take upon himself the Decision of a Matter, wherein all his Brethren had a Share; that therefore he would not reconcile the Penitents till Peace was restored to the Church, and he had the Advice of the rest of his Brethren: This Letter is the Seventeenth. At the same time he sent a Copy of a Letter of a certain Bishop named Caldonius, who was of the same Opinion with himself, as to the Reconciliation of those that had fallen, together with his own Answer to it. These Two Letters are the Eighteenth and Nineteenth. At this Juncture arrived Letters from Rome, one from the Clergy, the other from Moses, Maximus, Nicostratus, and the other Confessors.

The first is addressed to the Clergy, the second to Sturninus, Aurelius, and some other Persons. The Scope and Design of both, is to exhort those that had fallen into Idolatry, not to use over much haste in getting themselves reconciled, but to wait a sufficient time to undergo a true Penance. These Letters, that were full of an Evangelical Spirit, rejoyced S. Cyprian exceedingly, and secured him from the Complaints that were made against him. He thought himself therefore obliged to thank the Clergy and Confessors of Rome in two Letters, which he wrote to them. In that directed to the Clergy, the 22d in order, he gives them an Acconnt of all that had happen'd in Lucian's Affair, he complains of the Rashness of that Man, and tells them very properly to this Subject, That the Martyrs don't make the Gospel, but the Gospel the Martyrs.

In the other, which he sent to the Confessors (the 24) he commends their Zeal exceedingly, and tells them, That to be true Martyrs, we ought always to observe an inviolable Sanctity in our Words, and not to destroy the Precepts of JESUS CHRIST, when we pretend to die for him. He ordained Saturus a Reader, and Optatus a Sub-deacon to carry these Letters, because it was the Custom of Bishops in those Days to send their Letters by none but Clergy-men. He acquainted his Clergy with this Ordination in his 25th Letter, and sent them a Copy of the Letters he writ to Rome, and excused himself for being obliged to do this Business in the Absence of his Clergy. The Clergy of Rome being fully informed of S. Cyprian's Conduct, sent him a Letter of Novatian's composing, full of Esteem and Respect, which was brought him by Optatus and Saturus. They acknowledged, that though S. Cyprian being assured by the Testimony of his own Conscience, was therefore under no great Neceſſity to juſtifie himſelf; yet he deſerved, however, abundance of Commendation, for deſiring that his Actions might be approved by his Brethren; that if he had communicated his Reſolutions to them, it was not becauſe they were his Judges, but only that they might partake the Glory of it with him, by ſupporting and authorizing them, as they do in the 30th Letter, wherein they declare that they were of S. Cyprian's Opinion, That it was neceſſary to tarry till Peace were reſtored to the Church, that ſo the Advice of the Biſhops, Prieſts, Deacons and Confeſſors, who continued firm to the Church might be conſulted, before they regulated a Matter of that great Importance: That as for themſelves and their Neighbours, they would determine nothing till they had a Biſhop: That in the mean time they deferr'd to give thoſe Perſons Abſolution who were able to tarry; but as for thoſe who were in danger of Death, and had given ſufficient Marks of a ſincere Repentance and unfeigned Sorrow, they looked upon themſelves obliged to relieve them in that Neceſſity, leaving to God the Judgment of thoſe Perſons. This Letter is writ with a World of Elegance and Politeneſs, and abounds with admirable Thoughts upon the retarding of Abſolution, and alſo upon that Penance that is neceſſary to ſatisfie God. "Let thoſe People, ſay they, who, by reaſon of their Crimes, have "deſerved to be ejected out of the Church, knock at the Gates, but not break them open; Let them "come to the Church-Porch, but let them go no farther: Let them demand Peace and Abſolution, but "let it be with Modeſty, Humility, Patience and Submiſſion: Let their Tears and their Sighs inter-"cede for them, and teſtifie the real Sorrow they have for their Sins. S. Cyprian.

The Confeſſors of Rome likewiſe returned an Anſwer to S. Cyprian at the ſame time. Their Letter, which is the 25th, though not ſo polite as the former, is equally Learned. They thank S. Cyprian for the Letter he ſent them, and aſſure him they received no ſmall Satisfaction and Comfort from it; they looked upon the Condition of thoſe Perſons who had ſuffered Martyrdom to be extreamly happy, ſince they went directly to Heaven, and thought themſelves to be unfortunate, becauſe they were deprived of that Bleſſing. They commend S. Cyprian for his great Vigilance over his Flock, tho' he was conſtrained by Neceſſity to be abſent from it. In ſhort, they were of Opinion, that Penitents ought not to be admitted to Reconciliation, before the Church was in a State of Tranquility, ſhewing how neceſſary Repentance is to blot out our Tranſgreſſions, and how dangerous it is to cloſe up a Wound before it be throughly healed.

Theſe Letters being mighty advantagious to S. Cyprian's Affairs, he diſpatched a Copy of them to his Clergy, with Orders to ſhew them to the Faithful of Carthage, and to the Biſhops that were Strangers, as we find in the 31ſt Letter: But notwithſtanding all this Advice, the Lapſi, in a full Body, writ a Letter to S. Cyprian in the Church's Name, wherein they demanded of him to grant them Reconciliation, as being a thing they might juſtly claim, pretending that Paul the Martyr had given it to all of them before he died. S. Cyprian ſent them Word, in the 26th Letter, that the Church conſiſting only of the Biſhop and Clergy, and all the Laicks who continued firm and ſtedfaſt, he wondred how they durſt be ſo bold, as to write to him in the Name of the Church, and demand Reconciliation of him as a thing that was their Due, inſtead of writing to him after a ſubmiſſive manner, as ſome had done before, who, though they had received Tickets from the Martyrs, yet humbly ſignified to him, that they acknowledged their Fault, that they were heartily ſorry for it, and were by no means urgent to receive the Peace of the Church: That he deſired them therefore, for the time to come, to let him know preciſely what they requeſted, and to ſend him their Names, that he might know what to do. He wrote alſo the 27th Letter to the Clergy, to inform them, that if any of his Prieſts and Deacons, or elſe any Stranger ſhould be ſo preſumptuous, as to communicate with the Lapſi, before that Affair were ſolemnly decided, he declared him to be cut off from Communion. He commends them for ſeparating themſelves from Caius a Presbyter of Didda, and his Deacon, who communicated with Apoſtates, though they had been twice reprimanded by the Biſhops; and declares, That he will not judge the Cauſe of Philumenus and Fortunatus the Deacons, and of Favorinus the Acolyth, who had withdrawn themſelves in the Heat of Perſecution, but that they muſt tarry till his return before he examined their Cauſe, not only with his Collegues, but alſo with the People; that in the mean time he would have them deprived of the Diſtribution that was given to the Clergy, though in ſuch a manner, as ſhould not do any Prejudice to the Merits of their Cauſe. He afterwards, in his 28th Letter, acquaints the Clergy of Rome with all that he had regulated and done about thoſe that had fallen; and they, for their part, return him a very obliging Letter, wherein they commend his Stedfaſtneſs, and condemn the Precipitation of thoſe that were ſo eager to be reconciled to the Church; but at the ſame time they excuſed the Martyrs, who ſent them to their Biſhop. Towards the end of the Letter, they thank him for the Information he had given them concerning Privatus of Lambeſa, and aſſure him that they think themſelves obliged to ſhew, that they are not indifferent in thoſe things which relate to other Churches, becauſe "Paſtors ought to watch in common for "the Body of the whole Church, the ſeveral Parts of which are extended in many Provinces. This Letter is the 29th. Towards October, Celerinus of Africa, after he had generouſly confeſſed the Chriſtian Faith at Rome, came back to Carthage; and going to find out S. Cyprian in his Retirement, comforted him exceedingly, by letting him know what an Affection Moſes, and the other Confeſſors of Rome bore unto him. This obliged him to write another Letter to them, to acquaint them how ſenſibly he received their Good-will, and to encourage them to perſevere in the Reſolution they had taken upon them to die for JESUS CHRIST. This is the 17th Letter in the Order of Pamelius. It contains an admirable Commendation of Martyrdom; he obſerves in it, that it was almoſt a full Year ſince they were in Priſon; but then endeavours to ſatisfie them, that their Recompence would be proportionable to the length of their Sufferings, and that immediately after their Martyrdom, they would would receive the Happineſs of enjoying GOD. Theſe Confeſſors, animated by this eloquent Letter, ſuffered Martyrdom ſoon after the Receipt of it,

S. Cyprian.

In December, S. Cyprian ordained the Readers, Aurelius and Celurinus, both of whom had confeſſed the Faith of JESUS CHRIST, and ſignified this Ordination immediately after to his Clergy and People, in his 32d and 33d Letters, wherein he excuſes himſelf for having Ordained them before he had conſulted his Church, becauſe we need not ſtay for the Teſtimony of Men, when we have that of GOD. He gives them both an extraordinary Character for their Virtue, and the great Conſtancy they ſhewed in ſuffering for the Chriſtian Faith. He ſays, they deſerved to be advanced to the higheſt Dignities of the Church, but that he judged it more convenient to Ordain them only Readers, becauſe they were ſo very young: That in the mean time he deſigned to make them Prieſts; and therefore ordered them to give them their Diſtributions, as if they were ſo already. At the ſame time he aſſociated Numidicus the Prieſt to his Clergy, who was as illuſtrious for the Strictneſs of his Virtue and Faith, as for the Glory of his Confeſſion; for after he had, by his Exhortations, ſent a great Number of Martyrs to GOD before him, who were either burnt or ſtoned to Death, and ſaw his Wife, whom he entirely loved caſt, among ſeveral others, into the Fire, with Joy, he himſelf was half burnt, bruiſed with Stones, and left for Dead. This is related in the 34th Letter, which was writ in his Favour.

In the beginning of the Year 257, the Confeſſors that were in Priſon at Carthage, being ſet at Liberty, ſome of them were licentious in their Behaviour. S. Cyprian being informed of it, writ two Letters, one to his Clergy, and the other to the Confeſſors. In the firſt, which is the 5th according to Pamelius's Order, he ſends his Clergy word, that he earneſtly deſired to come back to Carthage; but that the time not permitting him to do it, he conjured them to ſupply his Abſence, to have a particular Care of the Poor, and to exhort the Confeſſors not to loſe the Honour of their glorious Confeſſion by their Sins, but to ſuffer themſelves to be governed by the Prieſts and Deacons; that as for himſelf, he could not regulate the Affairs of his Church alone, having obliged himſelf, when he was firſt made Biſhop, to do nothing of his own Head, without the Advice of his Clergy, and the Conſent of the People.

In the Letter which he writ at the ſame time to the Confeſſors, he adviſes them to a ſtrict Obſervance of the Diſcipline of the Church, leſt otherwiſe they ſhould ſeem to renounce JESUS CHRIST, by their irregular way of Living, whom they had confeſſed before with their Tongues. He commends thoſe who behaved themſelves diſcreetly, and vigorouſly reprehends the reſt; he exhorts all Chriſtians to live ſoberly, and to forſake all Vices, that ſo they may be perfectly changed, and become perfect, when Peace, which GOD promiſes to ſend in a ſhort time, ſhall be reſtored to the Church. He gives the ſame Advice to his Clergy in the 7th Letter, where he tells them, that as the Perſecution had been occaſioned by the Corruptions of the Manners of the Chriſtians, ſo it would be impoſſible to obtain a Ceſſation of it from GOD, by any other Means, than offering up Prayers to him in the Spirit of Union, and living a Vertuous Life. Soon after he writ the 35th Letter to his Clergy, wherein he aſſures them, that he paſſionately deſired to come and ſee them, but that he was obliged to have Regard to the Peace of the Church; and he was afraid that his Preſence might exaſperate the Pagans; that as ſoon as ever they ſent him word that all was calm, and GOD ſhould inform him of it, he would ſpeedily to repair them. In the mean time he recommended the Poor to their Care, and ſent ſome Mony to Regatianus the Prieſt, to ſupply their Neceſſities; as alſo to relieve Strangers, and thoſe that were Sick.

S. Cyprian being not in a Capacity at that time to go to Carthage, diſpatched two Biſhops, whoſe Names were Caldonius and Fortunatus, to relieve the Poor with Mony, and to examine thoſe Perſons who were thought worthy to be choſen into Eccleſiaſtical Offices. Feliciſſimus, who had always caballed againſt S Cyprian, and aſſerted that it was neceſſary to admit thoſe that had fallen into a Reconciliation, hindred theſe Alms and Examinations, as much as lay in his Power, and threatned to ſeparate himſelf from thoſe that ſhould receive any thing, and obey their Biſhop. After this, he retired to a Mountain, with thoſe of his own Party, and declared himſelf their Head. S. Cyprian being informed of this Defection, writ to the two Biſhops, ſignifying, That ſince Feliciſſimus had threatned to communicate no longer with thoſe who were in his Place, he would deprive him, and all the reſt of his Faction, from the Communion of the Church, and that, ſetting this Crime aſide, he deſerved to be Excommunicated for the Rapines, the Cheating, and Adulteries of which he was accuſed. This Letter is the 37th. He writ likewiſe the 39th Letter to his own People, wherein, after he had repreſented what a Grief it was to him, that this Diſturbance retarded his Return, he remonſtrates with ſome Vehemence, that as there is but one Church, ſo there is but one Chair in every Church, whereof the Biſhop is Maſter; that we cannot ſet up Altar againſt Altar, nor eſtabliſh a new Prieſthood; and that thoſe who revolt from their Biſhop, and ſeparate themſelves from his Communion, are out of the Church. In ſhort he threatens, at the ſame time, to exclude thoſe for ever, who ſhould join themſelves to Feliciſſimus. Caldonius, Fortunatus, and the reſt of S. Cyprian's Clergy had no ſooner received theſe Letters, but they excommunicated Feliciſſimus, and thoſe of his Cabal, and acquainted S. Cyprian with it in the 83d Letter. And thus I have given the true Order, as well as the Subject of all thoſe Letters that were written to S. Cyprian, during the time of his firſt Baniſhment.

The Order of the Letters written after his Return is leſs perplexed and confuſed in Pamelius's Edition than that of the former. The 40th and 41ſt Letters are firſt in this ſecond Order, and are addreſſed to Cornelius. S. Cyprian had ſent him word of all that had paſſed in Africk, upon the Difference Difference he had with Novatian, and informed him (q) of the Faction Felicissimus: At the same time also he writ the 43d Letter to the Confessors of Rome, to dissuade them from Novatian's Party, and gave Cornelius Information of it in the 42d Letter, wherein he acquaints him, that he had given Orders to his Subdeacon Metius, who carried it, to shew it to him, lest he should suspect him to entertain a Commerce with the Schismaticks. In the mean time, Primitivus the Priest, who had carried S. Cyprian's first Letter from Carthage, being returned thither, brought him a Letter from Cornelius, in which he complains that the Letters that were sent him from Adrumetum, were not directed to him, but to his Clergy, ever since Juvenalis and S. Cyprian were arrived there. To this S. Cyprian answers in the 44th Letter, that the Reason of this was, because they had acquainted the Christians of that Colony with a Decision lately made in Africk, which, by reason of their Bishop's Absence, they were ignorant of, viz. That they should neither write to Novatian nor Cornelius, but to the Clergy of Rome, till they had received certain News from Caldonius and Fortunatus; and that since Cornelius's Ordination was now approved of by all the World, he himself in particular had writ about it to all the African Bishops. Towards the end of this Letter he he prays, That GOD, who chose and established Bishops, would not only vouchsafe to protect and defend them, but give them Grace and Knowledge necessary to repress the Licentiousness of Offenders with Vigor, and to manage the good Inclinations of the Penitents with Gentleness and Clemency. S. Cyprian.

In the mean time the Confessors of the Church of Rome returning from their Error, and being received by Cornelius in an Assembly of the Roman Clergy, where five Bishops made their Appearance; Cornelius communicated this News to S. Cyprian in the 45th Letter, which he sent to him by the Hands of Acolyth Nicephorus, wherein he gives him a particular Account of whatever had passed in relation to the Confessors, and how they had acknowledged their Fault, and desired to be publickly pardoned, owning that they had been abused by the Perfidiousness and Artifices of Novatian; and that, though they had communicated with him, yet they were always in their Hearts united to the Church, and acknowledged at the bottom, That as there was but one God, one Christ, and one Holy Ghost, so there ought to be but one Bishop in a Catholick Church: That after this solemn Profession, they had been received with the Approbation of the People; and that they had granted the Favour to Maximus the Priest, to keep his Rank and Dignity. The Person that carried this, brought S. Cyprian another Letter from Cornelius, wherein he informs him of the Departure of Novatus and his Companions, Nicostratus the Deacon, Evaristus the Bishop, Primus and Dionysius: This is the 47th Letter. S. Cyprian having received these two Letters, answered them by two others. In the first, which is the 46th, he rejoyces with Cornelius at the Return of the Confessors. In the second, which is the 48th, he paints Novatus in his true Colours, and accuses him of several Crimes. He tells him, it was he, who by his Caballing had got Felicissimus to be ordained a Deacon in Africk; and that coming to Rome afterwards, he had been the Cause of Novatian's being Ordained; but that it was no wonder that this Man could not continue in the Church, who had violated all the Laws of Christian Morality, and Ecclesiastical Discipline; that he had plundered the Orphans and Widows; that he had cheated the Churches, by laying out the Mony to other Uses; that he had suffered his own Father to die of meer Poverty; and that he had been the Cause of his Wife's proving abortive, by Kicking and Ill-using her; that he ought not only to be deprived of the Priesthood, but also of the Communion of the Church, for his Crimes; and that he had prevented the Judgment which the Bishops ought to have passed against him by his voluntary Separation. At the same time likewise, the Confessors of Rome writ to S. Cyprian, signifying, that after they had deliberated among themselves, concerning the Welfare and Peace of the Church, forgetting what had passed, and leaving the Judgment of it to God, they had reconciled themselves to Cornelius, to the Clergy, and all the Church of Rome. S. Cyprian congratulated them upon their Return, in such a manner as sufficiently testified the Joy he had at such welcome News; as also the Sorrow he had formerly entertained at their falling away. These Letters in Pamelius's Edition, are the 49th and 50th.

Towards the beginning of the year 252, Antoninus an African Bishop, who had been of Cornelius's Side, having received a Letter from Novatian, to acquaint him, that Cornelius had received Trophimus, and several other Persons who had offered Incense to Idols, was a little staggered at it, and writ to S. Cyprian, praying him to inform him what was Novatian's Heresie, and why Cornelius had received Trophimus, and the other Apostates. S. Cyprian perceiving him to waver, endeavoured to confirm him by a long Letter; wherein, after he has justified the Conduct that was observed at Rome and in Africk, concerning those that were fallen, he defends Cornelius, and demonstrates the Validity of his Ordination. He begins it with making a sort of Reproach to this Bishop for his Inconstancy, telling him, it by no means became discreet Persons, who had built their Judgments upon solid Grounds, to suffer themselves to be carried away with every Wind, and to be always changing their Opinions. After this he proceeds to justifie the Measures that were taken with those that had fallen into Idolatry, whether by taking Certificates, or Sacrificing to Idols. He tells him, as long as the Persecution lasted, he had been of Opinion, that it was their Duty to deny them Reconciliation, to encourage them the better to suffer Martyrdom; but that after Peace was once restored to the Church, and after a mature Deliberation upon this Affair, in a numerous Assembly of Bishops, it was thought convenient to keep a Temper, not by taking away all Hopes of Pardon from those that had

S. Cyprian. fallen, for fear they ſhould live as Pagans, when they ſaw themſelves entirely ſhut out of the Church; but by obliging them to undergo a long Penance before they could be reconciled; that this had been regulated in Councils of ſeveral Biſhops, held in Africk and at Rome. He afterwards comes to the Perſon and Ordination of Cornelius, and tells him, that he had not all on the ſudden arrived to the Epiſcopacy, but that he had formerly paſſed through all the Eccleſiaſtical Dignities; that he had neither deſired it, nor ſtickled for it, but that he had received it with all Humility; that, in a Word, he had uſed no manner of Violence, as ſome have done, to get himſelf made a Biſhop, but that he had ſuffered it rather in receiving the Epiſcopacy againſt his Will, Non ut quidam vim fecit, ut Epiſcopus fieret, ſed vim paſſus eſt ut Epiſcopatum coactus acciperet; that he had been elected Biſhop by ſeveral Biſhops, who happened to be then at Rome, in expectation of the Choice of the Clergy, and the Suffrages of the People, and with the general Approbation of all Churches, the See being at that time vacant by the Death of Fabian; that after this Ordination, which was approved by all the Biſhops in the World, whoever would get himſelf ordained in the See of Rome, muſt neceſſarily be out of the Church; that no Credit was to be given to the ſecret Calumnies that were publiſhed againſt him; that his Collegues, after they had diligently examined the Accuſations of his Enemies, found him to be innocent; that he had never received any Certificates from the Magiſtrates, nor communicated with thoſe Biſhops that had Offered Incenſe to Idols, but that he had followed the Regulations which the whole Church had made concerning Apoſtates; that as for Trophimus, he had only received him for the Good of the Church, and to procure the Return of ſeveral Chriſtians, whom he had brought along with him back again to the Church; that for this Reaſon he had been received, but on this Condition, to be in the Number of the Laity, and not as the Novatians had reported, in Quality of a Biſhop; that ſince the Benefit of Reconciliation was allowed to Adulterers and Robbers, he ſaw no reaſon why Idolaters ſhould be totally excluded; that amongſt theſe, ſome were more to be blamed than others, that the Libellatici, [Thoſe who had Certificates of their having Sacrificed, though they had never done it,] were more excuſable than thoſe that had ſacrificed to Idols; that the firſt of theſe had been reconciled immediately, and that it had been determined, that Abſolution ſhould not be refuſed the latter upon the Point of Death, becauſe there was no Repentance in Hell, with Exception always to thoſe who deferred to do Penance till they were in Danger. After this he largely proves and demonſtrates the reaſonableneſs of this Conduct.

He obſerves that ſome of his Predeceſſors formerly had abſolutely refuſed Abſolution to Adulterers, but that they had not therefore condemned their Brethren, who acted indifferently, nor torn the Church, by making a Separation; that no body ought to be alarmed at what Novatian taught, ſince he was out of the Boſom of the Church; that he could not be Biſhop of Rome, ſince the Roman See was filled by Cornelius, who had been legally ordained, and whoſe Ordination had been approved by all the Biſhops in the World; that the Church being a Body whoſe Members were ſpread over all the Earth after the ſame manner, there was only one Epiſcopacy diffuſed in the Perſon of ſeveral Biſhops united together; and that though Novatian had been rightly Ordained, yet he forfeited that Dignity by ſeparating himſelf from his Collegues, and diſturbing the Repoſe of the Church, and that there were no hopes of Salvation for him, being out of the Church. In ſhort, S. Cyprian ſhews that it is cruel and unreaſonable to oblige Sinners, as Novatian had done, to undergo Penance, and yet refuſe them the Favour of Reconciliation, to exhort them to make Satisfaction for their Sins, and yet deny them that Cure which their Satisfaction deſerves; to ſay to them, Weep and Sigh Night and Day, Waſh your Sins in your Tears, endeavour to efface them by your good Works, and yet at the ſame time add, you muſt die out of the Church; do all you can to procure your Peace, though you ſhall never be able to obtain the Peace you ſo earneſtly deſire.

But Cornelius did not defend S. Cyprian at Rome with the ſame Reſolution and Conſtancy as this Saint defended his Party in Africk; for Feliciſſimus arriving there with a Company of factious Perſons, to get the Ordination of Fortunatus approved, whom he had cauſed to be Ordained in Oppoſition to S. Cyprian, Cornelius at firſt rejected him, and turned him out of the Church, without vouchſafing ſo much as to hearken to him, and writ to S. Cyprian about it. But ſeeing no body came from S. Cyprian, and that he had ſent him no Directions about it, whereas on the other hand it was openly diſcourſed, That Fortunatus had been ordained by Twenty five Biſhops; that S. Cyprian favoured the Party of the Novatians, and that if the Church of Rome refuſed to receive the Letters which they brought againſt him, they would read them in Publick. The Pope was not a little affrighted at the Menaces, and wrote a ſecond Letter to S. Cyprian, wherein he acquaints him that he was ſenſibly concerned at theſe Accuſations, and wondred why he would omit to give him Satisfaction in this Affair. S. Cyprian ſurprized at the Boldneſs of Feliciſſimus, and the Weakneſs of Cornelius, returns him a generous Anſwer, in which he tacitly reprehends him for all this Procedure. He tells him, that if the Inſolence of Wicked Men renders them terrible to Biſhops, and that if they can obtain by Menaces and Violence what they could never pretend to get by Reaſon and the regular Courſe of Juſtice, then there is an end of Epiſcopacy. As for himſelf, he declares, that he feared not the obloquies of his Enemies; that Diſcipline muſt not therefore be laid aſide, becauſe we are reviled with Calumnies, and ill-affected Perſons endeavour to affright us by their threatning Speeches; that the Original of Hereſies and Schiſms is ſolely owing to the Diſobedience ſhewn to the Biſhop, whom God has eſtabliſhed; and becauſe People don't conſider that there is only one Biſhop and Judge in a Church, who for that time ſupplies the Place of Jeſus Chriſt; that a Biſhop being once Canonically Elected, and acquitting himſelf worthily in the Functions of his Miniſtry, whoever ſeparates from him, does actually withdraw himſelf from the Church; that we ought not to impute this Loſs to the Biſhop, but to themſelves, who voluntarily choſe it; that the Reaſon why Biſhops are obliged to have ſo great a Care in the Diſcharge of their Conſciences, is that no body might pretend to leave the Church for their ill Adminiſtration; that his own Election was without any Blemiſh, as having been ſubſtituted in the room of a deceaſed Biſhop, Elected by the Suffrages of the People in the Time of Peace, protected by God in his Perſecution, united inviolably to his Collegues, approved by the vigilant Adminiſtration of his Office for four years, demanded often in the Cirque and Amphitheatre to be expoſed to Lions, and that very lately too upon the occaſion of a publick Sacrifice. He informs him at laſt with all that had paſſed in Africk concerning the falſe Biſhop Fortunatus, who was ſet up by the Faction of Feliciſſimus, and ordained by Privatus of Lambeſa a Heretick, particularly marked out in the Letters of Fabian and Donatus, and condemned in a Council of Nine Biſhops. He tells him, that he forbore to write to him concerning this Matter, becauſe he ſuppoſed he knew him well enough, ſince he was one of the Five Prieſts who had ſeparated themſelves from his Church a long while ago, and becauſe he himſelf had ejected Feliciſſimus, the Chief of that Faction, out of the Church; that Novatus's Party had likewiſe choſen one Maximus an African Biſhop, and that he had ſcarce troubled himſelf to write about theſe Matters now; but ſince Fortunatus boaſted that he was Ordained by Twenty five Biſhops, he aſſures Cornelius, that except the Heretick Privatus of Lambeſa, there was only four Biſhops, and thoſe too all Apoſtates, that aſſiſted at his Ordination. After this, he accuſes Feliciſſimus, and thoſe of his Faction, for reconciling thoſe that had fallen in the Time of Perſecution, without ſtaying till they had done Penance for their Crime, contrary to the Decree of the African Council. He likewiſe deſcribes the furious Exceſſes of this Cabal, and adds; "After all "theſe Irregularities, after having Elected an Heretick to be a Biſhop, they have ſtill the Impudence "to go to Rome, and carry Letters from Schiſmaticks to the Chair of S. Peter, to that chief Church, "which is the Spring of Sacerdotal Unity. But what can their Deſign be, ſince they are ſtill reſolved "to perſevere in their Crimes? Or what Benefit can they expect in going from Rome? If they re- "pent of their Faults, they ought to underſtand that they muſt come back again hither to receive "Abſolution for them, ſince it is an Order eſtabliſhed all the World ever, and indeed but reaſonable, that "every ones Cauſe ſhould be Examined where the Crime was committed. Every Paſtor has received a part of "Jeſus Chriſt's Flock to govern, and ſhall render an Account of his Actions to God alone. Upon this ac- "count it is not to be allowed, that thoſe Perſons who are under our Charge, ſhould run to and fro, "and ſow Diſſention amongſt Biſhops by their Temerity and Artifices; but on the other hand, it is "neceſſary for them to defend themſelves in that Place, where they may be confronted by their Ac- "cuſers, and the Witneſſes of their Crimes. Their Cauſe has been examined, Sentence has been pro- "nounced againſt them, and it would be below the Gravity of Biſhops to be juſtly reproached with "being Wavering and Inconſtant. He concludes all with laying open the Method which he uſed with Schiſmaticks, that were deſirous to come back again to the Church. He ſays that he is extreme- ly indulgent to thoſe who acknowledge their Fault, and are heartily concerned for it; that his People complain of his Clemency, and that he rather offends by being too mild than too ſevere, but that at the ſame time he continues inexorable to thoſe that pretend to enter the Church by Menaces and Force. They ought to be perſwaded, ſays he, that the Church ſhall be always ſhut againſt them. He adds, That he was not in the leaſt apprehenſive of their Threats, and that a Biſhop who conforms himſelf to the Rules of the Goſpel, and keeps the Precepts of Jeſus Chriſt, may perhaps be murdered, but can never be overcome. At laſt, he warns and conjures Cornelius to order this Letter to be read to his flouriſhing Clergy that preſided at Rome together with him, that ſo if theſe malicious Reports, that were induſtriouſly ſpread about him, had left any ill Impreſſion, it might be entirely effaced by the Reading of this Letter. It was writ four years after his Election to the Biſhoprick, that is to ſay, in the Year 252.

Biſhop,

S. Cyprian.

(r) About April, in the very ſame year, S. Cyprian, who had been conſulted by Fidus an African Biſhop, upon the occaſion of a Prieſt, whoſe Name was Victor, to whom his own Biſhop Therapius had granted Reconciliation, and upon the Baptiſm of Infants, propoſed theſe Queſtions in a Council of Sixty ſix Biſhops, who were come to Carthage at the Feſtival of Eaſter, according to the Cuſtom. They were ſurprized to hear that Therapius had ſo ſtrangely ſlighted the Authority of a Decree which

(r) About April in the ſame Year.] The Author of the Annals of S. Cyprian, in the Engliſh Edition, believes that this Synod was not held till the end of the Year 253, after the Perſecution of Gallus, and Voluſian was ended: But if it was aſſembled at that time, the Biſhops ought not to have blamed Therapius for giving the Peace to Victor, ſince they themſelves had freely granted it to all People before the Perſecution of Gallus; and indeed ſo far was he from doing any thing againſt the laſt Decree, that he rather ſeems to have put it into Execution; for it is not true that S. Cyprian makes any mention in this Letter of the two Decrees of the preceeding Synods; he only ſpeaks of the firſt, whereby it was ordained that the Peace ſhould not be given to thoſe that had fallen, unleſs they fell into any dangerous Diſeaſe, or in caſe of Extremity. S. Cyprian's Words are theſe, Quæ res ſatis nos movit receſſum eſſe a Decreti noſtri auctoritate, ut ante legitimum & plenum tempus ſatisfactionis, & ſine petitu & conſcientia plebis nulla infirmitate urgente, ac neceſſitate cogente pax ei concederetur. He ſpeaks only of one Decre, Decreti noſtri, and not Decretorum, and he does not diſtinguiſh between two, for infirmitate urgente and neceſſitate cogente ſignifie the ſame thing. And though Terapius the Biſhop had reconciled Victor before the Perſecution, and his Conduct ought for that reaſon to be blamed, yet it could never be doubted after the Perſecution was over, whether this Reconciliation were valid; beſides there is no great probability that Fidus ſhould ever be ſo ill adviſed as to accuſe Therapius for giving Abſolution to Victor long after, and at a Juncture too, when all Biſhops gave it to thoſe that were fallen. 'Tis infinitely more proba-

S. Cyprian. ble that this Council was held after the firſt Council of Carthage, which prohibited the giving Abſolution to thoſe that had fallen, unleſs in caſe of extream Sickneſs, and the ſecond which granted the Peace to all that had fallen. 'Twas likewiſe in this Interval, that the 52 Letter was written, but after this Council, which in all probability was held about Eaſter, in the Year 252. For if Abſolution had beed granted to all the lapſed, the Queſtion of the Biſhops concerning thoſe Perſons who yielded only through the Violence of their Torments, and S. Cyprian's Anſwer had been impertinent; and what is more, it was written three years after the Perſecution of Decius. Therefore this could not happen but at the beginning of the year 253, and conſequently the Synod of Carthage which granted the Peace, was held in the ſame year, and not in 252, as Biſhop Pearſon ſays. Thus if we would be exact in our Chronology, we ought to place the firſt Synod of Carthage about Eaſter, in the year 251, the ſecond at Eaſter 252, which is that of the Sixty ſix Biſhops, and the third at Eaſter in the year 253.

they had Synodically paſſed the Year before; but nevertheleſs, after they had maturely weighed every thing, they were of Opinion that the Reconciliation he had received from his Biſhop was not to be reverſed, and ſo they permitted him to enjoy Lay-Communion, contenting themſelves with Admoniſhing their Collegue, and adviſing him to do ſo no more for the time to come. As for what concerned the Baptiſm of Infants, they declared that it was neceſſary to Baptize them immediately after their Birth, and that there lay no Obligation upon Chriſtians to tarry till the 8th day. S. Cyprian returns this Anſwer to Fidus in his Fifty Eighth Letter.

Soon after, S. Cyprian being conſulted by ſome of his Brethren, who were aſſembled at Thapſus to ordain a Biſhop, about the Caſe of ſome Penitents in the City of Thapſus, who having generouſly confeſſed Jeſus Chriſt, had at laſt yielded to the Violence of their Torments, but had done Penance for it three years afterwards; he anſwers them in the Two and fiftieth Letter, that in his Opinion, they ought by no means to refuſe Pardon to ſuch ſort of Perſons; that their generous Confeſſion ought to attone for the Infirmity of the Fleſh, and that, ſince it had been judged expedient to grant Reconciliation at the Hour of Death, to all thoſe that had fallen, we ought to ſhew greater Indulgence to thoſe who had maintained the Combat a long time, than to thoſe who had yielded merely through Cowardiſe: Nevertheleſs, ſince this was a Queſtion of great importance, he promiſes to propoſe it to the Synod that was to meet about Eaſter.

About this time alſo he writ againſt Fortunatianus, who had been Biſhop of Aſſuri, his Sixty third Letter, directed to Epictetus, who was Elected in his Place, and to the People of that City. This Fortunatianus had the unhappineſs to fall into Idolatry, and was upon that account diveſted of his Biſhoprick: After his Deprivation he laboured earneſtly to re-poſſeſs himſelf of it, and to perform his reſpective Functions as formerly. S. Cyprian condemns theſe Proceedings in this Letter, wherein he demonſtrates how neceſſary a thing Sanctity is to make our Sacrifices acceptable, and adviſes the People not to ſuffer him to exerciſe his Office, but to ſeparate from him, in caſe he continued in his Deſign. Towards the end of this Letter, he exhorts the Penitents that were amongſt them, not to be impatient at the length of their Penance, but to endeavour to ſatisfie God, and to continue knocking at the Gate of the Church: Which Paſſage evidently diſcovers, that it was writ before the Decree of the Council of Carthage, which granted Abſolution to all Penitents.

The Council was held in the Year 253, about the time that the Emperors Gallus and Voluſian diſpatched Letters to all Parts, to oblige the People to Sacrifice to Idols: So that the Chriſtians had reaſon enough to apprehend a general Perſecution. Now to encourage them the more to fight againſt the Enemies of their Faith, the African Biſhops thought it convenient to grant Reconciliation to thoſe who were in a State of Penance ſince their Fall, and having accordingly determined it in this Aſſembly, they writ a Letter to Cornelius, which is the 53d amongſt thoſe of S. Cyprian, to acquaint him with their Decree, and to adviſe him to do the like: They repreſented to him, that though they had reſolved to prolong the Penance of Apoſtates, and not to reconcile them till the Hour of Death, yet ſince they were informed that the Church was going to be perſecuted, they judged it expedient to ſtrengthen the Chriſtians, that ſo they might the better bear the Attacks of their Enemies, and to animate them to the Combat, by giving them the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt, which would inſpire them with Vigor to ſuffer Martyrdom couragiouſly. That if there were any Biſhops who thought themſelves obliged to do otherwiſe, it would certainly lye at their Doors to render an Account to God of ſo ill-timed a Severity; that as for themſelves, they had only done what they owed to Charity, as well as to their own Conſciences, by declaring, that the Time of Perſecution drew near, and not hiding that which God had revealed to his Servants. A little after this Decree, S. Cyprian writ an excellent Letter to the Thibaritans, which is the 55th in Pamelius's Order, wherein he exhorts them in a very vigorous and moving manner, to ſuffer undauntedly for Jeſus Chriſt.

Some time after, S. Cyprian being informed that Cornelius was ſent into Baniſhment with many of the Faithful of Rome, he writ immediately to him to congratulate him upon the account of his Conſtancy, which he had ſo viſibly ſhewn by being the firſt of his Church, that confeſſed the Name of Jeſus Chriſt: He extols his Action, and from thence takes occaſion to triumph over Novatian, ſaying, That the Confeſſion of Cornelius had evidently diſcovered which of thoſe two was the true Biſhop; and that the Conſtancy of thoſe who had fallen away in Decius's Perſecution, ſufficiently proved, that there was good reaſon to reconcile them to the Church. At laſt he exhorts Cornelius to paſs Night and Day with all his People in Faſting, Watching and continual Praying, becauſe the Day of Combat and Triumph was at hand.

It

It was perhaps at this Time, that is to ſay, towards the end of the Reign of Gallus and Voluſian, that the Empire being invaded on all ſides by the Barbarians; and ſeveral Chriſtians happening to be taken Captives by them in Numidia, the Biſhops of that Country contributed to redeem them, and wrote to S. Cyprian, deſiring him to aſſiſt them in that Conjuncture. S. Cyprian.

S. Cyprian intimates to them in the 59th Letter, that he was extremely afflicted at the Misfortune that had befallen his Brethren, that Chriſtians, being all Brothers one to another, ought to be concerned at the Captivity of the Faithful, who were carried away Priſoners, as much as if it were their own Caſe: That their Sufferings ought to repreſent to them the Perſon of Jeſus Chriſt, who made himſelf a Captive to deliver us from the Captivity, wherein we were inthraled: That the extreme Peril of the Virgins, who were conſecrated to God, and had reaſon to apprehend the loſs of their Virginity, was a convincing Motive to haſten their Delivery. He tells them therefore, that he returns them his Thanks, becauſe they were willing to let him have a Share in their Works of Charity, and for giving him a fertile Field to caſt his Seed in, that ſo he might one Day reap a plentiful Harveſt out of it: That all the Chriſtians of his Church had readily and liberally contributed to raiſe a Sum of Mony upon this Occaſion: That he had ſent them this Sum, which amounted to an Hundred thouſand, Seſterces, that is to ſay, the 7500 Livres, to diſtribute it as they ſhould think fit, and together with it the Names of thoſe who had contributed towards it, that ſo they might remember them in their Prayers and Sacrifices.

Lucius, who was Elected Biſhop of Rome, after the Death of Cornelius, being now returned from his Exile, where he had been ſent immediately after his Election; S. Cyprian writ the 57th Letter, wherein he congratulates him at the ſame time, both upon the Score of his Baniſhment and his Return; as he had before writ a Letter to him, to Compliment him for (s) his Election and glorious Confeſſion.

About the ſame time Pupienus, an African Biſhop, giving Credit to the Calumnies which Felicisſimus, and the Enemies of S. Cyprian had publiſhed againſt him, writ him a very diſobliging Letter, wherein he aſſured him, That he could not with a ſafe Conſcience communicate with him, becauſe he did not look upon his Ordination to be lawful; and upon that he accuſes him of Pride, and of being the Occaſion of the Diviſions that were in his Church. S. Cyprian anſwered him in the Sixty eighth Letter, That he wondred extremely how he came to call his Ordination in queſtion, after he had been elected Biſhop of Carthage, by the Conſent of the Clergy and People, that is to ſay by the Judgment of God himſelf, and had exerciſed that Function for the ſpace of ſix years, which ſhews, that this Letter was writ in the Year 254. That it had been approved by all the World, and acknowledged even by the Pagans themſelves; That an infinite Number of Prelates, Martyrs, Confeſſors, and holy Virgins had owned him for their lawful Biſhop; that after this, he deſired Pupienus to judge in his Favour, and to ratifie the judgment of God, and of Jeſus Chriſt; That he had done him wrong in liſtning to ſcandalous Calumnies, and ſuch too as were juſtly puniſhable, againſt his Brother and againſt a Biſhop; That even the Pagans were ſenſible of the Effects of his Humility, and that Pupienus had formerly known him when he communicated with him; That there were no Diviſions in his Church, becauſe all his People lived in a wonderful Union with him; and that thoſe only continued without the Church, who deſerved to be ejected out of it, if they had been within. After this, he exhorts Pupienus to repent of his Raſhneſs and Pride, and promiſes to communicate with him, provided he is ſorry for his Crime, and endeavours truly to ſatisfie God. He tells him, that God had informed him in a Viſion, That whoſoever would not believe in Jeſus Chriſt, when he eſtabliſhed a Biſhop, ſhould believe him againſt his Will, when he came to take Vengeance upon him; That he very well knew, that the World made theſe Viſions and Dreams paſs for ridiculous, ill-grounded Imaginations, but that the ſame thing had been ſaid of Joſeph's Dreams. At laſt, he concludes with theſe Words: You have my Letter, and I have yours; they will both be read on the Day of Judgment, before the Tribunal of Jeſus Chriſt.

Towards the beginning of Pope Stephen's Pontificate, S. Cyprian was conſulted by the Biſhops of France and Spain, about two Affairs of great Conſequence. To give the Reader a ſhort Account of that which related to France, he is to know, That the Hereſie of Novatian having ſpread it ſelf in that Country, Marcianus, Biſhop of Arles, being infected with it, joyned himſelf to Novatian, and brought over ſeveral Perſons to his Party. And becauſe he was not excommunicated by Name, he arrogantly inſulted over his Brethren. Fauſtinus, Biſhop of Lyons, and the other Biſhops of that Province, writ to Stephen and S. Cyprian about it, earneſtly deſiring that they would concur with them in excommunicating Marcianus. Stephen neglecting to ſend them any Anſwer, Fauſtinus writ the Second Time to S. Cyprian about it, (t) who adviſed Stephen in the Sixty ſixth Letter, to ſatisfie the Deſires of the Gallican Biſhops, and diſpatch Letters into Provence, and principally to the Inhabitants of the City of Arles, wherein he ſhould declare Marcian Excommunicated, and give them notice to elect another

(s) His Election and glorious Confeſſion.] The Engliſh Annaliſt ſays, that this Letter was written before the Death of Gallus and Voluſian in 252, becauſe S. Cyprian there ſpeaks of the Perſecution as not being quite over, or at leaſt as being ſtill to be feared: but this does not prove that Lucius returned before their Death, but only that though theſe Emperors were dead, there was reaſon ſtill to apprehend a Perſecution, and he actually ſuffered Martyrdom ſoon after, at the beginning of the Empire of Galienus, or under Emilian.

(t) Who adviſed Stephen in his 66th Letter.] Baronius and ſome others have made uſe of this Letter to advance the Authority of Rome, but with ſmall ſucceſs; for firſt of all S. Cyprian only adviſes Stephen to do what he himſelf might do, and what he had really done. Secondly, The Gallican Biſhops writ to S. Cyprian as well as to Stephen. Thirdly, They addreſſed

S. Cyprian. addreſſed themſelves to them, becauſe Marcianus had alledged in his own Defence, that theſe Biſhops had not excommunicated him. Fourthly, S. Cyprian does not write to him to Cite or Depoſe Marcianus, but only to declare him ſeparated from the Communion, and to adviſe the People of Arles to Elect an other Biſhop, becauſe he was notoriouſly Excommunicated and Depoſed, for joyning himſelf to Novatian, who was then out of the Church. Fifthly, He does by no means ground the Neceſſity of Stephen's writing into France upon his Authority, but only upon a Motive of Charity, whereby Biſhops were obliged to aſſiſt one another, and upon the Unity of the Epiſcopacy. Monſieur Launoy has endeavoured to bring the Truth of this Letter into queſtion, and has propoſed ſome Conjectures to ſhew that it is ſpurious, but they are weak and ill grounded, and ſcarce any body has been induced to embrace his Opinion, becauſe this Letter is really S. Cyprian's Style, which has a peculiar Character, as S. Auſtin well obſerves, by which it may be eaſily known. The firſt Difficulty relates to the time of this Letter, but this is eaſily anſwered, by ſaying that it was written at the end of the Year 255, and that the Quarrel between Stephen and S. Cyprian began not till the Year 256. The ſecond is taken from the Silence of the Ancients, but we ought not to be ſurprized that this particular Fact was not taken notice of, ſince that of Baſilides, and Martialis, which are not queſtioned by Monſieur Launoy, were alſo as much forgotten. Add to this, that S. Auſtin. Lib. 6. de Bapt. contra Donatiſt. Ch. 15. makes mention of a Letter of S. Cyprian to Pope Stephen, which takes no notice of the Queſtion about Baptiſm, and cannot be any other than this. The Third Objection of Monſieur Launoy is, that it is not to be found in ſeveral Manuſcripts, as in that of the Vatican, and above twenty more, according to the Engliſh Edition; but then it is to be found in three ancient ones, as Rigaltius has obſerved, and there are ſeveral Letters of S. Cyprian that are wanting in ſome Manuſcripts. The Principal and Laſt is taken from the Hiſtory of Trophimus, who came not to Arles, of which place he was Biſhop (if we may believe the ancient Author of the Life of S. Saturninus, quoted by Gregory of Tours) till the time of Decius, which is four or five Years before this Letter of S. Cyprian was written, though it appears by this Letter that Marcianus was Biſhop of Arles, and not Trophimus, and the Chriſtian Religion had been a long time eſtabliſhed in that City. This we confeſs to be the greateſt Difficulty, but we may anſwer it by admitting the Epocha of Sulpitius Severus, who tells us, that Trophimus came ſome Years before Decius, and that it is not the Author of the Life of Saturninus, but Gregory of Tours, who upon occaſion of what this Author ſays, that Saturninus was Biſhop of Thoulouſe in the time of Decius, adds ſeven other Biſhops of France, amongſt whom is Trophimus, and it is poſſible that he might reckon ſome who came ſome time before. The fifth Epiſtle of Zozimus, which Queſnellus has defended againſt the Conjectures of Monſieur Launoy, confirms our Opinion, for there it is ſaid: Trophimus being ſent to Arles by the Holy See, was as it were the Spring of all thoſe Rivers that run through the whole Body of France. Which Paſſage ſhews, that it is probable that he came ſome years before the Empire of Decius, though it were a long time after the Times of the Apoſtles, and ſeveral years after the Martyrdom of S. Irenæus.

Biſhop in his Room. He remonſtrates to him, that ſince this Biſhop had joyned himſelf to Novatian, who was notoriouſly excommunicated, there was no neceſſity of having a new Judgment againſt him; that all Biſhops were obliged to take care that Admiſſion into the Church ſhould not be denied to Penitents; that the numerous Body of Biſhops being united to one another, by a Bond of mutual Charity, they were all bound, in caſe any one ſhould make himſelf Chief of an Hereſie, or the Flock of Jeſus Chriſt, which they feed in common, ſhould be attacked or carried away, to come to their Relief, and to re-unite the Sheep of Jeſus Chriſt, like the good Shepherds that truly love their Flock.

The Biſhops of Spain likewiſe had recourſe to S. Cyprian, about an Affair of the ſame Nature, Baſilides and Martialis, one the Biſhop of Leon, the other of Aſtorga, having been publickly proved to have taken Certificates of their having Sacrificed, and convicted of ſeveral other Crimes, were depoſed, and Felix and Sabinus elected in their Places. Baſilides owning his Crime, had voluntarily quitted his Biſhoprick, and was placed in the Rank of Penitents, where he thought himſelf over happy, if he could but communicate as a Laick: Nevertheleſs, theſe two Biſhops being afterwards puſhed on by their Ambition and Envy, uſed their utmoſt Endeavours to regain their Sees; and finding they could not compaſs their Deſigns there, they went to Rome, not to demand their re-eſtabliſhment from Stephen, but only that he would be pleaſed to admit them to his Communion, which they ſaid would be very ſerviceable to them to procure their Re-eſtabliſhment. They acted their Parts ſo dexterouſly, that Stephen granted them what they requeſted; ſo upon this they went back to Spain, where they became more inſolent than ever, and would by all means re-poſſeſs themſelves of their Sees by Force. The Clergy and People of Spain writ to S. Cyprian about it, and deputed Felix and Sabinus, who were ordained Biſhops in the Room of theſe two Apoſtates, to go to him, to know what they were to do in this Exigence. But Felix, Biſhop of Saragoſſa, whom S. Cyprian calls a great Defender of the Faith, writ to him likewiſe in particular. The Saint judging this to be an Action of no ſmall Importance, read the Letters ſent him from Spain, in a Synod of the African Biſhops, who, after they had diligently examined the Matter, came to this Reſolution, That the Depoſition of Baſilides and Martialis ought to ſtand good, as well as the Ordination of Felix and Sabinus in their Place. They writ a Synodical Letter concerning it to the Clergy and People of Leon and Aſtorga, which is placed the 67th, amongſt thoſe of S. Cyprian, and ſent them word, that they had no reaſon to ſuffer Baſilides and Martialis to re-enter upon their Epiſcopal Functions, after they had been found guilty of ſuch enormous Crimes, and Baſilides himſelf had acknowledged ſo much; that ſince the People had Power to elect good Biſhops, and to reject the bad, they would appear culpable before God, if they communicated any longer with them; That the Ordination of Felix and Sabinus was lawful, ſince it was made with the Conſent of the People by the Neighbouring Biſhops; That it ought not to be reverſed, though Baſilides had ſurprized Stephen, who, by reaſon of his great diſtance from the Place, could could not exactly inform himself of the Truth of Affairs; that this Conduct was so far from effacing their Crimes, that on the other hand it augmented their Guilt, because though Stephen was in some sort excusable for suffering himself to be deceived merely out of Negligence; yet we ought to have a Detestation for those Persons, who had so maliciously imposed upon his Easiness; That they extremely commended their Faith and Zeal, and desired them to maintain a Correspondence no more with Bishops of such a profligate Character, who were notorious for so many Crimes. S. Cyprian.

(u) The same Year another Synod of Bishops was held in Carthage, who being consulted by Januarius, and the rest of the Numidian Bishops about the Baptism of Hereticks, returned them this Answer, that it was necessary to re-baptize all those who had been Baptized by Hereticks, according to the ancient Regulation made by Agrippinus in Africk.

S. Cyprian writ the same Year to one Quintus, a Bishop, who had ordered the same Question to be put to him by Lucian the Priest. This Letter is the 71st, as Pamelius has ranged them. He assures him, that some of his Brethren were of a different Opinion from him in this Affair, who pretended that it was the ancient Custom before Agrippinus, not to re-baptize Hereticks after they had been once admitted into the Church. To weaken the Authority of this pretended Custom, he lays it down for an undoubted Truth, that we are not to be determined by any Customs of that Nature, but to examine whether they will bear the Test of Reason; That S. Peter, in his Dispute with S. Paul upon the Business of Circumcision, did not treat that Apostle with Arrogance and Pride; That he never alledged his Primacy, or told him that the new Disciples of Jesus Christ, as S. Paul was, who had likewise been a Persecutor of the Church, ought blindly to obey him, and not to question his Decisions, but gave him the Hearing, and humbly received the Counsel of Truth which S. Paul gave him, and readily submitted to the powerful Reasons of that Apostle, teaching us by that Behaviour to be Peaceable and Patient, and not to espouse our own Opinions with Heat and Obstinacy, but to embrace the advices of our Brethren, whenever they are useful and agreeable to Truth.

Some time after this, S. Cyprian assembled at Carthage a Council of Seventy one Bishops, as well of the Province of Africk as Numidia, who confirmed all that had been determined by the preceding Synod, concerning the Baptism of Hereticks, and decreed, that all Priests and Deacons who were ordained amongst them, or who, after having been some time of their Party, returned to the Church, should be received only in the Quality of Laicks: And after this, to maintain that Honour and Friendship which Bishops owed to one another, they acquainted Pope Stephen with these Constitutions, by a Synodical Letter, which is the Seventy second amongst those of S. Cyprian in Pamelius's Order, and towards the end of it represented to him, that since the things they had ordained were conformable to the Christian Religion, and to Truth, they hoped he would make no difficulty to approve them; That nevertheless they knew there were some Bishops in the World, who could be hardly perswaded to change their Opinions, and yet though they kept up their own particular Customs, would never break the Laws of Peace and Charity; that after the same manner they would not pretend to prescribe Laws, or constrain any Persons, since they were satisfied that every Bishop was free to behave himself, as he saw expedient in the Administration of his own Church, for which he was accountable to God alone.

About the same time likewise, S. Cyprian immediately after this Council, writ a long Letter to Jubaianus a Bishop, who had also consulted him about this Question, wherein he urges abundance of Reasons, and Texts of Scripture to support his own Opinion; and after he has answered the Objections that were brought against it, concludes with this new Protestation, that he had not the least Design to impose Laws upon any of his Collegues, or to fall out with them upon this Occasion, but inviolably to preserve Faith and Charity, the Dignity of the Priesthood, and Concord with his Brethren. Stephen having answered S. Cyprian very roughly, Pompey Bishop of Sabra, a Maritime City of Africk, desired him to let him know what Stephen had writ to him. So he sent him a Copy of the Letter, with another of his own, wherein he bestows a particular Answer upon the Pope's Letter, which is the Seventy third, as Pamelius has placed them. In it he principally opposes the Truth of the Gospel, and the first Traditions of the Apostles, both to the Custom and Tradition which Pope Stephen had alledged for himself. He sent likewise by Rogatianus the Deacon, another Copy of Stephen's Letter to Firmilian Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, and to the other Bishops, giving them an Account of what had been determined in Africk upon this Question, and desiring them to acquaint him with the Opinion of their respective Churches. He could not have expected a more favourable Answer than what he received from Firmilian, for that Bishop openly condemns, and that in Terms severe enough, the procedure of Stephen; extols S. Cyprian's Conduct, declares himself entirely in favour of the last, proves it by several Reasons, and assures him it was the ancient Custom of the Asiatick Churches; and that it had been regulated many Years before in two numerous Synods held at

(u) In the same Year another Synod of Bishops was held.] This Synod must of necessity have been assembled in the Year 255, as what followed sufficiently shews. It is different from that which was held upon the account of Basilides and Martialis, at least the Names that are to be seen at the Head of two Synodical Letters, are different. Hence it follows, that there must have been more than one held that very Year, and we are not to wonder at it, because it was the Custom of the Africans to hold two every Year, one in the Spring, and the other in Autumn. This might be assembled in the Month of September, in the Year 255, the next in the Spring 256, and the last in the Month of September in the same Year.

Synnada and Iconium. This Letter of Firmilian, which is the 74th among those of S. Cyprian, (x) was written in Autumn in the Year 256.

S. Cyprian.

Before this Letter came to S. Cyprian's hands, he writ to Magnus, who had asked his Opinion about the Baptism of the Novatians, whether these Hereticks were to be excepted out of the Number of those who were to be re-baptized, since they owned the same Faith as the Catholicks did in relation to the Trinity, and Baptized after the same manner. He answers him, I say (y) in the Seventy fifth Letter, that they ought to be re-baptized as well as the rest, forasmuch as there was no true Baptism out of the Church. In this Letter he answers another Question, proposed to him by Magnus, concerning the Baptism of Clinicks, that is to say, of those that were Baptized in their Sickness, that there was no reason to doubt of the Validity of this Baptism; That the Sacrament was equally efficacious, whether the Person was plunged in the Water, or had it sprinkled upon him. He concludes with repeating his usual Protestation, that he would give Laws to none, but leave them an entire Liberty of doing what they thought convenient, and that every one must give an account of his Conduct to GOD alone.

Thus we have given an exact Account of all the Letters extant in S. Cyprian's Works, that treat of the Baptism of Hereticks. To these we ought to add the Acts of the last Council of Carthage, consisting of Eighty seven Bishops, who assembled there the same Year in the Month of September. In the first place, the Letters of Jubaianus to S. Cyprian, and those of S. Cyprian to that Bishop, were read in the Council. After that S. Cyprian proposed to all the Bishops that were present, to deliver their Opinions freely, but yet so as not to condemn or excommunicate those that were of a different Judgment. "For none of us, says he, ought to make himself a Bishop of Bishops, or pretend to awe "his Brethren by a Tyrannical Fear, because every Bishop is at liberty to do as he pleases, and can no "more be judged by another, than he can judge others himself. But all of us ought to wait and "tarry for the Judgment of Jesus Christ, who alone has Authority to set us over the Church, and "to judge our Actions. After this Proposition the Bishops gave their Opinions, and concluded all in Favour of S. Cyprian.

The Persecution of Valerian, that was raised against the Church in the Year 257, put an end to the Controversie about the Baptism of Hereticks. This Emperor, who was pushed on by Marcianus, a professed Enemy to the Christians, and a great Protector of the Ægyptian Superstitions, declared himself against the Christians, and published an Edict against them in July that very Year, whereby he prohibited them to meet in the Cœmeteries, or any where else upon Pain of Death. Pope Stephen having been found in a Cœmetery, contrary to the Emperor's Prohibition, suffered Martyrdom for it on the Twentieth of August the same Year, and (z) Xystus was Elected in his Place.

On the 30th day of the same Month, S. Cyprian generously confessed the Christian Faith before Paternus, the Proconsul, and was banished to Curubis. At the same time the Præfect of Numidia condemned several Christians to the Mines, and among the rest many Bishops and Priests of his Province, after he had put some of them to Death, and order'd others to be scourg'd. S. Cyprian from the Place of his Exile, sent them a Letter, which according as Pamelius has distributed them is the 76th, and is the first of the 4th Part of S. Cyprian's Letters. In it, with wonderful Eloquence he heightens the Glory of their Confession, and encourages them to suffer with Constancy. He comforts them in their difficulties, and principally the Priests that were not able to offer Sacrifice in those Places, by representing to them that they themselves continually offer'd up their own Bodies as living Sacrifices to the Lord. He excites them at last to use more fervency in their Prayers, that so God may give Grace to all the Confessors, to finish their Course couragiously, in order to be crowned with everlasting Glory. He sent this Letter to three different Places, where these Holy Confessors were dispersed, and remitted some Mony to them to supply their present Extremities. It appears by the Answers they made him, what Consolation and Joy this Letter gave them in the midst of their Sufferings. These Answers are the 77th, 78th, and 79th Letters, written from three several Places, in which they return him their Thanks for his great Charity and Kindness in a simple and unaffected Style, and assure him, that this Letter had raised their declining Spirits, heal'd their Wounds, and rendred their pressures more light, and supportable to them.

(x) It was written in the Autumn, in the Year 256.] We are told in this Letter, that it was written about Twenty two years after the Empire of Alexander, who died in the year 235, and that it was composed in haste, because Rogatianus was obliged to return by reason of the approaching Winter. It could not be written in 257, because S. Cyprian was banished at the end of that Year.

(y) In the 75*th Letter.*] The English Annalist thinks that this is the first Letter which was written concerning the Question of Baptism, because it does not plainly and openly make mention of the Synods that were held in Africk upon that Occasion. It appears more probable to me, that it was written afterwards, because it supposes the general Question to be decided, and the Author clearly speaks of some of his Collegues that received the Baptism of Hereticks. He says he knew no reason why Christians should take the Part, if he might so say, of Antichrists, which induces me to believe, that it was written after his Quarrel with Stephen; besides, it is more natural to imagine, that this Question, which regards the Exception of the general Rule, was made after the Decision. For Magnus proposes it to him as a new difficulty. You demand of me, says he, whether those that come from Novatian's Party, are to be baptized as well as other Hereticks.

(z) S. Zystus was Elected in his Place.] This Persecution lasted forty two Months, according to S. Denis of Alexandria, and Valerian was taken by the Persians in 251, so it began about July 257.

The

The 80th Letter which is directed to the Confessors in Prison, was rather writ in his first Exile, than in this, as we have observed after the Author of the English Edition. The 81st was writ at the beginning of the year 258, after the Death of Pope Xystus, and the return of S. Cyprian. It is addressed to one Successus, a Bishop, and in it he sends him word, That he was informed by some Letters he had received from Rome, that Valerian had directed a Rescript to the Senate, by which he ordered all Bishops, Priests, and Deacons to be put to Death without delay, and that the Senators, the Roman Knights, and all other Persons of Quality, who were Christians, should be deprived of their Offices and Estates, and that if they continued, after this Edict, to make Profession of the Christian Religion, they should be condemned to Die; That the Ladies should not only forfeit all their Fortunes, but be Banished, and that those of Cæsar's Houshold should be sent to Prison. He adds, that this Emperor had dispatched Letters to the Governours of Provinces, wherein he enjoyn'd them to Punish the Christians with all Rigour and Severity, who daily expected to see these Orders put in Execution against them; That Pope Xystus had suffered Martyrdom on the sixth day of August, and one Quartus along with him; That the Præfects of the City of Rome were very violent against the Christians, causing some of them to be executed every day, and that they confiscated the Goods of all those that were presented before them. In fine, he desires this Bishop to communicate the news to the rest of his Brethren, that all Christians might prepare themselves the better for the Combat. S. Cyprian.

The last Letter of S. Cyprian is that which he writ a little before his Martyrdom, when he withdrew from his Gardens where he was ordered to Reside, because he received information, that the Proconsul had sent some Soldiers to carry him away to the City of Utica, and he was not willing to suffer Martyrdom in a place distant from his own Church and People. But lest this retirement should be interpreted to proceed from a fearful degenerous Spirit, he acquainted his Clergy and People with the reasons that moved him to preserve himself; and at the same time conjures them not to raise disturbances, but to preserve Peace and Unity, and that no body should be permitted to present himself of his own accord to the Gentiles, since it was sufficient to speak courageously when they were apprehended by them.

Besides these Letters of S. Cyprian, the time of whose writing we know, there are five others that respect some points of Discipline, and have no certain Date. The Author of the English Edition has placed four of them at the head of all the Letters, and affirms that they were written by S. Cyprian, before his first Banishment in the Year 246. The first, which is the Sixty Sixth in Pamelius's Order, is directed to the Clergy and People of Furni, and is writ againg one Geminius Victor, who by his Will had nominated a Priest called Geminius Faustinus to be Guardian to one of his Relations. He sends them word, That both himself and his Collegues were extreamly surprized when they were informed of it, because it had been prohibited long before by a Council of Bishops to name any Clergyman in a Will to be a Guardian or Executor, since those that were honoured with the Priesthood, and had undertaken the Office of Clerks, ought only to serve at the Altar, and the Holy Sacrifices, and should not take any other employment than that of Praying to the Lord. He shews them that for this very reason the Laity supplied them from time to time, with all things necessary for Life, as in the time of the Old Testament they paid Tithes to the Levites and Priests. He concludes, that since Victor had violated a Constitution made some time ago by a Council, they ought not to Pray for him after his Death, or suffer his Memory to be honoured in the Prayers of the Church.

The second, which is the Sixty first in Pamelius's Order, was writ upon the occasion of an Actor upon the Stage, who after he had turned Christian, continued to follow his Profession. S. Cyprian tells Eucratius, who had consulted him to know whether he should let him stay in the Church, that it was below the Divine Majesty, the Evangelical Discipline, and the honour of the Church, to permit a Man that exercised so infamous a Profession to be in her Communion; That if the Law forbid Men to put on Female Habits, it certainly forbad them much more to Personate the Gestures and Postures of Women, and to represent unseemly and lascivious Actions; That though this Actor had forborn to appear on the Stage himself, yet he was no less Criminal in teaching his scandalous Art to others: That if he pretended in his own excuse that he was Indigent, and had no other way left to maintain himself, he should be relieved as the other Poor belonging to the Church were, provided he would be content with that little Subsistence the Church allowed him, and did not believe, that this was given him by way of recompence for sinning no more, since he alone reaped the benefit of it.

The third, which is the Sixty fifth in Pamelius's Order, was writ to Rogatianus, against one of his Deacons, who forgetting the respect he owed to his own Bishop, had treated him after an undutiful manner. S. Cyprian and his Brethren, to whom this Bishop had writ about the Matter, answered him that he might have punished him immediately for his Boldness, if he had been so pleased, and that his writing to him about it was only an Effect of his Humility. They enlarge upon the Respect and Obedience that is due to Bishops, affirming, that the Original of all Schisms and Heresies proceeded from the Contempt that was shewn to them. At last they advised this Bishop, in case his Deacon still continued to provoke him with new Injuries, to make use of his Episcopal Authority, and to Excommunicate him, together with the other who had joyned himself with him; hoping nevertheless that he would give him full Satisfaction, Because, say they, we had rather overcome the Evils we receive, by Patience, than revenge our selves by the Sacerdotal Power.

The Fourth Letter, which is the Sixty second in Pamelius's Edition, was writ in the Name of a Councel to Pomponius a Bishop, who had consulted S. Cyprian's Advice about some Virgins, who having made a Resolution to keep their Virginity, had been too familiar with some Persons, and particularly with a Deacon. He commends this Bishop for depriving the Deacon, and the rest that had lived with them, of the Communion. As for what concern'd the Caſe of the Virgins, it was ordained, that thoſe who had loſt their Virginity ſhould do publick Penance for their Crimes a conſiderable time, as being Adultereſſes in reſpect of Jeſus Chriſt their Spouſe, and that if they would not quit the Company of thoſe Perſons, with whom they had maintained this Criminal Correſpondence, they ſhould be for ever turned out of the Church, without hopes of Pardon and Salvation, ſince it is impoſſible to be ſaved out of the boſom of the Church. And then as for thoſe who had not loſt their Virginity, he judged it expedient to admit them to the Communion of the Church, but with this warning, That if they ſtill continued to live in the ſame Houſe with thoſe Perſons, they ſhould be puniſhed after a more ſevere manner, and muſt no more expect to be pardoned ſo eaſily. Thus I have briefly run over theſe four Letters, which the Author of the Annals of S. Cyprian has placed at the head of his Engliſh Edition, and pretends to have been written before any of the reſt; becauſe S. Cyprian (yz) makes no mention of any Perſecution either preſent or paſt in them, as he does in almoſt all the reſt. [The Reader ought to conſult Mr. Dodwell's Learned Diſſertation upon this Letter to Pomponius, wherein he will ſee what gave occaſion to thoſe Virgins to live in ſo Scandalous a manner with the Deacons, fully explained.]

There remains nothing now but the 63 Letter, which the Author of the Annals in the Engliſh Edition, (aa) affirms to have been written in the year 253, in the time of the Perſecution under Gallus and Voluſian. It is addreſſed to Cæcilius and condemns the Error, or rather the Abuſe of ſome Prieſts, who offered only Water in the Holy Sacrifice of the Maſs. He confronts this ill Cuſtom, which was introduced in ſome places, with the example and precept of Jeſus Chriſt, and ſhews that we ought to offer in the Chalice nothing but Wine mingled with Water. He ſpeaks of this after ſuch a manner as may encline us to believe that it was abſolutely neceſſary in his Opinion to mingle Water with the Wine, for he tells us, that as the Body of Jeſus Chriſt could not be only of Meal unleſs it were tempered with Water, ſo likewiſe the Blood of Jeſus Chriſt could not be of Wine alone, if it is not mingled with Water. But beſides that, in the Explication of theſe Words, we may underſtand them of the Body of Jeſus Chriſt taken in a Myſtical Senſe, we ought not to wonder that the Fathers ſpeak often thus of Cuſtoms eſtabliſhed in their own time when they are Ancient; ſuch as this is, which came from the example of Jeſus Chriſt, and the Tradition of the Apoſtles; we are not at all to wonder, I ſay, if they ſpeak of them as of neceſſary things, without ſcrupulouſly examining whether they are of abſolute neceſſity, taking them in the rigorous ſenſe. He obſerves in this Letter, that they uſed in his time to Celebrate the Sacrifice of the Maſs in the Morning; and that Baptiſm was a neceſſary preparation for the Euchariſt. He ſpeaks of this Sacrament in ſuch terms, as plainly ſhews, that he believed it really contained the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt; and yet he lays down ſeveral Myſtical Reaſons to explain why they made uſe of Bread, and Wine mingled with Water. He tells us, that Jeſus Chriſt is figuratively repreſented by the Wine, and that the Water which is mingled with it ſignifies the Union of the People with Jeſus Chriſt. Upon theſe grounds it is that he ſays, that if we offered pure Wine, the Body of Jeſus Chriſt would be without us; and that if we offered only Water, we ſhould be without Jeſus Chriſt; and laſtly, That as ſeveral grains of Corn ground and kneaded together make one Loaf, ſo after the ſame manner we are one and the ſame Body in Jeſus Chriſt, who is that Cæleſtial Bread. [See here the Power of Prejudice! The extract which M. Du Pin has given of this Letter, demonſtrates that S. Cyprian underſtood the Inſtitution of the Euchariſt to be only Myſtical; Cæcilius deſired to know what S. Cyprian thought of a Cuſtom newly taken up of uſing Water alone in the Morning when they adminiſtred the Lords Supper; it was in dangerous times, when by their Breaths the Chriſtians might have been diſcovered, if they ſhould have drank Wine ſo Early: This Innovation of theirs does not ſeem to have proceeded from a wilful Contempt of the command of Chriſt, but from the Notions they had always been inſtructed in, concerning the Euchariſt. They believed that the Lord's Supper was only a commemorative Sacrifice; and ſo they thought the Death of Jeſus Chriſt could equally be remembred by Water in a Morning, as by Water and Wine together in an Afternoon. The Queſtion then is, whether if S. Cyprian had believed that Jeſus Chriſt was Corporeally preſent in the Sacrament, he would have uſed ſuch Myſtical Arguments to perſwade them to break off ſo unwarrantable a practice. He ought according to Roman Catholick Principles to have confuted their Error by a right Explication of the Nature of the Euchariſt: He ought to have ſhewed them that it was not a Myſtical but a Real Sacrifice, and that Jeſus Chriſt is literally offered up in that Sacrament as he was upon the Croſs; and eſpecially he ought to have told them, that Water could not have ſerved inſtead of Wine, becauſe upon Conſecration it could not have been Tranſubſtantiated into the Blood of Chriſt, and ſo by conſequence it had been no true Sacrament for want of that real Preſence, ſince Jeſus Chriſt had never given his Miniſters a Power to turn any thing beſides Wine into his Blood, upon Pronouncing the words of the Inſtitution. Whereas here S. Cyprian owns the Euchariſt to have been a Myſtical Sacrifice, and gives this as a principal Reaſon why Water alone without Wine is ineffectual, becauſe there was a poſitive Inſtitution from which the Church had no Warrant to recede.

(yz) St. Cyprian.] The Principle Reaſon is, becauſe he does not ſpeak of any Perſecution in his Letters, though this reaſon is not abſolutely convincing.

(aa) Pretends to have been written in the Year 253.] Becauſe it appears that S. Cyprian was then a Biſhop. Cum mediocritatem noſtram ſemper humili & verecunda moderatione teneamus: Beſides that, there he ſpeaks of the Perſecution, and ſays, that this was the cauſe why ſome of the Faithful abſtained from offering Wine. [This rather, as I intimated above, was the true Reaſon of this Innovation.]

This

This is further confirmed by his ſecundary Arguments; In the firſt place he ſays there muſt be Wine, Quia non poteſt videri Sanguis ejus, quo redempti & vivificati ſumus, eſſe in Calice; quando Vinum deſit Calici, quo Chriſti ſanguis oſtenditur: Becauſe, ſays he, his Blood by which we are redeemed and quickned cannot ſeem to be in the Cup, if the Wine that repreſents the Blood of Chriſt be not in the Cup. If S. Cyprian had believed Tranſubſtantiation he ought to have ſaid, That the Blood of Chriſt is not in the Cup, unleſs Wine had been put into it. But he ſays, It cannot ſeem to be there, i. e. cannot be Typically repreſented by Water, ſo well as by Wine. This is no force upon his Words; becauſe he afterwards brings ſeveral Texts out of the Old Teſtament to prove that the Blood of Chriſt was repreſented by Wine, and not by Water, and that Baptiſm only was typified by Water by the Prophets. This Reaſoning does not agree with modern Gloſſes; no Man ever ſearches for a myſtical Reaſon when he can give a plain one. Wine after Conſecration is not a Figure of Chriſt's Blood, but the Blood it ſelf, according to the Church of Rome. And it is improper to ſay, that the Blood of Jeſus Chriſt could not ſeem to be in the Cup if the Wine did not repreſent it, if the Wine were believed to be the real Blood: To be, and to be Repreſented are very different things. And though S. Cyprian calls the Euchariſt a Sacrifice, yet ſince he deſcribes it as a Commemorative one, by which we are Myſtically united to Jeſus Chriſt, by Faith in him, it is impoſſible to gather from thence, that he believed any other Preſence of the Body and Blood of Chriſt in the Sacrament, than that which is taught by the Church of England.] S. Cyprian.

Hitherto we have not been willing to interrupt the order of the Letters, by mingling them with his other Books, according to the Series of the time they were written in, becauſe we could not poſſibly have made an Abridgment of them without breaking the Continuation of the Letters, but nothing hinders us now from doing it: We ſhall carefully ſet down the years wherein they were compoſed, and this will be full as well for the Chronology of them, as if we had introduced them among the Letters.

It is probable that S. Cyprian's firſt Book, I mean after his addreſs to Donatus, is, (bb) That ſmall Treatiſe, Intituled, The Vanity of Idols, wherein he refuſed the Pagan Religion which he had lately quitted. This Treatiſe may be divided into three Parts. In the firſt, he proves that the Deities of the Heathens are not true Gods; in the ſecond, he ſhews that there is only one God; And laſtly, in the Third, he ſhews that Jeſus Chriſt is the word of God, who was ſent to bring Salvation to Men. The two firſt parts are almoſt word for word taken out of Minutius Felix, and the laſt out of Tertullian.

(cc) The firſt Books of the Teſtimonies to Quirinus were alſo in all probability writ by S. Cyprian before he was Biſhop, when he wholly employed himſelf in Reading and Studying the Holy Scriptures. Theſe Books are a Collection of ſeveral Texts out of the Bible, and principally the Old Teſtament upon different Matters. In the firſt Book he cites thoſe paſſages that prove, that the Jewiſh Law was to be only for a time; that it ought to be Aboliſhed, and the Jews to be rejected; That Jeſus Chriſt, was to come to eſtabliſh a New Temple, and New Sacrifices, a New Prieſthood, and a New Church; That the Gentiles ought to believe in him, and through his means to obtain Remiſſion of their Sins. In the ſecond he urges thoſe places that concern the Myſtery of the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, and particularly thoſe that ſhew that Jeſus Chriſt is the Wiſdom and Word of God, who took our Nature upon him, to redeem Mankind, with the Prophecies wherein it is foretold that he was to be born of the Race of David in the City of Bethlehem; That his firſt coming was to be without Glory; That the Jews were to Crucifie him; That he ſhould riſe the Third Day, and come at laſt to Judge the World. (dd) The third Book was Compoſed after theſe, upon a quite different Subject.

It is a Collection of ſeveral Teſtimonies, taken as well out of the Old as the New Teſtament, containing many Precepts of Morality, that either have a relation to Chriſtian Virtues, ſuch as are the Fear and Love of God, Patience under Sufferings, Martyrdom, and Virginity; or that diſſuade from Vices, ſuch as Anger, Evil Speaking, Pride, the ſuperfluous Ornaments of Women, and the inordinate (bb) A ſmall Treatiſe intituled of the vanity of Idols.] This Book is cited by S. Jerome. Epiſt. 84. ad Magnum. Cyprianus, quod Idola Dii non ſunt, qua brevitate, qua hiſtoriarum omnium ſcientia, quo verborum & ſenſuum ſplendore perſtrinxit. It is probable that it was written in the year 247.

(cc) The firſt Books of the Teſtimonies to Qurinus.] Theſe Books are not only cited by Bede, and by Gennadius, but alſo by S. Jerome, adverſ. Pelag. and by S. Auſtin, lib. contra duas Epiſt. Pelag. c. 8. & 10. who teſtifies that Pelagius the Heretick had made a Collection of ſeveral Teſtimonies out of the Scripture, to imitate, or rather to compleat the Work of S. Cyprian. S. Jerome cites the third Book. He and S. Auſtin have drawn ſome paſſages out of it, ſo that though they are not to be found in ſeveral Manuſcripts, yet we are not in the leaſt to doubt of them. Quirinus, to whom this Work is addreſſed, was in all probability a Neophyte, when it was written to him; for S. Cyprian calls him his Son, and tells him in his Preface, that he ſent him theſe Teſtimonies to give him the firſt Tincture of the Faith, and that he preſented him with a little Water drawn out of the Divine Fountains, which he might make uſe of till he could go to drink of them himſelf at the Spring-Head.

(dd) Has been Compoſed ſince theſe.] In the Preface of the firſt Book he only ſpeaks of two Books, and the third is not to be found in ſome ancient Editions: but it is cited, as we have obſerved by S. Jerome and S. Auſtin, Retract. lib. 2. c. 1. adverſ. Pelag. c. 9. de Prædeſtin. Sanct. c. 3. and 'tis properly ſpeaking, a work by it ſelf: For the two firſt were written to inſtruct Quirinus in the firſt grounds of the Chriſtian Faith, and the deſign of this is to teach him the precepts of Morality. Some few Texts of Scripture may have been ſince added to it, which follow the Vulgar Latin. This Treatiſe might perhaps be written in the year 249.

love of Riches: Or Laſtly, thoſe that lay down the manner how Chriſtians ought to behave themſelves towards their Superiours; ſo that we may juſtly ſay of this Treatiſe, that it is a very uſeful Collection of all the Morality in the Holy Scriptures.

S. Cyprian.

The Book of the Diſcipline, or the Conduct and Apparel of Virgins ſeems to be the firſt Work that S. Cyprian compoſed, (ee) after he was ordained Biſhop. The Deſign of it is to inſtruct the Virgins, with the care of whom he was intruſted, to preſerve in their Habits, and the whole tenour of their Life a truly Chriſtian Modeſty. He begins with recommending Diſcipline, that is to ſay, a good conduct; as being the Guardian of Hope, the Anchor of Faith, and the Guide to the way of Salvation. He ſhews by ſeveral Texts of Scripture that it is of great neceſſity; and afterwards addreſſing himſelf to the Virgins, and extolling their Condition, he exhorts them to maintain this Diſcipline with the greateſt of exactneſs, as having more need of it than any Perſons beſides. He convinces them, that Chriſtian Continence can by no means ſuit with profane Ornaments; that their Wealth did not excuſe this Vanity of Dreſſing; that God gave 'em Riches not to throw away upon idle Superfluities, but to employ them to good uſes, to feed and relieve the Poor; that a great Fortune, unleſs employed after this manner, does only become a great Temptation; that although theſe Ornaments that Virgins made uſe of, did not of themſelves deſtroy them, yet they ought to abſtain from them, ſince they had proved the ruin of others, by drawing the Eyes of young Men after them, and by that means kindling the fire of Love in their Hearts; that rich attire and care in Dreſſing only became Proſtitutes, and that the Scripture always ſpeaks of them after this manner; that they abuſed the works of God to ſet themſelves out, and that they diſfigured the Image he made by the Painting and Curling, and abundance of other Ornaments. After this he adviſes the Virgins, carefully to avoid all thoſe things that might injure their Chaſtity, and ſeverely reprehends thoſe who were not aſhamed to go to publick Baths, though they did it without entertaining the leaſt ill deſign. In ſhort, after having given theſe Inſtructions to the Virgins, he takes occaſion to ſpeak of the great advantages of Virginity, and he tells them it was the neareſt State to that of Martyrdom; that Virgins avoid the Curſe pronounced againſt the firſt Woman; that they are equal to the Angels; that Virginity is not of abſolute neceſſity, but that it is a great deal more excellent than any other Condition. At laſt he concludes with deſiring the Virgins to remember him when they ſhould receive the Recompence of their Virginity. Tantum mementote tunc noſtri, cum incipiet in vobis Virginitas honorari: Words which make it appear that in S. Cyprian's time they believed that the Saints interceded for us before God.

The Treatiſe concerning thoſe that had fallen away in the time of Perſecution, and that of the Unity of the Church were compoſed in the year 251, immediatly after the Perſecution of Decius. This laſt was writ upon the occaſion of the Schiſm of the Novatians and the Faction of Feliciſſimus; and the firſt was writ againſt thoſe of the Faction of Feliciſſimus that raſhly granted the Grace of Reconciliation to all that had fallen into the Perſecution. He Read both theſe Books in an African Council held that very year, and afterwards ſent them to Rome, as he teſtifies in his Fiftieth Letter according to Pamelius's Order.

In his Treatiſe concerning thoſe who had fallen away during the Perſecution, he begins with giving Thanks to God that Peace was reſtored to the Church, and makes an honourable Elogium of the Holy Martyrs and Confeſſors. He deplores the lamentable Fall of thoſe Perſons that had Apoſtatized, and obſerves that GOD never permits a Perſecution but to puniſh the Corruptions and Vices of the Chriſtians. He deteſts the crime of thoſe who had preſented themſelves before the Magiſtrates to deny the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and carried their Children to the Altars of their Gods to make them, if it were poſſible, partakers of their Crimes, and cauſe them to loſe, as one may ſay, the Grace of Baptiſm. He obſerves that a Love for the World, and an Inclination to Earthly Things occaſioned the Fall of greateſt part of thoſe Perſons who had Apoſtatized, and even hindered them from flying to avoid the Perſecution: He affirms that the fault of thoſe who were overcome by the extremity of their Torments was a great deal more excuſable; but that thoſe who had fallen away merely out of fear of Suffering, before they ever did ſuffer, could alledge nothing in their own defence. After he has ſhewn the greatneſs of the crime of theſe Apoſtates, he paſſes to the Remedies, and greatly blames thoſe that admitted them to a raſh and over haſty Reconciliation. He maintains that a Prieſt of GOD ought by no means to deceive Chriſtians by a pernicious Complaiſance, but to heal them with wholeſome Remedies, herein imitating a skilful Chirurgeon, who makes deep Inciſions that ſo he may perfectly heal up the Wound, and never harkens to the Complaints and Crys of his Patient, who will certainly thank him for it as ſoon as he is healed; that the liberty ſome Perſons had aſſumed to themſelves to grant Reconciliation unadviſedly to thoſe that had fallen, was a new calamity that ſucceeded the Perſecution; that this falſe Peace was pernicious, as well to thoſe that gave it as fatal to thoſe (ee) After he was Ordained Biſhop.] He was then a Biſhop, for he ſpeaks to them, as having Authority over them, and calls himſelf their Father. Pontius inſinuates, That it was not compoſed till after his Retirement; for, to prove that S. Cyprian's Retirement was of great advantage to the Church, becauſe of the Books he wrote, during his Solitude, he places the Book about the Conduct of Virgins in this number. Who is it, ſays he, who has taught the Virgins to preſerve Diſcipline, to wear modeſt Apparel, agreeable to their Condition? But Pontius in this place enumerates the works of S Cyprian, like a Rhetorician, ſince the firſt he mentions is the Epiſtle to Donatus, which was certainly written before his Confinement, and in all appearance the Luxury of Women, the uſe of frequenting Baths, and the other Irregularities he reprehends in that Treatiſe, better agree with a time wherein the Church had long enjoy'd Peace. Be it as it will, Pontius always places the Book of the Conduct of Virgins firſt.

that received it; that a Sinner ought to have time sufficient to expiate his Sin by a true and lawful satisfaction; that it was abominable Sacriledge to approach the Holy of Holys, and to receive the body of Jesus Christ, while their hands were still polluted with sacrificing to Idols, and had scarce digested the meats offered to false Gods; that this in effect is to drink the Cup of the Lord, and the Cup of Devils, to eat at the Table of the Lord, and at that of the Devil, and to offer violence, as one may say, to the body and blood of Jesus Christ; that they deceive themselves who think that the Reconciliation which is given them before they have expiated their Crime by a publick Penance, and purified their Conscience by Sacrifice and Imposition of Hands from the Bishop, is a true Reconciliation; that is rather a War, a new Persecution, a new Temptation, whereof the Enemy makes use to consummate the destruction of those that fell, by taking away from them the Spirit of Repentance; that they ought not to flatter themselves because they were absolved by the Martyrs, since Jesus Christ only can pardon Sins; that the Merits and Works of the Martyrs can indeed do much, but that only for the day of Judgment, and that it is downright rashness to believe that they can without distinction grant Remission of Sins to all the World, against the express command of Jesus Christ; that if what the Martyrs ordain is just and lawful, it ought to be granted at their request; but if what they demand is against the Law of GOD, and the Gospel, it is not reasonable that it should be granted; besides, that it is not to be presumed that those who are Martyrs for the Gospel, would attempt any thing in derogation to it. After this to strike terrour into those who had fallen, he relates several Examples of Persons, whom God had severely punished for being so bold as to receive the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ after their Apostacy. Then he addresses himself to those who had taken Certificates from the Magistrates, which testified that they had sacrificed, tho' they had really done no such thing, and advises them not to flatter themselves, as if there was no necessity of repenting, since to confess that one has committed a crime, is effectually the same thing as to commit it, and that this Declaration was a solemn renouncing of the Christian Religion; that tho' this crime did not appear very shameful in the Eyes of Men, yet it was heinous before God, who knows the most secret motions and inclinations of our hearts. At last he mightily extolls the Piety of those who had neither offered Sacrifice, nor taken Certificates. However, since they had a desire to do it, he exhorts them to confess themselves largely and with sorrow before the Priests of GOD, discovering the Secrets of their Conscience, to quiet their Consciences, and to search out a remedy for their Wounds, tho' they appeared to be slight and insignificant; and he persuades those that were conscious to themselves of this fault, not to be ashamed of discovering it, and to do Penance for it, that so they may obtain Pardon. He concludes all with an exhortation to Sinners, to renounce the Pleasures and Vanities of the World, and to satisfie the Divine Justice by a long and sincere Repentance. S. Cyprian.

(ff) In his Treaty of The Unity of the Church he begins with advising all Christians to joyn Prudence to Simplicity, and to take diligent care to keep themselves from the secret Attacks of the Devil, as Heresies and Schisms, whereby he draws Christians, before they are aware, to separate themselves from the Unity of the Church. After this, he demonstrates, by several Reasons, That the Church of Jesus Christ is essentially One, and that there cannot be more. He tells us, That for a visible mark of this Unity, Jesus Christ had built his Church upon S. Peter; and that he gave the Power of his Keys only to him, tho', after his Resurrection, he gave equal Power and Authority to all his Apostles; that as the Church is One, so there is One only Episcopacy, a part whereof every Pastor truly and really possesses; that such as are out of this Church, have no Salvation to hope for; that a Man may be killed indeed out of the Church, but that he could not be crown'd unless he were actually in the Church; that Schism and Heresie are the most enormous Crimes a Man can be guilty of, which God has always punished with the greatest Severity; that the example of a few Confessors ought not to stagger or scandalize any one; for besides that, we are not to imitate them in the faults they may commit; there was still a very great number of them that continued stedfast in the Unity of the Church. At last, he exhorts all Christians whatsoever, to return to it again, to promote Union by their joynt endeavours, and to have no manner of Commerce with Schismaticks.

[In the Account which our Author gives of this Discourse of S. Cyprian, he seems not to be so fair as he is at other times. He says from S. Cyprian, That for a visible mark of this Unity of the Church, Jesus Christ had built his Church upon S. Peter, and gave the Power of the Keys only to him; tho', after his Resurrection he gave equal Power and Authority to all his Apostles. S. Cyprian's words are these, Loquitur Dominus ad Petrum, ego tibi dico, inquit, quia tu es Petrus, & super istam Petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam, & portæ inferorum non vincent eam, &c. & iterum eidem post Resurrectionem suam dicit, Pasce oves meas. Super unum ædificat Ecclesiam suam. Et quamvis Apostolis omnibus, parem potestatem tribuat, & dicat, si cui remiseritis peccata, remittentur illi: Si cui tenueritis, tenebuntur: tamen ut unitatem manifestaret, unitatis ejusdem originem, ab uno incipientem sua auctoritate disposuit. Hoc erant utique & cæteri Apostoli, quod fuit Petrus, pari consortio præditi & Honoris & Potestatis, sed exordium ab unitate proficiscitur, ut Ecclesia una monstretur. 'The Lord said unto Peter, I say unto thee, says he, that 'thou art Peter, and upon that Rock I will build my Church, and the Gates of Hell shall not prevail 'against it, &c. And again, after his Resurrection, he says to the same S. Peter, 'Feed my Sheep. He builds 'his Church upon one. And tho' he gives equal Power to all the Apostles, and tells them, whose Sins

(ff) In the Treatise of the Church.] Pontius mentions this Treatise. It is cited by S. Austin in his second Book, Contra Crescon. and by Facundus, lib. 1. cap. 16. under the name of the Treatise of Unity; and in some ancient Editions, it is Entituled, A Treatise of the Simplicity of Pastors.

ye

S. Cyprian. 'ye retain, they ſhall be retained, and whoſe Sins ye forgive, ſhall be forgiven; yet that he might 'make that Unity manifeſt, he ordered by his own Authority, that the Original of that very Unity 'ſhould begin from one. For the other Apoſtles were the ſame as he, equally Partners of Honour 'and Power, but the beginning ſprings from Unity, that the Church may be ſhew'd to be but one.

Here is no diſtinction made of different Powers granted before and after the Reſurrection. S. Cyprian ſeems to have deſigned to obviate this Objection; and leſt any Man ſhould think, that any Primacy, except that of being named firſt was intended, he ſays, that the other Apoſtles were S. Peter's equals, both in Honour and Power. But this Paſſage has had foul dealing ſhew'd to it long ago; Manutius publiſhed it at Rome with Interpolations in his Edition in 1563. Rigaltius was aſhamed of it, and ſo Printed it in his Notes faithfully. The wonder is, how Mr. Du Pin ſhould ſay, That Jeſus Chriſt gave the Power of the Keys to S. Peter only, when he had the Oxon Edition before him, and all the other Editions that preceded Manutius's of which he has given us a Catalogue. One ſees the Reaſon now, why he deſires afterwards that ſome Catholick Divine (as he calls them) would Reprint S. Cyprian, and Illuſtrate him with Catholick Commentaries. This is the Reaſon why the Oxon Edition could not ſatisfie him: Biſhop Fell's Notes are too candid and ſincere for any one of that Communion; ſo that tho' he could not omit ſpeaking honourably of it, leſt his judgment ſhould have been queſtioned, yet the want of Catholick Commentaries was ſo very deplorable a thing, that he thought by this ſly inſinuation to depreciate ſo valuable an Edition of ſo great a Father: For S. Cyprian alone cannot be put into all Mens hands without danger; and it is an unanſwerable Argument how little Antiquity favours their Cauſe, when the Father who wrote more and more earneſtly for Catholick Unity, and the ſupport of Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline againſt Schiſmaticks, and Diſturbers of the Peace of the Church, than any Man before the Council of Nice, cannot be brought to ſpeak as they would have him, without uſing the moſt palpable miſrepreſentation, and the moſt unjuſt dealing that can be ſhewn to the Writings of any Author whatever.]

The Treatiſe about the Lord's Prayer immediately follows that of the Unity of the Church, in Pontius the Deacon's Catalogue, and it is probable, that it was compoſed ſoon after, towards the beginning of the Year 252. In this Book he highly recommends Amity and Concord, which ſhews, that he writ it ſoon after the former, when he had his Head full of the ſame thoughts, and at a juncture when it was neceſſary to inforce them the ſecond time on the World. We may divide it into ſeven Parts: In the firſt, he demonſtrates, that the Lord's Prayer is the moſt excellent and efficacious Prayer, ſince Jeſus Chriſt himſelf compoſed it for our uſe. In the ſecond, he ſets down Rules how we ought to Pray, and tells us we muſt do it with a World of Reverence and Modeſty; that the tone of our voice ought not to be high; that when Chriſtians aſſemble together to celebrate Divine Sacrifices with the Biſhop, it is convenient that they ſhould remember to be moderate, and not to make a confuſed noiſe with their Voice, becauſe it is not the Voice, but the Heart which is to be elevated to Heaven; that we muſt pray with great Humility, which he confirms by the example of Hannah, the Mother of Samuel, and of the Publican mentioned in the Goſpel. In the third part, he inſtructs us what things we are to Pray for; and taking occaſion to explain the Lord's Prayer, he obſerves in the firſt place, that we do not ſay, My Father, but Our Father, becauſe the Prayer of every Chriſtian is a common Prayer, who does not pray for himſelf alone, but for the whole Congregation of the Faithful, which make up but one body; that we invoke God by the name of Father, becauſe we are made his Children by Baptiſm; that we beſeech him that his name may be ſanctified in us, that is to ſay, we pray him to ſanctifie and purifie us continually to the end of our Life; that the Kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt, which we expect, is the recompence we hope to receive in the other Life, at the day of Judgment; that when we pray to God that his Will may be done, our meaning is not, that he would do whatever pleaſes him, but that he would work in us what he would have us to do, that is to ſay, that he would make us accompliſh his Will, which no body is able to do by his own ſtrength alone, without the aſſiſtance of God's Mercy; that this Will of God, which we are required to fulfil, is no other than what Jeſus Chriſt has done and taught, that is to ſay, Humility, Stedfaſtneſs in the Faith, Prudence, Juſtice, Mercy, a good Deportment, to do wrong to none, to preſerve Peace with our Brethren, to love God with all our Heart, and to prefer nothing before Jeſus Chriſt, ſince he himſelf preferred nothing before us; that when we pray that this Will may be done in Earth as it is in Heaven, we mean (according to his Explication) in our Body, and in our Mind, or rather in the Unbelievers as well as the Believers. After this he ſays, that the daily Bread we pray for in the Lord's Prayer, may be underſtood either of Spiritual or Corporeal Bread; that the Spiritual Bread we beg for is the Body of Jeſus Chriſt in the Euchariſt, which the Chriſtians who are truly devoted to Jeſus Chriſt deſire to receive, daily fearing to be ſeparated from it by ſome great Sin; that if we underſtood it of Corporeal Bread, the meaning is, that we are not to beg of God what is neceſſary for our Suſtenance every day, unleſs we carry our deſires farther: That in praying to God that he would Forgive us our Treſpaſſes, we acknowledge that we Treſpaſs continually, and impoſe upon our ſelves at the ſame time a Law not to obtain remiſſion, but only upon condition, that we forgive our Brethren the Treſpaſſes they have committed againſt us: When we deſire of God that he would not permit us to fall into Temptation, we intimate, that our Enemy has no Power over us, if God does not give him leave to tempt us, and that he never gives him leave but for two Reaſons, either to puniſh us for our Sins, or elſe to try us: That the Lord's Prayer concludes at laſt with a Petition, which is a ſort of an Abridgment of all the reſt; for when we beſeech God to deliver us from all Evil by his Almighty Power, nothing more remains for us to ask.

In

In the fourth part he tells us, that Jesus Christ has instructed us to pray as well by his Example as by his Words; and since he who was without Sin pray'd often, certainly we who are Sinners are to pray continually. In the fifth, he recommends vigilancy and attention in our Devotions, exhorting us to think upon nothing but only him to whom we address our selves, and to banish all carnal Thoughts out of our Hearts. To impress the greater Authority upon this Exhortation, he takes notice of the Prayer which the Priest repeated at that time, when he celebrated the Eucharist, saying, Sursum corda, Lift up your Hearts, and observes, that the People answer'd, We lift them up to the Lord. S. Cyprian.

In the sixth part, he advises all Christians not to content themselves with vain barren Prayers, but to joyn Alms-giving, and other Actions of Piety to them. And lastly, in the seventh part, he discourses of the time of Prayer, after he has taken notice, what are the most solemn hours to Pray in. He concludes with affirming, that Christians ought to Pray to God at all times; and since the serious performance of these duties will procure for them one day, everlasting Happiness, they ought, even now, to begin to thank God. This Treatise of S. Cyprian was so highly approved by S. Austin, that he recommended it to the Monks of Adrumetum, to whom he addressed his Book about Grace and Free-will, to read it over carefully, and to learn it by Heart; and he observes, that this Saint speaks after such a manner in this Treatise, as shews, that he was perswaded we ought to pray to God to give us his Grace to perform what he commands us to do in his Law. And indeed, amongst all the Treatises that were composed in the first Ages of the Church, perhaps there is not one that ascribes so much to the Grace of Jesus Christ as this does, or contains more formal Passages to prove the efficacy and necessity of it.

The Exhortation to Martyrdom, directed to Fortunatianus, at a time when the Christians expected the Persecution of Gallus and Volusian, was writ in the Year 253. 'Tis a Collection of Texts of Scripture, to excite all Christians to confess the Name of Jesus Christ Courageously, and to suffer Martyrdom for the Truth. In the first Chapter he cites those places, that discover the vanity of Idols. In the second, those that shew, that we must only Worship God. In the third, those that mention the severe Punishments wherewith God threatens to visit those that Sacrifice to Idols. In the fourth and fifth, those that declare, that God will not easily pardon Idolatry, but punishes those with Death who counsel others to adore Idols. In the sixth, he urges those Texts that may induce us to consider, that since we have been redeemed and enlivened by Jesus Christ, we ought not to prefer any thing before him, since he himself prefer'd nothing before us. In the seventh, those that represent to us, that since we have once escaped the Snares of the Devil, and the Ambushes of the World, we ought to take heed that we fall into them no more, but make the best use of that delivery. In the eighth, those that recommend Perseverance in the Faith, and all other Virtues. In the ninth, those that shew, that Persecutions and Afflictions are sent only to try us. In the tenth, those that give us Consolation, and teach us not to be afraid, since God is more powerful to Protect us, than the Devil to Overcome us. In the eleventh, those that prove, that it was foretold, that the World would hate us, and stir up Persecutions against us; and that good Men always suffered. In the last, there is a Collection of Texts to encourage Christians to suffer Martyrdom, out of hopes of finding a sufficient recompence in Heaven. Here is an Abridgment of this Treatise made by St. Cyprian himself, which he sent at the end of his Letter to Fortunatianus, to whom he Dedicates this Book. He observes in this Letter, that it is the duty of the Bishop to train and exercise those Soldiers, whom Jesus Christ has committed to his Charge; and that Observations drawn out of the Holy Scripture, are the best Arms he can give them.

The Treatise of Mortality was composed (gg) upon occasion of a certain Pestilence that afflicted the Roman Empire, but principally Africk, the Year after the Death of Gallus and Volusian. He shews in his Treatise, that Christians ought not to be afraid of Sickness or Calamities, but that they rather ought to wish for them, since they furnish them with an opportunity to exercise their Patience, and to merit the Rewards of Heaven; that they ought not to fear Death, but rather to desire it, since it delivers them from all the miseries of this Life, and unites them to Jesus Christ for ever; that we ought not to be surprized, that the Pestilence seizes Christians as well as Pagans, since all the miseries of the Flesh are equally common to both, nay, that a Christian ought to suffer more than the other; that the difference that ought to be between him, and one that does not know God, is, that the latter complains and suffers his Evils with impatience, whereas a Christian shews his Faith at such a juncture, by being not afraid of Death, and his Vertue in bearing every thing patiently, and his Charity in helping his Neighbour; that though the Good dye as well as the Bad, yet their end is very different, because the Good after their Death, are sent into a place of Refreshment, whereas the Wicked are thrown headlong into a place where they are Tormented for ever; that the first dye to be put into a better state of security, and the last to be more severely punished: That Sicknesses prepare us for Martyrdom, and make us Martyrs of Jesus Christ; that for this reason we ought not to be afflicted, because they deprive us of the glory of Confession, since not to mention, that it does not depend upon our selves to be Martyrs, and that it is the Grace of God to let us dye with a Will of suffering Martyrdom, God will crown us as if we had really suffered it: That it would be to no

(gg) Upon the occasion of the Infection.] It had its rise in Arabia, then spread it self in Ægypt and Africa, from whence it passed into all the West. It was an Epidemical Distemper, a great deal worse than a common Pestilence. It began under the Empire of Gallus and Volusian, and lasted several Years; it raged with twice the violence, under the Empire of Gallienus, as we have already observed. This Treatise was written in the Year 253, or 254.

S. Cyprian. purpoſe to beg of God, that his Kingdom may come, if the Captivity wherein we are does ſtill pleaſe us: That we ought not to bewail thoſe of our Brethren, whom God has taken to himſelf, ſince we have not loſt them, and they have only gone a Journey before us, which we are all to make one time or another: That we do in ſome ſort diſtruſt the promiſes of Jeſus Chriſt, if we concern and afflict our ſelves at the Death of our Neighbours and Friends, as if they were no more, and that we ought rather to rejoyce that they are paſſed into a better Life, and enjoy a ſtate of repoſe and tranquility that will never end. At laſt he exhorts all Chriſtians heartily to wiſh for the happy day of their Death, which will free them from the exile of this Life, and give them admiſſion into the Kingdom of Heaven, which is their Country, where they will be everlaſtingly in the Company of the Saints, and with Jeſus Chriſt.

His Treatiſe to Demetrianus (hh) a Judge in Africa, was likewiſe compoſed during the rage of this Peſtilence, immediately after (ii) the Death of Gallus and Voluſian. He there refutes a Calumny, which the Pagans frequently formed againſt the Chriſtians for being the cauſe of thoſe Wars, Famines, Plagues, and other Calamities that waſted the Roman Empire. He ſhews, that thoſe misfortunes that daily happen in the World, which grows old every day, ought to be rather attributed to the Crimes and Impiety of Men; and that the Chriſtians were ſo far from being the occaſion of them, becauſe they did not adore falſe Gods, that the Pagans rather drew down all theſe heavy Viſitations upon Mankind, becauſe they did not worſhip the true God, and Perſecuted thoſe that Worſhip'd him: That all this was the immediate hand of God, who to revenge himſelf for the contempt they ſhew'd of him, and of thoſe that ſerved him, puniſhed Men after this rigorous manner, and made them feel the weight of his diſpleaſure: That the Gods of the Pagans were ſo far from being able to exerciſe this Revenge, that they were fettered and ill uſed, as I may ſay, by the Chriſtians, who ejected them by force out of the Bodies of thoſe Perſons, whom they had poſſeſt: That the Chriſtians ſuffered patiently, as being aſſured that their Cauſe would be ſoon revenged, that they endured the ſame Evils which the Pagans did in this World, but that they comforted themſelves, becauſe after their Death they ſhould poſſeſs everlaſting Joy, whereas the Pagans at the day of Judgment would be condemned to everlaſting Torments. He exhorts them at laſt, with great zeal and ardour, to quit their Errors, and to repent of them while they are in a condition to do it; becauſe after this Life is once over, there is no room for Repentance, and afterwards the Satisfaction is uſeleſs, ſince it is here upon Earth, that every Man renders himſelf worthy or unworthy of everlaſting Salvation: That neither Age nor Sins ought to hinder any one from ſuffering himſelf to be Converted, ſince, as long as we are in this World, there is ſtill time for us to Repent, the Gate of the Divine Mercy being never ſhut to thoſe that diligently ſearch the Truth. Though you were, ſays he, at the point of Death, if you pray'd to have your Sins forgiven, and implored the goodneſs of God, you would obtain remiſſion of your Crimes, and paſs from Death to Immortality. Jeſus Chriſt has procured this favour for us by conquering and triumphing over Death on the Croſs, by redeeming thoſe that Believe with the price of his Blood, by reconciling Man to God, and communicating a new Life to him by a celeſtial Birth. Let us follow them all if it is poſſible, and receive this Sacrament, and his Sign, &c

It is probable, that the (kk) Treatiſe of Mercy and Alms-giving was writ when S. Cyprian gathered conſiderable Alms to redeem the Chriſtians, who had been taken Priſoners by the Barbarians, towards the Year 253. He demonſtrates in this Book, by ſeveral Authorities of Scripture, and many Convincing Reaſons, the neceſſity of giving Alms; he refutes the frivolous excuſes, and vain pretences uſed by Rich Men to avoid the doing ſuch acts of Charity; and obſerves, that in his time every one brought a Loaf at the Celebration of the Euchariſt, [which was always once a day, in the Morning before it was Light, and often at Night after Supper.]

S. Cyprian tells us himſelf, in his Letter to Jubaianus, that he compoſed his Book of Patience, upon the occaſion of a Queſtion concerning the reiteration of the Baptiſm of Hereticks, to ſhew that we ought to preſerve Charity and Patience in all Diſputes with our Brethren. So this Treatiſe was compoſed, at the beginning of the Year 256, and S. Cyprian (ll) ſent it as ſoon as it was finiſhed to one Jubaianus a Biſhop, together with the Letter which he writ to him. In it he exhorts Chriſtians to Patience, by the Example of Jeſus Chriſt, and the Saints as well of the Old as the New Teſtament.

(mm) The Book of Envy was writ a little after that of Patience. In it he diſſwades Chriſtians from that Vice, which is the occaſion of all Miſchief, and exhorts them to the practice of Charity and Chriſtian Humility.

(bb) After the Death of Gallus and Voluſian.] This Treatiſe was written during the Plague, to ſhew that the Chriſtians were not the cauſe of it. He there ſpeaks of the late Fall of Kings, which is to be underſtood of the Death of Gallus and Voluſian, who were killed by their Soldiers.

(ii) Judge] It has been commonly believed, that he was Proconſul: But the Author of the Engliſh Edition has very well obſerved, that S. Cyprian does not ſpeak to him as to a Proconſul; and that what he ſays of him, viz. that he often came to him to diſpute with him, and that he drew ſeveral Perſons over to his Party, is by no means ſuitable to the Character of a Sovereign Magiſtrate of Africk.

(kk) The Treatiſe of the Works of Mercy and Alms-giving.] This Treatiſe is cited by Pontius, by S. Jerome, Ep. ad Pamm. by S. Auſtin, contr. Jul. contr. Pelagianos & alibi

(ll) He ſent to Jubaianus a Biſhop.] Ep. ad Jub. Teneatur a nobis patienter, & firmiter Charitas animi, Collegii honor, vinculum fidei, & concordia ſacerdotii; propter hoc etiam libellum de bono patientiæ, quantum valuit noſtra mediocritas, permittente Domino, & inſpirante conſcripſimus, quem ad te pro multa dilectione tranſmiſimus. Pontius mentions it, S. Jerome cites it, adverſ. Lucif. and S. Auſtin in ſeveral places.

(mm) The Book of Envy was writ ſome time after that of Patience.] It was written after the Book of Patience, becauſe when he writ to Jubaianus, he ſent him only the Treatiſe of Patience. It is cited by Pontius, by S. Jerome, in Epiſt. ad Gal. c. 5. and by S. Auſtin in many places.

Hitherto

Hitherto we have only mentioned thoſe Works that unqueſtionably belong to S. Cyprian, I ſhall now ſpeak a few Words of thoſe that are falſly attributed to him, which are put by themſelves in S. Cyprian. Rigaltius's and the Engliſh Edition. There is a great number of theſe Books, ſome of which are really uſeful and ancient, tho' we don't know their Authors, ſome carry the Names of their Authors at preſent, and ſome are of a later date, and deſervedly deſpiſed.

In the number of the firſt, we muſt place the following Treatiſes. That againſt publick Shews, the Books of Chaſtity, and the Homily againſt Novatian, all which Works ſeem to proceed from one Author; and (n) might be attributed to S. Cyprian, if it were not for the difference that is ſo viſible between the Style of this Father, and that of theſe three Books.

The Treatiſe or (o) Homily againſt Gameſters, is yet more different from S. Cyprian's Stile than any of the former, being an intricate confuſed Book, and abounding with barbarous Words. The Scriptures are cited there after another manner than they are in S. Cyprian; and the Author mentions a Book, Intituled, The Doctrin or Doctrins of the Apoſtles, which, in all probability was compoſed ſince S. Cyprian's time.

The Book of the Cœlibacy of the Clergy is extreamly uſeful: In it he proves, that Churchmen ought not to live with Women; ſome have attributed it to S. Cyprian upon the Faith of ſome MSS. others to S. Auſtin, others to S. Jerom, and laſtly others to Gaudentius Brixienſis. However, it is certain, that it was never writ by S. Cyprian, as the difference of Style, and (p) the barbarous Words, ſufficiently witneſs. Nor is it a Tranſlation out of Origen, but the Work of ſome Latin Author: In ſhort, it is neither (q) written in the Style of S. Jerom nor Origen.

The Author of the Engliſh Edition ſuppoſes that this Treatiſe was writ in the time of Venerable Bede, when the famous Queſtion of the Cœlibacy of Churchmen was ſo warmly diſcuſſed in the Weſt: But this is only a bare Conjecture, ſupported by no ſolid Reaſon; ſo that we can ſay nothing poſitive concerning the Author of this Work.

The Book of the Twelve Abuſes of the Age, which is likewiſe attributed to S. Auſtin, was neither written by that Father, nor by S. Cyprian; for, beſides that, it has not the leaſt reſemblance of their Style or manner of Writing, the Scripture is always cited there, after S. Jerom's Verſion. Pamelius has aſcribed it to one Erardus, whoſe Name he found in the Margin of this Treatiſe in a MSS. of S. Auſtin. Others again beſtow'd it upon S. Patrick Biſhop of Ireland, and ſome upon S. John Climacus.

To theſe Treatiſes we muſt join an Oration in praiſe of Martyrdom, and another about double Martyrdom, both which were compoſed by ſome Author who is not very ancient for his Diverſion. The firſt is penn'd in an elaborate affected Style; and it ſeems probable, that the Perſon that made it, only tried how he could make an Harangue in form. He begins with an Exordium, as if he delivered it before an Aſſembly; the Periods are carefully wrought, his Thoughts are odd and uncommon, and the whole Turn is extreamly Stiff. The Oration about double Martyrdom is writ after a more negligent way by ſome young Author, who had a mind to imitate S. Cyprian's Style. Gravius imagined that Eraſmus was the Author of this Cheat; but in all probability, ſo able a Man as he was, would have carried on the Impoſture better than it is managed in this Book: For though the Author pretends that he writ it 240 Years after Jeſus Chriſt; yet he makes no ſcruple of telling us, that the Chriſtian Religion was farther extended than the Empire. He ſpeaks of the Perſecution under Diocleſian, and Maximin or Maximian, of a War againſt the Turks, and makes mention of Monks and their Practices: And theſe are the Books falſly attributed to S. Cyprian, which may be of ſome uſe, whoſe Authors are not known.

The Treatiſe of the Cardinal, or principal Works of Jeſus Chriſt, which was attributed to S. Cyprian, though it does not reſemble his Style, has been reſtored upon the Faith of ſeveral Manuſcripts, to Arnoldus Bonævallis, a Friend of S. Bernard's, who addreſſed it to Pope Adrian IV. and who compoſed ſome other Treatiſes beſides this, in the very ſame Style, viz. one concerning the Sayings of Jeſus Chriſt, another upon the Creſs, the Work of the Six Days, and the Praiſes of the Virgin, all which are Printed in the Bibliotheca Patrum; and laſtly, a Treatiſe of Meditations, which was never Printed before, but has been added in the Engliſh Edition of S. Cyprian, to all the other Works of the ſame Author.

The Explication of the Apoſtles Creed belongs undoubtedly to Ruffinus. The Treatiſe of the Baptiſm of Hereticks, Publiſhed by Rigaltius, but directly contrary to S. Cyprian's Opinion in the matter, was writ by an ancient Writer who lived before S. Auſtin's time, and perhaps was a Contemporary of S. Cyprian.

The other Treatiſes attributed to S. Cyprian are not only ſpurious, but are full of nothing elſe but Impertinencies and Errors. The firſt is a Treatiſe of the Mountains of Sion and Sinai, writ by ſome body who was wholly beſotted with the dreaming Enthuſiaſms of the Rabbines and Caballiſts. The Supper is a ridiculous impertinent Book. The Revelation of John Baptiſt's Head is a fabulous Story, writ after the time of S. Athanaſius, S. Cyril, Theodoſius, the Vandals, the Chronicle of Marcellinus and Pipin, whom it mentions. His Preface attributed to Celſus, upon the diſpute of Papiſcus and Jaſon ad-

(n) Might be attributed to S. Cyprian.] I ſay it might be, for beſides the difference of Style, which is obvious to every Eye, they are not attributed to S. Cyprian in the Manuſcripts, but only in the Printed Books.

(o) The Treatiſe againſt Gameſters.] It was writ by ſome Biſhop, but we are not to conclude, that it was by a Biſhop of Rome, becauſe he calls himſelf the Vicar of Jeſus Chriſt, for anciently that Name was given to all Biſhops.

(p) Barbarous Words. Such as Repulſorium, Conſtitutionarios, Vulgaritatis, Flumirorum, Probroſitatis, Participiis, Adunari, Vanificat, Egeſtoſam, Procurativa, Abſentarii, Conjugaliter.

(q) In ſhort, it is neither writ in the Style of S. Jerom, nor Origen.] That which has given occaſion to attribute it to Origen, is, becauſe the Author ſeems not to condemn a Man's making himſelf an Eunuch; but Origen was at laſt of a contrary Opinion, and repented of his Action. There is only one Manuſcript in the King's Library, that attributes it to Origen; as ſome Modern Authors think, after Vincentius Bellovacenſis: But it rather reſembles the Style of Gaudentius Brixenſis, were it not, that in no Manuſcripts or Printed Editions it is ever attributed to him.

S. Cyprian. dreſſed to Vigilius, and the Treatiſe againſt the Jews, are two Books, wherein there is nothing regular or ſolid. The two Treatiſes directed to the Martyrs, and the Confeſſion or Repentance of S. Cyprian the Martyr, are Books which the Modern Greeks have attributed to the Martyr Cyprian, who perhaps is the Biſhop of Carthage, whoſe Life they have amplified.

The Secrets and Prayers of S. Cyprian, are Treatiſes full of Superſtition and Impiety. There remains nothing behind but (r) a Calendar upon Eaſter, Printed under S. Cyprian's Name in the Engliſh Edition. 'Tis the Work of an ancient Author, but the Stile is wholly different from that of S. Cyprian. I ſay nothing of the Poems that are attributed to him, becauſe they go likewiſe under Tertullian's Name, and I ſpoke of them when I gave an Account of that Author. [A Man muſt have a very nice taſte of Styles, that can throw away a Book that is almoſt all Calculation, from any Author to whom it is attributed, if he has no other Reaſon to reject it.]

S. Cyprian is the firſt of the Chriſtian Authors, that was truly Eloquent, as Lactantius has obſerved; and we may ſay, that there has been never another ſince him, * if we except Lactantius, who was Maſter of ſo much true, and noble, and genuine Eloquence. He profeſſed Rhetorick with mighty Reputation, before he was Converted to Chriſtianity; and what he writ afterwards is admirable in its kind. For as Lactantius adds, 'He had an eaſie, fertile, agreeable Invention; and what is more, a Spirit of 'Perſpicuity reigns throughout all his Works, which is one of the beſt Qualities belonging to any Diſ-'courſe. He has a great deal of Ornament in his Narration, an eaſie Turn in his Expreſſions, and Force 'and Vigour in his Reaſonings, in ſuch a manner that he had all the three Talents required in an Ora-'tor, which are to pleaſe, to teach, and to perſuade; and it is not eaſie to ſay which of theſe three 'he poſſeſſes in the moſt eminent degree. As S. Jerom ſaid, that his Diſcourſe reſembled a Fountain of pure Water, having a ſweet and gentle Stream, ſo we may ſay, that it does likewiſe very often reſemble an impetuous Torrent, that carries away with it every thing it meets, ſince he was capable of raiſing what Paſſions he pleaſed, and of perſuading us to do whatever he had a mind to. Whether he gives Conſolation, or whether he exhorts or diſſuades, he does it with ſo much force, that one cannot poſſibly avoid being ſenſibly comforted or encouraged, or deterred by what he ſays. His Eloquence is natural, and far removed from the Style of a Declamer. There is no inſipid mean Railery, no common Proverbs; in ſhort, nothing that has the tincture of ordinary Literature in his Writings, but the Chriſtian and the Biſhop ſpeak all along: A Man may ſee that his Tongue ſpoke out of the abundance of his Heart, and that as he had ſearched into the deepeſt Chriſtian Truths, ſo he expreſſed them nobly and generouſly: Though we muſt at the ſame time own, that after all his endeavours to ſpeak as diſtinctly and purely as was poſſible, there is ſomething of the African Genius in him; and he could not forbear now and then to intermix (ſ) ſome harſh Terms. So difficult a matter it is to vanquiſh Nature, or to abſtain from thoſe words we daily hear from thoſe with whom we converſe.

* This can only be underſtood of the Latins.

His ſtudying and reading of Tertullian, whom he looked upon to be his Maſter, might in ſome meaſure contribute to corrupt his Style: But then on the other hand we muſt acknowledge, that it furniſhed him with ſome Advantages, and that he has borrowed ſeveral Thoughts out of him, which he ſets off and beautifies, though he was Religiouſly careful to avoid all his Faults and Errors. For, at the bottom, the Characters of theſe two Authors are exceeding different. Tertullian is harſh and obſcure; S. Cyprian is polite and clear; Tertullian is hot and fiery; S. Cyprian, though he does not want all neceſſary force upon occaſion that requires it, is ſoft and gentle: Tertullian reproaches his Adverſaries, and inſults over them in a bitter railing manner; S. Cyprian is infinitely more moderate, and if he is obliged at any time to ſpeak ſome Truths that diſpleaſe them, he takes care to ſoften them by the agreeableneſs of his Narration: Tertullian vents abundance of falſe Reaſons, and teaches ſeveral Errors; on the contrary, S. Cyprian argues almoſt every where with a World of Juſtice and Solidity, and is exempt, I mean, not only from groſs Errors, but even from thoſe of ſmall conſequence, commonly found in the Fathers of the Three firſt Centuries: He ſays nothing concerning the Myſteries of the Trinity, or the Incarnation, that carries any difficulty with it, or ſtands in need of an Explication. He rejects the Error of the Millenaries, and that of the State of the Soul before the Day of Judgment. He is the firſt that ſpoke clearly of Original Sin and the Neceſſity of the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt. He plainly diſtinguiſhes between Baptiſm and Impoſition of Hands, as two different Sacraments. He ſpeaks of the Euchariſt as of a Sacrament, wherein the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt is received, and which requires great Purity and great Preparation to be worthily received. He eſtabliſhes the matter of this Sacrament, but he urges the neceſſity of mingling Water with the Wine, with too much heat. He is the firſt that talked largely of Penance, and of the Power of the Prieſthood to bind and unbind. He zealouſly demonſtrates how neceſſary it is towards Salvation, to be within the Church: He diſcourſes

(r) A Calendar of Eaſter.] It has been cited under S. Cyprian's Name, by Paulus Diaconus. The Scripture is cited there according to the Verſion made uſe of by S. Cyprian, but there are ſome words in it that have nothing of the Purity of S. Cyprian, and the Turn of the Phraſe is wholly different. To diſcover the Truth of this, we need only ſet down the very firſt Period. Multo quidem, non modico tempore anxii ſumus & æſtuantes, non in ſæcularibus, ſed in ſanctis & divinis ſcripturis quærentes invenire, quidnam ſit primum diei, non menſis, in quo menſe præſcriptum eſt Judæis in Egypto XIV. Luna comedere Paſcha. Cyprian would never have uſed ſuch a Turn as this is to expreſs his Thoughts. This Author tells us, That Jeſus Chriſt celebrated the Paſſover five times, and died the ſixth, in the 16th Year of Tiberius, after he had Preached for the ſpace of a Year only. This Syſtem is ancient.

(ſ) Some harſh Terms.] Such as exambire, remiſſa, ſanctificari, magnanimitas, mortalitas, confundi, abſtinere to excommunicate, Dominicum, &c. Words which are not Latin. He has likewiſe ſome harſh Turns; as for Example, he uſes the Pronouns, ſe, ſui, inſtead of iſte, iſtic for hic, quando for cum, quamdiu for donec, imo for potius. He has alſo ſome Alluſions and Antitheſes proper to the Africans.

very very advantageously of the Bishop of Rome, and looks upon the Bishop of that See to be the Superintendent of the first Church in the World. But then he was of Opinion, that he ought not to assume any Authority over the rest of the Bishops that were his Brethren, or over their Churches: That every Bishop was to render to God an account of his own Conduct: That the Episcopal Authority is indivisible, and that every Bishop has his Portion of it. That in case of necessity, all Bishops may assist their Brethren with their Counsels, though they are not under their ordinary Jurisdiction: That Causes ought to be determined in their respective Provinces, where the Accusers and Witnesses are to be found: That Councils or Assemblies of Bishops are extreamly useful: That the Keys were given to the whole Church in general, in the Person of S. Peter, to denote Unity. It may be proved out of his Writings, That they used to offer Sacrifice for the Dead in his time; That they were persuaded that the Saints interceded for us, and that Sacrifices were offered in Honour of their Memory; That they made use of Holy Water, that they had Virgins who made Profession of Virginity; and that this condition was mightily honoured among the Christians. I take no notice of abundance of other points of Discipline and Morality, which may be observed in the Abridgment we have made of his Works, where the Reader, as he peruses them, may collect them for himself; and indeed, they are of great importance to all People. S. Cyprian.

The 1st Edition of S. Cyprian, which appear'd a little after the Invention of Printing, neither bears the Name of the Printer, nor of the City where it was Printed. It is more Correct, and freer from Faults than the following ones.

The 2d Edition is that of Spire, by Wendelinus, in the Year 1471, in Folio. It is mighty full of Errors.

In the Year 1512, Remboldus caused this Author to be Printed at Paris, and was the first that divided the Letters into several Books. Afterwards Erasmus having Review'd and Corrected it, Printed it with a Preface and some Annotations, in the beginning in 1520, and 1525, for Frobenius. It was likewise Printed the very same Year at Colen. Afterwards at Paris, for Langelier, in 1541. At Antwerp, in Octavo, in the Year 1542. by Crinitus, and for Frobenius, in 1549. At Lyons for Gryphius, in Octavo, in 1544, and 1550. At Basil, according to Erasmus's Edition, in Folio, for John Hervagius, in 1558. Gravius caused it to be Printed with some Notes at Colen; and it was also Printed at Lyons, in 1535, 1543, 1549 and 1556, in Octavo. At Venice in the same Volume, in 1547. After these Editions, which are none of the most Correct, Manutius caused it to be Printed at Rome, Corrected by several Manuscripts in 1563. in Folio, in a very neat Character, and augmented with a fifth Book of Letters. Morellus's Edition at Paris in the Year following, is larger and more accurately done. It was Printed too at Geneva, in the Year 1593. with the Notes of Goulartius and Pamelius.

Pamelius, after he had taken pains with Tertullian, set himself to Publish a more exact Edition of S. Cyprian's Works. He is the first that disposed the Letters according to the Series of Time, distributing them, as we have done into five Classes; but he has not been very exact in distributing those of the same Clas in their natural Order. He likewise writ S. Cyprian's Life, and has made large Observations upon this Author, wherein he applies himself more to confirm the Doctrin and Discipline of our Times, than to explain the difficulties of his Author.

Pamelius's S. Cyprian has been Printed twice at Antwerp, in 1568, and 1589. And at Paris in 1607, 1574, 1616, 1632, and 1644. These Editions are compared with several ancient Manuscripts, and the former Editions. In imitation of him, Rigaltius, after he had Published Tertullian, undertook S. Cyprian, and without making the least alteration in the Order observed by Pamelius, he only Corrected the Works of this Author, upon the different Readings of two Italian Manuscripts, which Monsieur de Monchal, Archbishop of Tholouse, had Copied in the Margin of his S. Cyprian, and made some Notes to explain the most difficult places; and some Observations to enlighten the Discipline that was in vigour in this Saint's time. Some of these Observations seem to be bold, and he endeavours to excuse himself for them in his Preface. This Edition was Printed at Paris for Dupuis, in 1648.

In the Year 1666, Dupuis Reprinted the Works of this Saint, as he did those of Tertullian, that is to say, he added to the Text, which is conformable to the Edition of Rigaltius, the entire Notes and Observations of that Learned Man; together with some choice Observations of Pamelius, and join'd to this Author Minutius Felix, Arnobius, Firmicus, and the Instruction of Commodianus. In the Year 1681. Frederic Reinard, a Minister in Germany, put out S. Cyprian's Letters at Altdorf. There is nothing particular in this Edition, but the great number of Manuscripts with which it was compared.

Monsieur Lombert having Translated the Works of S. Cyprian into French, and follow'd Pamelius's Method in his Translation, has reformed some part of this Method in his Preface, and has given us, by the assistance of several judicious Men, a more accurate order of the Letters and Treatises of S. Cyprian, than that of Pamelius. [He is quoted with great respect by the Bishops of Oxford and Chester, in the Oxford Edition of this Father's Works.]

After all, two English Bishops, not long since, put out a new Edition of S. Cyprian, which is more correct and exact, and larger than all the former. The Text is here Printed in a very fine Character, Revised upon four new Manuscripts, and several different Readings, Copied out of other Manuscripts by very able Men. The Margin is all along charged with a very short and clear Summary of all that is contained in the Text. Just under the Text, the different reading of the Manuscripts and Editions are set down. At the bottom of the Page are placed the Notes, some of which are borrowed from Rigaltius and Pamelius, and the rest which are new are made by the Bishop of Oxford. Most of them are Theological. His Tracts precede the Letters in this Edition, and are disposed according to the Order wherein they are supposed to have been written. The Letters likewise are distributed after a new Method, but very exact. The Books that are falsly attributed to S. Cyprian, are Printed at the end in a smaller Character, with the Works of Arnoldus Bonævallis that carry his Name with a Book of Meditations never Printed before. The Calendar of Easter is at the end of

S. Cyprian. the Volume. At the head of all, there is an Advertiſement to the Reader, containing the general Deſign of this Edition; S. Cyprian's Life, by Pontius his Deacon; ſome Teſtimonies of the Ancients concerning S. Cyprian; a Table as well of the Books according to the different Editions, as of the Texts of Scripture cited in the Works of S. Cyprian, and the matter of them. This is followed with a Book written by Dr. Pearſon, Biſhop of Cheſter, Intituled, The Annals of S. Cyprian, becauſe it contains the Hiſtory of the Lives and Works of this Saint from Year to Year. [After all, there are ſome Diſſertations of Mr. Dodwell's upon difficult places, wherein he not only explains his Author, but makes large Digreſſions to clear ſome of the moſt conſiderable Queſtions in all Eccleſiaſtical Antiquity: And to illuſtrate thoſe Matters of Fact, and Points of Diſcipline which are only alluded to in S. Cyprian, as things at that time perfectly known.]

I have been lately informed, That a Doctor of the Faculty in Paris, a Man of prodigious Learning, deſigns to oblige the World with a new Edition of S. Cyprian. It were to be wiſhed, that this Deſign were put in Execution, it being a matter of great Importance, that S. Cyprian ſhould be Publiſhed by a Catholick Divine, who is throughly verſed in the Doctrin and Diſcipline of the Church, and who, in his Annotations would not depart from the Rule of Faith, nor condemn or diſapprove the practice of the Church; that ſo by this means the Works of the Father might without any danger be put into the hands of all People.

PONTIUS.

Pontius. SAint Jerom reckons Pontius among the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, who writ the Life of S. Cyprian, whoſe Deacon he had been. Some Learned Perſons, and Rigaltius in particular, ſeem to have doubted whether this Work was not Suppoſititious; and indeed, we muſt own, that it is written with ſo much affectation of Eloquence, that it might well be ſuſpected to be ſpurious, if S. Jerom had not owned it as genuine. But, after the Teſtimony of that Learned Father, I don't think we ought to queſtion the truth of it. This Life is not written, as Rigaltius has well obſerv'd, after an Hiſtorical manner, but in the Language of one that deſired to be thought an Orator, and has more Rhetorical Ornaments, than Hiſtorical Exactneſs in it. The Narration which ought to be plain and ſingle, is full of Rhetorical Figures; and the Style, which ought to be conciſe, is ſwelling. In ſhort, as I have obſerved already, there is rather an affectation of Eloquence, than any true Eloquence in this Book.

CORNELIUS.

Cornelius. Cornelius was ordained Biſhop of Rome, towards the beginning of the Year 251. Soon after, Novatian got himſelf ordained by three Biſhops, but his Ordination being Irregular, was Condemned, and Cornelius acknowledged to be the true Biſhop of Rome by all the Biſhops in the World.

He was ſent into Baniſhment in the Perſecution of the Emperor Gallus, and then receiv'd the Crown of Martyrdom, towards the end of the Year 253. after he had preſided in the Roman Chair two Years and ſome Months.

There are two Letters of this Pope among S. Cyprian's, and (a) Euſebius mentions three more.

In the firſt, he informs Fabius, Biſhop of Antioch, of what had paſſed in the Synod held at Rome againſt Novatian, and ſends him the Opinion of the Italian and African Biſhops.

In the ſecond, he gives a more particular Account of the Decrees of this Synod; and in the third, he deſcribes the Manners and Actions of Novatian. Euſebius has preſerved a long Fragment of this laſt Letter, wherein Cornelius deſcribes the Artifices which Novatian had uſed, to get himſelf Ordained Biſhop, by abuſing the ſimplicity and eaſineſs of three Biſhops, one of whom having acknowledged his Crime, did Penance for it. He afterwards obſerves, that there were at that time in the Church of Rome, 44 Prieſts, 7 Deacons, and as many Sub-Deacons, 42 Acolyths, 52 Porters and Exorciſts, without reckoning the Widows and Poor, upwards of 1500. and a (b) very great multitude of People.

He adds, That Novatian could never hope to arrive to the Epiſcopal Order, becauſe he was Baptized in his Bed, and never received Impoſition from the hands of the Biſhop, that is to ſay, the Sacrament of Confirmation, and was afterwards ordained Prieſt only at the requeſt of a Biſhop, contrary to the Order of the Church, which Prohibits the Ordaining of thoſe who had been Baptized after that manner: He reproaches him for denying his Sacerdotal Function in time of Perſecution; as alſo for obliging thoſe of his own Party, when he gave them the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt (inſtead of anſwering Amen, as was the cuſtom of the Church) to Swear, that they would never return to Cornelius's Party. Laſtly, he informs Fabius, that the Confeſſors of Rome had left his Party, and that ſeveral Biſhops, whoſe Names he ſends him, were condemned in a Synod. This Letter, as well as the others ſent by Cornelius to the Eaſt, were in all probability written in Greek. In the Bibliotheca Patrum, we find a very ſhort Letter, attributed to Cornelius, directed to Lupinicus, Biſhop of Vienna; but that Letter does not belong to this Pope, no more than the two others which go under his Name in the Decretals. For firſt of all it is not of the ſame Style with thoſe we find in S. Cyprian. Secondly, the word Maſs, which was unknown at that time, occurs there. And thirdly, it is unworthy of this Pope, and 'tis plain, it was counterfeited by ſome ignorant Impoſter. The Style of Cornelius, as far as we are able to judge of it, by thoſe few Letters of his that are ſtill extant, is not very lofty; tho' he ſets off whatever he ſays, turning every thing to his own advantage, and does not ſpare his Enemy in the leaſt.

(a) Euſebius mentions three more.] S. Jerom reckons Four Letters, but he is miſtaken, and Euſebius takes notice only of three.

(b) And a very great multitude of People.] There were at that time ſeveral Churches at Rome, for they had but one Prieſt to one Church: And this is the Reaſon why Optatus, ſpeaking of the Churches that were at Rome in the Time of Diocleſian, ſays, that there were above forty of them.

NOVA.

NOVATIAN.

NOvatian, who had been a Philoſopher before he was a Chriſtian, was, as we have hinted already, Baptized in his Bed, being dangerouſly ill. He was afterwards ordained Prieſt of the Church of Rome, at the inſtance of his Biſhop, who obtained this Favour for him from the Clergy and People, who would have oppoſed it. Cornelius accuſes him for abſconding in a Chamber during the Perſecution, and for anſwering the Deacons, who deſired him to go out and Baptize ſome Catechumens, That he would not be a Prieſt any longer, but that he would follow another ſort of Philoſophy. Being Maſter of a great deal of Wit, Knowledge and Eloquence, he might have been very ſerviceable to the Church, if his Ambition to be a Biſhop, which was, in a manner, the ſole occaſion of the Apoſtacy of the firſt Hereſiarchs, had not carried him to a Separation. After the Death of Pope Fabian, he wrote in the Name of the Clergy of Rome, a very Elegant Letter to S. Cyprian, which is the thirtieth among thoſe of that Father, and he ſtill continued in the Communion of the Church during the Vacancy of that See. But as ſoon as Cornelius was choſen in Fabius's room, puſhed forward by his Envy and Jealouſie, he attacked his Ordination, accuſed him of ſeveral Crimes, and publiſhed a Libel againſt him. The principal Plea he made uſe of, was, That Cornelius admitted thoſe who had been guilty of Idolatry to Communion; and to make the beſt advantage of this Accuſation, he maintained, That we never ought to ſuffer thoſe Perſons to participate of the Communion, who had fallen into Idolatry. So he ſeparated from Cornelius, and from thoſe who believed, that the Church might receive them again. The greater part of thoſe who had ſuffered Couragiouſly for the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, not being able to endure that others, who had not ſhewn the ſame Conſtancy and Reſolution, ſhould (if I may uſe the Expreſſion) ſtand on the ſame level with themſelves, embraced his Party, together with ſome Prieſts. Novatus, a Prieſt of Afric, who had raiſed great Feuds againſt S. Cyprian at Carthage, joined himſelf to Novatian, and brought with him thoſe of his own Faction. (a) It was he who gave him that pernicious Advice to get himſelf Ordained Biſhop. Novatian, the better to execute this deſign, ſent two of his own Cabal to three ſimple ignorant Biſhops, who lived in a ſmall Province of Italy, and prevailed with them to come to Rome, under a pretence of accommodating Affairs, and putting a ſtop to ſome Diviſions. As ſoon as theſe three Biſhops were come to Rome, he ſhut them up in a Chamber, and cauſed himſelf to be ordained Biſhop of Rome by them, about Ten a Clock at Night, and this, after he had made them drunk, if we may believe Cornelius. Immediately after his Ordination, he diſpatched two Letters to the Biſhops of the other Provinces, and ſent ſome Deputies into Afric to get his Ordination approved. But the African Biſhops rejected his Deputies, and ratified Cornelius's Ordination. The reſt of the Biſhops alſo adhered to Cornelius: And one of the three who had ordained Novatian, acknowledged his Fault, and did Penance for it. The Confeſſors gave him up to Cornelius, who having got him condemned in a Synod of Sixty Biſhops, wholly turned him out of the Church. He continued however ſtill to teach this Doctrin, That the Church neither could nor ought to admit thoſe to the Communion who had Apoſtatized: And as this Severity pleaſed abundance of People, ſo he became the Head of a Hereſie, which diſturbed the Peace of the Church for a very long time. Novatian.

Beſides, this Letter which he writ before his Separation in the Name of the Clergy of Rome, S. Jerom tells us, he compoſed the following Treatiſes, viz. of the Paſſover, the Sabbath, Circumciſion, the High Prieſt, Prayer, Jewiſh Meals; of Firmneſs of Mind with relation to Attalus, and many more, together with a great Volume about the Trinity, which is, as it were, an abridgment of Tertullian's Work, that has been by ſeveral Perſons attributed to S. Cyprian; not that Tertullian made a Book expreſly about the Trinity, but becauſe he had borrowed whatever he ſays out of the Books of Tertullian upon the Trinity. We have none of theſe Works under the Name of Novatian, but 'tis extreamly probable, that the Treatiſe of the Trinity, and that of the Jewiſh Meats, that are to be found in Tertullian, are the ſame which S. Jerom attributed to Novatian.

And indeed, as for the Book of the Trinity, Ruffinus obſerves, that it was not compoſed by S. Cyprian, under whoſe Name it went, but by Tertullian. S. Jerom, who ſaw farther into this matter than Ruffinus, takes notice in the Apology which he has compoſed againſt him, that it was not written by Tertullian, but by Novatian. There are ſeveral Reaſons which make it evidently appear, that the Book we now have, is the very ſame with that mentioned by S. Jerom and Ruffinus. For in the firſt place it carries the ſame Title. Secondly, it imitates Tertullian, and uſes his Arguments. Thirdly, the Style of it is polite enough, and the Terms very pure. Fourthly, we find ſome Paſſages there againſt the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, a Fault which Ruffinus and S. Jerom obſerve to have been in the Book of the Trinity, which they cited, and which might have been inſerted afterwards by the Macedonians. For this Author eſtabliſhes very Orthodox Principles concerning the Myſtery of the Trinity, which prove the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, as well as that of the Son.

It is very probable likewiſe, that the Treatiſe about Jewiſh Meats, attributed to Tertullian, belongs to Novatian, as well by reaſon of the conformity of the Style, as becauſe the Author obſerves in the

(a) It was he who gave him that pernicious Advice.] S. Cyprian in his 41ſt Epiſtle tells us, That Novatus had ordained a Biſhop of Rome, as one Felicíſſimus a Prieſt had done one at Carthage; not that he made them ſo himſelf, for he was no Biſhop, but becauſe he had made him ſo by his Counſels and Faction

beginning

Novatian. beginning, that he wrote two Letters, wherein he demonſtrated, that the Jews knew not what is the true Circumciſion, or what is the true Sabbath. All which agrees with Novatian, who, according to S. Jerom, wrote two Treatiſes upon the ſame Subjects.

The Deſign of this Treatiſe is to ſhew, That the Animals forbidden to be eaten by the Moſaical Law, were not abſolutely and in themſelves impure. To demonſtrate the Truth of this Aſſertion, he tells us, that the Fruits of Trees were the firſt Nouriſhment of Mankind; that afterwards they eat the Fleſh of Animals; that the Law came in afterwards, which made a diſtinction betwixt thoſe Creatures that might be eaten, and thoſe that were prohibited; that under this Diſpenſation they were called Unclean, not becauſe they were really ſo in their own Nature, ſince they were the Creatures of God, but firſt, to inſtruct Men to avoid the Vices that were figured, and (b) repreſented by theſe Animals; and in the ſecond place, to ſerve as a Remedy againſt Intemperance; that Jeſus Chriſt, who is the end and accompliſhment of the Law, has given liberty to Men to eat of all ſorts of Meats, provided they don't violate the bounds of Chriſtian Sobriety; and from thence he takes occaſion to reprove the Irregularities and Diſorders of ſome Chriſtians, who lived intemperately. He obſerves, that this is by no means fitting for thoſe Perſons who are to pray Night and Day. At laſt, out of the number of Meats that are permitted to be eaten, he excepts thoſe that have been offered to Idols, from which the Primitive Chriſtians abſtained very Religiouſly; and he concludes all with theſe Words, that are an Abridgment of his whole Diſcourſe: 'Having therefore ſhewn what is the nature of Meats, (for he had before diſcovered the Genius of the Moſaical Law, and explained the nature of the Evangelical Liberty) 'Let us live up to the Rules of Temperance, and abſtain from things offered to Idols, giving 'thanks to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt his Son, to whom be Praiſe, Honour and Glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Some think that Novatian writ this Letter during the Perſecution of Decius, before he had ſeparated from the Church; but his way of ſpeaking, at the beginning, makes me rather believe, that it was compoſed after he became Chief of the Party, in the Perſecution of Gallus and Voluſian. This Author has abundance of Wit, Knowledge and Eloquence; his Style is pure, clean and polite; his Expreſſions choice, his Thoughts natural, and his way of Reaſoning juſt: He is full of Citations of Texts of Scripture that are alway to the purpoſe; and beſides, there is a great deal of Order and Method in thoſe Treatiſes of his we now have, and he never ſpeaks but with a world of Candor and Moderation.

(b) Repreſented by theſe Animals.] As for Example, he ſays, that the Prohibition of eating Swines-fleſh is to intimate to us, that we are not to lead a Carnal Life: That when we are forbidden to eat Weaſils, the meaning is, we are forbidden to Steal; that by Crows, Pleaſures are ſignified, &c.

S. MARTIALIS.

S. Martialis SAint Martialis came into France with S. Dionyſius (a) under the Emperor Decius towards the year of our Lord 250. Two Letters attributed to him, one written to the People of Burdeaux, the other to thoſe of Tholouſe, which were ſaid to be found in the Veſtry of (b) S. Peter of Limoges in the Eleventh Century, and have been ſince (c) frequently Printed, and inſerted into the laſt Bibliotheca Patrum, though no Man queſtions that theſe Letters are Suppoſititious. For in the firſt place the Author tells us, that he lived with Jeſus Chriſt, which can by no means agree with him who was Biſhop of Limoges in 252. Secondly in the Eighth Chapter of the Second Letter, he ſaith, that he Baptized King Stephen, and another Tyrant with his Noblemen. Now in the time of Martialis there was neither King nor Tyrant in France. Thirdly, he tells us, that in his time the Temples of the Gods were demoliſhed, and that Churches were built by the Kings Authority, which does not agree with the time of S. Martialis. Fourthly, the Texts of Scripture quoted in theſe Letters follow the vulgar Tranſlation, which was compoſed long after. Fifthly, the Author tells us, that he had eaten with Jeſus Chriſt at the laſt Supper, though it is certain that none but the Apoſtles were there.

The Life of S. Martialis, Printed at the end of Abdias, which carries the Name of Aurelian Biſhop of Limoges, is a ſpurious Piece, no leſs than the Epiſtles of that Biſhop, and full as Fabulous as the Hiſtory of Abdias, to which it is joined. The Author by a very groſs Error ſuppoſes, that Veſpaſian ſucceeded Nero immediately. He tells us that S. Martialis received from Jeſus Chriſt after his Reſurrection, the ſame Power which the Apoſtles had; that he never ſuffered either Hunger, Thirſt or Pain, and recounts ſeveral other Fables concerning him, which are no leſs ridiculous than thoſe that are to be found upon the ſame Subject in the two Councils of Limoges, held in the Years 1029 and 1031.

(a) Under the Emperor Decius.] S. Gregory of Tours is the Man that fixes this Epocha of the coming of S. Denis, Martialis, and their Collegues into France. There is no Author extant, who is either more ancient or more worthy to be believed than S. Gregory, that has given us any Account of their arrival there any ſooner.

(b) Peter of Limoges.] This Story is related by a Monk called Gauſius, in a Chronicle which is to be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum, p. 288, 289. firſt printed in the Year 1521, with Abdias, and afterwards in 1571, and 1614.

(c) Frequently Printed.] They were firſt printed by Badius in the Year 1521, afterwards by Berdes in the Year 1573, with the Notes of Elmenhorſtius at Helmſtad in 1614. at Baſil in 1655, at Colen in 1560.

SIXTUS

SIXTUS or XYSTUS.

Sixtus.

IT is a long time ago, ſince under the name of Pope Sixtus, who preſided in the Roman Chair in the Year 257. Ruffinus publiſhed a Book of a certain Pythagorean Philoſopher named Sixtus, tranſlated out of Greek into Latin. (a) S. Jerom often reproaches him with this Impoſture; S. Auſtin ſuffered himſelf at firſt to be deceived by it, and has cited it in his Book of Nature and Grace, as if it had been compoſed by Pope Sixtus, but afterwards (b) he retracts his Error. Gelaſius placed it among the Heretical Books, ſuppoſing it to have been written by ſome Chriſtian. (c) It is ſtill extant, being a Medley of Philoſophical Sentences, uſeful indeed in themſelves, and ſerviceable to the Truth, but having little of the Spirit of Chriſtianity in them. There is no mention made in it either of Jeſus Chriſt, the Holy Ghoſt, the Prophets or the Apoſtles; and it is full of the Errors of the Pythagoreans and the Stoicks. It renders Man equal to God, and affirms that he is made of a Divine Subſtance, and would have him be without Paſſion, according to the Principle of the Stoicks, and without Sin, purſuant to the Doctrin of the Pelagians. There are ſeveral other Pelagian Errors to be found in it.

(a) S. Jerom often reproaches him with this Impoſture.] Ep. ad Cteſiphont. contra Pelag. in Cap. 22. Jerom. in Cap. 18. Ezechielis.

S. GREGORY THAUMATURGUS.

S. Gregory Thaumaturgus.

SAint Gregory, whoſe Name at firſt was Theodorus, and afterwards Surnamed Thaumaturgus, that is to ſay, the Worker of Miracles, by reaſon of the great number of Miracles he is ſuppoſed to have wrought both in his Life-time, and after his Death, was born in the City of Neo-Cæſarea in Pontus, deſcended of a Family that was very conſiderable as well for its Nobility, as for its great Poſſeſſions. He was educated in the idolatrous Worſhip, having a Father who was extreamly bigotted to Paganiſm. After he had loſt him at the Age of Fourteen Years, his Mother would have him ſtudy Rhetorick to qualifie himſelf for the Bar. His Siſter being married to a Lawyer, who was afterwards Governour of Paleſtine, and being obliged to follow her Husband, Gregory and Athenodorus her Brothers went along with her, intending to go as far as Berytus, and there apply themſelves to the Study of the Laws in a Celebrated School of that City. But being arrived at Cæſarea in Paleſtine, they there met Origen, who having exhorted them to ſtudy Philoſophy, by little and little inſpired into them the Principles of the Chriſtian Faith, and ſoon after made them his Diſciples. After they had been with him for the ſpace of five Years, Gregory being willing to teſtifie the great Obligations he had to Origen, and beſides, to give him ſome publick Marks of his Acknowledgment, as he took his leave of him, compoſed a very eloquent Diſcourſe, which he recited before a numerous Aſſembly invited to that Solemnity. After his return to Neo-Cæſarea, he retired for ſome time, and lived a ſolitary Life, and was at laſt, contrary to his Inclinations, ordained Biſhop of Neo-Cæſarea by Phædimus Biſhop of Amaſea, towards the Year of our Lord 240. At that time there were but very few Chriſtians in that City, but the number of them was ſoon augmented by his vigilance and care, and by his Miracles, ſo that this Church became in a little time one of the moſt flouriſhing Churches in the World. He aſſiſted at the firſt Council of Antioch held againſt Paulus Samoſatenus, as Euſebius tells us in the Sixth Book of his Hiſtory, ch. 23. and Died a little after in the Year 265. This is an Abridgment of this Biſhop's Life, drawn out of his Diſcourſe to Origen, out of Euſebius, S. Baſil, S. Jerom and S. Gregory Nyſſen in the Relation that he gives of the Life of this great Saint.

The Works of this Father (part whereof of Zinus's Verſion were Printed at Venice in Latin in 1574, and at Rome in 1594.) were collected and Printed in Greek by Gerrard Voſſius, at Mentz in Quarto, 1604, and afterwards in Folio at Paris, 1621, with ſome other ſmaller Fathers.

The firſt, as well as the moſt Eloquent Work he has compoſed, is the Harangue he made to thank Origen, which was ſeparately Publiſhed by Hoeſchelius at the end of his Edition of Origen againſt Celſus in 1605. He begins his Exordium with the difficulty of commending Origen as he deſerved. Afterwards he tells him in what a ſtrange manner the Providence of God conducted him to Cæſarea, the Converſations this great Man held with him and his Brother to exhort them to the Study of Philoſophy, and to poſſeſs them with a Veneration for the Holy Scriptures and the Chriſtian Religion; and afterwards he teſtifies the Regret he had to be obliged to quit a Maſter whom he ſo tenderly loved. This Harangue is very Eloquent, and we may ſay it is one of the moſt conſummate pieces of Rhetorick that are any where extant among the Ancients. It was printed under the name of Gregory Thaumaturgus in Greek, and in Latin at Antwerp in 1613, in Octavo.

The Second Book mentioned by Euſebius and S. Jerom, as well as the firſt, is his Paraphraſe upon Eccleſiaſtes. It was Tranſlated by Jacobus Billius, who attributed it to S. Gregory Nazianzen upon the Credit of a Manuſcript in the King's Library. But certain it is, that it belongs to Gregory Thaumaturgus maturgus, not only becauſe we read in Euſebius, and in S. Jerom, that he compoſed a Book bearing that Name, which we are no where told of S. Gregory Nazianzen, but alſo becauſe we find there word for word a long Paſſage cited by S. Jerom upon the fourth Chapter of Eccleſiaſtes, as taken out of the Paraphraſe upon Eccleſiaſtes, done by Gregory Biſhop of Pontus. I have no more to ſay of this Book, but only that it is a Paraphraſe which largely explains the Moral Reflections in Eccleſiaſtes.

S. Gregory Thaumaturgus.

S. Gregory Nyſſen in his Life of this Father, takes notice of a Creed which, as he pretends, this Saint received from S. John in a Viſion which he ſaw in the Night, and which was ſtill preſerved, being, as he ſays, written by the Hand of Gregory Thaumaturgus. This Profeſſion of Faith is as follows: 'There is only One God the Father, who is the Father of the Living Word, his eſſential Wiſdom, his 'Power, and his eternal Image; it is he who being Sovereignly perfect, has begotten a Son Sovereignly 'perfect as himſelf. He is the Father of the only Son. There is only one Lord, the only Son of the 'only Father, God begotten of God, the Character and Image of the Divinity, the efficacious Word by 'which all Creatures were formed, the true Son of the true Father, the inviſible Son of the inviſible Fa'ther, the Incorruptible of the Incorruptible, the Immortal of the Immortal, the eternal Son of him 'who is from all Eternity; and there is only one Holy Ghoſt, who proceeds from God, and was given to 'Men by the Son, he is the Image of the Son, and a perfect Image of him that is perfect. He is Life, 'and the Principle of Life to thoſe that Live; He is the Holy Spring, Holineſs it ſelf, and the Author 'of Sanctification. By him God the Father is made manifeſt, who is above all things, and in all things, 'and God the Son, who is equally in all things. This is the perfect Trinity, which is not divided, 'but is One in Glory, in Sovereignty and Eternity.

The following Words, which ſome Perſons do ſtill attribute to Gregory Thaumaturgus, belong to S. Gregory Nyſſen, who draws this Concluſion from the above-mentioned Profeſſion. 'There is therefore no 'created Perſon or dependent Being in the Trinity, it admits into it nothing that is Foreign, nothing 'that has been out of it during a time, or which afterwards began to be there; the Father was never 'without the Son, nor the Son without the Holy Ghoſt, but the Trinity has ever been immovable 'and invariable.

There is likewiſe attributed to S. Gregory Thaumaturgus another Expoſition of Faith, much longer, and tranſlated by Turrianus, which ſome People might believe to be that which is cited by S. Baſil, in his Sixty Fourth Epiſtle, directed to one whoſe Name was Ælian. But it is manifeſt, that this is different from that mentioned by S. Baſil, and that it could not be compoſed by S. Gregory Thaumaturgus: For, in the firſt place, it is different from that S. Baſil ſpeaks of, which was addreſſed to Ælian, and made in form of a Diſpute, wherein he ſays, That the Father and Son were one in Hypoſtaſis, and only diſtinguiſhed by abſtraction of the Mind, the Words which the Sabellians abuſed; whereas in this which is neither addreſſed to Ælian, nor compoſed after the manner of a Diſpute, the Error of Sabellius is clearly rejected; and it is formally ſaid, that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt are Three Perſons, and Three Hypoſtaſes. In the ſecond place, it cannot be of the time of S. Gregory Thaumaturgus; for the Author expreſly refutes the Arians, ſaying, That thoſe who affirm, that the Son is created of nothing, are Enemies to the Faith of the Church, and that thoſe who reject the Word Conſubſtantial, are out of the Church. Beſides, when he explains the Myſtery of the Incarnation, he ſpeaks after a manner which makes it credible, that he had the Neſtorians and Eutychians in view. Caniſius attributes this Profeſſion of Faith to Apollinarius, but it too plainly refutes the Error of that Heretick to be ever his. However it be, it was compoſed after the time of S. Gregory Thaumaturgus. We ought to paſs the ſame Judgment upon the twelve Anathema's, which follow this Expoſition, and are likewiſe compoſed out of the Errors of the Neſtorians and Eutychians.

No Body doubts of the Canonical Epiſtle of this Saint, which is cited in the ſixth Council, and is ſet down by Balſamon. It has all the Characters of Antiquity, which any one can deſire in ſuch Monuments. It was written after the Goths had ravag'd Aſia under Galienus, and it is directed to a Biſhop, whoſe Name we know not, to inſtruct him how he was to preſcribe Penance to thoſe who had fallen into any ſcandalous Crimes, during the Inundations of the Barbarians. In the firſt Canon he ſays, that thoſe who having been taken Priſoners by the Barbarians, had eaten the Food which was given them, ought not, upon that account to ſuffer Penance, as well becauſe the Barbarians did not ſacrifice any Victims to Idols, as alſo becauſe that which defiles the Man is not the Meat which enters into the Man, but that which goes out of the Man. That for the ſame reaſon thoſe Captive Women who had been forcibly carried away by the Barbarians, were not to be blamed; but nevertheleſs, that thoſe who had lived diſſolute Lives before their Captivity, were not eaſily to be admitted to Communion.

In the ſecond Canon, and the three following, which to ſpeak properly are only one Canon, he deteſts the Avarice and Injuſtice of thoſe Perſons, who took the advantage of the Captivity of theſe miſerable Creatures to plunder them of their Goods. He ſhews, that they are obliged to make Reſtitution, and that they cannot keep in their Poſſeſſion the Goods of other Men. In the ſixth, he endeavours to ſhew with what Horror the World ought to look upon the Cruelty of thoſe Perſons, who detained as Captives thoſe who had freed themſelves out of the Hands of the Barbarians. In the ſeventh he ordains, That ſuch Offenders ſhould not be received ſo much as into the number of Hearers (this was the firſt Degree of Penance) who joining themſelves with the Barbarians, had fallen upon the Chriſtians, either by Murdering them, or ſhewing the Infidels where they were fled for ſhelter. In the eighth, he decrees the ſame Puniſhment againſt thoſe who ſhould be convicted to have broken open any ones Houſe during the Ravage of the Barbarians; but then he moderates this Rigour in favour of thoſe who who should make a voluntary Confession, and these he places in the third degree of Penitents. 'Tis also under this Class, that in the ninth Canon he ranges those who kept back the things which belonged to others, which they found in the midst of the Field, or in their Houses, as soon as they were convicted of it: But if they confessed the Fact, he believed them not to be unworthy to communicate at Prayers, which was the last degree of Penance. In the tenth, he exhorts those that were willing to restore their Neighbours Goods, to do it without making any sordid Gain, by exacting any thing for what they had discovered, kept or found, or for any other reason whatever it might be. The last Canon is in explication of the different degrees of Penance. Weeping and Groaning, says he, consist in standing without the Church Porch, where the Sinner ought to beg earnestly of those who go in, to pray to God for him, and this is the first degree. The second degree is that of Hearers, and is performed in the Church porch, where the Sinner is to tarry with the Catechumens, and go out with them, after having heard the Holy Scripture, as being unworthy of Prayer. In the Substration, which is the third degree, the Party offending is admitted into the Body of the Church, but must go out with the Catechumens. Lastly, the fourth degree is that of standing up when the Person may tarry in the Church with the Faithful, without being obliged to go out of it with the Catechumens; and this is followed with the participation of the Sacraments. Morinus questions whether this last Canon belongs to Gregory Thaumaturgus, and conjectures, that it has been added by one of the Modern Greeks, to explain the Letter of this Saint. This Conjecture seems to be well grounded. S. Gregory Thaumaturgus.

There goes likewise, under the name of this Father, a Discourse about the Soul, addressed to one Tatian, which contains the Decision of several Questions concerning the Nature of the Soul, and follows the Principles of the Peripatetics, but in truth it has not the least resemblance of S. Gregory's Style; and besides, it seems to be the product of the following Age, when Aristotle's Philosophy began to be in some Reputation. To be short, it is rather the work of a Philosopher, than of a Bishop.

I am no less satisfied, that the Sermons which carry the name of S. Gregory Thumaturgus, do really belong to another Author; for besides, that none of the Ancients have ever mentioned them, they are altogether of a different Style, which is so far from approaching the Elegance and Politeness so familiar to S. Gregory, that it is mean and childish. Secondly, The Author of these Sermons speaks of the Mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, in such terms as shew, that he lived after the rise of the Heresies of the (a) Arians and Nestorians. He often affects to make use of the word Θεοτόκος when he speaks of the Virgin Mary, and bestows excessive Praises upon her, which were not customary till after the Council of Ephesus. Lastly, it is evident, that these Homilies were composed when the Church enjoy'd Peace, and celebrated it's Festivals with great Solemnity.

The three Sermons upon the Annunciation resemble the Style of Proclus of Constantinople, as it has been observed by him who has made some Notes upon the Homilies of that Author. The last of the three has also been attributed to S. Chrysostome, but the difference of the Style shews that it is not his.

The fourth Sermon is upon the Baptism of JESUS CHRIST, which Festival was anciently celebrated on the day of Epiphany; it is more eloquent than the three preceeding ones, and appears to be composed by another Author, who nevertheless was not S. Gregory Thaumaturgus, for the very same reason we have offered before; there we find the term Θεοτόκος, and that of Consubstantial.

(a) The Arians and Nestorians.] For Example, in the first of these Homilies, it is said, that JESUS CHRIST is born of the Virgin, that he is God and Man without Confusion, and without Change, perfect in the Divinity, and the Humanity, like his Father in all, and consubstantial to us. In the second, there are extraordinary Praises of the Virgin, whom he calls Θεοτόκος, which was not begun to be commonly practised till after the Synod of Ephesus. The Trinity is there called Consubstantial.

S. DIONYSIUS of Alexandria.

DIonysius, (a) who had formerly been a Disciple of Origen, and Catechist of the Church of Alexandria, succeeded Heraclas in the Episcopal See of that Church, in the Third (b) Year of the Empire of Philippus, and 247 of the Nativity of our Saviour. He was one of the most Learned and most Illustrious Bishops of his Age; and being consulted from all parts upon matters of Religion, wrote a vast number of Letters to the most famous Bishops of the Church, besides several Works against the Hereticks, and some Treatises of Divinity and Discipline. S. Jerom has composed a Catalogue of all his Works, and Eusebius has enriched his History with several Passages that he has S. Dionysius.

(a) Dionysius.] He is Sirnamed the Great, by the Ancients. Euseb. S. Basil. Ep. ad Amphil. Maximus and Metaphrastes give him this Name. He had formerly been a Rhetorician, if we may believe Maximus upon the fifth Chapter of the Hierarchia Cœlestis. He was unquestionably descended of a good Family. See Eusebius, Lib. 7. Ch. 11. and the Notes of Valesius.

(b) The third Year.] 'Tis so set down in Eusebius's History, Lib. 6. Chap. 35. and in his Chronicon 'tis the Fifth. But the Account of his History is the truest; for he supposes in his Chronicon, that Philip reigned Seven years, whereas he was Emperour but Five.

borrowed out of him. The Fragments that are yet extant in Euſebius and S. Athanaſius, make us greatly regret the Loſs of his Writings, as Works that would have been of infinite Advantage and Uſe in the Explication of the Doctrin of the Church. The Catalogue of them, as it is ſet down by S. Jerom, being without any order, we ſhall therefore endeavour to make another of all the Volumes of this Dionyſius, whereof we have any knowledge, according to the order of time in which they were written, not forgetting at the ſame time to take notice of thoſe Fragments that are to be found in Euſebius and in S. Athanaſius.

The firſt Letter which he wrote, is directed to Fabius, Biſhop of Antioch, immediately after the Perſecution of the Emperor Decius; that is to ſay, at the end of the year 250. Euſebius has preſerved two Fragments of it in the Sixth Book, Chap. 41. & 44. of his Hiſtory. In the firſt, he gives an Account of the horrid Cruelty of the Perſecutors that fell ſo ſeverely upon the poor Chriſtians of Alexandria, as well towards the end of the Empire of Philippus, as alſo after Decius had publiſhed his Edict againſt them; and he gives us a Narrative of the Martyrdom of ſeveral Perſons. In the Second, he relates the Hiſtory of an Old Man, whoſe Name was Serapion, who having fallen away in the time of Perſecution, was enjoyn'd a courſe of Penance, till being ready to die, he ſent a young Boy to fetch him the Body of Jeſus Chriſt, that he might die in the Communion of the Church.

He deſcribes the Perſecution of Decius in his Letter againſt Germanus, though it was not writ till long after; and he particulary relates what happen'd to himſelf; how, having been forcibly hurried away out of Alexandria by ſome Soldiers againſt his Will, he was conducted to a Town called Taposiris, where being reſcued by a Company of Country Fellows that fell upon his Guards, he was obliged to abſcond for a while, being only accompanied by ſome Prieſts.

(c) This is that Perſecution, which he mentioned in the Fragment of a Letter to Domitius and Didymus, related by Euſebius towards the end of the Eleventh Chapter of his Hiſtory, Lib. 6. It was alſo about the end of this Perſecution, when he was yet in Exile, that he wrote a Letter concerning Penance to the Brethren in Ægypt, wherein he delivered his own Opinion, as to the manner with which they ought to treat thoſe that had fallen away; and he there diſtinguiſhes between the different degrees of Offences, He likewiſe wrote at the ſame time a Book upon the ſame occaſion to Conon Biſhop of Hermopolis, a Letter to his Clergy at Alexandria, one to the Chriſtians of Laodicea, where Thelymidres was Biſhop, and one to the Armenians, over whom Meruzanes was Paſtor, which treated of Penance; and a ſmall Treatiſe of Martyrdom to Origen.

After peace was reſtored to the Church in the Year 251. Dionyſius having received a Letter from Cornelius Biſhop of Rome againſt Novatian, who had alſo written to him himſelf, he anſwered both one and the other. His Letter to Novatian, whom he calls Novatus, is taken notice of by Euſebius in his 7th Book, Chap. 45. He adviſes him, if he had a mind to perſwade the World that he was Ordained againſt his Will, as he publickly affirmed, to return back to his Duty, and uſe all his Endeavours to re-eſtabliſh Peace and Concord. His Letter to Cornelius is plainly what they called in the Language of thoſe times, a Letter of Communion. He informs him, that he was ſummoned to a Synod of Antioch, by Helenus Biſhop of Tarſus, by Firmilian of Cappadocia, and Theoctiſtus of Paleſtine, in which they reſolved to confirm the Diſcipline of Novatus; that word was ſent him, that Fabius Biſhop of Antioch was dead, and Demetrian elected in his room; that Alexander Biſhop of Jeruſalem died in Priſon. To theſe Letters he added one to the Chriſtians at Rome, concerning Peace and Penance; and another to the Confeſſors to diſſwade them from the Faction of Novatian. Afterwards he wrote another to the Romans, which he ſent by Hippolytus, wherein he diſcourſes of the Duty and Function of Deacons; and two more to the Confeſſors of Rome, after they had entred into the Unity of the Church. Theſe are the Letters which he wrote under the Pontificate of Cornelius, and are mentioned by Euſebius in the laſt Chapter of his Sixth Book.

Under the Pontificate of Pope Stephen, that ſucceeded Cornelius in the beginning of the Year 255. Dionyſius wrote a Letter to him, in which he acquaints him, That all the Eaſtern Churches where at laſt agreed to condemn the rigorous Novelty of Novatus, and ſpeaks to him of the Queſtion concerning the Validity of the Baptiſm of Hereticks, that was in Agitation between him and S. Cyprian. After the Death of Stephen, which happened in the Year 257. he wrote another upon the ſame Subject to Sixtus his Succeſſor, and begs of him to conſider the Conſequence of that buſineſs, and not to purſue it with the heat of his Predeceſſor, who had written Letters to Helenus, to Firmilian, and to all the Biſhops of Cappadocia, and Cicilia, wherein he ſent them word, that he would not Communicate any more with them, becauſe they re-Baptized Hereticks; which, he ſays, was determined in the Councils of the Biſhops. In the ſame Letter he ſpeaks againſt the Error of the Sabellians, that aroſe in Ptolemais a City of Pentapolis; againſt which, as he tells him there, he had written a long Letter, or rather a Diſcourſe which he ſent him. He wrote likewiſe to Dionyſius and Philemon, Presbyters of the Church of Rome, about the Baptiſm of Hereticks. In his Epiſtle to Philemon, he tells him, That his Predeceſſor Heraclas cauſed the Hereticks to abjure their Errors, without Baptizing them a-new; that this was the Cuſtom of his Church; but nevertheleſs that he had been informed, that the Africans had for a long long time observed the contrary, and that it was Established in the East in a very numerous Assembly of Bishops held at Iconium and Synnada, and in many other places; that matters standing thus, his Advice was, that their Customs and Decrees ought not to be reversed, since it is written, That we must not remove the Land-mark which our Fathers have given us. This is the true Opinion of Dionysius concerning this matter, and S. Jerom wrongfully accuses him to have been of S. Cyprian's Party, since he tells us in expres Terms, That we ought to follow the Judgment of the Church in this Point. He says the same thing in his Letter to Dionysius, who was afterwards Bishop of Rome, and delivers his Sentiments there very boldly against Novatian. Lastly, He wrote a Letter, which is the Fifth, to Sixtus, concerning the Baptism of Hereticks, in which he maintains, That if a Man has been Baptized amongst Hereticks, with Ceremonies wholly different from those of the Church, and comes at last to discover it, after he has continued in the Church a long time, participating of the Prayers, and Communicating as others, without having been Baptized, he needs not be Baptized anew, since he has received the Body of Jesus Christ several times, and answered Amen with the rest of the Faithful. Eusebius seems to mention a sixth Letter, written upon the same occasion to the same Pope; where, as he tells us, he has examined this Question more copiously, though perhaps it is not different from this last. S. Dionysius.

(c) This is that Perſecution.] Euſebius refers it to the Perſecution under Valerian; but the Circumſtances agree with what happened to him under the Perſecution of Decius, and not what he ſuffered under the Perſecution of Valerian, in which he was not carried away by Violence. One needs only conſulting the two Fragments of his Letter to Germanus, where he gives an Account of what befell him in theſe two Perſecutions, to be perſwaded in the matter.

After Sixtus's Death, Dionysius of Alexandria wrote a Letter concerning Lucian, to Dionysius that succeded Pope Sixtus, towards the end of the Year 258. 'Twas in this, or rather in the following Year, that he wrote his Letter against Germanus; in which, after he has described the Persecution he suffered in the time of Decius, he relates what happened to him under that of Valerian; how the Prefect Æmilianus prohibited him to hold any more Assemblies of Christians; how having refused to obey his Orders, he was sent along with his Presbyters, to a Village near Cephro in Lybia; how these Proceedings did not hinder the Christians from holding their ordinary Assemblies. Lastly, how he preached the Gospel, and converted great Numbers of Pagans to Christianity, whilst he tarried at Cephro.

While he continued in this Exile, he wrote some Paschal Letters; that is to say, Letters in form of Homilies upon the Festival of Easter; in which, according to the ancient Custom, he ascertains the time of that Feast. He sent one of them to Flavius, another to Domitius and Didymus, which I imagine to be different from the first that is addressed to the same Persons; wherein he proves, That the Feast of Easter ought not to be celebrated till after the vernal Equinox. He composed a Canon or Table of Eight Years. He likewise wrote another to the Church of Alexandria, and to many others. Peace was no sooner restored to the Church, but he returned back to Alexandria; tho' he was immediately obliged to depart from thence, by reason of a Sedition that arose in that City (d).

It was during this Retreat, that he wrote a Letter to Hierax, a Passage out of which Eusebius has borrowed, that gives an Account of a Riot that happened at that time. He likewise wrote another Letter to his Church, which he sent to them on Easter-Day.

A Pestilence (e) that succeeded this War, obliged S. Dionysius to comfort and encourage his Congregation with another Letter, in which he describes that admirable Charity wherewith the Christians relieved and buried those that were seized with the Plague, in a very lively manner.

In short, during the whole time of his Retirement, he never ceas'd to write to his Brethren, and did them more good by his Letters, than he could have done by his Presence. Eusebius mentions another Paschal Letter of his concerning the Sabbath, and one concerning Spiritual Exercises, and a third to Hermammon, written in the Seventh Year of Galienus, which fell out in the Year 264. some Fragments of which he has preserved in Lib. 7. c. 1. 10. and 23. And yet S. Dionysius was not only content to exhort, or instruct the Faithful by his Letters; but he applied himself vigorously to confute and extinguish the Errors that sprung up in his time.

An Ægyptian Bishop named Nepos, understanding the Promises of the Gospel in a gross sense, and maintaining the Reign of Jesus Christ upon Earth for a Thousand Years, with an inflexible Obstinacy composed a Book which he Entituled, A Confutation of the Allegorists, where he endeavoured to prove his Opinion out of the Apocalypse. He brought over abundance of People to this Opinion in that part of Ægypt that was called Arsinoe, which unhappily proved an occasion of Schism and Division in those Churches. Dionysius happening to be there, judged it expedient to examine this Doctrin publickly: And because they generally set up Nepos's Book as an unanswerable Treatise, he confuted it Viva voce, and afterwards wrote two Books against it, Entituled, Of the Divine Promises. In the First, he delivers his own Opinion upon this Question. In the Second, he answers all the Reasons urged by Nepos, and his Testimonies drawn out of the Revelations. Saying upon this last Head, That some Persons have rejected the Apocalypse, as being the Book of the Heretick Cerinthus, who admitted of no other Beatitude, but that which consisted in carnal Pleasures; that as for himself, he durst not entirely reject it, since it was esteemed by a great many Christians, but that he was perswaded it had a hidden meaning, which could not be comprehended by any body; that he acknowledged that Book to be written by an Author inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt, though he did not believe it to have been written by S. John the Evangeliſt, but by another of the ſame Name; as he endeavours to prove by the difference of the Style and Thoughts. Euſebius has preſerved conſiderable Fragments of this Book, from whence we have drawn the above-mentioned Paſſages. See the Third Book of his Hiſtory, Chap. 28. and l. 7. Ch. 24. and 25.

(d) Arose in that City.] 'Tis undoubtedly that Commotion, that was occasioned by Æmilianus, Governour of Alexandria, who caused that City, and likewise all Ægypt, to revolt from the Emperor Galienus; as Pollio reports it. This Æmilianus was a different Person from him that took up Arms in Mœsia, and marched against Gallus and Volusianus some years before. These two Æmilians are distinguished in the Epitome of Aurelius Victor.

(e) A Pestilence.] This Pestilence began in the time of Gallus and Volusianus, but it broke afresh under Gallus; as is observed by Aurelius Victor and Pollio. Dionysius of Alexandria speaks of the latter Pestilence, and S. Cyprian of the former. Thus those Persons that imagined they spoke of the same Infection, are mistaken.

S. Dionyſius.

Another Error, that Dionyſius of Alexandria oppoſed and ſtifled, if I may uſe the Expreſſion, in its Cradle, was much more conſiderable. There were ſeveral Biſhops in Pentapolis that embraced the Error of Sabellius, who confounded the Three Perſons of the Holy Trinity. This Opnion was ſo deeply rooted and eſtabliſhed in thoſe Quarters, that the Son of God was ſeldom mentioned in their Churches. Dionyſius, to whom this Province belonged, by vertue of the Preheminence of the Patriarchal See of Alexandria, to preſide and watch over all the Churches of Ægypt, ſent his Legates to that place to undeceive the People that were in an Errour; but being not able to go thither himſelf in Perſon, he was conſtrained to write to them to confute this Hereſie. His firſt Letter was addreſſed to Ammon Biſhop of Berenice, the Second to Teleſphorus and Euphranor, and the Laſt to Ammon and Euporus. The End which he propoſed to himſelf in writing theſe Letters, was to perſwade theſe People, who had not been very well inſtructed, that the Father was not the Son, and that He was not the Father, but the Son that was Incarnate, and Died for us. But that happened to Dionyſius in this Affair, that uſually happens to moſt Men; that while he oppoſed and attack'd one Error, he ſpoke very favourably of the contrary: Thus going about to prove, that the Son was a diſtinct Perſon from the Father, he chanced to ſay, That he was the Work of the Father; That he was with reſpect to the Father what a Vine is to the Vine-dreſſer, a Ship to the Builder. And laſtly, That the Son did not exiſt before he was made. Theſe expreſſions, that ſeemed to eſtabliſh an oppoſite Error to that of Sabellius, which afterwards was taken up by Arius, gave occaſion to ſome well-affected Catholick Perſons, to carry a Complaint to Dionyſius Biſhop of Rome, againſt the Biſhop of Alexandria. But he being advertiſed of the matter, wrote Four Books which he preſented to the Pope; wherein he refutes not only the Error of the Sabellians, but alſo that which was attributed to himſelf; and having deſired the Pope to ſend him all the Objections that were urged againſt him, he wrote a Treatiſe which he called, A Refutation and an Apology; becauſe he refutes the Errors of other Men, and likewiſe Juſtifies himſelf. S. Athanaſius, from whom I have borrowed this Account, relates divers other Paſſages, that were extracted out of this Work, in a Book which he wrote about the Opinion of Dionyſius of Alexandria; in which, he invincibly proves againſt the Arians, who had the Confidence to make uſe of his Authority, That his Notions of the Trinity were very conformable to thoſe of the Church, though he did not much approve of the term Conſubſtantial.

To conclude, Dionyſius of Alexandria a little before his Death, defended the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt againſt Paulus Samoſatenus Biſhop of Antioch: For, being invited to the Synod that was held at Antioch againſt that Heretick in the Year 264. and not being able to go thither, by reaſon of his Old Age and Infirmity, he wrote ſeveral Letters to the Church at Antioch, wherein he explains his own Opinion, and refutes the Error of Paulus Samoſatenus, whom he looked upon as ſo great a Criminal for advancing this Error, that he would not even condeſcend to Salute him in his Letter, conſidering him already as an Heretick, and one that was ſeparated from the Church; as we find it obſerved by the Fathers of the Council of Antioch, and by Euſebius after them, in his Seventh Book, Chap. 27. and 29.

Baronius thinks that this Letter of Dionyſius, is the ſame with that which Turrianus publiſhed, which is inſerted in the firſt Volume of the laſt Edition of the Councils, P. 850. But he is miſtaken; for that Letter which the Fathers of the Council of Antioch ſpeak of, was written to the Church of Antioch; whereas we find this is addreſſed to Paulus Samoſatenus, as appears by theſe firſt words: We Anſwer what you demand of us, that we may oblige you to ſpeak your Thoughts plainly and openly. From whence it is manifeſt, That this Letter, if it is not Suppoſititious, was written ſoon after the Firſt Synod of Antioch, when Paulus Samoſatenus promiſed to renounce his Opinion; and in all appearance ſeem'd to have chang'd it effectually. But it's probable enough, that this Letter, which is cited by ſome of the Ancients, and which was unknown to the World before Turrianus's time, was never writen by Dionyſius of Alexandria. For in the firſt place, The Fathers of the Second Council of Antioch tell us plainly, That Dionyſius of Alexandria would by no means ſalute Paulus Samoſatenus: What reaſon is there therefore to imagine, that he wrote to him twice, as this Letter ſuppoſes? Secondly, The Style of this Letter is extreamly different from that of the other Letters writ by Dionyſius. In the third place, the Author of this Letter approves of the Word Conſubſtantial, and expreſly tells us, That the Fathers called the Son of God by that Name. Now it is certain, that both Dionyſius of Alexandria, and the Synod of Antioch, diſallowed that term; and in the time of S. Dionyſius, a Man could not ſay, that the Fathers commonly made uſe of it. And if S. Dionyſius of Alexandria had ever uſed it, is it to be believed that S. Athanaſius would have forgotten or omitted ſo memorable a Paſſage, when he was writing in his Defence?

It is not to be imagined, that we have given a Catalogue of all the Works of Dionyſius of Alexandria; for he compoſed ſo great a Number, that notwithſtanding all the Diligence that Euſebius uſed in drawing a perfect Catalogue, he is forced to ſay at laſt, and ſeveral other Letters. Now the Letters of this Father, were Treatiſes, and his Treatiſes were written in the way of Letters; for after this manner he wrote ſome Books concerning Nature to a young Gentleman named Timotheus; a Book of Temptations to Euphranor, and ſeveral Letters to Baſilides; in one of which, he tells him that he had compoſed composed a Commentary upon the beginning of Ecclesiastes. We have only now one of his Letters to Basilides, Printed in the first Tome of the Councils, where he treats of some matters relating to Discipline. 'Tis divided into Four Canons; in the First of which, he discourses about the Fast, which the Ancient Christians observed before Easter; and tells us, That some Christians fasted Six days before Easter; others Two, others Three, after an extraordinary manner; That we ought not to break our Fast before Midnight; and that those that were able to hold on till Easter-morning, were more generous; That there were some Persons, who, though they did not fast at all, nay, had spent the Four first days of the last Week in sumptuous and delicate Entertainments, yet imagined they did Wonderful things in fasting only two days: But that they were not to be compared with those that fasted several. In the second Canon he says, That Women ought not to enter into the Church, or receive the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ while they have their Courses, but to offer their Prayers to God at Home; since none by right ought to enter the Sanctum Sanctorum, that is not pure in Body and Spirit. In the Third, he particularly Counsels those that are superannuated, to abstain from the use of Marriage, that they may the better attend their Devotions. In the Fourth, he leaves those Persons that have had an Illusion in the Night-time, at liberty to receive or forbear the Eucharist; following the Dictates and Motions of their own Conscience. S. Dionysius.

Anastasius of Nice, in his 23d Question upon Genesis, cites a Passage drawn out of a Book of Dionysius of Alexandria against Origen; but there is no ground to believe that it was written by our Dionysius, who was so far from being his Adversary, that he was both his Disciple and Defender. He died in the Year 264, after he had held the See of Alexandria Seventeen years, and had one Maximus for his Successor. The Style of this Author is Pompous and Lofty; he is excellent in his Descriptions and Exhortations; in his Polemical Discourses he falls upon his Adversaries with all the Vigour imaginable; he perfectly well understood the Opinion, the Discipline and Precepts of the Church; he had sound piercing Judgment; he was very moderate, very discreet, and ready to take Advice. In short, the Loss of his Works is one of the most considerable Losses we could have sustain'd in this kind.

THEOGNOSTUS.

THEOGNOSTUS of Alexandria, is an Author, (unknown to Eusebius and S. Jerome) whom S. Athanasius cites with Commendation, and whose Books were extant in Photius's time, who read them over. We don't precisely know the time when he liv'd, though we cannot doubt but he was some time after Origen, and long before the Council of Nice. Photius informs us, That he composed Seven Books, Entituled, Hypotyposes; that is to say, Instructions; and he gives us this Account of that Work: In the first Book he treats of the Father, and endeavours to shew, 'That he 'is the Creator of all things, against the Opinion of those that suppose Matter to be Eternal. In the Second Book he advances some Arguments, whereby he pretends it necessarily follows, that the Father had a Son; but speaking of this Son, he says, 'That he is a Creature above all Creatures that 'have Reason: He likewise attributes to the Son of God several other Qualities of the like Nature, as 'Origen has done: Whether he was of the same Opinion, or whether he speaks after that manner, ra-'ther by way of Disputation, than a Design to propose his own true Doctrin; or in short, whether he 'was somewhat mistaken in the Truth, and that to accommodate himself to the weakness of his Audi-'tors, who having no Knowledge of the true Religion, were not capable of comprehending a perfect 'Instruction, he supposed it most expedient to give them an imperfect Knowledge of the Son of God. 'than not to speak of him at all. But though a Man may follow this Method in a Dispute, or in a 'Discourse, when he is constrained to say the same things often, that are not altogether conformable 'to his own Opinion of the matter; yet 'tis a Weakness to make use of this Pretence, to excuse those 'Errours that are published in any Book, where we are obliged to speak the Truth to all the World. 'In the Third Book, speaking of the Holy Ghost, he brings some Arguments to prove, that there is an 'Holy Ghost; but in the rest he falls into the same Extravagancies with those of Origen in his Book 'of Principles. In the Fourth Book he talks erroneously about Angels and Dæmons, and assigns small 'Bodies to them. In the Fifth and Sixth, he treats of the Incarnation, and uses all his Endeavours to 'demonstrate after this manner, That it was possible for God to make himself Man. This Book 'likewise is full of several groundless Fancies: As for Example, when he has a mind to prove that 'the Son of God is circumscribed in Place by our Imagination; though in Truth he cannot be known 'there. In the Seventh Book, which he wrote concerning the Creation of God, he discourseth of 'matters of Religion after a manner conformable to the Doctrin of the Church, and especially of the 'Son of God, of whom he treats in the Last Part. His Style is elevated, and very Ἀπέρτλος καὶ ἔοικὸς 'His Discourses have the Beauty of Old Athens, but without Affectation, so that in his Compositions 'he does not go very far from the ordinary manner of Conversation; and yet he avoids saying mean 'things. Theognostus

Thus I have shewn you what Photius has informed us of this Author. S. Athanasius calls him an Admirable Man, Studious and Eloquent; and is so far from accusing him for having any Unorthodox Sentiments about the Divinity of the Word, that he cites him as a witness of Consubstantiality. 'Learn, says he, O Arians, ye Rebels to Jesus Christ, that the Eloquence of Theognostus has made use 'of the Word Substance; for behold after what manner he discourseth in his Second Book of In- structions:

Theognoſtus

'ſtructions: The Subſtance of the Son is not a ſtrange Subſtance; he was not produced of nothing, but 'was begotten of the Subſtance of the Father, as the Ray is of the Light, or a Vapour of Water; 'for the Vapour is not Water, nor is the Ray Light; but neither one nor the other is a Stranger to that 'which produces it: Thus the Son is at it were the gentle running of the Subſtance of the Father; yet 'ſo as that the Father ſuffers no Diviſion: For as the Sun is not diminiſhed, though it produces Rayes 'continually; ſo likewiſe the Father is not diminiſhed in begetting the Son, who is his Image. This Paſſage, and the Authority of S. Athanaſius, ought to convince us, that Photius has wrongfully accuſed Theognoſtus to have erred concerning the Divinity of the Son, upon the ſcore of a few Expreſſions that did not agree with thoſe of his own Age; without taking notice, that though the Ancients have ſpoken differently as to this Point, yet the Foundation of the Doctrin was always the ſame; and that it is an horid Injuſtice to require them to ſpeak as nicely, and with as much precaution, as thoſe that lived after the Birth and Condemnation of Hereſies. But 'tis an ordinary Fault with Photius, who lived in an Age when theſe Myſteries were illuſtrated, and in which People talk'd with a great deal of exactneſs, to condemn the Ancients almoſt all along with too much Severity.

The ſame S. Athanaſius in another Work concerning the Explication of theſe words in the Goſpel; He that blaſphemes againſt the Holy Ghoſt ſhall receive forgiveneſs of his Sin, neither in this World, nor in that to come; tells us, that Origen and Theognoſtus have written, that the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt was falling away after Baptiſm. And after he has delivered the Paſſage out of Origen, he likewiſe adds that out of Theognoſtus, who ſays, 'That he who has paſſed only the Firſt or Second Bounds is leſs cul-'pable; but he that paſſes the Third, has no hopes of Pardon. That the Firſt and Second Bound is the Knowledge of the Father, and that the Third is Baptiſm, which makes us Partakers of the Holy Ghoſt; which is confirmed by theſe Words of the Goſpel, I have ſtill many things to tell you, &c. after which, continues he, 'Our Saviour levels, if I may ſo ſay, his Diſcourſe in favour of thoſe who cannot com-'prehend the moſt perfect things; whereas the Holy Ghoſt dwells in thoſe that are perfect. But we 'muſt not therefore conclude, That the Doctrin of the Holy Ghoſt ſurpaſſeth that of Jeſus Chriſt, but 'that our Saviour abaſeth himſelf in favour of thoſe that are not altogether perfect; whereas the Holy 'Ghoſt is the Seal of Perfection, which we receive in Baptiſm: Thus it is not that the Holy Ghoſt is 'more excellent than the Son, becauſe the Sin which is committed againſt him, is without hopes of 'Remiſſion; but it is, that theſe imperfect Men, that is to ſay, thoſe that are not baptized, may ob-'tain Forgiveneſs of their Sin; whereas thoſe that have once taſted the Celeſtial Gifts, and once are 'touched, have no more excuſe, nor means to avoid Puniſhment. S. Athanaſius afterwards confutes this Explication, which appears to be very agreeable to the Opinion of Novatian, and gives another Interpretation, which is far more Natural.

ATHENOGENES.

Athenogenes.

TO Theognoſtus we may joyn the Martyr Athenogenes, who compoſed a Hymn, before he was caſt into the Fire, wherein he ſpeaks of the Trinity; as S. Baſil aſſures us in the 29th Chapter of his Book of the Holy Ghoſt.

DIONYSIUS Biſhop of Rome.

Dionyſius.

Dionyſius Biſhop of Rome, who preſided in that See, from the Year 258. to the Year 270. writ a Letter againſt the Sabellians, a Fragment whereof remains ſtill preſerved by S. Athanaſius in his Book concerning the Deciſion of the Council of Nice; in which, diſcourſing againſt the Sabellians, he falls upon the contrary Doctrin, that was afterwards maintained by the Arians. He proves that the Word was not Created, but Begotten of the Father from all Eternity, and diſtinctly explains the Myſtery of the Trinity. This Fragment is plainly taken out of a Letter written by Dionyſius, in the Name of the Roman Synod, at the time when Dionyſius of Alexandria was accuſed of falling into the oppoſite Errour to that of the Sabellians.

MALCHION.

Malchion.

Malchion, a very Eloquent Man, was, after he had taught the prophane Sciences with a great deal of Reputation in the City of Antioch, ordained Presbyter of that Church, for the Purity of his Faith and his Doctrin. He had a famous Diſpute againſt Paulus Samoſatenus in the Second Council of Antioch, held in the Year 270. in which after he had clearly diſcovered the Errours which that Heretick endeavoured to conceal, he prevailed with the Council to condemn him. This Conference was taken in Writing by ſome Notaries, and was extant not only in the time of Euſebius and S. Jerome, who mention it, but alſo in the time of Leontius; that is to ſay, towards the end of the Sixth Sixth Century: He speaks of it in his First Book against the Nestorians, and recites some Fragments of it in the Third Book. However it is not certain that they are genuine any more than the Fragments of another Letter of the Council of Antioch, mentioned by Eusebius. S. Jerome tells us, that he was likewise Author of a Letter written in the Name of that Council, against Paulus Samosatenus, and spoken of by Eusebius in the Seventh Book of his History, Chap. 30. Malchion.

ARCHELAUS.

ARchelaus Bishop of Mesopotamia, published a Dispute in the Syriack Language, which he had with a Heretick of the Manichean Party, that came out of Persia; and S. Jerome assures us, that in his time it was Translated into Greek. This Author flourished in the time of the Emperour Probus. There is a Fragment of this Writing in the Sixth Catechetick Lecture of S. Cyril of Jerusalem. [This Dispute it self, translated into Latin by an Ancient Hand, was published by Valesius at the end of his Edition of Socrates and Sozomen at Paris, 1668. It is imperfect. Bigotius found it in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and communicated it to Valesius.] Archelaus.

ANATOLIUS.

ABout the same time, under the same Emperour, and under Carus his Successor, Anatolius also flourish'd, born at Alexandria, and Bishop of Laodicea in Syria; a Man of profound Learning, very well skilled in Arithmetick, Geometry, Physick, Astronomy, Grammar, and Rhetorick. Eusebius and S. Jerome assures us, that the greatness of his Spirit, the force of his Eloquence, and the depth of his Knowledge, abundantly appear in a Book of his concerning Easter; and that he shew'd the Dexterity of his Address and Politicks in the Siege of Alexandria, which by his Prudent Counsels he saved from an entire Destruction that threatned it. Eusebius in the last Chapter of his Seventh Book, has preserved a Fragment of this Treatise about Easter, concerning the time wherein that Festival is to be celebrated. This same Author likewise composed Ten Books of Arithmetick, and left behind him several Monuments of his Learning and Exactness; particularly in those things that concerned the Holy Scriptures. Anatolius.

Ægidius Bucherius hath given us an entire Version of the Treatise about Easter by Anatolius, which he Copied out of an ancient Manuscript. He pretends that it was done by Ruffinus, and that it answers the Treatise of Anatolius. And indeed, the Fragment cited by Eusebius, is to be found intirely in Latin, and the Passages cited by Bede are there word for word. But it would be no strange thing, for an Impostor to insert a Passage mentioned by Eusebius, that was so easie to find, and for this Work to be forged since Bede's time. Though I am of Opinion, That this Canon is ancient, though full of Errours, and perhaps a little corrupted by him that Translated it.

VICTORINUS.

VIctorinus Bishop of Passaw (a), a City of the ancient Pannonia, situate upon the Drave in Styria, and not of Poictiers in France, passeth for a very indifferent Author. (b) S. Jerome says of him, That he did not understand Latin so well as Greek; that the Style of his Works is simple and mean, Victorinus.

(a) Bishop of Passaw, a City of the Ancient Pannonia, and not of Poictiers in France.] Monsieur Launoy has written a Dissertation on purpose, to prove that he was not Bishop of Poictiers in France, but of a City in Pannonia called Petabion or Petavion, now called Passaw. He quotes in this Dissertation Five several places of S. Jerome, where mention is made of this Victorinus, twice in his Catalogue, once against Vigilantius, once against Helvidius, and once upon the Thirty sixth Chapter of Ezekiel; we find in the ancient Editions Petabionensis, or Petavionensis, or Pictabiensis, or Pictabionensis; and that he is also called by this Name in the Martyrologies of Usuardus and Ado, and in some other Ancient Writers, as well as in the first Edition of the Councils by Merlinus; and in the Edition of the Commentary upon the Apocalypse attributed to this Author. And he concludes from all these Authorities, and from several other Reasons that he produceth, that this Victorinus was not Bishop of Poictiers, but of a certain City in Pannonia called Petabion or Petavion, and now Passaw. He likewise observes in another small Dissertation, that there were five Authors of this Name. The First is the Defender of the Opinion of Praxeas, whereof Tertullian makes mention. The Second is our Author. The Third is a Rhetorician of Rome, of whom S. Austin speaks in the Eighth Book of his Confessions, Chap. 2. The Fourth it mentioned by Gennadius, who was of Marseilles. And the Last is an Orator, Surnamed Lampadius, mentioned by Photius, Cod. 101. See this Dissertation.

(b) St. Jerome saith of him, that he did not understand Latin so well as Greek.] These Passages of S. Jerome Victorinus. S. Jerome are in this Catalogue: Non æque Latine ut Græce noverat; inde opera ejus grandia ſenſibus, viliora ſunt compoſitione verborum. And in his Commentary upon Iſaiah, Lib. 1. Imperitus ſermone, non tamen ſcientia. Epiſt. ad Magnum: Victorino Martyri in ſuis libris licet deſit eruditio, non deeſt tamen eruditionis voluntas.

though the Senſe is very high; that he had no Notion of Style, though he underſtood the Holy Scriptures very well; that he had no Learning, but that he had great Inclinations that way. His Works, whereof S. Jerome has compoſed a Catalogue, are, beſides a Treatiſe againſt all Hereſies, ſome Commentaries upon Geneſis, Exodus, Leviticus, Iſaiah; and as far as the Viſion of the Four-footed Beaſts in Ezechiel; Eccleſiaſtes, the Canticles, and the (c) Revelations.

We have in the Bibliotheca Patrum, a Commentary upon the Apocalypſe by Victorinus, with a Preface attributed to S. Jerome. It is ſaid in this Preface, That Victorinus was of the ſame Opinion with Papias and Nepos, touching the Reign of the Thouſand Years; and the very ſame thing is likewiſe obſerved by S. Jerome in his Catalogue: Nevertheleſs we find the contrary in this Commentary, and that Opinion ſeems to be plainly rejected there, as belonging to the Heretick Cerinthus. There is alſo mentioned in this Book an Epitome of Theodorus, who reckoned Twenty Four Books of the Old Teſtament. Now this Theodorus, having lived under Juſtinian, we muſt of neceſſity conclude, that the Author of this Commentary lived ſince that time; however, 'tis far more probable that this Citation of Theodorus has been added ſince, becauſe the Author of this Commentary lived before Juſtinian's Age. For he believed with the Ancients, that the Souls of Men ſhould not be happy till after the Day of Judgment; and that Nero was Antichriſt; which Opinions were no where maintained in Juſtinian's time. 'Tis likewiſe very probable, that they have altered ſomewhat of what he ſays in his Commentary concerning the Reign of the Thouſand Years; beſides that, he formerly rejects only the Errour of Cerinthus, who believed no other Beatitude but that of a Temporal Reign. 'I don't 'believe, ſays he, that the Reign of the Thouſand Years will be at the end of the Judgment; or if 'there is one, we ought to believe that it ends after the Thouſand Years are compleated. Thus we cannot be certainly aſſured, that this Commentary does not belong to Victorinus; on the contrary, 'tis ſomewhat probable that it is his.

(c) And upon the Revelations.] He likewiſe wrote ſome other Works, and made a Commentary upon St. Matthew, as S. Jerome tells us, Præfat. in Matth. And in his Catalogue he ſays, That he compoſed ſeveral other Works.

PIERIUS.

Pierius. PIerius, a Prieſt and Catechiſt of Alexandria, Inſtructed the People of that Church under the Empire of Carus and Diocleſian, at the ſame time when Theonas was Biſhop of that place. He compoſed ſeveral ſorts of Treatiſes, that were extant in S. Jerome's time, with ſo muh Eloquence, that he was called the young Origen. It is certain, he lived a very auſtere Life, and embraced a voluntary Poverty. He was excellently well skilled in Logick and Rhetorick. The Perſecution being ended, he came to Rome, where he continued a conſiderable time. He wrote a great Homily upon Hoſea, which he recited on Eaſter-Eve, wherein he takes notice, that in his time on Eaſter-Eve the People tarried in the Church till after Midnight. Photius tells us, That in this Homily he diſcourſed about the Cherubims that Moſes placed over the Ark. The ſame Author read another Work compoſed by Pierius, but he does not acquaint us with the Title of it, that contained a dozen Volumes; in which according to the Teſtimony of Photius, he has ſome particular Opinions different from thoſe of the Church. His Doctrin upon the Trinity is Orthodox concerning the Perſons of the Father and the Son, though he uſes the Word Subſtance and Nature to ſignify a Perſon. But his manner of ſpeaking about the Holy Ghoſt is dangerous, and ſcarce Orthodox; becauſe he ſays, That the Glory of the Latter is leſs than the Glory of the Father and the Son. Photius moreover adds, That he wrote a Book upon S. Luke's Goſpel; in which he proves, That the Diſ-reſpect ſhewn to Images, falls back upon that which they repreſent. As for his Style, he tells us, It is clear, ſmooth and eaſie; that it is by no means elaborate, but flows equally and gently, as in Diſcourſes compoſed Extempore; and that it is full of Enthymems.

METHODIUS.

Methodius. METhodius, Biſhop of Olympus or (a) Patara in Lycia, and afterwards of Tyre in Paleſtine, (who ſuffered Martyrdom at Chalcis, a City of Greece, towards the end of Diocleſian's Perſecution in the Year 302, or 303.) compoſed in a clear elaborate Style, a large Work againſt Porphyrius the Philoſopher; an excellent Treatiſe about the Reſurrection againſt Origen; another about the Pythonyſſa againſt the ſame; a Book Entituled, The Banquet of Virgins; one about Free-Will; Commentaries upon

(a) Or Patarah.] S. Jerome tells us, he was Bishop of Olympus; Suidas adds, or of Patara. Though we are not therefore to think that there were two Methodius's. But it is probable that Patara, which was a City of Lycia, was likewise called Olympus; because it was built upon a Mountain so called. Methodius likewise calls himself Eubulus, and that is the Name he uses in his Banquet of Virgins. Eusebius does not speak of this Author, because he wrote against Origen. S. Jerom reports, That some Persons said, he suffered Martyrdom in the time of Decius and Valerian; which Account is followed by Suidas. But S. Jerom, and the Martyrologies after him, relate, that he suffered Martyrdom at Chalcis, towards the End of the last Persecution. Methodius.

upon Genesis and the Canticles, and several other Pieces that were extant in S. Jerom's time. At present, besides The Banquet of Virgins that was published entire not along ago by Possinus a Jesuit, we have several considerable Fragments of this Author cited by S. Epiphanius and Photius, and others, found in Manuscripts, and collected together by Father Combesis, who has Printed them, together with the Works of Amphilochius and Andreas Cretensis. But afterwards Possinus found The Banquet of Virgins entire in a Manuscript belonging to the Vatican Library, and Translated it into Latin, and sent it into France, where it was Printed in the Year 1657. Revised and Corrected by another Manuscript. We cannot doubt, that this is the true genuine Work of Methodius; as well because it carries all the Marks of Antiquity in it, that a Book can possibly have; as also because it contains Word for Word all the Passages that Photius has cited out of this Work of Methodius, and another place cited by S. Gregory Nyssen. 'Tis written by way of Dialogue, in which he introduces a Woman named Gregorium, who tells her Friend Eubulus all the Conversation that passed in a Meeting of Ten Virgins, which she learnt of Thebpatra. It was composed by Methodius, in imitation of a certain Book, very much resembling it, written by Plato, and Entituled, The Banquet of Socrates. After that Gregorium and Eubulus have exchanged the usual Complements, and Gregorium has given a short Description of the Place, where these Ten Virgins were assembled; she feigns that Arete, in whose Garden they were met, requests each of them to make a Discourse upon Virginity; which she repeats one after the other.

The first is that of Marcella, who enlarges very much upon the Greatness and Excellence of Virginity. She makes it appear how choice a thing Virginity is; and that it is a difficult thing to preserve it amidst so many Thousand Temptations we meet with: That it is necessary to meditate incessantly upon the Holy Scripture, in order to keep it unspotted and undefiled: That Virginity was scarce so much as known under the ancient Law, when Men were permitted to Marry even their own Sisters, and to take several Wives: But that God by little and little has taught Men, in the first place to preserve their Chastity, and afterwards to embrace Virginity: That Jesus Christ came into the World to instruct them in this Virtue by the Influence of his own Example; that he is the Prince of Virgins, as well as the Prince of Pastors; that the Company of Virgins has the first place in his Kingdom, tho' they are the least in number: And this she justifies by a Passage out of the Revelations, Chap. the 14th.

Since this Conversation of Marcella might seem to throw some Dis-reputation upon the Sanctity of Marriage, Theophila proves in the second place, that Jesus Christ in making the great Excellencies of Virginity known to the World, did not design thereby to banish Marriage, and entirely abolish so Sacred an Institution. She says, That the Ecstasie of Adam denotes and signifies the Passion of Marriage; that God is the Author of Generation, and that he forms the Infants that come into the World. Here Marcella interrupts the Series of her Discourse, and enquires of her, How it comes to pass; if Infants are conceived and born by the Will of God, that he permits the Children of Adulterers to come into the World; that these Children thrive, and are often more perfect in their Body and Mind, and also become better Christians than others: That nevertheless, Experience daily acquaints us with the truth of this Assertion; so that we ought to understand this Saying in the Scripture, The Children of Adulterers shall be consumed by Fire, only of those that corrupt the Word of God. Theophila returns this Answer to the Objection, That God is not the Author of Adulterers, though he forms the Infants that are born of such Copulations; and this she illustrates by the Example of a Man that makes Earthen Vessels in a place enclosed with four Walls full of Holes, through which he is furnished with Clay, of which he makes his Work: Now if those that serve him are mistaken in taking one hole for another, and it so happen that his Work is not such as it ought to be, the fault would lie neither in the Workman himself, nor in the Clay, but in those that had made a wrong Application of the matter; That after the same manner, we ought not to cast the Sin of Adulterers either upon God that makes Men, or upon the Matter of which they are made, or upon the Power that is given to Men to beget Children, but upon the Wicked Inclinations of those Persons that use these things in a dishonest manner; that every thing in the World is really Good in it self, but becomes Ill through the ill use and management of it. She continues afterwards to prove, by the admirable Beauty and Harmony that so visibly appears in the Contexture of our Bodies, that God is the Author of them. She observes that all Infants, even those that are begotten in Adultery, have their tutelar Angels to guard them immediately after their Conception: that the Soul is in its Nature immortal; that it is not generated by our Parents, but proceeds from God who inspireth it. In short, after she has thus answered this Objection, she concludes, That it is permitted for Men to Marry, tho' Virginity is a more perfect State than Marriage.

The Third Discourse goes under the Name of Thalia, who applies the words of Adam to his Wife in Genesis, to our Blessed Saviour Jesus Christ, and his Church; and following the Opinion of the Apostle, she adds, That the Word was the Wisdom of God; who existing before all Ages, communicated himself after a very particular manner to the first Man; but that Man having violated and transgressed Methodius. the Commandments of God, became Mortal and Corruptible; and that it was necessary for the Word to make himself Man, to deliver him from the Curse and Tyranny he had rendred himself obnoxious to, and save him from Corruption by his own Death and Resurrection. That it is upon this account that the Son of God came into the World, to unite himself to the Church, as to his Spouse, which through this means became his Flesh and his Bone; that he died for her; that he purified her by Baptism, and by his Holy Spirit; that these words, Increase and Multiply, are accomplished and fulfilled every day in the Church, which encreases in Greatness and Beauty by the Communication of the Word, and by the Union it maintains with him; that Catechumens are as it were Infants, that are as yet in their Mothers Belly, that being perfectly instructed, they are born through Baptism, and at last become perfect full-grown Men; that we ought not therefore to abuse these Words, and employ them, to oppose Virginity, to which S. Paul exhorts the Faithful, not allowing Marriage it self, and second Marriages in particular, but as a Remedy for Incontinence; like one that should desire a Person that is Sick and Indisposed to eat on a Fast-day, and say to him, It were to be wished that you were able to Fast, as all of us have done to day, for you know eating is forbidden; but since you are sick, it is expedient for you to eat, that you may not die.

In the Fourth Discourse, that goes under the Name of Theopatra, it is maintained, That nothing is more efficacious than Virginity, to make a Man enter again into Paradise, and enjoy a blessed Immortality.

In the Fifth, Thalusa endeavours to demonstrate, That the most excellent Gift we can present to God, and the most worthy of Him, is to embrace Virginity; and she gives several Cautions and Advertisements to Virgins how to preserve their Virginity without Spot or Blemish.

Agatha, that manages the Conference after Thalusa, undertakes to prove in the Sixth Discourse, that Virginity ought to be accompanied with Vertue and good Works; and to this purpose she explains the Parable of the Ten Virgins.

Procella afterwards begins the Seventh Discourse, wherein she shews the Excellency of Virginity; because of all Vertues, this is that which has the Honour to be the Spouse of Jesus Christ. She explains a certain place out of the Sixth Chapter of the Canticles, ver. 7. and 8. There are threescore Queens, and fourscore Concubines, and Virgins without number. My dove, my undefiled is but one.

Thecla, assuming the Discourse after this, observes, That the Greek word that signifies Virginity, only by adding one Letter to it, denotes an Union with God, and a frequentation of Heavenly Things. She takes occasion from thence to shew, That Virginity elevates us up to Heaven, and makes us despise the Vanity of things below; and having cited a place in the Revelations, Chap. 12. concerning a Woman that is there described, she explains it of the Church. In short, after she has drawn some Allegories from Numbers, she exhorts all Virgins to persevere in their Virginity, and to resist the Attacks of the Serpent; that is to say, the Temptations of the Devil. From thence she launches out into other matter, and shews that Men are free Agents, and that they are not necessitated to do good or ill by the Influences and Configurations of the Stars, deriding the Effects that the Astrologers attribute to the Constellations because of their Names. 'For, says she, if there was any such thing as fatal Ne-'cessity from the beginning of the World, it was to no purpose for God to place the Stars of Men, and 'the Stars of Beasts in order; and that if there was not a necessity at that time, wherefore should God 'establish it, since the World was then in its full perfection, and in a time which they called the Golden 'Age? She afterwards demonstrates, That if we were necessitated by the Fatality of our Nativity under such and such a Constellation, it would follow, that God who is the Author of the Stars, and of their Motion and Disposition, would likewise be the Author of Sin and Iniquity. She adds, That Laws being contrary to things that are done by a fatal Necessity, it is impossible that these Laws should be made by mere Fatality. 'For, says she, it is not to be supposed that this Fatality would destroy it self. Now, if those that had a share in making these Laws, were not subject to this fatal Necessity, why should we not pass the very same Judgment upon others? Besides, if such a Fatality really took place, it would be Injustice either to recompence the Good, or punish the Bad; or rather, there would be neither Good nor Evil in the World, since every one would be constrained to Good or Evil. Afterwards to explain the Cause of Evil, she says, There are two contrary Motions in us; one of which is called the Concupiscence of the Flesh; the other, the Concupiscence of the Spirit; that This is the Original of all Good, and the Other the Cause of all Evil.

After this, Tysiana taking up the Discourse, explains in the Ninth Discourse a place of Leviticus, v. 36. Chap. 23. where mention is made of the Feast of the Seventh Month; that is to say, the Fifteenth of September, which is the Scenopegia, or Feast of Tabernacles. She reprehends the Jews for stopping at the bare Letter of Scripture, without penetrating into the hidden mysterious Sense; and for taking the Figures of things to come, as Marks of things that were already past. She instances in the Paschal Lamb, which they did not comprehend to be a Type of Jesus Christ, who at the Day of Judgment shall save Souls marked with his own Blood; That the Law was the Figure of the Gospel; That these Shadows and Representations are no more, but that we shall have a perfect Knowledge of all things when we shall be raised up from the Dead; That Man was created Immortal, but that his Sin causing him to incline towards the Earth, God made him Mortal, lest he should continue a Sinner everlastingly; That for this reason he separated the Soul from the Body; that so the Sin, which is in the Body, being dead and destroyed, he might raise it up again immortal, and delivered from the tyranny of Sin; That we ought to adorn this Body, which may be called a Tabernacle, with Faith, with Charity, Vertue, and particularly with Chastity; That those that live chastly in the state of Marriage, adorn it in part, but not so perfectly as those that have made a Profession of Virginity; That those Persons who have thus adorned and set out the Tabernacle of their Bodies in this Life, shall enjoy after the Resurrection a Thousand Years of Repose and Felicity upon the Earth with Jesus Christ, that afterwards they shall follow him to Heaven; and that this is the promised Beatitude, in which there shall be no more Tabernacles; that is to say, in which our Bodies shall be changed, and become incorruptible, and Men shall be made like Angels. Methodius.

Lastly, Domnina, to shew the Excellency of Virginity, falls into a very obscure Allegory upon a place of Scripture taken out of the Book of Judges. After her Harangue is ended, Arete, assuming the Discourse, tells them, That to be truly a Virgin, it is not sufficient barely to preserve and keep Continence of Body, but that it is likewise necessary to purifie ones self from all Sensual Desires; That we actually dishonour and sully Virginity, when we abandon our selves to Pride, or permit a Spirit of Vanity to possess us, because we have preserved our Bodies chaste; That this is to do like the Pharisees, who made every thing appear clean without, while they were full of Impurities within; That we ought to be Virgins both in Body and Spirit, and that we must watch and labour incessantly, lest Idleness and Negligence give an open entrance to other Sins. After this Discourse, all of them sing their Prayers, and several times repeat, 'I preserve my self chaste for thee, O my divine Spouse, and desire to walk 'before thee with a burning Lamp. At last Gregorium and Methodius, Surnamed Eubulus, who entertained themselves with the Discourses of these Virgins, discuss this Question, viz. Who were the most perfect Virgins, either those that feel no Motions of Desire, or those that feel them, and though they are assaulted and tormented by them, yet heroically resist and extinguish them? Gregorium gave the preference to the first: But Methodius shews her by the Example of Mariners, Physicians and Wrestlers, that those Virgins who preserve themselves chaste in the midst of those violent Agitations and Tempests that are excited by their Passions, who have the Art to cure the various Diseases of Concupiscence, and cannot only resist, but also defeat the disorderly Motions of the Flesh, deserve a great deal more than those that have no Appetites and Inclinations to struggle with.

This Dialogue is full of Allegories and Citations out of Scripture, explained in a mystical Sense; and the Doctrin contained in it is exceeding Orthodox. He does not condemn, or speak dishonourably of Marriage, even when he is setting out Virginity to the greatest Advantages; a Moderation seldom to be found in the Ancients. Photius tells us, That this Book has been corrupted by the Hereticks; and that there are some Expressions in it, which the Arians use. And indeed he tells us in the Seventh Discourse, That the Son who is above all Creatures, made use of the Testimony of the Father, who alone is greater than he. But if by reason of this single Expression, we must immediately cry out, that this Dialogue has been abused by the Arians, we must likewise say the same thing of the Gospel of S. John; and there is no greater difficulty in giving a good Sense to this Expression in Methodius, than in the Gospel; and so much the rather, since in the same place, and indeed as often as he speaks of the WORD in this Dialogue, he says, That he was before all Ages: And towards the end of the following Discourse, which is the Eighth, explaining these Words of the Psalmist, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. 'We ought to observe, cries he, that he says, Thou art my Son; being 'willing to have it known that he had from all time the quality of the Son, that he will never cease to 'have it, and that he who was begotten, was, and ever will be the same. As for what concerns the 'following Passage, this day have I begotten thee; it is to shew, that he who was before all Ages in Hea-'ven, was born in time for the good of the World. A little after he takes occasion to speak of the 'Hereticks, who have erred concerning the Trinity. Some of them, says he, as Sabellius, have erred 'concerning the Person of the Father, who maintained, that it was the Almighty that suffered: Others 'concerning the Son, as Artemas and some others, that affirm, he was only a Man in outward appear-'ance: Others concerning the Holy Ghost, as the Ebionites, who pretend that the Prophets spoke of 'themselves: For I will not speak of Marcelion, Valentinus and Helcesaites. These Words demonstrate, that we may very well defend Methodius from the Imputation of any Error concerning the Trinity. I cannot spend any more time to observe, that he taught the Opinion of the Millenaries in this Treatise, or to give an exact relation of his Doctrin, which may be learnt out of the Abridgment we have made of his Banquet of the Virgins. The Treatise of the Resurrection was written against Origen's Opinion, who believed that Men were not to be raised up again from the Dead in the Flesh. This Book also was composed in form of a Dialogue between Aglaophon, who maintained Origen's Assertion, and Proclus, and Methodius or Eubulus, who dispute against him. S. Epiphanius has cited a large Fragment of it in his Account of the Heresie of Origen; and Father Combefis has added some other Fragments to it, taken out of a Manuscript of Sermondus. He first of all proves under the Person of Proclus, That Man was created Immortal; that Death was occasioned by his Sin, of which it is the Punishment; That Sin was caused by the Envy of the Devil; and that the Devil himself, who was created in Righteousness like to the other Angels, fell through the Sin of Envy, and an inordinate Passion he had for Women; That our first Parents had a real Body and real Flesh before their Transgression; That the Fig-leaves wherewith they covered themselves, denote that after the Death of Man, Sin shall be entirely rooted out of the Heart: For, tho' Men's Sins are blotted out by Baptism, yet nevertheless there remains a Root still, that shoots up young Branches in this Life: So that all we can do to hinder these Branches from spreading, is to root them up, and prune them often with the Pruning knife of the Word of God. He tells us, that Man is like a cast Statue, which having been disfigured by some Accident, the Workman that made it, casts it anew before he erects it again; That after the same manner, God Almighty who made Man, was willing that his Work which was disfigured by Sin, Methodius. ſhould be deſtroy'd by Death, that ſo he might re-eſtabliſh him by the Reſurrection; That it is a folly to imagine a Reſurrection of the Soul, ſince the Soul does not die; That Air, Earth, Heaven and the World ſhall not be deſtroy'd at the Day of Judgment, but that they ſhall only be purged and renewed by the Fire of Heaven; That Men ſhall not change their Nature at the Reſurrection, and that they ſhall not be transformed into Angels, but that they ſtill have Body and Fleſh, though immortal and incorruptible. All this is extracted from the words of Proclus. S. Epiphanius afterwards cites thoſe of Methodius, who continues to refute Origen's Error about the Reſurrection, and who likewiſe endeavours to prove in the ſame place againſt the ſame Author, That the Body cannot paſs the Chains and Priſon of the Soul; That the Paradice where Adam lived was upon Earth; That Man does not conſiſt of the Soul alone, as Plato believed, but that the Body and Soul are the two parts of him; That 'tis Fabulous to ſay, that Souls were thrown headlong down from Heaven in their Bodies, or that they paſſed through Vortices of Elementary Fire, and through the Waters of the Firmament before they came to the Earth. And at laſt he makes ſeveral curious uſeful Remarks upon the Scriptural Notion of Fleſh, and of the Sin that dwells in our Bodies, explaining at the ſame time ſeveral places of the Apoſtle. Photius has cited theſe Explications all along, and added beſides, what the ſame Author has delivered about thoſe Perſons that were raiſed up to Life before Jeſus Chriſt, about the Apparitions of the Dead, and the Parable of Dives and Lazarus; in which he concludes, that Souls keep the Form of their Bodies in another World, and are there puniſhed and rewarded before the Day of Judgment. There ſtill remains a certain Paſſage of it, which is ſuppoſed to belong to the ſame Work quoted by S. John Damaſcene, in his Third Oration concerning Images; wherein he ſays, 'That Chriſtians make 'Golden Images repreſenting Angels for the Glory of God. But I very much queſtion whether this Paſſage belongs to Methodius; or if it does, it muſt be taken in another ſenſe than that in which S. John Damaſcene underſtood it; and that by Angels, Principalities and Powers, he means the Kings of the Earth, as the Words that immediately precede ſeem to intimate.

The Treatiſe of Free-Will was compoſed in Form of a Dialogue or Diſpute between a Valentinian and a Catholick. The former affirms, That Matter which is Eternal, was the cauſe of Evil, or of Sin. On the other hand, the Orthodox Chriſtian makes it appear, that there could not be two Eternal Principles; that if Matter were Eternal, yet Evil would not be Eternal, becauſe the Qualities of Matter could not be Eternal; that Matter is not the cauſe of Evil; and that God is not the cauſe of Evil, becauſe Evil conſiſts not in a real thing, but in the ill uſe that we make of our Liberty: that Man having been created with a Liberty either to obey, or not to obey the Commandments of God he ſins, when uſing this Liberty the wrong way, he does things contrary to the Law of God.

Theſe are the Works of Methodius, which S. Jerom mentions. Photius has made an Extract of a Treatiſe about created Things, written by Methodius. In the Firſt, he ſays, That theſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt, Caſt not Pearl before Swine, ought not to be underſtood of Doctrin, but of Vertues; and that the meaning is not, that we muſt conceal Myſteries from the Infidels, but that we muſt not prophane the Chriſtian Vertues; ſuch as Chaſtity, Temperance and Juſtice, with the Pleaſures of the World that are ſignified by the Swine. In the Second, he confutes thoſe that thought the World had no beginning; an Opinion which he attributes to Origen. In the Third, he ſays, That the Church is ſo called, becauſe it calls Men to fight againſt Pleaſures. [In the Greek Eccleſia, which ſignifies a Church, or any Aſſembly of Men, comes from καλέω, to call; becauſe the Publick Aſſemblies were convened by publick Cryers, who called the People together.] In the Fourth, he ſays, That there were two Vertues or Powers that concurred to the Creation of the World; the Father that created it of nothing, and the Son that poliſhed and compleated the Work of the Father. The Son, ſays he, who is the almighty Hand of the Father. In the Fifth he aſſerts, That Moſes was the Author of the Book of Job; and he explains the firſt Words of the Book of Geneſis, In principio, in the beginning, of the Wiſdom of God. He obſerves, that God the Father begot the Word, or the Wiſdom which was in Him before the Creation of the World; that this Wiſdom being a Principle without Beginning, became the Principle of all Things; which is a Catholick way of ſpeaking, and far remote from the Arian Opinion; though it does not ſeem to be altogether conformable to the Expreſſions of our Age. To conclude, In the laſt Fragment he cites a Paſſage of Origen, who would endeavour to prove by Allegories, That the World exiſted long before the Six Days, that preceded the formation of Adam. Methodius looks upon this as a trifling Opinion.

Theodoret, in his firſt Dialogue, cites a Paſſage taken out of a Sermon of Methodius concerning the Martyrs; where he ſays, that Martyrdom is ſo admirable, and ſo much to be deſired, that Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God would honour it himſelf; and that he who was equal to his Father, was willing to Crown Humane Nature, to which he himſelf was united with that excellent Gift.

The Sermon compoſed upon the Nativity of Jeſus, and upon his being preſented in the Temple, entituled, Simeon and Ann, publiſhed by Pantinus in the Year 1598. and afterwards Printed by Father Combefis among the reſt of the Works of Methodius, is neither cited by any of the Ancients, nor mentioned by Photius, though it is written in Methodius's Style. The Author of it endeavours to confute the Errors of Origen, and calls himſelf the Author of the Banquet of Virgins, in the beginning of his Diſcourſe, which ſhews that it belongs to Methodius. Though we muſt own that he ſpeaks ſo clearly of the Myſteries of the Trinity, of the Incarnation, of the Divinity of the Word, whom he calls in ſeveral places Conſubſtantial to the Father, of the Hymn called the Trifagion, of the Virginity of Mary even after her Delivery, and of Original Sin, that it gives us ſome reaſon to doubt, whether ſomething has not been ſince added to this Sermon. Beſides, the Style of it is more ſwelling, and fuller of Epithets than that of Methodius.

Beſides,

Beſides all this, Father Combefis upon the Authority of a Manuſcript in the King's Library, has reſtored to Methodius another Sermon upon Palm-Sunday, that was formerly Printed under the Name of S. Chryſoſtom, by Sir Henry Savil, upon the Authority of another Manuſcript. It is certain, that it approaches nearer to the Style of Methodius than of S. Chryſoſtom; but he explains the Myſtery of the Trinity ſo clearly in one place, and oppoſes the Hereticks ſo very plainly, that there is ſome reaſon to believe, that either this place has been ſince added, or that this Homily was not written by Methodius. Father Combefis has likewiſe collected ſome other Fragments attributed to Methodius, cited by S. John Damaſcene, and by Nicetas, drawn out of his Books againſt Porphyry. But beſides, that we cannot intirely depend upon the Authority of theſe two Authors, who are not very exact, theſe Fragments having nothing conſiderable, and we think it not worth the while to ſay any thing more concerning them. We ſhall not take any notice of ſome Latin Prophecies about Antichriſt attributed to Methodius, that are Printed in the Bibliotheca Patrum, ſince it is agreed on all Hands that they are not his. Methodius.

The Style of Methodius is Aſiatick, that is to ſay, diffuſe, ſwelling, and full of Epithets. His Expreſſions are Figurative, the turn of his Sentences affected, he is full of Compariſons, and far-fetched Allegories, his Thoughts are myſterious, and he ſays a few things in abundance of Words. Setting theſe things aſide, his Doctrin is ſound, and free from ſome Errors that were common to the Ancients; particularly concerning the Virginity of Mary, concerning Original Sin, concerning Guardian Angels, and ſeveral other Points; as may be obſerved in the Abridgment that we have made of his Works.

PAMPHILUS.

Pamphilus, a Presbyter of Cæſarea in Palæſtine, and (a) Friend of Euſebius, ſuffered Martyrdom, during Maximine's Perſecution. He wrote almoſt nothing himſelf, unleſs it be a few Letters to his Friends; but he took extraordinary pains to gather the (b) Books of ancient Writers, and particularly thoſe of Origen, for whom he had a particular Eſteem. He tranſcribed ſeveral Volumes with his own Hand, and among the reſt, his Twenty Five Books of Commentaries upon the Prophets, and that very Tranſcript was to be ſeen in S. Jerom's time. Pamphilus when he was in Priſon compoſed (c) Five Books with Euſebius in defence of Origen, and Euſebius added a Sixth after his Death. Pamphilus.

(a) Friend of Euſebius.] Euſebius wrote the Life of Pamphilus, and was from him Surnamed Pamphilus.

(b) The Books of ancient Writers.] He laboured along with Euſebius to copy out exactly, and to correct the Verſion of the Septuagint, that was in the Tetrapla, and Hexapla of Origen, intending to publiſh it by it ſelf.

(c) Five Books with Euſebius.] S. Jerom in his Catalogue of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, makes him the Author of the Apology for Origen; but he afterwards retracted what he had ſaid in his Apology againſt Ruffinus. The truth is, The five firſt Books were compoſed by Pamphilus and Euſebius together; and the laſt, which Ruffinus quoted, was Euſebius's alone. See Photius, Cod. 118.

LUCIAN.

Lucian, a Presbyter of Antioch, applied himſelf vigorouſly to the Study of Scripture, and publiſhed a new Edition of the Verſion (a) of the Septuagint, which was afterwards called Lucian's Edition. He was a Man of great Eloquence, and wrote ſeveral ſmall Treatiſes concerning Faith, and ſome Letters. Among others, he wrote one, when he was in Priſon, addreſſed to a Chriſtian of Antioch; the end of which Letter is preſerved in the Chronicle of Alexandria, and is as follows: 'All the 'Martyrs that are with me, Salute you. I ſend you word that Biſhop Anthimus died a Martyr. Lucian is accuſed to have been the firſt Author of the Arian Opinion: And indeed, all the Heads of that Party were his Diſciples. He ſuffered Martyrdom at Nicomedia, under the Perſecution (b) of the Emperor Maximinus, and was Buried at Helenopolis, a City of Bythinia. Lucian.

(a) Of the Septuagint.] The Verſion which he Corrected, was the common Verſion of the Septuagint. Upon this account, S. Jerom (Præfat. in Paralipomena) diſtinguiſhes between three different Editions of the Verſion of the Septuagint. The firſt, was that of Euſebius and Pamphilus, which he calls Palæſtine, that was taken out of the Hexapla of Origen, who corrected it by an ancient Verſion, and added ſeveral things borrowed from the Verſions of Theodotian, Aquila and Symmachus. The Second was that of Alexandria, whereof Heſychius was Author, who likewiſe corrected the common Verſion of the Septuagint. The Laſt, that of Lucian. This gave occaſion to S. Jerom to ſay, That Totus Orbis hac inter ſe trifaria varietate compugnat.

(b) Of the Emperor Maximinus.] Euſebius, l. 9. c. 6. Hierom. in Catalog. And therefore Baronius is miſtaken, when following the Acts of his Martyrdom, he ſays, That he ſuffered under Maximian; for 'tis a common miſtake among the Greeks to take Maximian for Maximin.

PHILEAS.

PHILEAS.

Phileas.

PHileas, deſcended of a Rich and Powerful Family in the City of Thmuis in Ægypt, after having paſſed through ſeveral Offices and Honours, and acquired to himſelf the Repuration of an extraordinary Philoſopher, was elected Biſhop of the City where he lived, and had his Head cut off for the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, under the Emperor Maximinus. Before he ſuffered Martyrdom, he wrote a famous Letter to the Inhabitants of the City of Thmuis; in which he deſcribes the Puniſhments which the Chriſtians were forced to endure in the City of Alexandria. He deſcribes the Conſtancy with which they ſupported themſelves, and exhorts his Flock to keep up the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt after his Death, which he foreſaw would ſhortly happen. Euſebius in the Eighth Book of his Hiſtory, Chapter the Tenth, has preſerved a Fragment of this Eloquent Letter, which S. Jerom ſcruples not to call a Book. He likewiſe tells us, that they had the Anſwers which he made to the Judge, who would have obliged him to offer Sacrifice. We have the Acts of his Martyrdom, that were Printed at Antwerp: But they are corrupt, as moſt of the reſt are; and ſome things are inſerted which are taken out of Euſebius and Ruffinus.

ZENO Biſhop of Verona.

Zeno Biſhop of Verona.

'TIS commonly believed, that there was one Zeno, Biſhop of Verona, that ſuffered Martyrdom under the Empire of Galienus, and ſome Sermons are attributed to him, that were publiſhed by Guarinus, Printed at Venice and Verona in the Years 1508 and 1586. and afterwards inſerted into the Bibliotheca Patrum. But this Author being wholly unknown to all Antiquity, his Works have been abſolutely rejected; nay, ſome have doubted, whether it be true, that there ever was a Biſhop of Verona of that Name, that ſuffered Martyrdom under the Emperor Galienus. S. Gregory the Great is the firſt that ſpeaks of Zeno, as a Martyr; but before him S. Ambroſe, in a Letter written to Syagrius Biſhop of Verona, makes mention of one Zeno, the Predeceſſor of this Syagrius, who ſeems to have govern'd the Church of Verona in the time of Conſtantius, or Julian the Apoſtate. The Teſtimony of S. Ambroſe has obliged thoſe that poſitively maintain that there was one Zeno Biſhop of Verona, a Martyr under the Empire of Galienus; it has obliged them, I ſay, to diſtinguiſh between two Zeno's Biſhop of Verona; one put to Death under Galienus, and another that lived in the time of Julian the Apoſtate. But it is better to own frankly that 'tis a miſtake to believe, that there was one Zeno Biſhop of Verona in the time of Galienus. S. Gregory does indeed give the Name of Martyr to Zeno of Verona, but he does not tell us under what Emperor he ſuffered Martyrdom: And perhaps he might beſtow that Title upon him, becauſe he ſuffered ſome Perſecution under Conſtantius, or Julian the Apoſtate. Be that as it will, Molanus obſerves, That heretofore in the Roman Martyrology, they placed him among the conſiderable Biſhops that were Confeſſors: And Onuphrius Panvinus adds, That the Church of Verona anciently honoured him under that Quality, and that Lippomanus Biſhop of Verona, was the firſt that procured him the honour of a Martyr.

'Tis very certain, that the Sermons which we have under the Name of Zeno, cannot belong to him whom they ſuppoſe to have ſuffered Martyrdom under Galienus; for this Author in his Fifth Sermon ſpeaks of the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt againſt the Hereticks that affirmed the Word to be God, but did not believe him to be Eternal as the Father, and ſuppoſed there was a time when He was not; which viſibly demonſtrates, That the Hereſie of the Arians was then on foot. Neither can theſe Sermons belong to that Zeno of Verona, who lived under Conſtantius and Julian; becauſe they are borrowed out of other Authors. There are Four Sermons of them that are (a) intirely S. Baſil's. All the Homilies upon the Pſalms are taken word for word out of the Commentaries (b) of S. Hilary; which ſhews, That theſe Sermons attributed to Zeno of Verona, are a Collection of Sermons (c) ſtoln out of ſeveral Authors, and heaped together without any Choice. Some are ſhort, others are long; ſome are well written, and in an elevated Style; others ill, and in a mean pitiful one; ſome are clear, others obſcure. In ſhort, nothing can be imagined to be more unequal. In the Sermon of Continence, he reckons more than 400 Years ſince S. Paul wrote his Epiſtle to the Corinthians; and yet in other Homilies, he ſpeaks of Temples, Martyrs and Catechumens. All theſe things ſet it paſt Diſpute, that theſe Sermons attributed to Zeno of Verona, and unknown to all Antiquity, are a Collection of Sermons taken out of ſeveral Authors of different Times and different Countries, put together indiſcreetly by ſome ignorant Copier.

The ſame Cenſure ought in all probability to be paſſed upon the 18 Sermons cited by Turrianus under the name of Euſebius of Alexandria. This Author is unknown to the Ancients; neither was there a Biſhop of Alexandria (d) of this Name, for the Three firſt Ages of the Church: Therefore theſe Sermons belong to a more modern Author.

(a) Intirely S. Baſil's.] The Sermons of S. Baſil upon theſe Words, Attende tibi, & de Livore & Invidia, are entirely ſtoln; and the two other Homilies about Faſting and Temptation, are part of the two longeſt of S. Baſil.

(b) Of

(b) Of S. Hilary.] These Sermons upon the 126, 127, 128, 129 and 130 Psalms, belong to S. Hilary. Those upon the 49. 79 and 100 Psalms, might be his also; because we have lost the Commentaries of this Father upon the Psalms.

(c) Stoln out of several Authors.] Some of the long ones are taken out of Greek Authors, and the short ones out of the Latin Writers, and Fragments of Homilies.

(d) A Bishop of this Name.] Eusebius indeed, Lib. 7. Chap. 11. of his History, gives a good shop of Character of one Eusebius, a Deacon, that lived with Dionysius of Alexandria, who was afterwards Bishop of Laodicea; but this Man ought rather to call himself Eusebius of Laodicea, than Eusebius of Alexandria. Zeno Bi- Verona.

ARNOBIUS.

THough Arnobius and Lactantius lived the better part of their time in the Fourth Century of the Church, yet we shall nevertheless join them to the Authors of the Third, because they wrote with the same Spirit, and after the same manner; that is to say, they did not employ themselves in writing against the Heresies that rose in the Fourth Age, but only in confuting the Pagans in imitation of the Ancients. Arnobius.

Arnobius was Professor of Rhetorick at Sicca, a City of Numidia in Africk (a) under the Emperor Diocletian. He was first a Pagan; but as S. Jerom tells us in Euseb. Chron. being desirous to be converted, that he might more easily prevail with the Bishops to admit him among the Faithful, he composed, when he was but a Catechumen, Seven Eloquent Books against the Religion he had then left, and these Books were as Pledges or Hostages that procured for him the Favour of that Baptism he so earnestly sollicited. Now though it must be confessed, that he did not perfectly understand the Christian Religion when he wrote these Books, in which some Errors are to be found, yet he confuted the Absurdities of Paganism with singular Dexterity, and vigorously defended the principal Articles of our Religion.

He begins his First Book with confuting that Popular Calumny, which the Pagans so industriously advanced against the Christians, viz. That they were the Authors of all the Calamities and Miseries that afflicted the World. He shews, that this is a groundless and unreasonable Fancy, that there were Plagues and Famines, and Wars before our Saviours appearance, and that nothing had been changed since his coming: That he was so far from being the Author of their Miseries, that on the contrary, he brought abundance of Good unto the World; That Miseries proceed from Natural Causes, and that it often happens, that those things which in the common acceptation of Mankind pass for Misfortunes, don't prove so in effect; That if the Christians were the Cause of these Calamities, the World would have had no Interval without them ever since the appearance of Jesus Christ; That if the Pagan Deities sent these Miseries to Men for the Punishment of the Christians, they were unjust as well as weak; That the Christians worship the true God, and apprehend no dangers from false ones; That they adore Jesus Christ, but don't consider him as a Man that suffered Death for his own Transgressions, but as a real true God, who took the Humane Nature upon him to manifest himself to the World, to teach Mankind the ways of Truth, and to accomplish all those things for which he appeared upon Earth; That he died, and afterwards was raised up from the Grave, to satisfie all Men that the Hopes of their Salvation were certain. He proves the Divinity of Jesus Christ by the Examplar Holiness of his Life, by the Innocence of his Manners, by the great number of Miracles and Prodigies that were wrought by him, and by others that had Commission from him, by the Signs that appear'd upon the Earth at his Death; and then he shews, that we cannot reasonably question the Truth of these things, because the Evangelists, who have delivered them in writing, were Persons of great Integrity and Simplicity; That there is no reason to imagine they were so Vain, or indeed so Mad, as to pretend they saw those things that they never did see; especially since they were so far from reaping any Advantages from such Inventions, that they thereby exposed themselves to the Hatred of all the World.

In his Second Book, he demonstrates that Jesus Christ was wrongfully Persecuted, since he had done nothing to deserve the hatred of any one, since he was no Tyrant, and destroy'd no Body, since he acquired no Riches for himself, and did no manner of Injustice to the meanest Person. He likewise shews, that the Pagans had no certain Principles whereby to judge which was the true or false Religion; that they were very much in the wrong, for laughing at the Credulity of the Christians; since in the generality of things that have a relation to Human Life, Men usually manage themselves by the belief which they repose in particular Persons; That Jesus Christ merited a great deal more than all the Philosophers in the World, because of the Miracles which he wrought; That the Pagan Philosophers believed the same things that are received by the Christians; as for Instance, The Immortality of the Soul, the Resurrection of the Body, and Hell Fire. He takes occasion from thence to discourse of the Nature of Souls, he pretends that they are of a middle quality between a Spirit and a Body; that they are by Nature Mortal; but that God of his Goodness immortalizes the Souls of those who repose their Confidence in him. He confutes Plato's Notions concerning the Souls Immortality, and it's Excellency, Dignity, Exile or Imprisonment in the Body. He supposes that it is Corporeal and ex traduce; That Man is but very little different from the Beasts; That his Soul is mortal by Nature, but that it becomes immortal by the Grace of God: Opinions unworthy of a Man that had been perfectly instructed in the true Religion. What he at the same time observes, that in the Matters of Religion we ought not

Arnobius. not to indulge a fond Curiosity, nor endeavour to penetrate into the Reasons of God Almighty's Conduct, nor judge of it by our own Light, is infinitely more worthy of a Christian. 'Jesus Christ, says 'he, was God, and I ought to tell you so, though you are not willing to understand it, yet he is God 'and speaks unto us from God. He has commanded us not to perplex our selves with unprofitable 'Questions; let us therefore leave the Knowledge of these things to God, and not amuse our selves in 'a vain pursuit after them. And yet he does not forget to answer those Questions that were ordinarily proposed by the Pagans concerning Jesus Christ. Now they often demanded the reason, why our Blessed Saviour (since his Coming was so absolutely necessary for the Saving of Souls from Death) would suffer so long an Interval of time to pass before he came to deliver them. Arnobius replies, 'Is 'it possible for Man to know after what manner God dealt with the Ancients? Who has told you that 'he never relieved them any other way? Do you know how long it is since Men have been upon the 'Earth, or in what place the Souls of the Ancients are reserved? Who has informed you that Jesus 'Christ did not deliver them by his coming? Forbear then to torment your selves about these things, 'and meddle not with those Questions which 'tis impossible for Human Reason to resolve: Be persuaded that God has shewn Mercy to them; Jesus Christ perhaps had taught you how, and when, and 'after what manner it was done, if it would not have afforded matter to your Pride. But wherefore 'continued the Pagans, did not Jesus Christ deliver all Mankind? He invites, he calls upon all the 'World, says Arnobius; he rejects no body, he readily receives those that come to him; he only requires that Men would desire and wish for him; but he constrains and forces no Man, for otherwise 'it would be Violence, and not Grace. But are none but Christians delivered from Death? No, assuredly; for Jesus Christ alone has Power to effect it. But, say the Pagans, this is a new upstart Religion; and why should we quit that of our Ancestors for it? Why not, reply'd Arnobius, provided it 'is better? Did we never change our ancient Customs? Did we never alter our old Laws? Is there 'any thing in the World which had not a beginning at first? Ought we to esteem a Religion for the Antiquity of it, or rather for the sake of the Divinity which we honour? Within less than Two Thou'sand Years, none of the Gods that are now worshipped by the Pagans, were in being, whereas God 'and his true Religion has been from all Ages. Jesus Christ had his Reasons why he appeared when he 'did, though they are unknown to us. But why does he suffer those that worship him to be Perse'cuted? And why, replies Arnobius, do your Gods suffer you to be afflicted with Wars, with Pesti'lence and Famine, &c. As for us, 'tis not to be admired that we suffer in this Life, for nothing is 'promised to us in this World: On the contrary, all the Evils and Calamities which we suffer here, 'make way only for our Deliverance.

In the Three following Books, Arnobius falls upon the Pagan Religion, and shews, that the Christians had very great reason to reject a way of Worship so very Foolish, Extravagant and Impious.

In his Sixth and Seventh Books, he demonstrates that the Christians did very wisely not to Build Temples, or trouble themselves with the Pageantry of Statues, Images and Sacrifices, and that it is a ridiculous piece of Folly to imagine, that God dwells in Temples, that the Images are Gods, or that the Divinities are contained in them. Or lastly, That we honour the true God, when we Sacrifice Beasts, burn Incense, or pour out Wine in Adoration of him.

Thus we have considered the Subject of the Seven Books of Arnobius, that are written in a manner worthy of a Professor of Rhetorick. The turn of his Thoughts very much resembles that of an Orator, but his Style is a little African, that is to say, his Words harsh, ill-placed, unpolisht, and sometimes scarce Latin; and 'tis likewise evident that he was not perfectly acquainted with the Mysteries of our Religion. He attacks Paganism with a greater share of Skill and Vigour, than he defends Christianity, and discovers the Folly of That, better than he proves the Truth of This. But we ought not to be surprized at it, for 'tis the ordinary Fate of all new Converts, who being as yet full of their former Religion, know the weakness and blind-side of it better than they understand the Proofs and Excellencies of that Persuasion which they have newly embraced. I will say nothing concerning the Latin Commentary upon the Psalms, that carries the Name of Arnobius, because it is a certain truth, in which all the Learned World agrees, that this Arnobius is a different Person from him of whom we have been speaking; that he is of a later Date, and lived after the Council of Chalcedon, since he mentions the Pelagians and Predestinarians.

The Books of the Senior Arnobius were first published by Faustus Sabæus, and Printed at Rome by Theodorus Priscianensis in the Year 1542. out of a Manuscript belonging to the Vatican Library, but with abundance of Faults that were to be found in that Manuscript. Galienus, who afterwards set out another Edition of them at Basil, in 1546 and 1560. by Frobenius, took the liberty to Correct them upon his own bare Conjecture, and to insert his own Emendations into the Text. Thomasinus printed them at Paris 1570. Canterus Corrected the Edition of Galienus, and was the first Man that wrote Annotations upon Arnobius: His Edition was Printed by Plantin at Antwerp 1582. in Octavo. Elmenhorstius published a larger Comment upon him, and reviewed his Seven Books out of an ancient Manuscript. They are likewise Printed with Heraldus's Notes, in the Year 1583 and 1603. at Paris 1605, and at Hamburgh 1610. Stewechius, a Learned Man, took pains also with the same Author, and printed him at Doway 1634. in Octavo. Thysius afterward revised his Edition, and caused it to be printed at Leyden by le Maire, with the Notes of several others, 1652 and 1657, in Quarto. Lastly, Priorius printed the Books of Arnobius against the Gentiles, at the end of S. Cyprian's Works, at Paris by Dupuis in 1666.

(a) Under the Emperor Diocletian.] He wrote his Books toward the end of the Third, or the Beginning of the Fourth Century; for in his First Book he expressly tells us, That it was Three Hundred Years, more or less, since the Christians began to appear in the World.

LACTAN-

LACTANTIUS.

Lactantius.

L*ucius Cælius* (a) Firmianus, Surnamed Lactantius, was (b) Converted in his Youth to the Chriſtian Religion: He Studied Rhetorick in Africk in the School of Arnobius, but far ſurpaſſed his Maſter in Eloquence. Whileſt he was there, he writ a Book, Intituled, Convivium, or The Banquet; which acquired him ſo great a Reputation in the World, that he was ſent for to Nicomedia to teach Rhetorick there. But meeting with few Scholars there, becauſe it was a Grecian City, where they had no very great value for the Roman Eloquence; he gave himſelf altogether to the writing of Books. St. Jerome informs us, That he wrote a Poem in Hexameter Verſe, wherein he gave a Deſcription of his Voyage; and another Piece which he called, The Grammarian; but imagining, that he was obliged to employ his Learning and Time upon a better and higher Subject, he entred the Liſts in behalf of Religion. The Firſt Treatiſe, which he compoſed after this manner, was that about the Work of God: He afterwards undertook his Seven Books of Inſtitutions, (c) about the Year of our Lord 320, in which he ſtrenuouſly defends the Chriſtian Religion, and likewiſe Anſwers all thoſe that had written againſt it. After he had finiſhed them, he abridged them, and added the Book concerning the Anger of God to the reſt.

He likewiſe wrote Two Books to Aſclepiades, the Eight Books of Epiſtles; Four to Probus, Two to Severus, and Two to Demetrianus; but all theſe Books that were extant in St. Jerome's time, are loſt at preſent. We have only recovered one Small Treatiſe concerning Perſecution mentioned by S. Jerome, which Baluzius has lately Publiſhed under the Title of De Mortibus Perſecutorum. He Promiſes ſeveral other Works of the ſame Author, as his Diſputes againſt the Philoſophers, againſt the Jews, and againſt the Hereticks; but there is no reaſon to believe that Lactantius ever compoſed theſe Pieces, ſince St. Jerome doth not mention them; at leaſt, that they were contained in his Epiſtles.

Conſtantine afterwards took him to be Tutor to his Son Criſpus, to inſtruct him in all manner of Learning. In the midſt of all theſe Honours he was ſo very Poor that he often wanted Neceſſaries, being very far from making any purſuits after Pleaſure. This is all that we know of the Hiſtory of this great and excellent Perſon; but even this very Circumſtance alone, as we find it related in Euſebius's Chronicon, may paſs for an extraordinary and magnificent Commendation of him, and ought to inſpire us with no mean Idea of his Piety. For he muſt certainly have been a very Vertuous Man, that could live poorly in a Court, that could neglect the Care even of Neceſſary things in the midſt of Plenty and Abundance, and had not the leaſt taſte of Pleaſures, when he reſided amongſt Perſons that were overwhelmed in them.

We are now to conſider the Subject of the Seven Books of Lactantius, which beſides the general Title of Divine Inſtitutions, have each of them a particular Inſcription, that acquaints us with the Matter whereof it Treats. The Firſt is Intituled, De falſa Religione, of falſe Religion; The Second, De Origine Erroris, of the Original of Error. The deſign of Lactantius in theſe Two Books is to demonſtrate the falſity of the Pagan Religion. In the firſt, after he has informed his Reader of the Reaſons that moved him to undertake ſuch a Work, and has made his Addreſſes to the Emperour Conſtantine, he ſhews that there is a Providence in the World, and that it is God who Rules and Governs it. He particularly enlarges upon this Second Propoſition, and makes it evident by ſeveral Arguments, by the Authority of the Prophets that have Eſtabliſhed it, and by the joint-Teſtimonies of the Poets, of the Philoſophers, of Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, of the Sybils, and the Oracle of Apollo, that there is only one God that Governs the World: And laſty, towards the latter part of this Book, he demonſtrates the Falſity of the Pagan Religion, by ſhewing that the Gods to whom they paid their Adoration, were Mortal Men; and not only ſo, but for the moſt part wicked and profligate Wretches. In the Second Book he goes on to confute the Pagan Religion, and directs his Diſcourſe chiefly againſt the Idols and Repreſentations of their Deities; and plainly proves, that it is the higheſt Degree of Madneſs and Stupidity to pay Adorations to them as Divine Beings. After this, coming to aſſign Reaſons for the Prodigies and Oracles, which the Pagans attributed to their Idols, he riſes as high as the Creation of the World, to furniſh himſelf with a fit occaſion of diſcourſing about the Nature of Dæmons, to whom he aſcribes all thoſe wonderful miraculous Effects. Laſtly, he ſhews, That the principal Cauſe of the Errors and Malice of Men is owing to the perpetual Temptations and Snares of the Devil; as alſo to the abandoning of Cham and his Poſterity.

(a) Lucius Cælius.] This is his proper Name. There are ſome Manuſcripts where he is called Cecilius. 'Tis ſuppoſed that he was Surnamed Firmianus from his Country, and Lactantius from the ſweetneſs of his Elocution; but this is not certain.

(b) Converted in his Youth.] See the Seventh Book of his Inſtitutions, Chapter the laſt, the Third Chapter of his Epitome, l. 2. c. 10. where he ſeems to reckon himſelf in the Number of thoſe, who after they had acknowledged their Error, were converted to the Truth. S. Jerome tells us, That he was the Diſciple of Arnobius.

(c) About the Year of our Lord 320.] Lactantius was at Nicomedia at the time of Dioclesian's Perſecution in the Year 302. as he himſelf tells us, Lib. 5. of his Inſtit. Chap. 2. He tarried there till the Perſecution was over; afterwards he went to France, where he wrote his Book of Inſtitutions: for he ſpeaks of the Perſecutors in the Beginning of his Firſt Book, as if he were then in another Country; he therefore wrote it in the time of the Perſecution carried on by the Emperour Licinius, which began in the Year 320. So that the Name of Arians, that is to be found in ſome Manuſcripts of his Books, might perhaps have been added ſince.

Lactantius. The Third Book is Intituled, De falſa Sapientia, Of falſe Wiſdom; becauſe it is chiefly levelled at the Pagan Philoſophers, the Vanity of whoſe Philoſophy he endeavours to expoſe and diſcover: From hence he draws this Concluſion, That the only Wiſdom of Man is to know and worſhip God.

The Fourth is concerning true Wiſdom; and 'tis in this Book chiefly that he lays open the Doctrin of the Chriſtians. In the beginning of the Book he ſhews, That the Philoſophers were not able to find out the true Wiſdom, becauſe they never ſearched after it amongſt the Jews, and becauſe it is inſeparable from the Worſhip and Knowledge of the true God. He afterwards explains the Doctrin of the Chriſtians with relation to Jeſus Chriſt; and evidently proves, That the Pagans themſelves acknowledged that he was the Word and Wiſdom of God exiſting before the World; That this Word was begotten of God after an incomprehenſible manner; That he deſcended from Heaven, and was born of a Virgin, according to the Predictions of the Prophets, that the Gentiles might know the true God. He then gives an Account of the Life, the Miracles, and Death of Jeſus Chriſt; and ſhews, That it was neceſſary for him to undergo the infamous Puniſhment of the Croſs.

He afterwards demonſtrates, That though the Chriſtians do acknowledge that the Son is God, as well as the Father, yet they worſhip but one God; That the Father and Son are one Spirit, and one Subſtance, and one God, which he illuſtrates and explains by the Compariſons of a Fountain and its Stream, of the Sun and its Rays, &c.

Towards the End, he declaims in general againſt Hereſies; and tells us, That the Catholick Church only has retained the true worſhip of God; That it is the Sourſe of Truth, the Habitation of Faith, the Temple of God; That thoſe Men who never enter into it, or who depart from it, are out of hopes of obtaining Everlaſting Salvation; That no Man ought to flatter himſelf, whileſt he continues ſtedfaſt in his Obſtinacy, ſince his Eternal welfare is concerned in the Matter, which he will be in danger of loſing, unleſs he takes particular Care; That though all the Sects of Hereticks pretend and boaſt to be the Church, yet there is but one properly ſo called, which heals the Wounds of Man by the wholſome Remedies of Confeſſion and Repentance.

In the Fifth Book, that treats of Juſtice, He ſhews that the Pagans have no ſuch thing as true Juſtice; That 'tis impoſſible to find it any where but in the Chriſtian Religion; That it is a great Injuſtice to perſecute the Chriſtians, becauſe of their Perſuaſion; and that though they were in an Error, yet their Adverſaries ought to recover them out of it, by the force of Reaſon and not of Puniſhments; That we cannot, and that we ought not to conſtrain Men to be of any Religion; which is a thing not to be defended by Killing of others, but by Dying for it our ſelves; not by Cruelty but Patience; That the Sacrifices which are extorted from Men by Violence, neither ſignifie any thing to thoſe that offer them, nor to thoſe that cauſe them to be offered, nor to the Gods themſelves; That 'tis a ſurprizing thing that the Pagans could ſuffer the Superſtitions of the Egyptians, and Atheiſm of the Philoſophers, and yet ſhould bear ſuch an incurable hatred to the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt: In ſhort, That though God ſometimes permits Truth and Juſtice to be perſecuted; yet he never fails at laſt to puniſh Perſecutors with the utmoſt Severity.

The Sixth Book treats of the true worſhip of God. He diſtinguiſheth between Two ſorts of Worſhip, True, and Falſe; and Two ſorts of Ways, One that leads to Hell, and the Other that leads to Heaven. He tells us, That this laſt is a difficult Way, that we muſt paſs through Poverty, Ignorance, and a long Series of Sufferings before we can arrive at Virtue; That the Philoſophers ſearch'd after it to no purpoſe, ſince they neither knew what was Good, or what was Evil; having no Knowledge of God, who was the Author of Good, nor of the Devil, who is the Author of Evil; That the Law of God is made clear and manifeſt to us; That this Law contains two Principal Heads; The Firſt of Piety; The Second of Humanity. That Piety conſiſts in worſhiping God, and that Humanity which is alſo called Mercy and Charity, conſiſts in our mutually aſſiſting one another to our utmoſt Endeavours, ſince we are deſcended from the ſame Father; That if we would acquit our ſelves of this Duty, we ought to beſtow Alms, to relieve the Sick and Neceſſitous, to protect Orphans and Widows, to redeem Captives, and bury the Dead; and that the Apprehenſion of becoming poor, ought not to hinder us from giving conſiderable Alms, becauſe they blot out and efface our Sins.

He afterwards diſcourſes about the Paſſions, and demonſtrates, contrary to the Sentiments of the Philoſophers, That Mercy or Compaſſion is not a Vice, but a Virtue; and that Fear and Love, which are Vices when they carry a Man to Earthly things, are Vertues when they move him towards Heaven. From hence, he proceeds to the Precepts of Juſtice that are leſs general, ſuch as are the following ones; Not to Lye, not to be guilty of Uſury, not to exact Gifts from the Poor, not to revenge our ſelves of our Enemies, to ſpeak well of thoſe that revile us, to moderate our Paſſions, and to refrain from the purſuit of Senſual Pleaſures. After he has thus ſhewn the way of Juſtice, he ſays, That if it ſhould happen that a Man ſhould forſake this way by falling into ſome Sin; yet he ought not to deſpair, but turn away from his Evil Practices, and ſatisfie God, who knows our ſecret Thoughts. In one word, That the Sacrifice, which we are to preſent, ought to be Spiritual, and that we ought to offer him the Purity of our Hearts, and the Praiſes due to his Divinity.

The Laſt Book of his Inſtitutions treats about Happineſs, and a happy Life. He ſhews, that this ſuppoſes the Immortality of the Soul, which he demonſtrates by ſeveral Arguments; and likewiſe that this Mortal Life can never be Happy, unleſs we take care to preſerve Juſtice. He afterwards diſcourſeth of the End of the World, which he imagines muſt happen Six Thouſand Years after its

its Creation, (d) and of the Signs that shall precede it, amongst which he reckons the Destruction of the Roman Empire, and of the last Judgment; wherein he tells us, God shall, as it were, weigh both Good and Evil; and that those who have committed more Evil than Good, shall be condemned to Everlasting Punishment; That on the contrary, those who are altogether Just, shall not in the least manner feel the Divine Fire; but that those who are in a middle condition, shall be examined by it, and so purified from their Sins; That after this Solemn Trial is over, Jesus Christ shall Reign a Thousand Years upon Earth with the Just, and when that Course of Time is finished, the World shall be renewed, all Mankind shall be raised again, and God shall make the Just like to Angels, that they may be in his Presence, and serve him during a happy Eternity; but that he will throw the Wicked head-long into Everlasting Fire. He concludes all, with exhorting Mankind to be Converted and Repent while they have an Opportunity of so doing; that so they may put themselves in a Condition of fearing nothing at that Great and Terrible Day. "We cannot carry any thing along with "us, says he, but the Innocence of our Lives. Those only shall appear rich before God, that bring "along with them, if I may use the Expression, the Vertues of Mercy, of Patience, of Charity, "and of Faith. This is the Inheritance which cannot be ravished from us, and which we cannot "transmit to any one besides: And who are they that desire to acquire these Blessings? Let them "that are Hungry come to the Celestial Bread of the Word of God that they may be everlastingly "satisfied. Let them that are Thirsty come to quench their Thirst with the Water of this Heavenly "Fountain; Let no Man ground his hopes upon his Riches, or his Power; for these things are not "able to make us happy for ever; but let us bind our selves to the observation of Justice, which "will accompany us even to God's Tribunal, where we shall certainly receive the recompence, "which he has promised us. Lactantius.

The Epitome or entire Abridgment of these Seven Books composed by Lactantius himself, is lost: what is extant, begins at the End of the Fifth Book, the rest was lost in S. Jerome's time. This Abridgment contained the very same things with the Books themselves, only more succinctly treated, and thrown into a narrower compass.

In the Book of God's Anger, Lactantius endeavours to prove, that God is capable of Anger, as well as of Mercy and Compassion.

In the Book of the Work of God, he establisheth Providence by demonstrating the Excellence of his Principal Work, which is Man; for which Reason, he makes an Elegant Description of all the Parts of his Body, and the Proprieties or Faculties of his Soul.

The Book of Persecution, or rather of the Deaths of the Persecutors, lately published by Baluzius, and quoted by S. Jerome, was writ immediately after the end of that Persecution, which was begun in the Year 303, under Diocletian, and ended 313, by the Death of Maximinus, when Licinius and Constantine were Masters of the Empire. 'Tis written to a Confessor, whose Name was Donatus, who suffered several times courageously for the Christian Religion during that Persecution. The Subject which Lactantius proposes to himself in this Treatise, is to shew, That the Emperours who persecuted the Christians, died all miserably. He there describes and relates the several Persecutions which the Church suffered; and likewise the exemplary Punishments which God deservedly inflicted upon these persecuting Tyrants. After he has in a few Words briefly run over the Sufferings of the Church under the Emperours Nero, Domitian, Decius, Valerian, and Aurelian, and given an account of the Tragical Deaths of these bloody Princes; he enlarges more copiously upon the following Persecution. He gives a particular Account of the History of Diocletian, Maximian, Galerius, Severus, Maxentius, and Maximinus, and tells us how they came to be Emperours, and what was the occasion of the Divisions, and Wars that were raised between them. He represents in lively colours the horrid Cruelties which they exercised upon the poor Christians, and how by the visible Chastisement of God Almighty, they came to a lamentable End. This small Treatise is writ with a great deal of Flame and Elegance, and is exactly agreeable in the Historical Part to the Revolution of the Roman State under these Emperours. We find several Matters of Fact related there, which were unknown to us before, and many other Passages are illustrated, and set in a better light. He there discovers the Policy and Designs of all these Emperours; And lastly, makes it visibly appear, that the Hand of God was upon them to punish them for their Cruelty and ill Usage of the Christian Professors. There are few things in this Book that relate to the Doctrin of the Christians, but he seems to take notice, that S. Peter came not to Rome till the Beginning of Nero's Reign: And he likewise tells us, That as the Emperour Maximinus was offering Sacrifice, one of his Officers made the Sign of the Cross, and thereupon to their great trouble, the Dæmons disappeared.

Besides these Works, whereof we have already discourst, there are Three Poems attributed to Lactantius, which are not mentioned by S. Jerome, nor are to be found in the Ancient Manuscripts; and therefore in all probability they are none of his.

The First, is a Poem concerning the History of the Phœnix; but the Author of this Piece was certainly no Christian but a Pagan; for he not only describes the Deluge like a Heathen, and contrary to Moses's Account, but he also speaks of Phœbus; as if he owned and acknowledged him for a God. The Second Poem concerning Easter, is addressed to one Felix a Bishop, and was composed by a Christian Author, who lived after Lactantius; 'tis attributed to Venantius Fortunatus, upon the Testimony and Authority of some Manuscripts in the Vatican Library. The Third is about the Passion of Jesus Christ, but is not to be found in any ancient Manuscript of Lactantius; besides, it does not in the

(d) Six Thousand Years after its Creation.] So that he seems to have thought that there were no more than 200 Years to reckon from his own time to the Day of Judgment.

Lactantius. leaſt come up to the Purity and Eloquence of his Style, and beſides he mentions the Adoration of the Croſs. There are likewiſe ſome Arguments upon Ovid's Metamorphoſis, and Notes upon the Thebais of Statius, that ſome Perſons have attributed to Lactantius, but they really belong to Lactantius Placidius, a Grammarian. They are quoted by Boetius and Sedulius.

Lactantius is the moſt Eloquent of all the Eccleſiaſtick Authors that wrote in Latin; His Style is Pure, Equal and Natural; in a word, it is extremely like Cicero's, and he Juſtly deſerves the Name of the Chriſtian Cicero, not only for the cleanneſs and purity of his Language; but alſo for the Turn of his Phraſe, and his Way of Writing, which is ſo conformable to that of Tully, that the moſt accurate Criticks have been troubled to find out any difference between them: Nay, there have been ſome Perſons in the World, as we are informed by (e) Picus Mirandula, who made no difficulty at all of preferring his Style to Cicero's.

Be that as it will, we are very certain that Lactantius abundantly ſurpaſſeth Cicero in his Thoughts, becauſe the Matter of that Religion, which he ſo handſomly defends, does infinitely excel the Maxims and Doctrin of the Philoſophers. He confutes Paganiſm with all the Ardour and Spirit imaginable, and he likewiſe ſolidly eſtabliſhes the Chriſtian Religion. He diſcourſes of God after a very ſublime exalted manner; He explains the Divinity of the Word, and the Myſtery of the Incarnation in an Orthodox Way; He deſcribes the Creation of the World, and the Day of Judgment, by as lively and ſolemn a repreſentation as any Body have ever yet uſed; but at the ſame time it muſt be acknowledged, that he has ſometimes inſerted falſe, uncertain and fabulous things into his Diſcourſes. He is full of admirable Precepts of Morality; he lays down Deſcriptions of all the Vertues clearly and perſpicuouſly, and with an invincible Eloquence exhorts Mankind to the Practice of them; he ſhews them the way of Juſtice, and deterrs them from purſuing the Paths of Iniquity; he teaches them to honour God with a true ſincere Adoration, and to be throughly Penitent for their Sins. We ought however to own that he has handled Theology after a very Philoſophical manner; but that he did not examine all our Myſteries to the bottom, and that he has committed ſeveral Miſtakes.

Pope Damaſus writing to S. Jerome, is pleas'd to ſay, That he took no great pleaſure in reading Lactantius's Books; becauſe he frequently turned over ſeveral Pages, where he diſcourſeth of things that have no manner of Relation to our Religion.

S. Jerome paſſes this Judgment of him, That he was better able to deſtroy and confute the Errours of the Gentiles, than to maintain the Doctrin of the Chriſtians; He is accuſed of doubting whether the Holy Ghoſt was the Third Perſon, and to have ſometimes confounded him with the Son, and ſometimes with the Father; but it may be alledged in his defence, That he meant nothing elſe, but that the Name of the Spirit in Scripture, is common to the Father and Son. But whatever the Matter is, we find no Footſteps of this Errour in any of his Works that are now remaining, though in ſome places he takes occaſion to ſpeak of the Holy Ghoſt. He ſeems to have been of Opinion, That the Word was generated in time; but it is an eaſie matter to give a Catholick ſenſe to that Expreſſion, as we have ſeen it done to others, and we may be with Juſtice allow'd to do ſo, ſince he plainly eſtabliſhes the Divinity of the Word in that very place. His Opinion concerning Angels, that being ſent to guard and protect Men, they were afterward ſeduced by the Temptation of the Devil, and that falling in Love with Women, they begot Terreſtrial Dæmons upon them; as it is properly peculiar to him, ſo it is an erroneous Imagination without any Grounds to ſupport it. What he ſays about the End of the World, The Reign of a Thouſand Years, The Fire of Judgment which will prove Men that have been Sinners, is common to him with divers other Authors; as alſo what he delivers about the ſtate of Souls after Death, being kept in a Common Priſon in expectation of the Day of Judgment, pretending that God created them all before the Creation of the World. I take no notice of ſeveral other Errors of leſs Conſequence, and ſome harſh Expreſſions, which may be (f) interpreted in a favourable ſenſe.

The Works of this Author have been Printed often. The Firſt Edition that appeared, was at Rome 1468. in Folio, by Conradus Leweynheim. The Second at Rome 1470. was Reviſed by an Italian

COMMODIANUS.

Commodianus.

HERE are Two Authors of the Fourth Century, whoſe Works have the ſame Character and Genius with thoſe that were compoſed by the Writers of the Three firſt Centuries.

The Firſt is called Commodianus: He is no where mentioned by the Ancients; but in reading his Poetry, 'tis an eaſie matter to ſee that it is not Suppoſititions. Gelaſius places his Books amongſt thoſe which he calls Apochryphal, becauſe the Millenary Opinion is here maintain'd, and Gennadius ſpeaks of this Author in the following Words. "Commodianus giving up himſelf to the Study of "Humane Learning, read alſo the Books of the Chriſtians. This gave him a favourable Opportunity "of embracing the Faith. Being now become a Chriſtian, and deſirous to offer to Jeſus Chriſt the "Author of his Salvation a Preſent befitting a Man of Learning, he wrote a Treatiſe againſt the Pa-"gans in Verſe, which is compoſed in a middle Style, neither Verſe, nor Proſe: And becauſe he had "but ſlightly turned over our Authors, he was able to confute the Pagan Religion with more eaſe, "than to eſtabliſh that of the Chriſtians. Hence it is that he ſpeaks of the Divine Recompences af-"ter a groſs manner, following in this the Opinion of Tertullian, Lactantius and Papias. But his "Morals are Excellent, and he perſuades Men to embrace a voluntary Poverty." This is the Opinion of Gennadius concerning this Author, who lived in the Beginning of the Fourth Age, in the time of Pope Sylveſter (a). He calls himſelf Commodianus (b), and by way of Alluſion Gazæus (c), and gives himſelf the Title of the Beggar of Jeſus Chriſt. He tells us, That he was once engaged in the Errors of the Heathens; but that he was converted by reading the Law of the Chriſtians. His Work is entituled, Inſtructions; and is compoſed after the Faſhion of Verſe: I ſay after the Faſhion of Verſe, becauſe he neither obſerves Meaſure, nor Cadence in it; but only takes care that every Line ſhall compriſe a finiſhed ſenſe, and ſhall begin with an Acroſtick, in ſuch manner, that all the Letters of the Title of every Strophe are to be found one after another at the beginning of each Verſe; and thus by taking all the firſt Letters of the Verſe, we find the entire Title.

His Stile is harſh, his Words barbarous, and his Thoughts are ſeldom elevated. The Author appears to have been a Good Man, very ſimple, very humble, very charitable, throughly affected with the love of Jeſus Chriſt, zealous for his Religion, auſtere in his Morals, an enemy to Vice, far removed from the Pleaſures of the World, and a ſingular good Monk, as Rigaltius has obſerved of him. Though after all, we muſt own, that he was not very Ignorant; for there is a tolerable ſtore of Prophane Learning in his Work, and we meet there with ſeveral Remarks upon the Pagan Deities that are exceeding Curious and Rare, as well as Entertaining. He ſeems to have had a great deal of good Senſe, of Quickneſs, and Chriſtian Morality: This Treatiſe was for a long time buried in Obſcurity, and was lately found in our days. Sirmondus had it Copied from an old Manuſcript, and Rigaltius made uſe of this Copy, and Printed it ſeparately in the Year 1650. We may divide it into Three Parts. The Firſt, which contains Thirty ſix Strophes, is addreſſed to the Gentiles; whom he exhorts to embrace the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt, after he has expoſed the Falſhood of the Divinities which they Adored. The Second is directed to the Jews; whom he likewiſe perſwades to embrace the Chriſtian Religion, ſhewing them, that the Law was merely Figurative. He there ſpeaks concerning Anti-

(a) In the time of Pope Sylveſter.] Chap. 33. He exhorts the Pagans to join themſelves to the Congregation of Sylveſter; which Plainly ſhews, that he lived at that time, and wrote in Rome or in Italy, though his ſtyle is African.

(b) Commodianus] At the end of his Work he tells us, That his Name may be found out by ſearching after it in his Verſes; now if we take the firſt Letters of every Verſe in the Laſt Strophe, and put them together, we ſhall find Commodianus Mendicus Chriſti.

chriſt, the leſt Judgment, and the Reſurrection. The Laſt is addreſſed to the Chriſtian Catechumens, to the Faithful, and to the Penitents, to whom he gives admirable Inſtructions in Morality. It begins at the Forty ſixth Strophe.

We find in this Author moſt of the Errors of the Ancients. He is of Opinion that the Dæmons were Angels, that were debauched with the love of Women; and that the Giants came from this Illegitimate Commerce; That the World will end after Six Thouſand Years; That Nero was Antichriſt; That there will be Two Reſurrections, That of the Juſt before the Reign of the Thouſand Years, and the General One at the Day of Judgment; That the Juſt after the Firſt Reſurrection, ſhall live a Thouſand Years upon the Earth; That after that time, all Men ſhall be judged, the wicked thrown head-long into Fire, and the whole face of Nature changed. His Moral Inſtructions are very Excellent. He recommends to the Conſideration of the Catechumens to lead a Life free from Sin. He adviſes the Penitents to pray Night and Day, to live after an auſtere manner, that they may obtain Remiſſion of their Sins. He exhorts the Faithful to avoid all Evil, and to baniſh from their Hearts the very Motions of Hatred, aſſuring them, That Martyrdom will ſtand them in little ſtead, if they have an Averſion towards their Brethren. He repreſents to Apoſtates the greatneſs of their Sin, and admoniſhes all Chriſtians in General, that being Souldiers of Jeſus Chriſt, they ought continually to wage War with their Paſſions. He prohibits them to appear at the Prophane Shows. He adviſes Chriſtian Women to be Modeſt, to avoid Luxury and Magnificence of Apparel. He gives incomparable Inſtructions to Miniſters and Prieſts, that they may acquit themſelves worthily in their Miniſtry, and perſuades them to lead a Life unblameable, and exempt from Avarice; but above all, to relieve the Neceſſities of the Poor. He counſels the Rich not to value themſelves the more highly upon the ſcore of their Riches, but to communicate part to the Indigent; to aſſiſt and viſit thoſe that are in Sickneſs, and to Comfort thoſe that labour under Affliction. He ſays, That we ought not to lament the Death of our Children or Relations. He condemns all Funeral Pomps, and proud Interments. He powerfully reprehends thoſe Perſons that don't obſerve Silence in the Church. "The Prieſt of the Lord, ſays he, has ſaid, Lift up your Hearts "to God; you anſwer, That you have; and yet immediately forget the Word. He prays to the "Lord in behalf of the People, and in the mean time you are entertaining one another with ſtories; "you Laugh, you ſpeak Evil of your Neighbours, you talk inconſiderably, as if God were abſent, "even he that has made all, that ſees all, and underſtands all. He adviſes thoſe that Pray to God, to purifie their Hearts, before they addreſs themſelves to Him by way of Prayer. In a word, The laſt Part of his Inſtructions contains excellent Exhortations, to incline Chriſtians to the Love and Practice of Vertue, to turn them away from Vice, and his Remonſtrances concerning the corrupt Manners of the Chriſtians, and the Irregularities of his own time, carry a very near reſemblance to thoſe of our Age.

JULIUS FIRMICUS MATERNUS.

Julius Firmicus Maternus.

THIS Author, of whom none of the Ancients have made mention, has written a Treatiſe, Intituled, Of the Errors of Prophane Religions, which he has addreſſed to the Emperors Conſtantius and Conſtans, the Sons of Conſtantine. The Style and Matter of this Book abundantly convince us, that it is no Spurious Piece, and the Title it carries, gives us an occaſion to Conjecture, that it was writ after the Death of Conſtantine, the Eldeſt Son of Conſtantine the Great, which happened in the Year, 340, and before that of Conſtans, who was Slain by Magnentius in the Year 350; for it being addreſſed to Conſtantius and Conſtans there is reaſon to believe that Conſtantine their Eldeſt Brother was already dead, and 'tis very evident that Conſtans was then alive. We don't know what the Author was, of what Country, or of what Profeſſion. (a) Baronius believes that he was Biſhop of Milan; but without any ſolid Foundation. There are Eight Books of Aſtronomy that bear the ſame Name. Now ſome Perſons are of Opinion that they were compoſed by another Author. (b) Labbe maintains, that they belong to the ſame Man; but we cannot poſitively aſſert either one or the other. This Treatiſe De Errore Prophanæ Religionis was Printed at Venice in the Year 1499. At Baſil by Hervagius in 1533. At Strasbourgh in 1562. And afterwards with Wouverus's Notes by Frobenius in 1603. Afterwards it was joyned with Minutius Felix, and Printed at Amſterdam in 1645. And in 1652. At Leyden in 1562, in Quarto. 'Tis likewiſe to be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum. And laſtly, it was put at the end of the laſt Edition of S. Cyprian, which was Printed at Paris 1666. The

(a) Baronius believes, that he was Biſhop of Milan.] Baronius imagins that he was Biſhop of Milan in the time of Julius, and that he aſſiſted at a Council, held at Rome under that Pope. There is indeed mention made of one Maternus a Biſhop of Milan, who ſuffered in Dioclefian's time in the Martyrologies of the 18th of July. But he that was the Author of this Treatiſe, never took upon him the Quality of a Biſhop; and we don't find it related in any Authors of Credit and Reputation in the World, that there ever was a Biſhop of Milan of that Name. On the contrary, it appears by S. Athanaſius, That in the time of Julius there was no Biſhop of that Name at Milan: And the Roman Council, of which Baronius is to be underſtood, is a Chimerical Council invented by Iſidorus.

(b) Labbe maintains, that they belong to the ſame Man.] Poſſevinus and Simlerus diſtinguiſh them, and call the laſt the Younger of the two. Labbe pretends, that he lived in the Years 334 and 337, and according to this Computation, he might perhaps be the Author of the Treatiſe, De Errore Profanæ Religionis.

Author

Author of it discovers the Original of all the several Religions amongst the Pagans, and shews the absurdity of them. In the first place, he shews how prodigiously Men have debased themselves in making Gods of the Four Elements. Secondly, he lays open the Extract and Rise of the fabulous Deities, giving an Historical Account of those things which the Poets have so disguised in Fiction. In the Third place, he demonstrates the Absurdity and Impiety of the Pagan Theology, where several Persons have had the good luck to drop into an Almightyship, only for being more exquisitely villainous than the rest of their Fellow-Creatures. In the fourth place, he takes occasion to refresh their Memories with several particulars relating to their Gods, as how they have been slain, wounded and ill-used by Men. Fifthly, he pretends that the Religion of the Ægyptains derived its Original from Joseph, and that their God Serapis is the same with the above-mentiond Patriarch, who is so called, because he was the Son of Sarah. (This Reason in my Opinion appears to be weak, and ill-grounded.) Sixthly, he observes, that Men have Deified abundance of things which they either love, or have frequent occasion for; and thus they call Eating and Drinking their Dii Penates, or their Housheld Gods: Thus Vesta is the Domestick Fire we daily use, and the same Judgment may be passed of several others, and for this Reason it has happened, that the Names of their Gods denote, the Proprieties of Natural Things. In a word, he Describes and Enumerates the Prophane Signs, or Mysterious Words that are used by the Pagans in their Way of Worship, and he applies them to Jesus Christ with a great deal of Wit. To say the Truth, This Treatise is exceeding Elegant, and is abundantly stored with a great deal of Profound Learning; the Author of it shews a considerable Stock of Knowledge, Wit and Eloquence; he frequently Exhorts the Emperours to destroy the Pagan Temples, to suppress their Religion, and to make use of strong and violent Remedies, to cure Men of their Maladies, and retrieve them from their Extravagancies and Errors. At the same time he Exhorts all Men to feed and nourish themselves with the Bread of Jesus Christ, which is his Word and his Doctrin, (for he does not speak of the Eucharist in this place, as some Persons have vainly imagined) to embrace the Light, and come to the Marriage of the Celestial Bridegroom. He tells us there, that God made himself Man to save us, and restore us to that Immortality, which we lost and forfeited by the Fall of Adam; that if he had not assumed a Body in the Womb of the Virgin, and suffer'd an ignominious Death for the sake of Mankind, all the Jews, even those of the Old Testament, had never been in a Capacity of obtaining Salvation. He teaches us, that the Soul is Immortal and Spiritual, and that the Dæmons were frequently disturbed and ejected out of the Bodies of those Persons, whom they had possessed, by the powerful Prayers and Intercessions of the Christians. He acquaints us with several Figures or Types of the Cross, drawn out of the Old Testament. Lastly, to speak a Word or Two concerning his Morals; he severely declaims and inveighs against those that disguise themselves in Female Habits. These are the Principal and most considerable Heads that are discoursed of in this Treatise. As for his Astronomical, and Mathematical Books, they are divided into Eight Parts. That Work was first Printed by Aldus Manutius at Venice, in the Year 1499. Reviewed by one who calls himself Pascennius, and afterwards Printed in the same place in 1501. Lastly, It was Published at Basil by Hervagius, and Corrected by Bucherius in the Year 1551.

Of the COUNCILS that were Held in the First Ages of the Church.

THE Canons and Acts of the Councils, ought to be reckoned among the Works of the Ecclesiastical Authors, since they are the Works of Several Persons assembled in the same place to deliberate upon the Affairs of the Church, that concern either the Faith, or the Discipline, or the Manners of Christians. These Kinds of Assemblies were used in the First Ages of the Church, and the Apostles were the first Authors of them. For the Christians of the Primitive Church, having had some Disputes, Whether they were obliged to Circumcise and Follow the Law of Moses; The Apostles and Priests convened at Jerusalem, to Examine and Resolve upon this Matter, and at last concluded, That it was not necessary to impose these Burdens upon Christians; but only enjoyned them to abstain from Meats offered to Idols, from Blood, and from things Strangled, and from Fornication. (a) This was the First, and Only Council, to speak properly, that was held by the Apostles themselves.

Councils.

(a) And only Council of the Apostles.] They usually reckon Four. The first concerning the Election of St. Matthias; Acts 1. The Second concerning the Election of Deacons, Acts 6. The Third, that whereof we now speak, Acts 15. The Fourth, Acts 21. Where the Priests of Jerusalem declare, that the Converted Jews might observe the Law, and Exhort St. Paul to make a Vow. But in strictness of Speech, only the Third of these Assemblies deserves the Name of a Council. The two First were not held upon the account of any Controversie; nothing was there decided; the Christians found themselves Assembled together, but were not expressly Summoned. In short, they were Assemblies of all the Christians, and not of the Apostles only. The fourth was rather a familiar Conversation, than a Synodical Deliberation; and they only give some Council and an Advertisement to St. Paul, without deciding any Matter. And thus 'tis the Third Assembly alone, that deserves to be called a Council. The Council of Antioch is spurious, as we have elsewhere shewn.

Afte

Councils. After their Example, when any Difference aroſe in the Church, or when it was neceſſary to make any Regulations; the Biſhops, and oftentimes the Prieſts themſelves met together, to decide the controverted Queſtions, and appoint Laws for the better Government and Diſcipline of the Church. 'Tis true indeed, that in the Three Firſt Ages of the Church, theſe Aſſemblies were more rare, and leſs remarkable, than they were in the following Centuries; as well becauſe the continual Perſecutions of the Emperours hindered the Biſhops from meeting freely and in Publick; as alſo becauſe the Tradition of the Apoſtles being as yet freſh in Mens Memories, it was not ſuppoſed neceſſary to Summon a Council for the Eſtabliſhing of every Truth, and Condemnation of every Error. Hence it is, that we don't find (b) in any credible Authors, that any Councils were held to Condemn the firſt Hereticks, ſuch as were the Simonians, the Carpocratians, the Baſilidians, the Gnoſticks, &c. The Errors of theſe Hereticks were looked upon with horror by all the Chriſtians, who conſidered the Authors of them; and likewiſe thoſe that maintained them, as Perſons already Excommunicated, and ſeparated from the Church, without the Solemnity and Trouble of Convening a Synod to Excommunicate them by Name. In ſhort, every Biſhop inſtructed his own People in the True Faith of the Church, and confuted all ſorts of Errors by the Authority of Scripture, and Tradition.

The firſt Councils, that are mentioned in Antiquity, are thoſe that were held under the Pontificate of Pope Victor, to adjuſt the celebrated Controverſie about keeping Eaſter; and ſome others that were Aſſembled almoſt at the ſame time to ſuppreſs the growing Faction of the Montaniſts. Euſebius mentions the laſt in the Fifth Book of his Hiſtory, Chap. 15. and Tertullian aſſures us, That in his time the Montaniſts alſo met together (c) for themſelves. As for what relates to the Synods that were convened upon the Diſpute concerning the Celebration of Eaſter, though the Number of them is uſually reckoned to be great, yet Euſebius mentions but Three; one of which was held in Paleſtine, another in Aſia, and a Third at Rome. And then, as for what concerns the Churches of France, of Pontus, of Corinth, and of the Eaſt, he barely tells us, That the reſpective Biſhops there, wrote to Pope Victor about this Matter, without ſpeaking of any Council Aſſembled in theſe places.

Agrippinus, towards the Beginning of the Third Century, held a Council in Africk; where it was Ordained that Hereticks ſhould be Re-baptized.

There were likewiſe Two Councils held in Arabia, under the Emperour Gordianus; one againſt Berillus Biſhop of Boſtra, who maintain'd, That Jeſus Chriſt was not a different Perſon from the Father, before he made himſelf Man; and the other againſt the Arabians, who affirmed, That the Souls of Men were Mortal.

We don't know at what time the Councils of Iconium and Synnada were Aſſembled, that Decreed, It was Neceſſary to re-baptize Hereticks.

I ſhall ſay nothing more of the Councils held in Africk, and at Rome in St. Cyprian's time; becauſe I diſcourſed largely about them, when I had occaſion to conſider the Writings and Life of that Father.

Dionyſius Biſhop of Rome Summoned a Council, in which he Eſtabliſhed the Divinity of the Word, and the Myſtery of the Trinity againſt the Errors of the Sabellians, and that which was afterwards the Error of the Arians. He wrote a Letter upon this Occaſion to Dionyſius of Alexandria. S. Athanaſius mentions this Synod.

In the time of Pope Stephen, a Council was held at Antioch; where the Biſhops Condemned the Practice of the Novatians. S. Dionyſius of Alexandria ſent word to Sixtus, that he was invited thither: Euſebius Lib. 7. Hiſt. c. 8. S. Epiphanius in his Account of the Hereſie of the Noetians, mentions Two Synods that were aſſembled in Aſia againſt Noetius, and gives us an Account of ſome Words of that Heretick, and of the laſt Synod.

But of all the Councils that were Summoned in the Three Firſt Centuries, the moſt Celebrated and Famous, are the Two Councils of Antioch Aſſembled againſt Paulus Samoſatenus, Biſhop of that City, who maintained, That the Word was not truly United to the Humanity in the Perſon of Jeſus Chriſt; and who likewiſe, according to the Teſtimony of ſome Authors, denied, that the Word was a diſtinct Perſon from the Father. The Firſt Council aſſembled againſt him, was held at Antioch about the Year 264. Euſebius tells us, That the principal Biſhops who aſſiſted there were, Firmilian Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, Gregory and Athenodorus Biſhops of Pontus, Helenus Biſhop of Tarſus, Nicomas Biſhop of Iconium, Himenæus of Jeruſalem, Theotecnus of Cæſarea; without mentioning an Infinite Number of others, as well Biſhops as Prieſts. He ſays, That S. Dionyſius of Alexandria, being invited to this Synod, could not come thither, but that he acquainted them with his Judgment concerning this Matter by way of Letter, where he diſdained to ſalute the Author of that Hereſie. In all appearance Firmilian preſided in this Synod; for the Biſhops of the Second Council ſay in their Letter, That Paul having Promiſed to renounce his Opinion, Firmilian gave Credit to his Proteſtation, and hoping that this Affair might terminate calmly, without any prejudice or diſhonour done to the Church, judged it convenient to defer paſſing Judgment. And this plainly

(b) In any Credible Authors.] The Author publiſhed by Sirmondus under the Name of Prædeſtinatus, mentions ſome Councils that were held againſt the Ancient Hereticks; but he is a Modern Author, and does not deſerve Credit upon his own Authority.

(c) For themſelves.] Tertull. in lib. De Jejun. Agunt̃ur præcepta per Græcias illas certis in locis Concilia, per quæ & aliora quæque tractantur. Some Perſons underſtand this Paſſage of the Councils of the Catholicks; but he ſpeaks of thoſe held by the Montaniſts, as the following words plainly ſhew.

proves

proves, that Firmilian held the chief place in the Synod, and that they followed his Advice. Now they did not pass Sentence against Paulus Samosatenus in this Synod, because he had promised to quit his Erroneous Doctrin; but it seems he kept not his Word, but relapsed a little time after into his old Error; So a Second Council was held against him in the City of Antioch, in the Year 270, where we find Seventy two Bishops. Paulus Samosatenus was here convinced of his Errors by a Priest, whose Name was Malchion, and afterwards he was deposed by the Council, and Domnus Elected into his Place. The Bishops of this Council soon after wrote a Synodal Letter to Dionysius Bishop of Rome, and to all the other Bishops in the World, to give an Account of their Condemning Paulus, and Electing Domnus in his Room. This Letter is to be seen in Eusebius. Lib. 7. Hist. Cap. 30. They there give an ample Relation of what pass'd in the First Synod; in which Paulus Samosatenus having solemnly Promised to change his Opinion, Firmilian thought it convenient to defer passing Judgment upon him; That the aforesaid Bishop was upon his Journey, with a Design to come to the Synod, but died by the way. After this, they proceed to lay open the Manners of Paulus, and accuse him of enriching himself by Publick Extortion, Rapine and Sacriledge; they reproach him for his insupportable Arrogance, and Cruel Temper; they complained of him for taking upon him the State of a great Lord, as appeared by his numerous Retinue, by his sitting in an high Tribunal, by his ill Treatment of those Persons that did not make their Court to him, and would not commend him, when they sang Praises to God; by his commanding Hymns to be sung in his own Praise, and ordering himself to be publickly commended in the Sermons, by his living too familiarly with Women, and using his Clergy and People after a Tyrannical insolent manner. In short, After they have accused him of all those Vices that are ordinary and common to Bishops of great Sees, they say they condemned him principally because he revived the Error of Artemas; teaching, That Jesus Christ was a mere Man, and that he did not exist before he was born of the Virgin Mary; and that having deposed him, they chose Domnus in his Room. All which they take notice of, that for the time to come, all Communicatory Letters might be addressed to him only. Councils.

There is also another Letter attributed to this Council, addressed to Paulus Samosatenus, which contains a Profession of Faith. Baronius ascribes it to the first Council; but it being writ a little before Paulus's Deposition, as manifestly appears by the Title, and by its carrying the Name of Himenæus in the Front, who presided in the Second Council, and not Firmilian, who presided in the First; we ought to conclude, that it belongs to the Second Council. But we have a great deal of reason to believe that the Letter published by Turrianus is Supposititious, as well as that of S. Dionysius of Alexandria to Paulus Samosatenus; as we have already shewn in another place.

Baronius attributes besides to this Council, a Profession of Faith, set down in the Council of Ephesus in the Third Part, and assigned in that Place to the Council of Nice. I don't know what reasons Baronius had to incline him to this Opinion; but it seems past dispute to me, that it does not belong to this Council at Antioch: for certain it is, that the word Consubstantial was there rejected, whereas it is to be found in this Profession, as it is set down in the Council of Ephesus, under the Name of the Nicene Council; although it no more belongs to that, than it does to the former: But the truth is, 'Tis a Profession of Faith drawn up by some Bishops, to reconcile the Decisions of those two Councils, and to explain in what sense the word Consubstantial was rejected by the First, and approved by the Second.

Thus I have given a Catalogue of the Councils held in the Three first Ages of the Church, that are mentioned by Authors that deserve Credit. I don't in the least question, but that there were abundance of other Assemblies convened in this time: but then there is no reason to admit those, that are only spoken of by Modern Authors, such as the Prædestinatus published by Sirmondus, the Author of the Synodical Book, Bede; and some others of the same Character.

Of false Decretals Attributed to the first Popes.

THE Falsity of the Decretals that are attributed to the first Popes before Siricius, is so well known at present, that it would not be necessary to speak any thing concerning them in this place: If the Subject of my Book did not oblige me in a few words to run over the Principal Reasons, which prove them to be suppositious. I begin with them that are general and common to all the Decretals, and I shall afterwards descend to those that are more particular. Of False Decretals, &c.

1. (a) All these Decretals were unknown to all the Ancient Fathers, to all the Popes, and all the Ecclesiastical Authors, that wrote before the Ninth Century. Now what rational Man can believe that so vast a Number of Letters composed by so many holy Popes, that contained so many important Points in Relation to the Discipline of the Church, cou'd be unknown to Eusebius, to S. Jerom, to S. Augustin, to S. Basil, and in short, to all those Authors that have spoken of the Writings of the Popes, or have written concerning the Discipline of the Church? Cou'd it possibly happen, that the Popes, to whom these Letters are so very favourable, wou'd never have cited and alledged

(a) All these Decretals were unknown to the Ancient Fathers.] Except that of S. Clement to S. James Translated by Ruffinus, all the rest were absolutely unknown, and no Author ever cited any of them before the Ninth Age of the Church.

Of Falſe Decretals &c.

them, to raiſe their Reputation? Who wou'd ever imagine that the Deciſions of theſe Decretals ſhould be never ſo much as quoted in any Council, or in any Canon? He that will ſeriouſly conſider with himſelf, that ſince theſe Decretals have been impoſed upon the World, they have been cited in an infinite number of places by Popes, by Councils, and often copied by the Canoniſts, will be eaſily perſwaded, that they wou'd have gain'd a mighty Reputation, and been quoted very often by Antiquity, if they had been Genuine and True. (b) The firſt Man that publiſhed them, if we may believe Hincmarus, was one Riculphus Biſhop of Mentz, who died about the Beginning of the Ninth Century. 'Tis commonly believed, that he brought them from Spain, ſince the Collection carries the Name of Iſidorus; but 'tis certain, (c) it could never be compoſed by Iſidore the Great, Arch-biſhop of Sevil; and there is great Reaſon to believe, (d) that it was no Spainard, but rather ſome German or Frenchman that begun this Impoſture. It likewiſe (e) ſeems probable, that ſome of theſe Decretals have been foiſted in ſince Riculphus's time, and it is no leſs credible, that Benedict a Deacon of the Church of Mentz, who made a Collection of Canons by the Order of Autgarius Biſhop of Mentz, and Succeſſor of Riculphus, put the laſt hand to this Collection of falſe Decretals attributed to one Iſidorus (f) Surnamed the Merchant or Sinner, who is a different Perſon from the famous Biſhop of Sevil. (g) We read in Hiſtory, that about this time, a certain Man named Iſidore, the Brother of Eulogius, came from Spain along with ſome Merchants, and withdrew himſelf to Mentz. Now 'tis very probable, that this Man's Name was ſet to the Collection of Decretals, and likewiſe occaſion'd the Belief, that they were brought from Spain.

Secondly, The Impoſture of theſe Letters is invincibly proved from hence, becauſe they are made up of a Contexture of Paſſages of Fathers, of Councils, of Letters of Popes, of Canons, and Ordinances of Emperors, which have appeared from the Third Age of the Church down to the midſt of the Ninth: (h) It is viſible, that all theſe Paſſages drawn out of ſeveral places have been woven together by ſome Impoſtor, that had a Genius not large enough to compoſe the Letters himſelf.

Thirdly, The Scripture cited in all theſe Letters follows the vulgar Tranſlation of S. Jerom, which demonſtrates that they are ſince his time, and conſequently don't belong to the Popes whoſe Names they carry, that lived long before.

Fourthly, The Matter of theſe Letters is not at all agreeable to the Age, when the Popes to whom they are attributed, lived: There is no mention made in any of them, either of Perſecutions or Martyrs, or of the Doctrin of the Church in oppoſition to the firſt Hereticks, or of the Duty of Biſhops, or of the Care that ought to be taken of the Flock of Jeſus Chriſt: But they ſpeak of the Queſtions of Doctrin againſt the Arians, and the Eutychians, and of ſeveral Matters of Diſcipline, which ſuppoſe that the Church had been long Eſtabliſhed.

Fifthly, Theſe Letters are full of Anachroniſms; the Conſulſhips and Names of Conſuls are ill placed, and out of order; nay, more, the true Years of the Popes don't agree oftentimes with the Account that is to be found in theſe Letters.

Sixthly, The Style of theſe Letters is Extremely barbarous, they are full of Soleciſms, and we frequently meet with ſome Words in them, that were only uſed in the lower Ages. It is worth a (b) The firſt that Publiſhed them, if we may believe Hincmar, was one Riculphus.] 'Tis in the Twenty fourth Chapter of his Book againſt Hincmar of Laon, where it is ſaid, that Riculphus brought the Book of Epiſtles, as it was collected by Iſidore, out of Spain, and diſperſed them in that Country. Benedict the Deacon tells us in the Preface before his Collection, that he drew theſe Decretals out of the Archives of the Church of Mentz, from whence Riculphus had formerly taken them, and where they were found by Autgarius his Succeſſor.

(c) Not by Iſidore Archbiſhop of Sevil.] He died in 636. and the Author of theſe Decretals has taken ſome Paſſages out of the Council of Toledo, held in the Year 675, as alſo out of the 6th. Council celebrated A. D. 681. and out of Gregory the Second, and Gregory the Third, Boniface of Mentz, and ſeveral others who lived after Iſidore of Sevil.

(d) There is reaſon to believe, that it was no Spaniard, but rather ſome German or Frenchman.] 'Tis exactly the Style of the French or Germans about the Ninth Age. The greateſt part of theſe ſpurious Letters are directed to Germans or French. The Author of them cites a Letter of an Abbeſs of France, to Boniface of Mentz, and another of the ſame Biſhop. Beſides, This Collection was firſt ſeen in France, being diſcovered at Mentz.

(e) Some of theſe Decretals have been forged ſince Riculphus.] He died in 814, and there are ſome Letters amongſt them, where we find ſome Fragments out of the Council of Paris held in 829. Benedict was the firſt that expoſed theſe Letters to the World; and he tells us, they had been found by Autgarius in the Archieves of the Church of Mentz, where Riculphus placed them, having before brought them out of Spain. All this perhaps is only his own Invention.

(f) Surnamed the Merchant or Sinner.] Both theſe Titles are to be found in the Preface. Iſidorus Peccator, ſive Mercator, ſervus Jeſu Chriſti.

(g) We read in Hiſtory, that one named Iſidore.] 'Tis Eulogius himſelf, ſome of whoſe Letters are preſerved in the Bibliotheca Patrum; in which he teſtifies that he had two Brothers, and one of them was named Iſidore, who retired to Mentz, and came thither along with ſome Merchants. Upon this Account poſſibly they might call that Iſidore Mercator; perhaps alſo this is the Peccator; a Title, which they frequently gave themſelves in that Age, and which Eulogius took often himſelf.

(h) 'Tis viſible that all theſe Paſſages drawn out of different places have been patched together by ſome Impoſtor.] It is viſible that the Authors themſelves never borrowed thoſe Paſſages out of theſe Letters. For, 1. Who will believe that an infinite Number of Writers would take long tedious pieces out of theſe Letters, and never cite them? 2. Theſe Paſſages being very long and tedious, it does not appear probable, that they copied them out of theſe Letters. 3. They are the exact Stile of theſe Authors: Now who can imagine that the ancient Popes wrote ſo many different Stiles? 4. They are likewiſe out of their place in theſe Letters: Any Man may readily diſcover, that they are added and patched to the reſt of the Diſcourſe; whereas in the Books of the Fathers, from whence they are taken, they are in their proper Natural place.

Man's

Man's while to obſerve, that all theſe Letters are of the ſame Style; now I deſire to know how it cou'd poſſibly happen, that ſo many different Popes living in different Ages, ſhould all write the ſame Style? This ſets it beyond diſpute, that all theſe Letters were compoſed almoſt in the ſame time, and by the ſame Perſon; or at leaſt by one that purſued the ſame Train of Thoughts. Of False Decretals, &c.

Now ſince theſe Letters firſt appeared in an unlearned dark Age, what wonder is it if they were received with little Conteſtation? And yet Hincmar Archbiſhop of Rheims with the (i) French Biſhops, even at that time made great difficulty of acknowledging them. But a ſhort time after they acquired ſome Authority, being ſupported by the Court of Rome, whoſe pretenſions they mightily favoured.

After having thus repreſented the Reaſons that prove in general, that all the Decretal Epiſtles of the Popes before Syricius are Spurious; I ſhall now deſcend to particulars, and endeavour to ſhew in few Words, that every Epiſtle carries undeniable Signs of its being an Impoſture, along with it.

The Firſt, and that which ſeems to bear the greateſt Authority, is the Epiſtle of S. Clement to S. James, the Brother of our Lord; the Firſt Part whereof was formerly Tranſlated by Ruffinus. Iſidore has added a Second to it, and they are both of them equally Suppoſititious. The firſt, becauſe it ſuppoſes that S. Clement wrote that Letter after the Death of S. Peter; whereas it is a Truth that has been conſtantly received, that S. James, to whom it is written, died before S. Peter. Secondly, 'Tis there ſaid, That S. Clement immediately ſucceeded S. Peter, which is contrary to the Ancients, who place S. Linus and Cletus, or Anacletus between them two. Thirdly, the Weſt is there ridiculouſly called the darkeſt part of the World. Fourthly, It is compoſed to juſtifie the Itinerary, or Book of the Voyages of S. Peter, which is Apocryphal. The Second Part, that was compoſed by Iſidore, is yet a more evident Cheat: For, 1. It was unknown in the time of Ruffinus, and therefore has been invented ſince. 2. It is full of Texts of Scripture that follow the Tranſlation of S. Jerome: And we likewiſe meet ſeveral Paſſages there Copied out of S. Cyril of Alexandria againſt Theodore of Mopſveſtia, out of the rule of S. Benedict, out of the Expoſition of the Creed by Venantius Fortunatus, out of S. Gregory, and Iſidore of Sevil. In ſhort, it ſpeaks of Arch-Prieſts and Primates, and we find abundance of Words and Expreſſions in it, that are unworthy of the time of S. Clement.

The Second Epiſtle of S. Clement directed to S. James, has likewiſe all the ſame Marks of Forgery. In the firſt place it makes mention of Sacraments, of the Habits in which the Prieſts celebrate the Holy Sacrifice of the Maſs, of the Pall, of Sacred Veſſels, of Chalices; things that ſeem not to have been in uſe in the time of S. Clement. Secondly, It ſpeaks of the Oſtiarii, or Door-keepers, Arch-deacons, and other Eccleſiaſtical Officers, that were not then introduced into the Church. Thirdly, The Letter is writ in a barbarous Stile. Fourthly, The Author alledges the Authority of his Anceſtors. Fifthly, It ordains ſeveral Practices of little or no Conſequence to be obſerved under pain of Excommunication for Six Years. Sixthly, It ſuppoſes that S. Clement inſtructed S. James in the Actions of our Bleſſed Saviour, and the Diſcipline of the Church. Seventhly, It alledges S. James his own words, Work out your Salvation with fear and trembling, under the Name of S. Peter's. This Letter is full of divers Paſſages taken out of the Author of the Recognitions, out of S. Cyril of Alexandria, S. Proſper, Laurentius, Juſtinianus, and S. Gregory the Great. Laſtly, The Scriptures there cited, follow S. Jerome's Tranſlation. The Inſcription of the Third Letter of S. Clement alone, is enough to diſcover the falſity of it. It is directed, To all Suffragan Biſhops, Prieſts, Deacons, and others of the Clergy: To all Princes great and ſmall, and to all the Faithful. Now in S. Clement's time there were no great or ſmall Princes that were of the Church. Secondly, This Letter mentions Sub-Deacons, an Order not then eſtabliſhed in the Church. Thirdly, It is for the moſt part wholly compoſed of Paſſages drawn out of the Books of Recognitions: We ought to reject the Fourth for the ſame Reaſons.

The Fifth is directed to S. James, in the Name of S. Clement Biſhop of Rome, and Succeſſor of S. Peter: Now S. James died before S. Peter, from whence it neceſſarily follows, that this Epiſtle cannot have been written by S. Clement. 2, The Author of this Letter ſeems to approve the Doctrin of the Nicolaitans; who taught, that Women ought to be kept in common, and the place where he maintains this Errour, is borrowed out of the Book of Recognitions, in which a Platoniſt is introduced, diſputing upon this occaſion. In ſhort, the Author of this Letter tells us, he was preſent at the Death of Ananias, and S. Clement was not as yet Converted, when S. Peter inflicted that terrible Puniſhment upon Ananias. We muſt add to all the foregoing Arguments, this weighty Conſideration, that all theſe Letters are of a different Stile from that of the Epiſtle to the Corinthians, which is undoubtedly S. Clement's. There were indeed ſome other Letters formerly aſſigned to this Saint, but they were different from thoſe which we have examined here; for S. Epiphanius, who mentions them, aſſures us, that he there commends Virginity, and ſpeaks very advantageouſly of the Prophets. Now there is nothing that looks like this in the above mentioned

(i) The French Biſhops made great Difficulty of acknowledging them.] Hincmar rejected them, as having no Authority. Nicholas the Firſt, in Epiſt. 42. to the Biſhops of France, endeavours to confute thoſe that rejected them; but ſince that time, they have been received and inſerted into a Collection of Canons, though Learned Men always queſtioned the Truth of them. However at preſent no body dares undertake to defend them, the Impoſture being ſo abominably groſs, that all People may diſcover the Cheat at firſt ſight. They may ſerve as a remarkable Example both of the Credulity of the preceeding Ages, and the intolerable Impudence of Impoſtors.

Of Falſe Decretals, &c.

Epiſtles that are chiefly ſtoln out of the Itinerary of S. Peter, an Apocryphal Work, forged by the Hereticks.

The firſt Epiſtle attributed to Pope Anacletus, is viſibly Spurious: For, 1. He calls himſelf in this Letter, the Defender of S. Clement; now according to S. Irenæus, Euſebius, S. Jerome, and ſome other ancients, Anacletus ſucceeded S. Peter and not S. Clement. 2. The Author of this Letter is pleaſed to ſay, That he received ſeveral things from his Anceſtors by way of Tradition; and could this Expreſſion poſſibly drop from a Man that lived in the time of the Apoſtles? 3. He ſays, That Appeals from Secular Judges ought to be determined before Biſhops, but this was not Cuſtomary in the time of the Apoſtles. 4. He tells us, that the Priviledges and Laws of the Church ought to be confirmed, none of which were written in Anacletus's time. 5. He talks of Appeals from Eccleſiaſtical Judgments to the Holy See, and mentions the different ſorts of Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes. But theſe Queſtions were never debated under Anacletus, and when they came to be afterwards diſcuſſed, the Authority of this Letter was never alledged. 6. He ſpeaks not only of Primates and Metropolitans, but alſo of the Apocriſiarii, a Name unknown in the Roman Church till the Sixth Century. 7. The Style of this Letter is barbarous, and full of Soleciſms. 8. This Letter is compoſed of many Paſſages patched together, that are taken out of the Third Council of Carthage, the Letters of S. Damaſus, S. Ambroſe, S. Auguſtin, Ruffinus, Ennodius, Boniface of Mentz: And there is one Paſſage borrow'd from S. Cyprian's Book concerning Unity.

Nor are there leſs Proofs to diſcover the Impoſture of the Second Letter attributed to Pope Anacletus. For, 1. The Author of this Letter would neither have Biſhops to be Accuſed, nor Judged. 2. He ſays, That the Apoſtles choſe the 70 Diſciples; whereas it appears by the Goſpel, that our Saviour himſelf made the choice. 3. He ſpeaks of Primates, of Patriarchs, and of Chriſtian Kings. 4. He mentions the Diviſion of the Eccleſiaſtick Provinces, which was made long after the Death of Anacletus. Laſtly, He inſerts into his Diſcourſe ſome Paſſages of the Nicene Council, of Damaſus, of S. Jerome, of S. Auguſtin, of S. Gregory, of Iſidore of Sevil, of the 5th. Council of Orleans, and the Vulgar Latin. We ought to paſs the ſame Judgment upon the Third Letter attributed to the ſame Pope for the ſame Reaſons.

The firſt Letter attributed to Pope Evariſtus contains, 1. Some things that have a relation to Clandeſtin Marriage, and ſeveral Ceremonies belonging to that Sacrament, all which can by no means agree with the time of Evariſtus. 2. 'Tis patched up of ſome Paſſages out of the vulgar Latin, the Letters of Innocent, and the Diſpute of Ithacius againſt Varimadus. 3. 'Tis dated under Conſuls, that were not in the time of Evariſtus's Pontificate.

The Author of the Second Letter attributed to the ſame Pope, after he has commended ſeveral Churches and Biſhops, inſerts many Texts of Scripture following the vulgar Latin, and imitates divers Phraſes of S. Cyprian and the African Fathers. He ſpeaks of Primates, and borrows abundance of things out of Ruffinus, S. Gregory, and Iſidore of Sevil.

In the firſt Letter attributed to Pope Alexander, we find many things that diſcover its Novelty. 1. He mentions ſome Cuſtoms that were not uſed till after this Pope's time; as amongſt others, the Benediction of Water mingled with Salt. 2. He ſpeaks clearly and diſtinctly of the Trinity, and the Errors of the Arians and Sabellians are ſo openly rejected, that any Man in the World may ſee it was written ſince the Birth of thoſe Hereſies. 3. We there find ſome Paſſages taken out of Ithacius, Clarus, Siricius, Proclus, Ennodius, and Adrian the Firſt.

In the Second attributed to the ſame Pope, there is a Quotation out of the Council of Laodicea, that was held under Pope Martin the Firſt, and the Scriptures there cited, follow the common Verſion. The Third is compoſed of Paſſages borrow'd out of Sixtus the Pythagorean, S. Gregory and Iſidore of Sevil. Beſides the date of it is falſe.

In the Firſt Epiſtle attributed to S. Sixtus, he is called an Archbiſhop, a word not uſed in his time. 2. The Author confutes thoſe that maintain, that the Son was inferiour to the Father. 3. The Author uſes ſome words and expreſſions of Ithacius, of the Fifth Council of Rome, of Flavian Archbiſhop of Conſtantinople, of Martin the Firſt, of Adrian the Firſt, and Sixtus the Pythagorean. In fine, this Letter is dated under the Conſulate of Adrian; now there was no Conſul of that Name, whilſt S. Sixtus was Pope.

The Second attributed to the ſame Pope, mentions Conſecrated Veſſels, Appeals to Rome, the Grandeur of that Church. 'Tis there pretended, that all Biſhops wait for the Pope's Deciſion, and are inſtructed by his Letters: Modes of Speaking never uſed by the firſt Biſhops of Rome. 2. The Author borrows the better part of what he ſays concerning Pope Sixtus and Zoſimus, out of the Fifth Council of Rome, held under Symmachus and Martin the firſt. In a word, the date of the Conſuls is the very ſame with that of the former, and conſequently diſcovers the falſity of it.

The Epiſtle attributed to Teleſphorus, calls him an Archbiſhop; a Name unknown in the Firſt Ages. 2. There is a Decree in it, to enjoyn Three Maſſes on our Saviour's Nativity, a Cuſtom which is not ſo Ancient. 3. The Author ſuppoſes, that the Laity and Clergy could not accuſe one another in Judgment. 4. He has borrowed ſeveral places out of Damaſus, S. Jerome, Proclus, S. Leo, Flavian, and Ennodius, Authors of a much later date than Teleſphorus. 5. He makes uſe of the vulgar Tranſlation of the Bible. In ſhort, the date of the Conſuls is falſe and erroneous.

The Two Letters aſcribed to Higinus, are manifeſtly Spurious. The Firſt is made up of ſeveral places taken out of Ithacius, S. Leo, Martin the Firſt, and Adrian the Firſt. The Second is ſtuffed with Texts of Scripture, according to the old Tranſlation; the date of the Conſuls is equally falſe in both of them.

The

The Imposture of the First Letter attributed to Pope Pius, appears, 1. Because the Stile of it is rough and barbarous. 2. Because it speaks of a pretended Revelation that appeared to Hermas, who is supposed to be the Brother of Pius. 3. Because there are some Passages manifestly Copied out of the Books of Isidore of Sevil, S. Leo, the Fifth Council of Rome, Sixtus the Pythagorean, Adrian the First, and the Vulgar Latin. Lastly, Because the Date of the Consuls is false, as well as in the Second Letter, which is as evidently forged and spurious as the First. The Theodosian Code is cited there, and likewise a Decree is published in it, which Ordains, That those Clergymen who are found disobedient to their Bishop, should be delivered over to the Secular Power; which Passage does not agree with the time of Pope Pius the First.

The Two other Letters attributed to the same Pope, are addressed to Justus Bishop of Vienna, and are taken out of the Achieves of the Church of Vienna. Baronius pretends they are Genuine, because the Stile of them is Simple, and because they are agreeable to the History of the time of that Pope; but there are far greater Reasons to incline us to believe, that they are spurious, 1. The barbarous Stile. 2. The Name of Mass unknown to the Ancients. 3. The affected Terms; such as are, Superbeate, Senatoria, Cubilibus æternis, Perseverabilem, Primarchus, Senatus pauper Christi. 4. It mentions Habits peculiar to Bishops. Lastly, These Letters were unknown to all Antiquity.

We find several Passages in the Letter attributed to Anicetus, which don't agree with the time of that Pope; as for instance, what is there laid down concerning the Ordinations of Bishops, Sacerdotal Tonsure, Archbishops, Primates, and Patriarchs, which were not instituted till long after; besides many other things of the same Nature. 2. The Author of that Letter uses the Vulgar Latin, and Copies abundance of things out of S. Leo, Adrian the First, and the Councils of Nice and Antioch. Lastly, He is mistaken in the Date of his Consuls.

The First Letter attributed to Soter, is full of Passages borrowed from Ithacius, St. Leo, and the Vulgar Latin; and the Consuls there mentioned, held the Consulship some Years before Soter was Bishop of Rome.

The Second Letter attributed to the same, is a Miscellany taken out of the Council of Laodicea, and out of Gelasius, Martin the First, and S. Leo. It speaks of Monks, of Palls, &c. Besides the Date of the Consuls does not agree with the Years of this Pope's Pontificate.

The Epistle of Eleutherus treats of Ecclesiastical Judgments in favour of the Court of Rome. The Author of it pretends, That all Causes relating to the Church, ought to be determined there, and that they cannot be tried in the Province; a Practice contrary to all Antiquity. He follows the Vulgar Latin in his Quotations of Scripture, and cites a Text out of S. John, which he attributes to S. Paul. He copies several Passages out of the Popes S. Leo, Felix the Third, Anastasius, Adrian the First, Victor of Carthage, Hilary the Deacon, the Fourth Council of Carthage, the Sixth Council of Toledo, and the Theodosian Code. Lastly, The Date of the Consuls is false.

The Inscription of the First Epistle attributed to Victor, plainly discovers the falsity of it. 1. It bestows upon him the Quality of Archbishop of the Universal Church; a Title which the Ancient Popes never gave themselves. 2. It is directed to Theophilus of Alexandria, who lived almost 200 Years after Victor. 3. The Author of this Letter speaks of the Judgments of Bishops, and Appeals to Rome, according to the Pretensions of the Bishops of Rome in the latter Ages. Lastly, He uses the Testimonies of S. Leo and Isidore. The Second Letter attributed to the same Pope, is full of Passages borrowed from S. Leo, and the Vulgar Latin. The Third and Fourth published by Johannes de Bosco, and taken out of the Library of the Abby of Fleuri, are written in a Stile, that manifestly discovers their Novelty. The Scriptures there cited, follow the Vulgar Latin. The First is directed to Desiderius Bishop of Vienna; now we don't read that there was ever any Bishop of that Name in Vienna, before the time of Pope Gregory the Great.

The First Letter of Zephirinus is composed of several Passages taken out of S. Leo, S. Prosper, Vigilius, S. Gregory, Martin the First, Adrian the First, the Theodosian Code, Anianus, and Sixtus the Pythagorean. 2. We find in it the Names of Patriarch and Primate. 3. It treats about the Decisions of Bishops, and Appeals to the Holy See. 4. The Consul Gallicanus is named there; now there was none of that Name in the time of Zephirinus. Lastly, The Author of it supposes, that the 70 Disciples were chosen by the Apostles.

The Second Letter attributed to the same Pope is yet more visibly spurious. 1. The Author of it very impertinently cites the Imperial Laws in favour of the Bishops. 2. He speaks of the Apocrisiarii. 3. He heaps together the very Thoughts and Words of S. Prosper, Adrian, and Paul of Constantinople. 4. He cites the Canons of Pope Adrian as Ancient Statutes. And at last, he says, that there were false Brethren in Africk that plundered and spoiled the Bishops: Which cannot possibly be true, for there was no Persecution in Africk in the time of Pope Zephirinus.

The First Epistle attributed to Calistus, is filled with Passages taken out of the Nicene Council, the Fifth Council of Rome, S. Prosper, Gelasius, Symmachus, Isidorus, Anianus, and Sixtus the Pythagorean. He speaks of Ember-Weeks, that were instituted long after the time of this Pope. The Second is likewise full of Passages drawn out of the Council of Antioch, the Fourth Synod of Carthage, Simplicius, S. Austin, S. Gregory, Adrian, and Sixtus the Pythagorean. We find several new Constitutions there.

The Author of the Epistle attributed to Urban, gives large Commendations of a Life, where all things are held in common; He speaks of Vows, and the Revenue of the Church; he uses the Thoughts and Words of S. Prosper, Eusebius, the Council of Paris, Gregory the Fourth, the Theodosian Code, and the Vulgar Latin.

The

of Falſe Decretals, &c.

The Two Letters attributed to Pope Pontian, are made up of Paſſages taken out of the Vulgar Latin, S. Gregory, S. Jerome, Sixtus the Pythagorean: The reſt is written in a barbarous Stile.

The Author of the Epiſtle attributed to Anteros ſpeaks of a Biſhop of Epheſus named Felix, but unknown to the Ancients, and places one Euſebius amongſt the Biſhops of Alexandria, who is not to be found in the Catalogue of the Biſhops of that See. 2. Touching the Tranſlation of Biſhops, he eſtabliſhes ſome things, contrary to the Determinations of the Councils of Antioch, Sardica and Chalcedon. And beſides, he cites the Words of S. Jerome, Siricius, Ennodius, S. Gregory, Iſidore, Martin the Firſt, and Sixtus the Pythagorean.

The Author of the Firſt Epiſtle attributed to Fabian, ſuppoſes that Novatus came to Rome in his Papacy, though it was in Cornelius's time, according to the Teſtimony of S. Cyprian, Euſebius, and S. Jerome. Secondly, he borrows ſeveral Paſſages out of Ruffinus, S. Leo, S. Gregory, Adrian the Firſt, and Boniface of Mentz.

In the Second Epiſtle attributed to the ſame Pope, we read, 1. That diſobedient Clerks ought to be delivered up to the Secular Arm. 2. That the Holy Chriſm muſt be made Yearly. 3. We find ſome places in it, that are Copied out of the Second Council of Carthage, the Fifth of Rome, the Council of Antioch, Siricius, S. Jerome, S. Auguſtine, Innocent, Zoſimus, Celeſtine, Proclus, S. Gregory, Iſidore, and Adrian. The Third is full of Paſſages drawn out of the Letters of Pope Adrian, the Theodoſian Code, Anianus, Felix the Third, S. Gregory, the Second Council of Carthage, the Council of Toledo, and other Publick Monuments later than Fabian.

The firſt Letter attributed to Cornelius is full of Errours; 'Tis there ſaid, Firſt, That the Bodies of S. Peter and S. Paul were removed out of the Catacombs; which appears to be falſe by the Teſtimony of S. Gregory, who tells us in the third Letter of his third Book, That the Body of S. Paul lay always near the Porta Oſtia, and S. Peter's in the Vatican. Secondly, Some Paſſages are to be found in this Letter, taken out of the Epiſtles of Martin the Firſt, and S. Leo. The Second is a Collection of ſeveral things out of the Conſtantinopolitan Council under Flavian, the Firſt and Third Council of Carthage, the Council of Calcedon, the Fifth of Rome, S. Ambroſe, S. Jerome, and Boniface of Mentz; but nothing ſhews the Impoſture of theſe two Letters more palpably, than the difference of Stile from thoſe that truly belong to Cornelius, which are to be ſeen in S. Cyprian, with the Fragment of one in Euſebius. There is another Letter of his beſides, to Lupicinus Biſhop of Vienna, which is writ in a Style as different from that of the true Cornelius, as any of the reſt; we find the word Maſs in it, which was unknown to the Authors, that lived in the time of this Pope.

The Epiſtle attributed to Lucius, is full of Citations out of the Vulgar Latin, and of ſeveral Paſſages taken out of the Firſt Council of Arles, the Third of Carthage, that of Milevis, S. Leo, Gregory, Agatho, Adrian, and Sixtus the Pythagorean: Beſides, it is dated Six Months before the Election of Lucius.

The two Epiſtles Attributed to Stephanus, are filled with Citations out of Modern Authors, and Statutes, that don't all agree with the time of this Pope, and conſequently are Spurious.

For the ſame Reaſons, we muſt paſs the ſame Judgment of the two Letters of Sixtus the Second, the two of Pope Dionyſius, the three of S. Felix the Firſt, the two of Eutychianus, that of Caius, the two of Marcellinus, thoſe of Marcellus, the three of Euſebius, the Letter and Decree of Miltiades, and the reſt of the Letters of the Popes collected by Iſidore, that are full of ſeveral Paſſages taken out of the Fathers, Popes, and Councils more Modern than the very Popes, by whom they are pretended to be written; and in which many things are to be found, that don't in the leaſt agree with the true Hiſtory of thoſe times, and were purpoſely ſaid to favour the Court of Rome, and eſtabliſh her Pretenſions againſt the Rights of Biſhops, and the Liberties of Churches. But it would take up too much time to ſhew the groſs falſity of theſe Monuments, that are now rejected by a common Conſent, and even by thoſe Authors, that are moſt favourable to the Court of Rome, who are obliged to abandon the Patronage of theſe Epiſtles, though they have done a great deal of Service in eſtabliſhing the greatneſs of the Court of Rome, and ruining the ancient Diſcipline of the Church, eſpecially in relation to Eccleſiaſtical Deciſions, and Rights of Biſhops.

An Abridgment of the Doctrin, Diſcipline, and Morality of the Three Firſt Ages of the Church.

An Abridgment of Doctrine, &c.

After having given a Summary of what is Contained in the Works of the Eccleſiaſtical Authors for the Three firſt Ages of the Church, I ſuppoſe it would not be amiſs, to preſent the Reader with an Abridgment alſo of the Theology of the Primative Chriſtians. This Deſign, beſides the relation it had to the Work it ſelf, ſeem'd in my Opinion to be the principal Fruit and Advantage that could be gathered from it. For the ultimate Scope and End, which a Man ought to propoſe to himſelf in reading the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, and their Hiſtory, is not to gratifie a vain fooliſh Curioſity, but to learn Religion thereby. We muſt not ſtudy theſe Matters, only to make a Pompous Oſtentation of our Knowledge, but to come better Chriſtians, to become more certain of the Doctrin of the Church, more reſpectful to its Diſcipline, and better inſtructed in its Holy Morality. For all Theology reduces it ſelf to theſe Three Points,

Doctrin,

Doctrin, Discipline and Morality. Doctrin concerns the Articles of Faith that our Religion teaches us; Discipline concerns the Government of the Church; and Morality teaches us, what things we are to do, and what we are to forbear. Hereticks overthrow the Doctrin of the Church by their Errours. Schismaticks destroy its Discipline by violating the Orders and Rules of the Church: And lastly, The vitious Christian discards and lays aside the Laws of its Morality, by living after an irregular manner. For the better avoiding these Rocks and Precipices, it is exceeding requisite for all Christians, to draw out of the Tradition of the ancient Church, that is to say, out of the Books of the Primitive Fathers, who are the unquestionable Witnesses of the Opinion of the Church in their own times; to draw, I say, from thence the Doctrin which they are obliged to believe, to examine the Ecclesiastical Discipline, which they are to revere and obey, and lastly from thence to learn the most Holy Rules of the Christian Morality.

An Abridgment of the Doctrin.

An Abridgment of Doctrin.

THE Doctrin of the Church was always the same, and will be ever so till the end of the World: For 'tis utterly impossible that the true Church should cease to be, or that the true Church should not teach the Doctrin of Jesus Christ, because whether she should teach a Doctrin different from that of Jesus Christ, or whether she should not teach the Doctrin of our Blessed Saviour, in both these Cases she would cease to be the true Church. Jesus Christ, as S. Irenæus, Tertullian, and all the rest of the Ancients have observed, taught his Apostles all the Truths of Faith. The Apostles published them throughout all the Earth, and opened them to all the Churches in the World, whose Doctrin is found to be conformable each to other in Articles of Faith. This Doctrin was always preserved in the Church, which is the Pillar and Foundation of Truth. 'Tis indeed very true, that they did not always make use of the same terms, and that before the Birth of Heresies, they did not observe that precaution in speaking of Mysteries, which they did afterwards, when they were attack'd by the Hereticks: But still the Foundation of Doctrin was always the same as to the principal Articles of our Faith. We must likewise acknowledge, that there were some Errours very frequent in the First Ages of the Church, that have been rejected since, but then they don't concern the principal Articles of our Faith; and besides were never looked upon to be the received Doctrin of the Church, but only the most common Opinions. These previous Observations, will be confirmed by an Abridgment of the Doctrin of the Church, as it is delivered by the Authors of the Three first Centuries; which we are going to represent in as few words as possiby we can.

They taught, That the Grounds and Principles of Faith, were the Holy Scriptures, and Tradition; that we ought to believe Mysteries, though we were not able to comprehend them; they spoke of the Nature of God and of his Attributes after a most excellent manner; they believed him to be Invisible, Eternal, Incorruptible, &c. they have frequently discoursed of his Providence, his Power, his Bounty, his Mercy, and his Goodness; they wrote very sharply against the false Divinities of the Pagans, and the Errours of Hereticks, who imagined that there cou'd be above one Sovereign and Independent being; they proved that God Created all Things, and even Matter it self, which was not Eternal; they acknowledged the Trinity of the Three Persons in one only God, the Divinity and Eternity of the Word, and of the Holy Ghost; they maintain'd that the Word was from all Eternity in God, as a Person distinct from the Father; that the Father created the World by him, and that he governs it, and that it was the Person of the Word that appear'd to the ancient Patriarchs under different Figures, and who was at last Incarnate; that Jesus Christ was the Word made Man, God and Man all together, composed of two intire and different Natures; that he had a Soul and Body like unto ours; that he took this Body in the Womb of the Virgin Mary; that his Flesh was real and true; that he suffered and was really Dead; that he made himself Man, to save the World that was lost by the Sin of the first Man; that he came to discover the Truth to them, to shew them an Example; and that he redeemed them by his Death; that he descended into Hell, and afterwards rose again from the Dead; that he will come at the Day of Judgment to judge all Men; that he will Condemn the Wicked to everlasting Punishments, and reward the Good with Eternal Happiness, after he has raised up both the one and the other. All the Fathers, of whom we have spoken, make Profession of this Faith, and assure us, That this is the Doctrin, which all the Churches in the World have received from the Apostles, and that it was necessary to believe it in order to become a Christian. They sometime make use of some Expressions concerning the Person of the Word, that seem to derogate from his Divinity; as for instance, when they say, that the Word was not begotten, till the Beginning of the World; that he is visible, and that the Father is invisible; that he is one Portion of the Substance of the Father, and that the Father is all Substance. But these ways of Speaking, have a very good Meaning in these Authors, as we have often observed. For when they say, That the Word was begotten at the Beginning of the World, and that he was not the Son before, they don't mean that the Word began only to exist then, since they acknowledge he existed before, and was in God from all Eternity: But they take the Word Generation in another Sense than we do, giving this Name to a certain Prolation, or Emission of the Word, which they imagine was done, when God resolved to create the World; and 'tis in this sense they say, that the Word who was from all Eternity in God, was generated or begotten at that time, and that he had had not always the Quality of the Son. We have likewise explained in what sense they say, that the Word is visible, and the Father invisible; and we have made it evidently appear, that they did not believe, that the Word was therefore of a different Nature from the Father but only that they attributed Visibility to the Son, as they ascribed Almightiness to the Father: Saying, That it is through the Son, that God makes every External Being, and consequently that by him he renders himself visible to Mankind. This Manner of Speaking is so little contrary to the Divinity of the Word, that it is to be found in Athanasius, and in the other Fathers that lived after the Nicene Council. In short, when they say that the Son was a Portion of the Substance of the Father, we are so far from being able to conclude that they were of Arius's Opinion, that on the contrary, it follows from thence, that they believed the Son was not created of Nothing, as Arius afterwards taught, but that he was Consubstantial to the Father; that is to say, of the same Substance as the Nicene Council has determined. But wherefore do they say, that the Son is only something derived from the Substance of the Father? Is it because they believed he was inferiour to the Father? Not at all, but it was because they conceived, that the Father, as having all the Divinity in him, communicated it to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost. 'Tis upon this account that they usually ascribe to the Person of the Father all the Attributes of the Godhead, as we may see in the Creed, where after it is said, I believe in God, they add, Almighty, Creator of Heaven and Earth, &c. and yet we must not therefore say, that these Attributes don't agree to the Son and the Holy Ghost, but only that they are attributed to the Father; because he is the Fountain and Original of the Divinity, and because the Son and Holy Ghost receive it from him. I pass over in Silence some feeble Objections, that are only founded upon the ambiguity of the words Nature and Creation, that have not been as yet determined to a certain sense, as also the Signification of the word Hypostasis has been a long time undetermined. Thus when the Son is called another Substance than the Father, (though that is but very seldom) yet we are not to conclude from thence, that the Person who speaks after this manner, does not believe him to be truly God, because the Words of Nature and Substance were not at that time determined to the sense, they received afterwards, and because they may be taken for a Person subsisting. This is so true, that Gregory Nazianzen, and some others that lived in a time, when these Expressions were determined, forbore not to say sometimes that the Father was the first Substance or Nature, and the Son the Second; And thus it is ordinary for those, that acknowledged the Divinity of the Word, to say, That God made or created him, though they believe that he was not created of Nothing, but Begotten of the Divine Substance.

As to the Incarnation, the Fathers of the Three first Centuries have said nothing that in the least seems to favour the Errours of the Paulianists, the Apollinarists, the Nestorians, or the Eutychians; and they always distinguished Two Natures in Jesus Christ, and admitted the Proprieties of these Natures without Confusion, and being changed one into the other, yet re-united at the same time in the same Person. God and Man both together. They likewise plainly say, That Jesus Christ was Born of a Virgin by the Operation of the Holy Ghost, without Concupiscence and without Sin. And though they frequently tell us, That the benefit of the Incarnation is the Instruction, and the Example which Jesus Christ has given us; yet they acknowledge besides that, that he has truly Redeemed us by his Death; and that he has satisfied God for us. They believed, that we could not be Saved without believing in him; and for that Reason they imagined, that he descended into Hell, as well as the Apostles after him, to Preach the Gospel there to the Jews and Gentiles, who had known the true God, and had lived virtuously. They were of Opinion, That the Day of Judgment was at hand; That the Souls of Men until that Day, were neither perfectly Happy nor Miserable, though they underwent some Punishment before-hand, or were at rest, according to the proportion of the Good or Evil they had done in their Bodies. They almost universally believed with Papias, that Jesus Christ was to Reign a Thousand Years upon Earth, but they never asserted that Opinion as a Matter of Faith. They were sufficiently divided about the Nature of the Soul; some of them supposed it to be Corporeal, others declared, That they believed it to have been Spiritual; but however the better part of them agreed that it was Immortal, that the Just would be rewarded with Everlasting Happiness, and the Wicked everlastingly Punished. They never disquieted themselves in examining wherein the Beatitude consisted, but they were perswaded, That the Wicked should be punished with Fire, and that not Metaphorical, but Real. They advanced Man's Free-Will very highly, and maintained that he might carry himself either to Good or Evil; and yet they acknowledged, That since the Transgression of the First Man, we were naturally inclined to Evil, and that we stood in need of the Assistance and Grace of God to determine us to what was Good. They did not Philosophize too far about the Nature, and several Species of Angels; but only satisfied themselves, that there were good Angels, and likewise bad ones called Dæmons. They were of Opinion, that both the one and the other were Corporeal, and imagined that the bad Angels were lost for their love of Women, and they positively asserted, that the good Ones took care of things below. All of them were sensible of the Wounds and Punishment of Adam's Sin, but they dont seem to agree, that Infants were born subject to Sin, and worthy of Damnation. Nevertheless, this appears to be the common Opinion; as is evident from S. Cyprian, who says, "That it was requisite to Baptize Infants before "the Eighth day, for fear lest if they died without Baptism, this delay should prove the occasion "of their Destruction. They often spoke of the Necessity and wonderful Effects of Baptism, and said that the Holy Ghost descended by the Imposition of the Hands of the Bishop. They maintained, That the Church had Power to reconcile those that repented of their Sins; and did not doubt but that the Eucharist was the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ, and accordingly called it by that

Name.

Name. They extolled Virginity without condemning Marriage; they honoured the Saints and Martyrs as the Servants of God; they ſpoke of the Virgin Mary with a great deal of reſpect, and yet with no leſs diſcretion and adviſedneſs. S. Clement affirms, That ſhe continued a Virgin after her Delivery; but Origen, Tertullian, and ſome others, were of the contrary Opinion. We find nothing in the Three firſt Ages of the Church, either for or againſt the Aſſumption; there is a Paſſage in S. Irenæus, that is not favourable to the immaculate Conception. They believed that the Holy Scriptures were written by the Inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt, that they contain all the principal Articles of our Faith; that though they are obſcure in ſome places, yet they are clear enough in many others, and that even their Obſcurity has its Uſe; and that all Chriſtians might read them, provided they made good uſe of them: That it is neceſſary to believe what the Scripture, Tradition, and the Church teach us, without endeavouring to ſearch too deep into the Myſteries of our Religion, and diſputing about them. They acknowledged no other Books of the Old Teſtament to be Canonical, but thoſe that were received into the Canon of the Jews, though now and then they cited ſome other Books as very good and uſeful. In the New Teſtament they received as Canonical the Four Evangeliſts, the Fourteen Epiſtles of S. Paul, (though ſome of them queſtioned that to the Hebrews, and many Perſons attributed it to another, and not to S. Paul) the Firſt Epiſtles of S. John, and of S. Peter. The Epiſtles of S. James and S. Jude. The Second of S. Peter, the Second and Third of S. John were received by ſome, and rejected by others, as well as the Apocalypſe. They ſometimes cited the Apocryphal Books, but never reckoned them among the Canonical Scriptures. An Abridgment of Doctrin.

Thus I have given you a ſhort Summary of part of the Opinions of the Fathers in the Three Firſt Ages of the Church. The moſt part of the Proofs, which I have here laid down, are to be found in the Abridgment of thoſe Authors, that I have made in this Volume; and I don't in the leaſt queſtion, but that thoſe Perſons, who will carefully read over the ſame Authors, will be ſenſible, that I have impoſed nothing upon them, and that their Doctrin is what I have now repreſented it.

An Abridgment of the Diſcipline.

WE cannot ſay of the Diſcipline of the Church, what we have affirmed concerning its Doctrin viz. That it is the ſame in all Times, and all Places; becauſe it is an undeniable Truth, that it has been different in many Churches, and has been from time to time ſubject to change. We ought not however to conclude from this Principle, that it is unneceſſary to ſtudy the Primitive Diſcipline, or that we are obliged only to learn that of the Time and Church where we live; for beſides, that thoſe Perſons who are ignorant of the Diſcipline of the Primitive Church, cannot pretend to underſtand the Books of the Ancients, this ancient Diſcipline is the Foundation of ours: And tho' the Exterior part has been changed, yet the Spirit of the Church is always the ſame. It is not therefore an unprofitable Labour as ſome have vainly imagined, to buſie ones ſelf in examining the Diſcipline of the Ancient Church; on the contrary, it is a Study extremely uſeful and neceſſary for a Divine. An Abridgment of Diſcipline.

It muſt be acknowledged that the Diſcipline that was obſerved in the Infancy of the Church, however Holy it was in its Simplicity, yet was not arrived to its Perfection; for the Apoſtles altogether applying themſelves to what was neceſſary at the beginning, were content to Preach the Doctrin and Morality of our Bleſſed Saviour, without giving themſelves the trouble to regulate what related to the Ceremonies or Diſcipline of the Church. Nevertheleſs we are not to imagine, that they intirely neglected it, and S. John, who lived longer than the reſt of the Apoſtles, ſeems to have applied himſelf more particularly to it. But the Succeſſors of the Apoſtles, by little and little, regulated the Ceremonies, that ought to be obſerved, as well in the Adminiſtration of the Sacraments, as in the Aſſemblies of Chriſtians, and made particular Orders about the Government of Churches, the Form of Eccleſiaſtical Judicatures, and many other Points of Diſcipline.

Theſe Ceremonies were exceedingly augmented in the Fourth Century, when the Church began to enjoy the Benefits of Peace and Tranquility, and publickly Celebrated the Divine Service in the time of the Emperor Conſtantine. Then it was that the Biſhops met together with Liberty, being ſupported by the Authority of Princes; and made abundance of Rules concerning the Government of the Church, the Rights of the Biſhops of the greater Sees, the Forms of Judicature, and infinite Numbers of other Matters.

We have here obliged our ſelves to ſpeak only of the Diſcipline, that was obſerved in the Three firſt Ages of the Church: Then it was plain and ſimple, and had ſcarce any other Splendor to recommend it, but what the Holineſs of the Manners and Lives of the Chriſtians gave to it. They Aſſembled every Sunday in particular, in certain Places appointed and ſet apart for Publick Devotion, where they continued a long time in Prayer, which they pronounced with a low Voice, without Singing it aloud, as afterwards they did. The Biſhop, or in his Abſence, the Miniſter, preſided in that Congregation, where they read the Holy Scriptures, and oftentimes the Biſhop preached the Word of God. The Feſtivals of our Bleſſed Saviour's Nativity, of Eaſter and Whitſunday were Celebrated even in thoſe Days with great Solemnity. It was not their Cuſtom on Sundays, as likewiſe from Eaſter to Whitſunday, to pray Kneeling, and when they offered up their Prayers, they always turned to the Eaſt. The places where they met were plain and without Ornament, and it ſeems probable, that in thoſe times the uſe of Images, of Croſſes and Incenſe was not common. They did not give the Name of Temple to their Houſes of Publick Prayer, nor that of Altar to the Table upon which they celebrated the Euchariſt; they had often their Feaſts of Charity and Benevolence, which they called Agapæ, where all Comers were kindly entertained.

They pray'd for the Dead, and made Oblations for them, and celebrated the Sacrifice of the Maſs in Commemoration of them; the Chriſtians gave one another a Kiſs of Peace; they called one another by the Name of Brethren, and continually made the Sign of the Croſs. They pray'd to Saints and Martyrs, and ſolemnized the day of their Death with Joy, and were perſuaded that they interceded with God in behalf of the Living. They Baptized with ſome Ceremonies, thoſe that were well inſtructed in their Religion, and who had given ſatisfactory Signs of their ſincere Converſion; they generally dipt them thrice in the Water, invoking the Name of the Holy Trinity, and they never adminiſtred this Sacrament ſolemnly, but at the Feaſts of Eaſter and Pentecoſt. In Africk towards the Third Age of the Church, they made uſe of Holy Water in Baptizing their Neophytes. They anointed them with Oil after Baptiſm, and imagined that this Ceremony convey'd ſome Internal Benefit to them, and likewiſe in ſome Churches they gave them Milk and Hony to taſte. They impoſed Hands upon them, that the plenitude of the Holy Ghoſt might deſcend on them, and they conſidered this Impoſition of Hands, which was generally reſerved for the Biſhop, as a diſtinct Sacrament from Baptiſm.

Baptiſm was never reiterated among them, but by Hereticks in ſome particular Churches, and if after it any Chriſtians fell into Sin, of which they were convinced, or made a Confeſſion to the Prieſt, they were enjoyn'd a ſevere Penance; that is to ſay, they were thrown out of the Communion of the Church, forbidden the Aſſemblies of the Faithful, and obliged to Faſt, to Humble and Mortifie themſelves Publickly at the Church-Porch. In ſome Churches, and particularly in thoſe of Africk and Rome, there was a time, when they never admitted to Peace thoſe that fell into Idolatry, or thoſe that had committed Murder and Adultery. They afterwards conſented to ſome relaxation for Murderers and Adulterers, and afterwards for Idolaters themſelves, whom they reconciled to the Church, either at the point of Death, or after a long and ſevere Penance. 'Tis true, indeed, they did not uſe the ſame Severity in all Churches, and in ſome they admitted Offenders to a Reconciliation after a ſhort Penance, and they likewiſe abated ſomewhat of the Rigor of it at the recommendation of the Martyrs. As for the Clergy, thoſe of them that fell into any notorious Sin, were not only deprived for ever from the Miniſtry, but alſo obliged to undergo Publick Penance, at leaſt in ſome Churches. They that had once undergone this Scandal in the Face of the Congregation were never admitted into the Clergy. They impoſed this courſe of Repentance never but once, and whoever fell into his vitious Tranſgreſſions the ſecond Time, could never be reconciled to the Church, and was to expect his Pardon from God alone. The Sentence of Excommunication was pronounced againſt Hereticks, the Diſturbers of Diſcipline, and thoſe Chriſtians that perſiſted in a profligate irregular Life. He that was Excommunicated by a Biſhop, could be no where received into Communion. The Matter of the Euchariſt was ordinary Bread, and Wine ming'led with Water; the Faithful made this Offering, and the Prieſt or the Biſhop that preſided in the Aſſembly, ſaid Prayers and Thankſgivings over the Bread and over the Chalice, and after theſe Prayers were ended, all the Congregation anſwered Amen. They divided the Conſecrated Bread into ſeveral pieces, and the Deacons diſtributed them to the Standers by, and gave them alſo the Conſecrated Wine. In ſome Churches this Diſtribution was reſerved for the Prieſts, and in others every Man approached near the Table, and took his Portion of the Euchariſt himſelf. All the Chriſtians took it with wonderful reſpect, proteſting they received the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt: They received the Species of Bread in their Hands, and likewiſe the Euchariſt was given to Infants under the Species of Wine. They generally received it in the Morning before they had eaten, but this Cuſtom was not intirely Eſtabliſhed as a Law, and ſometimes they received it in the midſt of a repaſt. This Celebration of the Euchariſt was frequently called a Sacrifice; the Prieſt recited ſeveral Prayers both before and after Conſecration; and S. Cyprian obſerves, that he ſaid, Lift up your hearts to God: And the People anſwered, We have lifted them up to the Lord. The manner of celebrating this Sacrament was Simple and without abundance of Ceremonies, as we have already obſerved in another place. They received the Euchariſt often, and generally whenever they met together in the Aſſemblies of the Faithful: But they believed that they were obliged to live Piouſly, and according to the Holy Rules of the Goſpel, that they might partake of this Celeſtial Food worthily, and after a manner that might be beneficial to them. There is no mention made, in the Three firſt Ages of the Church, of Anointing the Sick, which S. James ſpeaks of; perhaps becauſe it was ſeldom uſed in that time. Marriage was celebrated in preſence of the Prieſts, and was confirmed by ſome Oblation. Second Marriages were reputed Scandalous; nay, they were condemned by ſome Perſons. In ſome Churches they allowed the Husband to ſend home his Wife and Marry another, in caſe of Adultery only: But this was no general Cuſtom among them. They took great Care in the Choice of their Miniſters to elect ſuch Perſons, whoſe Life and Converſation were unblameable. After the Death of thoſe who had been ordained by the Apoſtles, the People Elected. Though the Names of Biſhops and Presbyters were frequently confounded; yet the Biſhops were above the Presbyters. The Biſhops were generally Ordained by their Brethren, who impoſed their Hands upon them, and the Prieſts by the Impoſition of their Biſhop and the Clergy. The Biſhop was mightily reſpected and conſidered by them: Nothing of conſiderable moment in the Church could be done without him, even Baptiſm it ſelf was reſerved for him, but then he treated his Presbyters as Brethren, and did nothing without their Advice. There were Deacons in the

Times

Times of the Apostles, to whom belonged the Administration of Sacred Things at the beginning of the Church, and to whom in some places it was allowed to lay Hands upon Penitents in case of Necessity. The Deaconnesses also are very Ancient. As for the Sub-Deacons, and other inferiour Orders, they were afterwards instituted; yet they were in use in S. Cyprian's time. An Abridgment of Discipline.

All the Bishops were persuaded, that they received their Office immediately from Jesus Christ, and that Providence had assigned to each of them a Portion of the Flock of the Heavenly Pastor to Govern, in such a manner however, as that in an exigence or time of Necessity, they were to relieve the wants of all Churches. They lived in great Union together, and preserved a mutual Correspondence by Letters, which they sent one to another. The Bishops of great Cities had their Prerogatives in Ordinations, and in Councils; and as in Civil Affairs Men generally had recourse to the Civil Metropolis, so likewise in Ecclesiastical Matters, they consulted with the Bishop of the Metropolitan City. The Churches of the Three Principal Cities of the World were looked upon as Chief, and their Bishops attributed great Prerogatives to themselves. The Church of Rome founded by S. Peter and S. Paul, was consider'd as first, and its Bishop, as first among all the Bishops of the World; yet they did not believe him to be Infallible; and though they frequently consulted him, and his Advice was of great Consequence, yet they did not receive it blind-fold and implicitely, every Bishop imagining himself to have a Right to Judge in Ecclesiastical Matters. They had a Prodigious respect for the Decisions of Councils; and the Opinion of the Universal Church, that is to say, of all the Churches in the World, passed for an Infallible Rule of Faith. They esteemed those Persons, that were separated from the visible Society of the Church, to be Schismaticks, for whom no Salvation was to be had. The Clergy were not distinguished from others by any peculiar Habits, but by the Sanctity of their Life and Manners, they were removed from all kind of Avarice, and carefully avoided every thing that seem'd to carry the appearance of scandalous, filthy Lucre. They administred the Sacrament gratis, and believed it to be an abominable Crime to give or receive any thing for a Spiritual Blessing. Tithes were not then appropriated to them, but the People maintained them voluntarily at their own Expence. The Goods of the Church were in common between the Priests and Bishop, who had the Administration of them; the Offerings were reserved for the Poor; the Pastors never abandoned the Flock that was committed to their Care, but with infinite regret, and only in case of Necessity, and carefully acquitted themselves in all the Functions of the Ministry. The Clergy were prohibited to meddle with any Civil and Secular Affairs. They were ordained against their Will, and did not remove from one Church to another, out of a Principle of Interest or Ambition. They were extremely Chast and Regular. It was lawful for Priests to keep the Wives they married before they were Ordained, but Marriage was never permitted after Ordination; but both the one and the other was allowed to Deacons. Monks were not as yet instituted; but there were abundance of Persons of both Sexes among the Christians, that lived in a state of Celibacy, and chearfully submitted to the austerities of an Ascetick Life. There were likewise some Women in the Third Age of the Church, that solemnly obliged themselves to keep their Virginity all their Life-time. All Christians forbore to eat of any Meat that was Strangled, or Blood, or things offered to Idols, which were called Idolothyta. They fasted with great rigor before Easter, some a longer, and others a shorter space, according to the different Customs of Churches: Besides this, they ordinarily fasted every Wednesday and Friday, till Three a Clock in the Afternoon only, and many of them spent these Days in Prayers, which they called their Stations. They likewise fasted and mortified themselves in Times of Publick Calamities, and when they were in the rank of Penitents. They were of Opinion, That it was unlawful to fast on Sundays, and from Easter to Whitsontide. They buried the Bodies of the Deceased in the Earth, and did not approve of the Custom of those that burnt them.

These are the Principal Points of the Discipline of the Ancient Church, which I have collected with all the brevity and exactness that was possible. But no body ought to conclude from what has been said here, that all these things were practised in all Churches, and in all Times of the Three first Centuries. Some began to be used but in the Third Age, and others were only observed in some particular Churches. After all, it must be confessed, That the Discipline of the Church has been so extremely different, and so often altered, that it is almost impossible to say any thing positively concerning it.

An Abridgment of the Morality.

THE Morality of the Gospel has been as immutable as its Doctrin, but it has moreover this Advantage, that though there have been abundance of lewd, wicked Christians in the World, who lived in a manner contrary to the Rules of the Evangelick Morality; yet there were never any Persons to be found in all Antiquity, so rash as to overthrow the Rules of this Morality, and to establish Maxims opposite to it; for, there was scarce ever any dispute in the Church, or any different Sentiments about the Questions of Morality. They followed the Precepts of the Gospel according to the Letter, and exhorted all the Faithful to imitate the Life of Jesus Christ, as a Model of what they were to observe. I should never have done, if I should endeavour to heap together all the Principles or Heads of Morality, that are to be found in the Authors of the Three first Ages: It is sufficient to say, that they not only carried the Professors of Christianity to observe the Precepts of the Decalogue and the Natural Law, but that they likewise recommended to them, the embracing the Perfection of the Christian Mo- An Abridgment of Morality.

Morality. They maintained, that the moſt agreeable Sacrifice that could be offered to God, was to give him a contrite Heart; that it was neceſſary to love him above all things, in order to be juſt; that thoſe that were influenced only by a Principle of ſervile fear, were not really upright; that we ought to die, and ſuffer all Puniſhments imaginable, rather than be guilty of any thing, that might give the World occaſion to believe, that we have renounced or deſpiſed the Doctrin of Jeſus Chriſt; that we ought to love our Neighbour as our ſelf, and aſſiſt and help him; to wiſh ill to no body, to render Good for Evil, and Pray for thoſe that Perſecute us. They exhorted the Faithful to give large Alms, to viſit the Poor, to comfort the Sick, and thoſe that were Impriſoned upon the account of Religion. They recommended it to the Conſideration of thoſe Chriſtians that were Rich and Powerful, to employ the Superfluities of their Fortune in theſe indiſpenſable Duties, and to uſe the World without being Wedded to it; They taught them, that they were obliged not only to avoid Criminal Pleaſures, ſuch as Debauchery, and thoſe that were dangerous, ſuch as the publick Shows and Comedies, but alſo all unprofitable Pleaſures, that had no other end but the meer entertainment of the Senſes; that they ought to content themſelves with what was neceſſary, without a ſollicitous purſuit and ſearch after thoſe Things that ſerved only for Pleaſure or Luxury: That Chriſtian Women ought to be extremely Modeſt in their Garb and Dreſs. They commanded all Perſons of whatſoever Condition, to be Obedient to all Emperors, Magiſtrates and Secular Powers. They exhorted Wives to love their Husbands, Husbands to cheriſh their Wives, Children to obey their Fathers and Mothers, and Parents to have a Care of their Children, and reprehend them without Bitterneſs; they admoniſhed the Faithful to be ſubmiſſive to their Paſtors, and the Paſtors to have a great deal of Charity and Zeal for their Flock.

In a word, They preſcribed all the Rules and Holy Maxims of the Goſpel to the Obſervation of Chriſtians, and exhorted them to lead a Life conformable to them. But what is moſt to be admired, this excellent Syſtem of Morality was not only to be found in the Writings of the Firſt Chriſtians; but it appeared and glittered in their Lives and Actions. We ſay not great things, ſays one of theſe Ancients, but we live them. Non eloquimur magna, ſed vivimus.

Names of Authors.	Genuine Books ſtill Extant.	Books Loſt.	Suppoſititious Books.

[Huetius in his Diſcourſe of the Original of Romances, thinks that this Book might poſſibly have been compoſed by Philander, who impoſed upon M. Fumée, as if it had been really written by Athenagoras. This Dr. Cave ſays is very improbable: But if we conſider how extremely particular this Author is in his Deſcription of thoſe Buildings he mentions, how very improbable it is that Athenagoras ſhould have brought in his Melangenia, deſcribing Jupiter Hammon's Temple more like an Architect than an Hiſtorian, we can hardly conceive it to have been written by a Greek. Beſides, the Architecture it ſelf is ſo very exact according to the Rules of the Five Orders, the Four Ancienteſt whereof were introduced firſt by the Greeks; that it is not likely that one of that Nation, who knew very well that Jupiter Hammon's Temple was never raiſed by Men that were acquainted with their Models of Building, would ever have deſcribed it as Built after ſuch a manner, if he had thought fit to have deſcribed it at all. So that though we cannot certainly tell whether Philander, (who wrote Commentaries upon Vitruvius) was the Author of this Romance, or no; yet theſe Reaſons ſeem to make it more than probable, that it was not written by Athenagoras, eſpecially ſince a Greek Copy was never yet produc'd, and that none of the Ancients ever quoted it, either as his, or as belonging to any Body elſe. And I do not doubt, but Dr. Cave would have been of the ſame Opinion, if he had read the Book over himſelf.

HERMIAS.	A Diſcourſe to ſhew the Ridiculouſneſs of the Opinions of the Pagan Philoſophers.
THEOPHILUS.	Three Books to Autolycus,	A Diſcourſe againſt Marcion. A Diſcourſe againſt the Hereſie of Hermogenes: And ſome other little things.

[Since the firſt Edition of Mr. du Pin's Bibliotheque was publiſhed. Mr. Dodwell ſet out the Chronological Fragments of Biſhop Pearſon, with Additions of his own to the late Biſhop of Cheſter's Diſcourſes concerning the Succeſſion of the firſt Biſhops of Rome. In his Additions to the ſecond Chapter of Biſhop Pearſon's firſt Diſcourſe, he brings ſome Arguments to prove that this Theophilus the Author of theſe Diſcourſes to Autolycus, was not that Biſhop of Antioch that was the 6th from St. Peter, as it has hitherto univerſally been believed. Theophilus ſpeaks of the Perſecution, as of a Calamity the Chriſtians then groaned under, in two or three places, towards the end of the third Book: Καθ' ἡμέραν and ἕως τῆς νῦν: daily, and until now. He ſays alſo, that it chiefly lay upon thoſe that haſtned after Virtue, and endeavour'd to live a Holy Life, Σπεύδοντας ἐπὶ ἀρετὴν καὶ ἀσκῆσαι βίον ὅσιον. Theſe Mr. Dodwell affirms to have been Proſelytes and Catechumens who endeavoured to live up to the Rules of their new Religion, and uſed great Philoſophical ſtrictneſſes of Life, as Origen and his Diſciples did, which is properly meant by the word ἀσκῆσις. The Perſecution of Severus was raiſed particularly againſt New Converts, and thoſe that endeavoured to inſtruct the Catechumens in the Chriſtian Faith: for which reaſon, Origen was ſo ſeverely enquir'd after; from hence it will neceſſarily follow, That Theophilus, who mentions the Perſecution as a thing that had been of ſome Continuance, which did not begin till the Year CCIII. could not be that Biſhop of Antioch that ſucceeded Maximinus, and preceded Heros.]

TOME II.

CONTAINING

An Account of the LIVES and WRITINGS of the Primitive FATHERS, that Flouriſhed in the Fourth Century of Chriſtianity, with Cenſures upon all their BOOKS, determining which are Genuine, and which Spurious.

EUSEBIUS of Cæſarea.

Euſebius of Cæſarea.

EUSEBIUS Surnam'd Pamphilus (a), was Born in Palæſtine (b), towards the latter end of the Reign of Galienus (c). He was ordain'd Prieſt by Agapius Biſhop of Cæſarea in Palæſtine, and ſettled a Famous School in that City. When the Perſecution of Diocleſian aroſe, he exhorted the Chriſtians of Cæſarea to Suffer with Courage for the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and more particularly aſſiſted his dear Friend Pamphilus, who ſuffer'd Martyrdom after two Years Impriſonment. Some have accus'd him of offering Incenſe to Idols during this Perſecution, to releaſe himſelf out of Priſon (d); but this Accuſation is groundleſs, and 'tis much more probable, that he con-

(a) Surnam'd Pamphilus.] From the Name of the Martyr Pamphilus his Friend, and not of his Brother, as Nicephorus believ'd; for in the 7th Book of his Hiſtory, he ſays, That he was firſt acquainted with him when he was a Prieſt.

(b) Palæſtine.] All the Ancients call him Euſebius of Palæſtine. In the Firſt Book of the Life of Conſtantine, he teſtifies, that he had his Education in Palæſtine, and in the Second Book of the ſame Work, after he has repeated a Law of Conſtantine directed to thoſe of Palæſtine, he adds, This was the firſt Letter which Conſtantine addreſs'd unto us. 'Tis not known who were his Kindred. Some have thought that he was the Kinſman of Euſebius of Nicomedia, becauſe in a Letter of Arius to this Biſhop, Euſebius of Cæſarea is call'd his Brother. Neither is it known who were his Maſters. In the Seventh Book of his Hiſtory, he ſays, That he heard Dorotheus, a Prieſt of Antioch, expound the Scriptures; from whence Trithemius, and ſome others, have concluded that he was his Scholar. Acacius Succeſſor to Euſebius wrote his Life, but 'tis loſt.

(c) Towards the latter End of the Reign of Galienus.] There is ſome Proof of this Epocha: For in his Hiſtory Book III Ch. 28. he ſays, That Denys of Alexandria, who died the 17th Year of the Reign of Galienus, liv'd in his time: And in the Fifth Book he ſays, That Paulus Samoſatenus reviv'd the Error of Artemon in his time; and in his Seventh Book, where he gives an Account of what was done under Galienus, he ſays, After we have related the Tranſactions of former times, we come now to thoſe things which happened in our own time.

(d) Some have accus'd him of Offering Incenſe to Idols during this Perſecution, &c.] This he was charged with by Potamon a Confeſſor and Biſhop of Egypt, at the Synod of Tyre; for if we give Credit to St. Epiphanius, in Hereſie 68, this Biſhop perceiving Euſebius of Cæſarea there preſent, cry'd out, O Euſebius, How come you to ſit as Judge upon the innocent Athanaſius? Who can endure it? Tell me, I pray you, were not we in Priſon together in the time of Perſecution? I loſt an Eye there, for maintaining the Truth, but you have loſt no Part of your Body, you have ſuffered nothing: How then did you get out of Priſon? Epiphanius adds, That Euſebius hearing this, roſe up and diſſolv'd the Aſſembly, ſaying, Seeing you charge me with things of this Nature, in a place where you are Strangers, it muſt be true which your Accuſers ſay; for if you exerciſe ſuch Tyranny here, much more will you do it in your own Country. This is confirm'd by the Biſhops of the Council of Alexandria, who ſay in their Letter, That Euſebius of Cæſarea was accus'd by the Confeſſors of Sacrificing to Idols. In the mean time, this Charge of Potamon is groundleſs: For although it were true, that Euſebius was caſt into Priſon for the Faith of Chriſt, it does not follow that he muſt have Sacrific'd to Idols to obtain his liberty, becauſe he loſt no Part of his Body, ſince he might have been delivered from that Perſecution for many other Reaſons, without loſing any of his Members: and it was a raſh Cenſure of his Neighbour in Potamon, to accuſe, as he does, a Biſhop of ſo heinous a Crime, upon ſo weak a Conjecture as this: But the Good-man had more Zeal than Prudence.

Euſebius of Cæſarea.

tinued alway ſtedfaſt in the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt (e). Immediately after this Perſecution was ended, Euſebius was choſen Biſhop of Cæſarea in the room of Agapius (f), in the Year 313, or 314, from the Birth of Chriſt: And from that time he was much engag'd in the Controverſie of Arius, a Presbyter of Alexandria, whom he, (as well as ſome other Biſhops of Palæſtine) at firſt protected, thinking that he was unjuſtly perſecuted by Alexander of Alexandria, his Biſhop. He did not only write to this Biſhop in favour of Arius; but finding he could not prevail to reſtore him, he permitted him and his Followers to keep their Places, and to hold the ordinary Aſſemblies of the Faithful in their Churches, upon condition that they ſhould ſubmit to their Biſhop, and earneſtly deſire to be re-united to his Communion.

It appears by a Letter of Euſebius to Alexander, which is produced in the Second Council of Nice, that he did verily think that Arius, and thoſe of his Party, acknowledg'd the Eternity of the Word, and that he believ'd the contrary Doctrine was falſly charg'd upon them, which may in ſome meaſure excuſe his Proceedings in this Affair: For as ſoon as Arius did clearly diſcover his impious Sentiments in the Council of Nice; Euſebius, with all the other Biſhops, condemn'd them, and propos'd a very Orthodox Confeſſion of Faith. But becauſe it ſeem'd not to renounce the Hereſie of Arius formally enough, therefore the Fathers of the Council added to it the word Conſubſtantial, together with Anathematiſms againſt the Errors of Arius. This new term Conſubſtantial, gave ſome trouble to Euſebius, and he refus'd at firſt to aſſent to it; but being afterwards fully ſatisfy'd of its true meaning, he made no ſcruple of Subſcribing to it, and of Signing the Confeſſion of Faith made by the Council of Nice, which he was never known afterwards openly to violate, though he always maintain'd an intimate Correſpondence with the Biſhops of Arius's Party. He was preſent with them at the Council of Antioch, held in the Year 330, wherein they unjuſtly depos'd Euſtathius, then Biſhop of Antioch. But if he was to be blam'd for conſenting to that unjuſt Deprivation of a Biſhop who was his Enemy; yet it muſt be acknowledg'd that he deſerves great Commendation for refuſing to Succeed him in his See; For being Elected both by the Biſhops and the People, in order to his Ordination to the Biſhoprick of Antioch, after the Depoſing of Euſtathius, he did abſolutely refuſe it; and when the Biſhops wrote about it to the Emperour Conſtantine, that he would oblige Euſebius to agree to this Election, he wrote to him himſelf, humbly praying that he might have leave to refuſe this Biſhoprick; which at laſt the Emperour granted, and greatly commended his Moderation. Nevertheleſs Euſebius continued always to take part with Euſebius of Nicomedia, and aſſiſted at the Council of Tyre, held againſt St. Athanaſius, in the Year 335, and alſo at the Aſſembly of Biſhops, which was held at Jeruſalem at the time of the Dedication of the Church of that City: And, in fine, he was ſent in the Name of thoſe Biſhops to the Emperour Conſtantine, to juſtify what they had done againſt St. Athanaſius. Then it was that he ſpoke a Panegyrick in honour of the Emperour, at a time of publick Rejoicing for beginning the 30th. Year of his Reign, which was the laſt of his Life: And Euſebius himſelf did not long ſurvive this Emperour, whom he mightily lov'd and honour'd, for he alſo died about the Year 338.

He has written many very Learned Books. The Firſt were his Five Books of Apology for Origen, which he compos'd with the Holy Martyr Pamphilus, during the Perſecution of Dioclefian; and to which he only added a Sixth, after the Death of this Martyr. About the ſame time he wrote a Treatiſe againſt Hierocles, who had written two Books againſt the Chriſtian Religion. After he was choſen Biſhop of Cæſarea, he compos'd his Fifteen Books of Evangelical Preparation, and Twenty Books of Evangelical Demonſtration (g): After this he wrote a Chronicle from the Beginning of the World down to the 20th Year of Conſtantine the Great. After this Chronicle follow'd his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (h), divided into Ten Books, which ſeems to have been finiſh'd ſome time after the Council of Nice, though it reaches no further than the 20th Year of Conſtantine. About the Year 332, he compos'd a Cycle for Eaſter, at the deſire of the Emperour, to whom he dedicated it, and caus'd ſome very fair Copies of the Holy Scriptures to be written out, as he himſelf tells us in the Fourth Book of the Life of Conſtantine, Chap. 34, and 35. St. Jerom and Bede make mention of this Paſchal Cycle of Euſebius, compos'd, as they ſay, in imitation of that of Hippolitus. His Books againſt Marcellus of Ancyra were written after the firſt Condemnation of that Heretick in the Council of Conſtantinople, held in the

(e) 'Tis much more probable that he continued always ſtedfaſt in the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt.] Firſt, Becauſe we muſt always think well of our Neighbour, when it does not evidently appear that he has done ill. Secondly, Becauſe 'tis no ways probable, if he had committed ſuch a Crime when he was Prieſt, that he would have been afterwards choſen Biſhop of Cæſarea.

(f) In the room of Agapius.] Baronius and Blondel place Agricolaus between Agapius and Euſebius, whoſe Name is to be found among the Subſcriptions of the Council of Ancyra. But Euſebius in his Seventh Book reckoning up the Names of thoſe Biſhops who govern'd the Church while the Perſecution laſted, endeth his Catalogue of the Biſhops of Cæſarea with Agapius, of whom he ſays, that he took a great deal of pains for his Flock during that Perſecution: And Euſebius himſelf was ordained immediately after the Perſecution; for he aſſiſted in the quality of a Biſhop, at the Dedication of the Church of Tyre, which was done immediately after Peace was reſtor'd to the Church, before Licinius had taken Arms againſt Conſtantine, which happen'd in the Year 313. And therefore if there was one Agricolaus Biſhop of Cæſarea, he did not hold that See for any long time, for Euſebius was ordain'd to it in the Year 314.

(g) After he was choſen Biſhop of Cæſarea, he compos'd his Fifteen Books of Evangelical Preparation, and Twenty Books of Evangelical Demonſtration.] Theſe are cited in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, B. I. Ch. 2. Blondel believes the contrary, that the Hiſtory is cited in the Sixth Book of his Evangelical Demonſtration, Ch. 23. but he was deceived by the Tranſlation.

(h) After this Chronicle followed his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.] He ſaith expreſly in the beginning of his Hiſtory, that the Chronicle was written before it, in theſe Words, Formerly I made an Abridgement of theſe things in my Chronicle, but now I will give a more ample Declaration of them here in this Work.

Year

Year 335, or 336 (i). In ſhort, the Four Books of the Life of Conſtantine, were compos'd after the Death of that Emperor, to which he has added three Tracts, viz. The Harangue which he made at the Dedication of the Church of Jeruſalem, The Diſcourſe of Conſtantine to the Convention of the Saints, and a Panegyrick in Praiſe of this Emperor. Euſebius of Cæſarea.

Beſides theſe Works, whoſe Chronology is known, he hath alſo written, as St. Jerom teſtifies, Five Books of the Theophany, or the Incarnation, Ten Books of Commentaries upon Iſaiah, Thirty Books againſt Porphyrie, Ten whereof were loſt in St. Jerom's time; and a Book of Topography, which is the ſame that St. Jerom tranſlated and entituled, a Book of the Country of the Hebrews, which was afterwards Publiſh'd in Greek by Bonfrerius in the Year 1631. There is mention made in this Book of two other Tracts of the ſame Nature, whereof one contains an Explication of the Names which the Hebrews give to other Nations, and the other was a Topographical Deſcription of the Holy Land and the Temple. St. Jerom alſo places in the Catalogue of Euſebius's Works, Three Books of the Life of Pamphilus, ſome little Tracts upon the Martyrs (k), the Commentaries upon the 150 Pſalms, tranſlated afterwards by Euſebius of Verceilles, and the Rules for reconciling the Four Evangeliſts, together with a Letter to Carpianus. He mentions alſo, in an Epiſtle to Pammachius, Euſebius's Commentary upon the Firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians; and he teſtifieth in another place, that he caus'd to be Publiſh'd an Edition of the Verſion of the Septuagint, taken from the Hexapla of Origen. St. Baſil cites a Treatiſe of Euſebius concerning the Polygamy of the Patriarchs, of which Euſebius himſelf ſpeaks, Book I. Chap. 9. of the Demonſtration, and Book VII. Ch. 3. and 7. of the Preparation. In fine, Theodoret tells us, that Euſebius wrote Eclogues upon the whole Scriptures: But we muſt not forget the Letter which he wrote to the Cæſareans mentioned by Theodoret in his Hiſtory, nor thoſe Letters to Alexander and Euobration concerning Arius, which are cited in the Second Council of Nice, Act. 5. & 6. To theſe we may add, the Letter to the Empreſs Conſtantia, which is quoted by the Biſhops that condemn'd Images, whereof there is a Teſtimony related in the ſame Council, Act. 6. Photius mentions a Book of Euſebius entituled, Apology and Refutation, that is to ſay, An Apology for the Religion of Chriſt, and a Refutation of the Errors of the Gentiles, divided into two Books; and alſo of two other Books, which were, as he ſays, very little different from the two former. The Commentary upon the Canticles, publiſh'd by Meurſius, is falſly aſcribed to Euſebius, ſince in it are cited the Teſtimonies of Authors much later than Euſebius, ſuch as Gregory Nyſſen, Philo Carpathius, and many others. It is not certain, that Euſebius was the Author of that little Tract of the Life of the Prophets, publiſh'd in Greek before Procopius, by Curterius, from a Manuſcript of the Cardinal of Rochefoucauld, and printed at Paris in the Year 1580, though it appears to be ancient. To conclude, There are ſome Treatiſes or Diſcourſes publiſh'd by Sirmondus, which are believed to be a Tranſlation from the Greek of Euſebius of Cæſarea: But though theſe Treatiſes, which ſeem indeed to be tranſlated from the Greek, were compos'd by ſome ancient Author, and have ſomething of the Air and Genius of Euſebius's Writings, neither do they contain any thing unworthy of him; yet there is no full aſſurance that they are his, becauſe they are not mention'd by any of the Ancients, and we cannot now judge with any certainty from a Verſion, of the Stile of Euſebius.

After we have given a Catalogue of all the Writings of Euſebius, whereof we have any Teſtimony, we muſt now Diſcourſe more largely of thoſe that are come to our Hands. His Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory is the moſt conſiderable of all his Books, which is a Collection of all the Memorable Things which happen'd in the Church from the Birth of Jeſus Chriſt to his own time. He has exactly noted the Succeſſion of Biſhops to the Sees of all the Great Cities in the World; he has given an Account of Eccleſiaſtical Writers and their Books, together with the Hiſtory of Hereſies, and ſome Remarks concerning the Jews. He has deſcribed the Perſecutions of the Martyrs, the Controverſies and Diſputes touching Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline; and, in a Word, all things which concern the Affairs of the Church. He Writes nothing of Hiſtory as from himſelf, but almoſt every where, in his Works, he cites the ancient Authors or their Monuments, from whence he had his Relations, and inſerts long Extracts taken out of them, as Men uſually do when they write Annals or Memoirs. This manner of writing Hiſtory, is leſs agreeable indeed, but much more profitable than any other, and gains Credit and Weight to that which is related: For when a Writer reports the Tranſactions of Ancient Times without citing the Authors from whence he had them, he cannot ſo eaſily gain Credit with his Readers, as when he cites his Vouchers, and produces their Teſtimonies for the Truth of what he ſays, ſince thoſe Relations muſt certainly be agreeable to Truth, which are founded on the Authority of unqueſtionable Witneſſes. But beſides this general Reaſon, there is alſo a particular one, why this way of writing Hiſtory, which is followed by Euſebius, is of wonderful Advantage unto us; which is this, That for the moſt part, thoſe Authors and their Works which were more ancient than Euſebius, have been loſt ſince his Death by the injury of time; and therefore we are mightily oblig'd to him who hath preſerved in his Hiſtory, not only the Memory of thoſe Authors, but ſome conſiderable Fragments of their Works. In ſhort, without the Hiſtory of Euſebius, we ſhould ſcarce have any Knowledge, not only of the Hiſtory of thoſe firſt Ages of the Church, but even of the Authors that wrote

(i) His Books againſt Marcellus of Ancyra were written after the firſt Condemnation of that Heretick in the Council of Conſtantinople held in the Year 335, or 336] They are Dedicated to Flacillus Biſhop of Antioch, who was not choſen Biſhop of that Church until the Year 335. Beſides, in the Firſt Book of Eccleſiaſtical Theology, Ch. 14. he ſays, That Marcellus was condemned.

(k) Some little Tracts upon the Martyrs] We have one Book of theſe Tracts concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, but it is probable that he wrote more. The Martyrology ſuppoſed to be tranſlated by St. Jerom, has been aſcribed to him, but that Work is none of his, neither is the Tranſlation St. Jerom's.

Euſebius of Cæſarea.

at that time, and their Works, ſince no other Writer but he, has given an Account of thoſe things. For it is obſervable, that the Hiſtorians who followed after him, as Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, begun their Hiſtory where he ended his, either becauſe they thought that he had Collected in his all that was Remarkable of thoſe firſt Ages, or becauſe they had no other way of coming to the Knowledge of them but by him. Nicephorus Calliſtus, who pretended to write a New Hiſtory in the Fourteenth Century, has mixt in it a great many fabulous and uncertain Tales, becauſe they were not taken out of Euſebius, nor confirm'd by the Authority of any Ancient Author. Nevertheleſs, it muſt be confeſs'd, That even the Hiſtory of Euſebius is not altogether ſo perfect as were to be wiſh'd, for it is not written ſmoothly, neither is it always exact (l). Our Author does often enlarge too much upon thoſe things that ought to be ſlightly paſs'd over; and on the contrary, ſometimes he expreſſes ſuch things very ſuccinctly, which deſerve a much larger Account. But notwithſtanding theſe Faults, it is a moſt Excellent Hiſtory, and highly to be priz'd.

There is at the End of the Eighth Book, a ſmall Tract of the Martyrs of Palæſtine, in which he deſcribes the Martyrdom of thoſe that ſuffered in this Province for the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt. Some have confounded this with the Eighth Book, but againſt Reaſon; for it is a diſtinct Tract, and, as it were, a Supplement to it.

Ruffinus is the firſt who Tranſlated this Hiſtory of Euſebius, but he, according to his uſual manner, took a great liberty in doing it. He has paſt over the whole Tenth Book, and has added to it two more which contain the following Hiſtory down to the Death of Theodoſius. His Tranſlation is clean, neat, and elegant enough, it gives the Sence and Thought of the Author in a very agreeable Stile, and ſometimes more faithfully than thoſe Interpreters who have Tranſlated him ſince. This Verſion has been the great Magazine to all the Latin Authors, who have drawn from thence whatever they either wrote or underſtood of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Firſt Ages.

Muſculus the Proteſtant, undertook a new Tranſlation of the Hiſtory of Euſebius, which he perform'd happily enough. He ties himſelf up very much to the Letter, and has Tranſlated the Text with much politeneſs and brevity: But he does not always underſtand his Author aright, and ſo he has committed many faults in his Verſion. The Tranſlation of Chriſtophorſon is more Elegant, and his Stile more Ciceronian, but it is too Copious for an Hiſtorian, whoſe Stile ſhould be conciſe and cloſe. He hath Corrected many Faults of Muſculus, and yet his own Verſion is not altogether free.

The Learned Henricus Valeſius having obſerv'd the Faults of all former Verſions, undertook to make a new one, more perfect. He publiſh'd it with the Greek Text, Reviſ'd by Four Manuſcripts, and added to it moſt learned Notes. His Verſion deſerves Univerſal Applauſe, and the ſingular eſteem of all Learned Men, for it has two qualities that rarely meet together, being both Elegant and Literal; And yet the Criticks have obſerv'd ſome Faults in it: But it is impoſſible to ſatisfie all Men, and very difficult to avoid all Miſtakes, in a Work of ſo great a length.

It was very fit that the Hiſtory of Euſebius ſhould be Tranſlated, that thoſe who neither underſtand Greek nor Latin might not be depriv'd of the Hiſtory of the Church in its Original Purity. The Preſident Couſin has done the Publick this Service, who has Tranſlated this Hiſtory into French, with as great Purity as Faithfulneſs, and has prefix'd to his Verſion a Preface wherein he briefly takes notice of the principal Errors of Euſebius, and paſſes a very ſound and ſolid Judgment upon his Hiſtory and his Perſon.

The Chronicle of Euſebius, or the Abridgement of the Univerſal Hiſtory of all Times and Places from the Beginning of the World down to his own time, was divided into Two Parts: The Firſt was entituled, Canons of Univerſal Hiſtory, or Univerſal Chronography; and the Second, Chronical Canons. In the firſt, he has collected the Origin and Hiſtory of all Nations ſeverally, the Succeſſion of all Kings and Princes of the World, of the High-Prieſts of the Jews, and the Biſhops of the Chief Churches from the Birth of Jeſus Chriſt. In the ſecond, he has enlarg'd and digeſted theſe Hiſtories according to the order of Time. St. Jerom has tranſlated both Parts (m): But there was nothing remaining of the Tranſlation of the Firſt, but ſome Extracts containing the Names of Kings, which are Printed with the Verſion of the Second Part. This Tranſlation of St. Jerom, which was thus Printed at Baſle, was (l) Neither is it always Exact.] Many Faults are obſerved in it contrary to the Truth of Hiſtory, and contrary to Chronology. In his Firſt Book he ſaith, That the Taxing which Joſephus ſpeaks of in his Eighteenth Book of the Hiſtory of the Jews, is the ſame that St. Luke writes of. In the ſame Book, Ch. 9. he ſays, That Lyſanias Tetrarch of Abylene was Brother to Philip, and Herod the younger, which is not true. In Ch. 7. he ſays, That Herod Junior, was baniſhed to Vienna, contrary to the Teſtimony of Joſephus, who aſſures us, Book XVIII. Ch. 9. That he was ſent to Lyons. He thinks that Jeſus Chriſt ſpent Four Years in his preaching. He is miſtaken in the Epocha of the Voyage of St. Paul to Jeruſalem. In Book XI. Ch. 13. he diſtinguiſhes Cephas who was rebuked at Antioch by St. Paul, from the Apoſtle St. Peter, tho' he was certainly the ſame. I ſhall not now mention his other Faults, which he committed by taking things upon hear-ſay, nor the Apocryphal Books, which he cites very often. He miſtakes the Jews of Alexandria, mentioned by Philo, called Therapeutæ, for Chriſtians. B. II. Ch 10. he confounds Novatus and Novatianus. B. 6. Ch 45. he makes miſtakes in the years of the Pontificates of Sixtus and Eutychianus.

(m) St. Jerom has tranſlated both Parts.] St. Jerom in his Commentary upon Daniel, Ch. 9. ſaith, That there was found in the Verſion of the Chronicle of Euſebius an Explication of two Paſſages of Scripture, both which were in his Firſt Part: Marcellinus ſays alſo plainly, That St. Jerom tranſlated the Firſt Part. St. Jerom in the Preface to his Verſion ſays, That he tranſlated Euſebius word for word, from the time of Abraham to the taking of Troy; and that from the taking of Troy to the time of Conſtantine, he had added many things of his own Head, particularly about thoſe Matters that concern the Roman Hiſtory, which Euſebius had neglected; and that he was the Author of what follows after the time of Conſtantine, down to the Sixth Conſulſhip of Valens.

afterwards

afterwards Publish'd more exactly by Arnaud de Pontac, Bishop of Bazas, in the Year 1605. But none took care to Collect the Greek Fragments of the Original of Eusebius, before the famous Joseph Scaliger, who Publish'd them in the Year 1606, in a Book entituled, The Treasure of Time; wherein he gives a large Version of the First Part of the Chronicle than any other Edition, and renders the Version of the Second Part more Correct and Exact; to which he adds many very considerable Greek Fragments, taken out of some later Greek Authors.

Eusebius of Cæsarea.

This Book of Eusebius is a Work of Prodigious Study, and most Accomplish'd Learning: For he must have read an infinite number of Books and Ancient Monuments, to compose such an Universal History; and at the same time he must have a well-poiz'd Judgment, to collect so many Particulars, and relate every one of them in their proper time. This infinite Labour, is an evident Proof, that Eusebius was a Man of vast Reading and a Prodigious Memory: Nevertheless, it must be confess'd, that the Chronicle of Africanus was a great help to him, and that he took almost all his Chronicle from Africanus's Chronicon, which he had Copied. He corrected indeed some of the Faults which he found in him, but then he himself committed many more (n): And indeed it is next to impossible, to avoid all Errors in so long and knotty a Work as an Univerial Chronicle. These Faults are pardonable in a Book of this Nature, and do not hinder, but that it ought to be esteemed one of the most useful Books of all Antiquity.

The Four Books of the Life of Constantine, are, properly speaking, a Panegyrick; in which, he gives an Account as an Orator, rather than as an Historian; but only of the Life of this Emperor, but also of the Revolutions of the Empire, and the Affairs of the Church, in which Constantine had a hand, The Stile of this Work is more Sublime and Florid than that of the other Books of Eusebius, and yet it is not finer, nor more agreeable. He does nothing for the most part, but give slight hints of the Relations which he has given at large elsewhere, and deliver the Heads of them, leaving out the Circumstances and Particulars.

He has added at the End of those Four Books, Constantine's Oration to the Convention of the Saints, i. e. to the Christians, and a Harangue in praise of this Emperor, which he spoke before him at the Festival Solemnity of the 30th Year of his Reign. In this Piece he enlarges upon the Praises of God, the Wonders of his Providence, the Mystery of the Incarnation, the Benefits of Jesus Christ to Mankind, more than upon the Commendation of the Emperor, which he intermixes only now and then; for he praises him as a Christian Prince ought to be prais'd; that is to say, by publishing those Vertues which have a relation to Piety and Religion. This Discourse is the most Eloquent of all his Works, and is compos'd with much Art and Fineness.

The Fifteen Books of Evangelical Preparation, address'd to Theodorus, (who is believ'd to have been Bishop of Laodicea, and is mention'd in the 32d Chapter of the Seventh Book of his Ecclesiastick History) were written on purpose to dispose the Minds of Men to embrace the Christian Religion. In them Eusebius shows, that the Theology of the Pagans was ridiculous, and contrary to good Sence; and that the Christian Theology was Holy and Reasonable. The First Part of this Proposition, he proves in the First Six Books, and the Second Part in the other Nine. He begins with a General Description of the Doctrine of Christ, and to render it the more enticing, he give an account of the ineffable Blessings it has reveal'd to Mankind, and how it concludes to Piety, by teaching them to know and honour one God. After this, he alledges some Prejudices in favour of the Christian Religion, such as the Accomplishment of Prophecies, the Holiness of the Lives of Christians, and the wonderful facility, with all Persons, even those that were more dull and barbarous, found in comprehending the greatest and sublimest Truths. After he has thus dispos'd his Readers to be favourable to the Christian Religion, he destroys the Religions of all the Nations of the World, and lays open the Falshood of every one of them in particular, not only as to what concerns their History, but as to their pretended Mysteries and Prophane Morality. In the Fourth Book he confutes the strongest Argument of the Pagans, taken from the Predictions of their Oracles. He shows, that the Gods whom they worship'd were Evil Spirits, call'd Dæmons, as the Philosophers themselves have acknowledged. In the Sixth Book he opposes Destiny or Fatal Necessity, and proves there by many Reasons and Testimonies, that Man is entirely a free Agent.

In the following Nine Books, he shews that the Christians had reason to embrace the Theology of the Hebrews, because none but that affords solid Foundations for a Sincere Piety, together with Sound and true Doctrine. This he proves by a particular Induction of their Opinions, because there is no Theology but this which teaches the Immortality of the Soul, which commands Men to Adore one God only; which informs them, that he was the Creator of the World, which teaches them that the Word is the Son of God, and that the Holy Ghost is to be Worship'd with the same Worship that is due to the Father and the Son; There is no other Religion but this, which teaches Men, that they must not Adore the Angels as Gods, but honour them as the Ministers of God; which gives a rational Account of the Fall of some of the Angels, and instructs Man, that he is made after the Image of God: In a word, there is none but this whose Doctrine is agreeable to Right Reason. After this, he subjoins a long Fragment out of a Treatise of Maximus, which demonstrates that Matter is not Eternal.

In the Eighth Book he gives the History of the Version of the Septuagint, and to prove the Authority of the Holy Scriptures, he makes it appear by the Testimony of the Jews, that their Law is Mystical and very Significant, which he afterwards represents as worthy of all Esteem, by the holiness of their

their Lives who have embrac'd it, by the Example of the Eſſenes, whoſe manner of Life he deſcribes, and by the Wiſdom of Philo.

In the Ninth Book, he relates the Teſtimonies of the Pagans, who have ſpoken in favour of the Jewiſh Religion; and of thoſe who allow the Truth of Moſes's Hiſtory. In the 10th. he ſhows, that Plato and the Pagan Philoſophers have taken the greateſt part of what they have written, from the Books of Moſes. In the 11th. Book he demonſtrates particularly, that the Doctrine of Plato is agreeable to that of Moſes, and compares many of the Opinions of that Philoſopher with thoſe of the Jews. He carries on that Compariſon in the 12th. and 13th. Books. But in the mean time, he demonſtrates, that this Philoſopher had his Errors, and that no Book but the Scriptures is wholly free. In the 14th. and 15th. Books, he relates the Opinions of the Philoſophers, he ſhows their Contradictions, and oftentimes confutes one of them by another: From all which he concludes, that the Chriſtians had reaſon to forſake the Religion of the Pagans, and embrace that of the Jews.

After he has thus prepar'd the Minds of Men to receive the Chriſtian Religion, by eſtabliſhing the Authority of the Religion, and of the Books of the Jews, he demonſtrates the Truth of it againſt the Jews themſelves by their own Prophecies. This is the Subject of his Books of Evangelical Demonſtration, of which there are only Ten remaining of Twenty which he compos'd. In the Firſt Book he ſhows, that the Law of the Jews was calculated for one Nation only, but the New Teſtament was deſign'd for all Mankind, That the Patriarchs had no other Religion but that of the Chriſtians, ſince they ador'd the ſame God and the ſame Word, honour'd him as they do, and reſembled their holy Lives. In the Second Book he ſhows by the Prophecies, that the Meſſias was to come into the World for all Mankind. In the Third he makes it appear in favour of the Faithful, that Jeſus Chriſt is the Saviour of the World, and demonſtrates againſt the Infidels that he was no Seducer, as his Doctrine, his Miracles, and many other Reaſons do evidently prove.

In the Fourth Book he ſhows, that Jeſus Chriſt is the Son of God, and gives an Account of the Reaſons for which he was made Man; he explains the Name of Chriſt, and cites many Prophecies wherein he was foretold by that Name. In the following Books he brings abundance of Prophecies to demonſtrate that the Coming of Jeſus Chriſt, the time of his Birth, the Circumſtances of his Life and Paſſion, and, in a word, all things that concern'd him, were foretold in the Books of the Old Teſtament. What we have of theſe Books, ends with the laſt words of Chriſt upon the Croſs; And in the following Books he recited the Prophecies concerning his Death, his Burial, his Reſurrection, his Aſcenſion, the Eſtabliſhment of the Church, and the Converſion of the Gentiles: But theſe are wholly loſt.

Theſe Books of Evangelical Preparation and Demonſtration, are the largeſt Work that has been made by any of the Ancients upon this Subject, where a Man may find more Proofs, Teſtimonies and Arguments for the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion, than in any other. They are very proper to inſtruct and convince all thoſe that ſincerely ſearch after Truth. In fine, Euſebius has omitted nothing which might ſerve to undeceive Men of a falſe Religion, or convince them of the true.

The Treatiſe againſt Hierocles, was written againſt a Book of that Philoſopher, publiſh'd by him under the Name of Philalethes, againſt the Chriſtian Religion; wherein, to render it ridiculous, he has compar'd Apollonius Tyanæus with Jeſus Chriſt, and ſays, That Apollonius wrought Miracles as well as Chriſt, and aſcended into Heaven as well as he. But Euſebius has prov'd in his Anſwer, That Apollonius Tyanæus was ſo far from being comparable to Jeſus Chriſt, that he did not deſerve to be rank'd among the Philoſophers, and that Philoſtratus who wrote his Life is an Author unworthy of Credit, becauſe he contradicts himſelf very often, he doubts himſelf of thoſe very Miracles which he relates, and he reports many things which are plainly Fabulous. At the End of this Treatiſe Euſebius has given ſome Obſervations againſt Fatal Neceſſity.

In the Firſt of the Five Books againſt Marcellus of Ancyra, Euſebius endeavours to prove, That this Biſhop wrote his Book upon no other Motive, but the hatred of his Brethren; he charges him with Ignorance of the Holy Scriptures, and rallies him for the impertinent Explications of ſome Greek Proverbs brought in not at all to the purpoſe. In fine, he blames him for accuſing Origen, Paulinus, Narciſſus, Euſebius of Nicodemia, and Aſterius, of Error touching the Myſtery of the Trinity, and endeavours to juſtifie their Doctrine about it. In the Second Book, he diſcovers the Errors of Marcellus, and proves from many Paſſages of his Book, That he believes the Word was not a Perſon ſubſiſting before he was born of the Virgin, That he denies the diſtinction of the Son from the Father, That he is poſitive in aſſerting the Fleſh and not the Word to be the Image of God, the Son of God, the King, the Saviour, and the Chriſt; and in ſhort, That he durſt affirm that this Fleſh ſhall be deſtroyed and annihilated after the Day of Judgment.

After he has diſcovered the Errors and the Malice of Marcellus of Ancyra, he confutes his Opinions in the Three following Books, Entitled, Eccleſiaſtick Theology, and Dedicated to Flacillus Biſhop of Antioch.

In the Firſt Book he propoſes the Faith of the Church which he explains very exactly, rejecting the Errors of the Ebionites, Paulianites, Sabellians and Arians. After this, he ſhows that Marcellus is guilty of the Sabellian Hereſy, and proves by Third Arguments drawn from Scripture, That the Word is a Perſon ſubſiſting of himſelf. In the Second and Third Books, he goes on to confute the Conſequences of Marcellus's Error, and the Arguments which he alledges for it, and proves by many Paſſages of the Old and New Teſtament, that the Word is a Subſiſtence, or a Perſon Subſiſting diſtinguiſh'd from the Perſon of the Father.

From

From theſe Books we may learn the true Opinion of Euſebius concerning the Divinity of the Word. He has declar'd in many places, That the Word is God, and the Son of God; and he ſays plainly, That he was not made of nothing, nor created in time; but begotten from all Eternity of the Subſtance of the Father. He does expreſly reject the Error of thoſe that ſay, The Word was made of Nothing, and ſo place him in the number of Creatures. But he ſeems to inſinuate in ſome places, and chiefly B. II. Ch. 7. That the Perſon of the Son is not equal to the Perſon of the Father, and that the ſame Adoration is not due to him (o). And it is not only in theſe Books that he ſpeaks after this manner; for he does the like in all his other Writings; wherein he rejects the impious Opinion of thoſe that ſay, The Son was made of nothing, That he is not of the Subſtance of the Father, That there was a time when he was not: But then at the ſame time he ſeems to admit ſome inequality between the Father and the Son, and to acknowledge ſome ſort of Dependance upon, and Inferiority of the Son to the Father. For this reaſon it was that he made no ſcruple to declare in the Council of Nice, That the Son was God from all Eternity; where he alſo plainly diſavow'd the Impiety of Arius, who ſays, That he was made of nothing, That there was a time when he was not: Yet he found ſome difficulty to approve the term Conſubſtantial, that is, to confeſs, That the Son is of the ſame Subſtance with the Father; and after he had conſented to it by his Signing, he gave ſuch a Sence of the Word in a Letter which he wrote to his Church, as does not at all Confirm the Equality of the Father and the Son: His Words are theſe, When it is ſaid, That the Son is Conſubſtantial with the Father, the meaning is only, That the Son of God has no reſemblance to any Creature that was made by him, but a perfect reſemblance to the Father by whom he was begotten, and not by any other Subſiſtence or Subſtance. This plainly ſhews, That Euſebius did not approve this term, as it eſtabliſhes a perfect equality between the Father and the Son (p), but only as it ſignifies the reſemblance of the Son to the Father, and that the Son was begotten of the Father. It may be ſaid to excuſe Euſebius, That he did not admit this Inequality between the Father and the Son for any other reaſon, but becauſe the Son receiv'd his Subſtance from the Father: But he does every-where make uſe of ſuch Emphatical Expreſſions to denote this Inequality, that it is difficult to explain them in this Sence, eſpecially ſince he wrote his Books againſt Marcellus, wherein he ſpeaks after the ſame manner, at a time when this Queſtion was debated and even determined: For thoſe Expreſſions which might be innocent in former times, ought to be ſuſpected after the Deciſion of the Council of Nice. We might further add the Correſpondence which he maintain'd with the Biſhops of Arius's Faction, the Praiſes which he always gave them, his affected Silence in his Hiſtory, as to what concerns the Council of Nice, and the diſadvantageous Way that he ſpeaks of it in his Books of the Life of Conſtantine. But though Euſebius's Doctrine could be juſtified as to the Divinity of the Son, yet it will be much harder to Defend what he ſays of the Holy Spirit; for he aſſerts, not only in his Books, of Evangelical Preparation and Demonſtration, but alſo in his Third Book of Eccleſiaſtick Theology, That he is not truly God: The Holy Spirit, ſay he, is neither God, nor the Son of God, becauſe he does not derive his Original from the Father, as the Son does, being of the number of thoſe things which were made by the Son. What we have hitherto ſaid concerning the Opinion of Euſebius about the Trinity, does plainly demonſtrate on the one ſide, That Socrates, Sozomen, and ſome late Authors, are to blame, who do wholly excuſe him; and on the other ſide, That it is a great piece of Injuſtice to call him Arian, and the very Head of the Arians, as St. Jerom has done, whom many others have follow'd, ſince he formerly rejected the principal Errors of Arius, which are, That the Word was made of nothing, That he is not of the Subſtance of the Father, That he is unlike the Father, and, That there was a time when he was not.

His Sentiments about the other Articles of the Chriſtian Religion, appear to be very Orthodox: He explains the Myſtery of the Incarnation in a moſt Catholick manner (q), acknowledging in Jeſus Chriſt

(o) He ſeems to inſinuate in ſome places———That the Perſon of the Son is not Equal to the Perſon of the Father, &c.] B. I. Ch. 2. of his Hiſtory, he calls the Son the Miniſter of the Father's Will and the ſecond Cauſe next to him. He ſays, That the Father Commands, and the Son Executes, and that 'tis not poſſible for the Father to aſſume a Humane ſhape. In his Oration at the Dedication of the Church of Tyre, he calls the Son of God, the Second Cauſe of our Bleſſings, the Angel of his Counſel, and the Captain of the Armies of God. Yet theſe Expreſſions are more tolerable than that which is found B. V. Of Evangelical Preparation, Ch. 4. That the Son is not adorable but upon the account of the Father that dwelleth in him; and Ch. VIII. That the Son is a Lord inferior to the Father In ſhort, what he ſays, B II. Ch. 7. Of Theology, and in other places, is inexcuſable, That the Glory of the Son is leſs than the Glory of the Father, and that the Son does not deſerve Equal honour with the Father.

(p) That Euſebius did not approve this term Conſubſtantial, as it eſtabliſhes a perfect Equality between the Father and the Son.] St. Athanaſius teſtifies in his Treatiſe of Synods, and in his Book of the Deciſion of the Council of Nice, that he did by no means approve of the Explication that Euſebius gave of this term.

(q) He explains the Myſtery of the Incarnation in a moſt Catholick manner.] In a Letter to the Empreſs Conſtantia, cited in the Second Council of Nice, and aſcribed to Euſebius, he ſeems to aſſert, that the humane Nature, was changed into the Divine, from whence ſome took occaſion in the Council to accuſe him of the Error of the Theopaſſians: But he teaches the contrary in the Fourth Book of his Demonſtration, where he formally denies that the Divine Nature ſuffered. Yet in the 14*th. Ch* he ſays, That after the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, the Man was ſwallowed up of the Divine Nature, and that the Word was become God as he was before he was Man, the Man being made God. But this is only a Figurative Expreſſion, to denote the Glory of the Humanity of Chriſt, for he plainly rejects this Error, in his Books of Myſtick Theology againſt Marcellus, eſpecially, B. III. Ch. 10, 11, &c.

two Natures united in one and the ſame Perſon, and yet diſtinguiſh'd by their Properties. His Diſcourſe is very ſound as to the cauſes of Chriſt's coming and his Death, and the Merits of his Sacrifice which he offered upon the Croſs to make ſatisfaction for Mankind, where he ſaith, that his Divinity ſuffered not, but only his Humanity.

He Diſcourſeth often of the good Offices of the Angels to Men, and of the Worſhip that's due to them; he gives an Account of the fall of the Evil Angels, and demonſtrates that the Ancient Patriarchs had ſome knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt, and that they were ſaved by the Merits of his Death. He attributes much to the Free-will of Man. He praiſes the State of Virginity as more perfect, and the Celibacy of Prieſts, without blaming Marriage. He acknowledges, that the Monuments of the Saints, have a juſt Right to be Honour'd. He Diſcourſes of the oblation of the Body and Blood of Chriſt, of which he ſaith, The Bread offered by Melchiſedech, was a Figure. In fine, He approves the Prayers of the Church for the Dead. Photius, Epiſt. 144. accuſes him of denying with Origen the General Reſurrection, and at the ſame time takes Notice, that many have not obſerv'd this Error in his Writings, and that it is not to be diſcover'd there but by a careful Examination of them. But, however it may be in other Books, there is not the leaſt footſtep of it in thoſe that are now extant.

St. Jerom maintains in his Book againſt Ruffinus, That Euſebius alone was the Author of the Six Books of Apology for Origen, which have been aſcribed to Pamphilus: But it appears by the Teſtimony of Euſebius himſelf, B. VI. of his Hiſtory, Ch. 33. and alſo by that of Photius, That he compos'd the 1ſt. Five Books, together with Pamphilus, and added the 6th. after his Martyrdom. We have the Tranſlation of the 1ſt. of thoſe Books, which he begins with an Invective againſt thoſe that accuſe the Perſon and Doctrine of Origen; and then he produces many Paſſages out his Works to juſtifie him, concerning the Trinity and the Incarnation, the Pains of the Damn'd, and concerning the Nature and State of Souls. St Jerom accuſes Ruffinus of having changed thoſe Places in his Verſion, which ſeem'd to favour the Error of the Arians, about the Divinity of the Son and the Holy Ghoſt: Ruffinus does not deny the Charge, but only pretends that thoſe Paſſages had been added. Some Books of this Apology contain'd the Life of Origen, and a Catalogue of his Writings, as appears by the Teſtimony of St. Jerom and the Report of Photius, Vol. 118. of his Bibliotheque.

The Book of Topography, or the Names that the Hebrews give to ſeveral Countries, tranſlated by St. Jerom, and lately publiſh'd in Greek, is a Geographical Explication of all the Countries, Cities and Places, which were mention'd in the Books of the Old Teſtament. This Treatiſe is very Exact and Curious, and ſhews that Euſebius was an able Man in every thing.

The Harmony of the Evangeliſts, or the Rules for Reconciling them, contains Ten Tables, in each of which, he has mark'd by Arithmetical Figures, with wonderful Art, what is related by 4, by 3, by 2, or by 1 Evangeliſt only: So that in reading the New Teſtament, where the Figures of thoſe Tables are mark'd in the Margin, one may preſently know, by having recourſe to that Table, not only by how many, and by which of the Evangeliſts, but alſo in what places it has been related. He compos'd theſe Rules according to the Harmony of Ammonius, to which they were inſtead of a Table, as he himſelf obſerves in his Letter to Carpianus at the beginning of them.

We have a Latin Fragment yet extant, of the Harmony of the Evangeliſts, upon the Subject of their apparent contradictions about the time of the Reſurrection of Chriſt, tranſlated by the Monk Ambroſius, which is believ'd to be Euſebius's.

It's ſaid, There are ſome Greek Commentaries of Euſebius's upon Iſaiah, mentioned by Heinſius. St. Jerom in his Epiſtle to Pammachius, ſpeaks of Euſebius's Commentaries upon the Epiſtle to the Corinthians. Theodoret in the Firſt Book of his Hiſtory, Ch. 16. ſays, That he made Abridgments of the Scripture. 'Tis reported that in the Library of Florence, there are ſome Manuſcript Commentaries upon the Pſalms, which are aſcribed to Euſebius; and Gelaſius in his Book of the Two Natures, cites a Paſſage of Euſebius taken out of thoſe Commentaries. I don't mention the Commentaries upon the Canticles, publiſh'd by Meurſius under Euſebius's Name, becauſe they are none of his, but compos'd by a much later Author, as we have already prov'd.

The Treatiſe of the Lives of the Prophets, is a ſhort Abridgment of their Lives, and of the moſt Remarkable Things that are in their Prophecies.

The Tracts or Diſcourſes publiſh'd in Latin by Sirmondus, have much of the Air of Euſebius; whereof the two firſt were written againſt the Hereſy of Sabellius, to refute that Error, and prove by the Scriptures, that the Word is a Perſon diſtinct from the Father, and there he occaſionally Diſcourſes againſt Marcellus of Ancyra, whom he calls the Galatian. In the following Diſcourſe he Treats of the Reſurrection, and having eſtabliſh'd the Providence and Juſtice of God by ſenſible Proofs, he thence concludes, That there is a Reſurrection; becauſe if there were no other Recompence but in this Life, it would follow, that God were unjuſt, ſeeing good Men are oftentimes depriv'd of all the Advantages of this Life, which wicked Men moſt commonly enjoy. He ſhews by the Reſolution that appear'd in Abraham, when he went to Sacrifice his Son, and by all the Circumſtances of that Action which he deſcribes very eloquently; he ſhews, I ſay, That this Patriarch muſt needs believe a future Reſurrection, for otherwiſe he would never have attempted with ſo much Confidence and Zeal, to Sacrifice that which was deareſt to him in this World. He confutes the Opinion of the Phariſees, who held that Men are raiſed again from the dead to eat and drink, and enjoy the ſame Pleaſures which they had in this Life.

The

Euſebius of Cæſarea.

The Fourth Tract, is a Diſcourſe upon the Day of the Aſcenſion of Jeſus Chriſt, wherein he proves the Truth of his Reſurrection and Aſcenſion, by the Conſtancy of the Martyrs and Apoſtles, and by the wonderful Promulgation of the Goſpel. He obſerves how impoſſible it was, that ever the Apoſtles ſhould undertake to Preach the Chriſtian Religion, and ſucceed in their Attempt, if God had not encourag'd them by his Spirit, and diſpos'd the Hearts of Men to receive their Doctrine. In this Diſcourſe, he deſcribes alſo the Martyrdom of St. Romanus Deacon of Antioch. In the Six following Tracts, he diſcourſes of things Spiritual and Inviſible; and, in the Firſt, he ſhows, That God is Incorporeal and Inviſible, and demonſtrates, that things Incorporeal and Inviſible, are infinitely more Excellent than thoſe that are Material and Earthly. In the Second and Third, he proves, That the Soul of Man is Immortal and Spiritual, and deſcribes the great Advantages it gives a Man above the Beaſts. The Fourth Tract is, concerning the Thought of Man, which has theſe Remarkable Properties; Firſt, That it knows it ſelf; and, Secondly, That it reſiſts and checks the Motions of Luſt. In the Fifth, He goes on ſtill to prove, That God is Inviſible and Incorporeal, and takes Notice as he goes along, That Angels are Spiritual. In the Sixth, He anſwers ſome Paſſages of Scripture which ſeem to attribute Members to God.

The following Diſcourſe is, concerning the Advantages of the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, and the great Benefits it hath procur'd to Mankind. There he explains that ſaying of our Saviour, I came not to bring Peace, but War; by ſhewing, That Jeſus Chriſt, came indeed, to bring Peace; but Men being unwilling to receive it, there muſt be War, by neceſſary conſequence, as riſing only from the bad Diſpoſition of their own Hearts. Towards the end of this Diſcourſe he praiſes thoſe that ſuffer for the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt, and continues the ſame Subject in the following Diſcourſe, wherein he ſhews upon occaſion of thoſe Words of our Saviour, Preach ye upon the Houſe-tops what has been ſaid to you in ſecret. That nothing can diſpenſe with a Chriſtian's ſuffering for the Religion of Chriſt. He adds, That tho' there be no Perſecution, yet we are oblig'd to ſuffer, and to be, as one may ſay, continually Martyrs, becauſe we are always to fight againſt the World and our ſelves. The Two laſt Diſcourſes are concerning good Works; in the Firſt of which, he recommends it to Chriſtians, if they would be happy, to follow after that which is Good, and ſhun that which is Evil. And in the Second, he exhorts them to the practice of goods Works, and chiefly to giving of Alms. This is the Subject of thoſe Diſcourſes, which are more concerning Doctrines than Morality, wherein there appears a great deal of Wit, good Sence, and Eloquence, but little of Order and Method.

Euſebius was one of the moſt Learned Men of all Antiquity, as both his Friends and Enemies do equally acknowledge (r); of whom it may be ſaid without fear of miſtaking, That there was no Man of ſo great Reading and Learning amongſt all our Greek Authors. Almoſt all his Books are the effects of prodigious Labour, and very long and laborious Enquiries. And yet it muſt be confeſſed, that he had great Helps by the Memoirs of thoſe who had written before him upon the ſame Subjects, whoſe Works he makes no ſcruple to Tranſcribe. He did not much Study to poliſh his Diſcourſes, which is the common Fault of almoſt all thoſe that make Knowledge and Learning their chief Buſineſs. His Stile is neither Elegant nor Grateful, as Photius has many times obſerved, but dry and barren, and extremely unpleaſant. He is very proper to teach thoſe who apply their minds ſeriouſly to Study and ſearch after Truth, and love to conſider it abſolutely naked, deſpoil'd of all the Ornaments of Language; but he is not at all proper to entice thoſe who are taken with the manner of Expreſſing things, and the force of Eloquence. I ſhall not here add any thing to what I have ſaid concerning his Learning: But as to what concerns his Perſon, he ſeems to have been very impartial, very ſincere, and a great Lover of Peace, Truth and Religion. For altho' he maintain'd an intimate Correſpondence with the Enemies of St Athanaſius, it does not appear that he was his Enemy, nor that he ſided much with any Party in the Controverſy of the Biſhops of that time. He was preſent, indeed, in the Councils, wherein unjuſt things were done to Euſtathius and St. Athanaſius; but it does not appear, that he gave any Signs of an angry Temper, nor that he ſerv'd the Paſſions of other Men. He was not the Author of New Confeſſions of Faith, neither did he carry on any Plot, to the Deſtruction of St. Athanaſius, or the Ruin of his Party; but he only deſir'd to accommodate Differences, and reconcile the two Parties. He did not abuſe the Credit which he had with the Emperour, to Advance himſelf, nor to Deſtroy his Enemies, as Euſebius of Nicomedia did; but he only made uſe of it for the Welfare and Advantage of the Church. I do not doubt, but ſo many good Qualities obtain'd him a place among

(r) Euſebius was one of the moſt Learned Men of all Antiquity, as both his Friends and Enemies do equally acknowledge.] See here a part of the Teſtimonies which the Ancients have given to the Learning of Euſebius. Conſtantine in his Epiſtle to thoſe of Antioch, and in a Letter which he wrote to himſelf, praiſes his vaſt Learning. St. Baſil in his Book of the H. Spirit, Ch. 29. calls him an Author worthy of Credit, becauſe of his Univerſal Learning, διὰ πολυπειρίαν ἀξιόπιστος. St. Jerom, tho' the great Enemy of Euſebius, could not forbear oftentimes to praiſe his Learning, to confeſs that he priz'd his Books, and to ſay in his Second Book againſt Ruffinus, That he was a moſt Learned Man, Vir doctiſſimus Euſebius; doctiſſimum dico, non Catholicum: The moſt Learned Euſebius; I call him moſt Learned, but not Catholick: It is not to be wondered at, that Ruffinus his Friend gives him the ſame Title. Antipater of Boſtria, tho' he did not favour him, yet gives him the Name of πολυΐστωρ, i. e. one very knowing in moſt Matters; and further ſays of him, That he had read all the Books of the Ancients, examin'd and explain'd all their Opinions, and that he had written himſelf moſt uſeful Books. Philoſtorgius praiſes him for his Hiſtory, Socrates and Sozomen vindicate him, Victorius calls him a moſt Learned Man. Gelaſius the Pope durſt not reject his Hiſtory, becauſe of its great Learning, and ſingular uſefulneſs for information. Pelagius aſſures us, That there is no Hiſtory that deſerves greater Eſteem, than that of Euſebius. Photius, who cenſures the Stile and Doctrine of Euſebius, nevertheleſs, commends his Knowledge and Learning. I take no Notice of the Teſtimonies of Modern Authors.

the Saints in the Martyrologies of Uſuardus and Ado, and ſome other Ancient Officers of the Church of France (f); for tho' I muſt confeſs he kept not peaceable Poſſeſſion of this Honour of Saintſhip, yet in my mind it would be a raſh Cenſure to judge him altogether unworthy of it.

Since the Works of Euſebius have been printed ſeverally, we will now give an Account of the ſeveral Editions of every one of them.

There were but two Greek Editions of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory before that of Valeſius. The Firſt was only Greek, printed by Robert Stephen in the Year 1544.

The Second was Greek with the Verſion of Chriſtophorſon, on the other ſide, printed at Geneva in the Year 1612.

The Verſion of this Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, made by Ruffinus, was printed at Rome, in the Year 1476, in Folio, and in the Year 1479, at Mantua, and at Haguenaw in the Year 1500.

There was an old Edition printed without date at Paris, in 8vo. by Renaut, and publiſh'd by the Care of Godfrey Bouſſard, Dr. of the Faculty of Paris, who has put an Elegant and Senſible Preface before it, addreſs'd to Stephen Poncher, then Preſident of the Parliament of Paris. He obſerves in this Preface, That the Hiſtory of Euſebius, tranſlated by Ruffinus, had been already printed. There have been ſince that time, ſeveral Editions of the ſame Verſion of that Hiſtory in ſeveral places, in the Years 1544, and 1528, and at Lyons, in 1523, and with all Euſebius's Works in 1542, and 1559, and at Paris in 1541.

The Verſion of Muſculus was printed at Baſil, in 1554.

The Verſion of Chriſtophorſon, [Biſhop of Chicheſter in England,] was printed at Cologne and Baſil, in 1570, at Paris, in 1571, and with the Amendments of Suffridus, in 1581.

At laſt, the Verſion of Valeſius was printed with the Greek on one ſide, revis'd by Four Manuſcripts, at Paris, by Vitre, in the Year 1659, together with the Critical Notes of that Learned Man; to which he has added Four Treatiſes or Diſſertations: The Firſt concerning the Schiſm of the Donatiſts, where he has clear'd up many Points of that Hiſtory, which before were very dark and confus'd and diſcover'd ſome conſiderable Errors, into which almoſt all the Hiſtorians of our time had fallen. The Second is a Letter to a Friend, where he ſhews. That it is the ſame Church at Jeruſalem, which is call'd by the Name of the Reſurrection, and which bears the Name of the Death of Jeſus Chriſt. The Third, clears up ſome Difficulties concerning the Verſion of the Septuagint. And the Laſt, is a Critical Account of ſome Martyrologies. This is the Faireſt and moſt Correct of all the late Editions in Greek and Latin; which has been ſince Revis'd by Petit: But this Second Edition falls much ſhort of the Neatneſs of the Firſt. The Chronicle has likewiſe been printed apart in 4to. in the Year 1470, and 1512, and together with the Hiſtory, and the other Works of Euſebius, as has been noted above.

Monſieur de Pontac, Biſhop of Bazas, publiſh'd it in 1605, at Bordeaux, and it has been ſince printed at Antwerp, in 1608.

Scaliger's Theſaurus, printed in 1606, contains the Latin Chronicle of St. Jerom, the Supplements of the two Proſpers, the Chronicle of Victor, John and Idacius, of Marcellinus, of Marcellus, and an Hiſtorical Collection in Latin, extracted out of the Chronicles of Africanus and Euſebius, by an ignorant Man, together with the Greek Fragments of the Chronicle of Euſebius, an Abridgment of Hiſtory from Adam, down to the Second Year of Heraclius, which bears the Name of the Faſti Siculi, or the Chronicon Alexandrinum, and has been ſince publiſh'd in 4to. Greek and Latin, by Radeus, in 1615. [All which Editions have been lately ſuperſeded by an Edition in Folio, printed at the Louvre by Mr. du Cange.] After this Abridgment, follows the Chronography of the Patriarch Nicephorus, and an Epitome or Abridgment of many Hiſtories, compos'd by way of Chronicle. After theſe, follow the Notes of Scaliger, and a Work, Entituled, Canon Iſagogicus, or an Introduction to Chronology. There was a Second Edition of this Work, printed at Amſterdam, in 1658, wherein the Notes of Scaliger are more large and Correct.

The Books of Euſebius concerning the Life of Conſtantine, have almoſt always been printed with his Hiſtory. The Verſion of thoſe Books by Forteſius was annex'd to the Verſion of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory by Ruffinus.

Chriſtophorſon tranſlated Three of thoſe Books to add them to his Hiſtory, and the Fourth was finiſhed by Suffridus. Valeſius made a New Tranſlation of them. The Oration made in the Praiſe of Conſtantine, was alſo printed by it ſelf in Latin at Cologne, in 1581. The Verſion of the Four Books of Evangelical Preparation, and of the Ten Firſt of Evangelical Demonſtration, made by Georgius Trapezuntius, was printed at Venice in 1497, and at Paris in 1534; but it is very unfaithfully done, becauſe that Author gives himſelf the Liberty to add to it, or take away what he pleaſes, in that which concerns the Trinity. The Thirteen Books of Preparation, were alſo printed in Greek at Paris, by

There is in a Manuſcript Breviary at Limoges, three Lectures to his praiſe. In an Ancient Breviary of the ſame Church, printed in 1587. at June 21. there is an Oration in praiſe of Euſebius; and in the Miſſal, printed in 1484. a Maſs of St. Euſebius. In an ancient Manuſcript Verſion of Euſebius's Hiſtory, at the Church of Paris, the Name of Saint is given to him. Cardinal Baronius ſays, That all this is the miſtake of ſome that took Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea, for Euſebius of Samoſata, and upon this Conjecture, he raſes the Name of the firſt out of the Roman Martyrology. But Baronius affirms this without any ground, and againſt the expreſs Teſtimonies of the Martyrologies, which do plainly mention Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea, and diſtinguiſh him from all others by moſt evident Characters, in which no Man can be deceived. Robert

Since that time, the Version of the Ten Books of the Demonstration made by Donatus of Verona, together with that of the Fourteen Books of the Preparation made by Georgius Trapezuntius, and that of the Fifteenth by Hepperus, was subjoyn'd to the Versions of the other Works of Eusebius, in the Editions which we have already mention'd. Eusebius of Cæsarea.

To conclude, The Books of Evangelical Preparation and Demonstration (which deserve to be separated from the rest, since they belong to different Subjects) have been Printed in Greek at Paris in the Year 1628. in Two Volumes in Folio, with a new Version of the Fifteen Books of the Preparation, made by the Jesuit Vigerus, and Donatus's Version of the Books of the Demonstration, which Versions are plac'd over against the Greek. Moreover in this Edition was added the Greek of Eusebius's Treatise against Hierocles, which had been already reviſed by Holstenius, publish'd by Morellius in 1606. together with the Ancient Translation of Acciolus, which had also been Printed apart at Cologne in 1532, with the Latin Works of Eusebius; and in short, the Five Books against Marcellus of Ancyra, with the Translation of Richard Montague, and some Notes of his added at the end, which for the most part are in favour of Marcellus, and against Eusebius.

The Book of the Holy Land has been publish'd in Greek, as we have already observ'd, by Bonfrerius, the Jesuit, and printed at Paris in 1631. In 1580, Curterius put forth some Fragments concerning the Lives of the Prophets, which he has prefix'd to the Commentaries of Procopius upon Isaiah. The Notes upon the Canticles ascrib'd to Eusebius, have also been publish'd in Greek, without a Version, by Meursius, and Printed with Polychronius and Psellus in the Year 1617. The Tracts publish'd in Latin by Sirmondus were also printed at Paris in Octavo in 1643. In fine, The Letter to Carpianus and the Evangelical Canons of Eusebius, are to be found at the beginning of some Editions of the New Testament, and in Greek at the beginning of the Greek New Testament, printed at the Louvre, by Robert Stephen in the Year 1550.

CONSTANTINE the first Christian Emperour.

Constantine the Emperour.

THough it be a very rare thing to see the Name of an Emperour, in a Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers, yet this of Constantine is commonly to be found among them, because of some Discourses which he made and repeated, if we will believe Eusebius, and it may be also upon the account of the many Letters which he wrote, and Edicts which he made in favour of the Christian Religion: But before we say any thing of the Writings of this Emperour, it will be necessary according to our usual Method, to give a short Abridgment of his Life.

Constantine was the Son of the Emperour Constantius Chlorus, who was the only Person of all those that shar'd the Empire in his time, that did not Persecute the Christians (a). His Mother was call'd Helena, a Woman of mean Birth, who had not the Title of Empress, while Constantius liv'd (b).

Constantine in his youth, gave early proof of what might be expected from him afterward; His Conduct and Courage appear'd a little before his Father's Death: For being detain'd as an Hostage by the Emperour Galerius, and forseeing plainly that he and his Associates had a design to kill him, that they might Invade that part of the Empire which belong'd to his Father Constantius, who could not live long, he made his Escape out of the Hands of the Tyrants, took Post and went in great hast to find his Father in Britain. He kill'd all the Horses which he found at the Post-houses on the Road which he past, to hinder his Enemies from pursuing after him. When he came into Britain, he found his Father on his Death-Bed, who chose him for his Successor. After his Death, he was Proclaim'd Emperour by the Souldiers on the Sixth day of August, in the Year of Jesus Christ 306. He was no sooner Emperour, but he gain'd the love of all his Subjects, by visiting the Provinces under his Government, to give them necessary Orders, and by beating back the Barbarians, who would have pass'd the Rhine to enter into his Territories; but they were defeated, and two of their Kings kill'd in the Year 312. After this he attack'd the Tyrant Maxentius, who had laid Rome desolate by his Cruelties. He march'd towards Italy with an Army of 40000 Men, seiz'd upon all the Cities that oppos'd his Passage, or constrain'd them submit, and defeated three several times the Troops of Maxentius. In short, The Tyrant coming to meet him with a great Army near Rome, was entirely conquer'd, and perished by the fall of a Bridge, over which he was passing to save himself. Eusebius says, That Constantine assur'd

(a) Who was the only Person of those that shar'd the Empire in his time, that did not Persecute the Christians.] The Donatists in a Petition which they presented to Constantine, say, That he was the Son of a Just Father, who did not Persecute the Christians. Euseb Hist. B. VIII. Ch. 13, 15. And Ch. 16. he relates, That Constantius was very favourable to the Christians: And Constantine himself in his Edict, recited by Eusebius, in his Books of the Life of that Emperour, says, That his Father was the only Emperour, who was favourable to the Worship of the True God.

(b) Who had not the Title of Empress, while Constantius liv'd.] Eusebius, St. Jerom, Cassiodorus, and Orosius, make no scruple to give her the Title of Constantius's Concubine; Eutropius, altho'a Pagan, sweetens this Expression, by saying, That Constantine was born of a Marriage that was but little known, i. e. That tho' Helena was Married to Constantius, yet she had not the Title of Empress; (and those Women that had not the honourable Name of Augustæ, were call'd the Concubines of Emperours.) Helena had not this Dignity till after the Death of Constantius, and then her Son gave it her, as Eusebius observes. She was of Drepane a City of Bithynia, to which Constantine gave the Name of Helenopolis, in honour of his Mother. It is agreed on all hands, That she was of mean Extraction; and St. Ambrose says, She was an Hostess, and by this means Constantius first became acquainted with her.

Conſtantine the Emperour.

him, he ſaw then in the Heavens, a Croſs of Light with this Inſcription, [By this Sign you ſhall overcome your Enemies,] and that Jeſus Chriſt appear'd to him when he was Sleeping, and commanded him to make a Standard after the form of a Croſs, which he did in Obedience to this Revelation, and after his Victory, he plac'd his Standard among the Trophies in the midſt of the City of Rome, with this Inſcription: [By this Salutary Sign, which is the Mark of the true Power, I have deliver'd your City from the Yoke of Tyranny, and Eſtabliſh'd your Senate and People in their ancient Splendor.] After he had regulated the Affairs of Rome, Conſtantine came to Milan, where he celebrated the Nuptials of his Siſter with the Emperour Licinius. In this City 'twas that the two Emperours publiſh'd their Firſt Edict in favour of the Chriſtian Religion, in which they granted Liberty of Conſcience to all their Subjects; and a little after, at their going out of Milan, they allow'd the Chriſtians by a ſecond Edict, the Publick Exerciſe of their Religion, and commanded that thoſe places ſhould be reſtor'd to them wherein they had uſually kept their Aſſemblies. A ſhort time after this, the two Emperours quarrelled, and declar'd War againſt one another in the Year 314. Licinius loſt at firſt a great Battel in Pannonia; but at the ſecond in Thracia, the Advantage was equal on both Sides, which induc'd the Emperours to make Peace for that time.

The Wars and Affairs of the Empire did not hinder Conſtantine from concerning himſelf with the Affairs of the Chriſtians: For having receiv'd Complaints in behalf of the Donatiſts againſt Cæcilian and other African Biſhops, he appointed for Judges, ſuch as liv'd out of Africk, and ſummon'd a Council to meet at Rome under Miltiades, about this Matter. But the Donatiſts ſtill complaining of this Deciſion (c), he call'd a Council at Arles, where they were condemn'd anew; and at laſt when they appeal'd from the Determination of this Council to the Emperour, either becauſe he believ'd that he might take cognizance of the Matter, ſince there was nothing alledg'd, but a particular Accuſation againſt Cæcilian, which was Matter of Fact; or becauſe he would oblige the Donatiſts to yield, as St. Auſtin obſerves, he himſelf gave Judgment at Milan in favour of Cæcilian, condemn'd the Donatiſts, and wrote againſt them in Africk; caus'd an Information to be drawn up againſt Silvanus, who was of their Party, and their Temples to be taken from them; but yet he recommended them to be gently dealt withal, as a means to bring them back again into the Boſom of the Church. About this time he made many Laws in favour of the Chriſtians. He permitted Maſters to grant Liberty to their Slaves that were within the Church, in preſence of the Biſhop and the People. He made Laws for the due obſervation of Sunday, forbidding all ſorts of Perſons to Travel on that Day; and allow'd Men to leave their Goods to the Church by Teſtament. On the contrary, Licinius, Emperour of the Eaſt, publiſh'd Edicts againſt the Chriſtians, caus'd their Churches to be demoliſh'd and themſelves to be Perſecuted, or at leaſt conniv'd at thoſe that did ſo. Conſtantine declar'd War againſt him in 324. conquer'd him near Adrianople and Chalcedon, and then beſieged him in Nicomedia, whither he had retir'd after his Defeat. Licinius ſeeing that he was not able to maintain the Siege, came and threw himſelf at Conſtantine's Feet, who gave him his Life at the inſtance of his Wife, who was Licinius's Daughter, and then ſent him to Theſſalonica, where a little after he cauſed him to be put to Death, under pretence that he deſign'd to ſtir up Sedition. After this, Conſtantine Abrogated the Edicts of Licinius againſt the Chriſtians, and commanded that thoſe who were Condemn'd to the Mines or Baniſhment, or had been depriv'd of their Honour or Goods upon the account of Religion, ſhould be releas'd and re-eſtabliſh'd in their former Eſtate; That the Goods of the Martyrs which had been Confiſcated ſhould be return'd to their Heirs, That the Churches of Chriſtians ſhould be Rebuilt, and their Burial-places reſtor'd unto them: Then he Exhorted all his Subjects very earneſtly in a Letter, to embrace the Chriſtian Religion.

And he did not only take care to preſerve the Church in Peace againſt the Attempts of its Enemies but he us'd his utmoſt endeavours to hinder all Diviſions in its Bowels by the Diſputes of thoſe who were its profeſs'd Members. He applied himſelf to allay the Controverſy between Arius and Alexander, by writing a Letter to them, wherein he earneſtly Exhorts them to peace, in a moſt moving and perſuaſive manner, aſſuring them that he had delay'd his Voyage to the Eaſt, for fear of finding them there at Variance, and praying them to open by their good Agreement, his Paſſage to the Eaſt which they had hitherto, as one may ſay, ſtopt up by their Differences. He ſent this Letter by Oſius Biſhop of Corduba, a Man commendable for his Worth and Prudence. This Biſhop having call'd a Synod in the City of Alexandria, did all that in him lay to appeaſe their Differences, but not being able to compaſs his Deſign, Conſtantine judged, that the beſt way to reſtore Peace to the Church, was to ſummon a General Council of the Eaſt and Weſt in the City of Nice in Bithynia. He himſelf Aſſiſted at it, Exhorted the Biſhops to Peace, and refus'd to receive the Accuſations which one party form'd againſt the other. He made them agree in the ſame Doctrine, and approv'd the Deciſion of the Council, to which they all Subſcribed, except Secundus and Theonas. He wrote himſelf to all the World, and Exhorted all the Biſhops to receive the Decrees of this Council. He baniſh'd Arius and two Biſhops that had taken his Part in the Synod; he caus'd the Books of that Heretick to be burnt; forbad all his Subject, to keep them: and wrote in particular two very earneſt Letters againſt Arius, and his followers. In ſhort, He treated the Biſhops of the Council magnificently, teſtified a great deal of Friendſhip to them, and ſent them away laden with Preſents. Euſebius and Theognis having publiſh'd anew their Errors after the Council, altho' they had Subſcribed to its Decrees, were by him ſent into Baniſhment.

(c) But the Donatiſts ſtill complaining of this Deciſion.] Valeſius has prov'd in his Diſſertation about the Hiſtory of the Donatiſts; That the Donatiſts did not appeal from the Synod at Rome; but only complain'd to the Emperour that their Cauſe was not fully examin'd; and that they appeal'd afterwards from the determination of the Council at Arles, to that of the Emperour.

After

After this, he caus'd the Sepulchre of Jeſus Chriſt to be found out in Jeruſalem, and built a ſtately Church there, as well as at Bethlehem, and at the Mount of Olives. It's ſaid, That he diſcover'd the Croſs of Chriſt, and ſome pretend that many Miracles were then done by it. And yet it is very ſtrange, that Euſebius, an Eye-witneſs of thoſe things, who has exactly deſcrib'd all the Circumſtances of the Diſcovery of Chriſt's Sepulchre, and who forgets nothing that may be to the Advantage of Religion, ſhould not ſay one word, neither of the Croſs of Chriſt, nor of the Miracles that are pretended to be wrought by it. About the ſame time, he gave the Name of Conſtantinople to the City of Byzantium, and endow'd it with the ſame Privileges which Old Rome enjoy'd, from whence it had the Name of New Rome. After this, he labour'd more than ever he had done, to aggrandize the Church; he made Laws againſt Hereticks, wrote to the King of Perſia in favour of the Chriſtians, deſtroy'd the Temples of Idols, gave great Gifts to Churches, and caus'd magnificent Copies of the Bible to be made: In a word, he did ſo much for Religion, that he had good right to be call'd Biſhop of the Church, as to thoſe things that concern its External Policy. And truly the Church had no reaſon to complain of his Conduct, till the latter end of his Life, when he gave ear to the Accuſations that were brought to him againſt St. Athanaſius, by thoſe Biſhops that favour'd Arius's Faction: For they being offended with him becauſe he would not appear at a Council held at Cæſarea, whither he had been cited to come, mov'd the Emperour to Summon a Synod in the City of Tyre, to Judge his Cauſe. There St. Athanaſius appear'd, and finding that his Enemies had injuriouſly oppreſs'd him, he had recourſe to the Emperour, and went to him at Conſtantinople. Conſtantine, although prejudic'd againſt him, yet heard him favourably, and commanded the Biſhops of the Council of Tyre, who had called another afterwards at Jeruſalem, to come to him and render an account of their Proceedings. They deputed Six Biſhops to go to the Emperour, and accuſe St. Athanaſius; but thoſe Deputies durſt not alledge the Facts, of which they had accus'd him at the Council of Tyre, for fear leſt the Emperour, being a lover of Juſtice, ſhould diſcover their Falſity, and declare him Innocent. They conſult therefore how they might charge him with a Crime againſt the State, by ſaying, that he threatned to hinder the Tranſportation of Corn from Alexandria to Conſtantinople. This Accuſation made ſuch Impreſſion upon the Emperour's Mind, and ſo ſtirr'd him up againſt St. Athanaſius, that he immediately Baniſh'd him to Triers, a City of Gaul. The Enemies of St. Athanaſius having thus procur'd his Baniſhment who was the great Oppoſer of Arius, they call'd back again this Heretick, and us'd all the Endeavours to reſtore him to the Communion of the Church. But Conſtantine would not hear of it, till after he had drawn up a Confeſſion of Faith, which appear'd contrary to his Errors, and had Sworn and Proteſted that this was his Doctrine; yet, even after he had done this, the Emperour, being always jealous of the Man ſaid to him, " If thy Faith be right, as thou would'ſt make us believe, thou haſt done well to " Swear; but if not, then let God condemn thee to ſome Puniſhment for this falſe Oath. Which words were follow'd with a ſuitable Effect; for in a little time after, Arius periſh'd miſerably, the day before he ſhould have been admitted to the Communion of the Church at Conſtantinople.

Conſtantine the Emperour.

The Reader no doubt may wonder that I have not ſpoke a word all this while of the Baptiſm of this Emperour; for it ſeems very ſtrange, that one who took ſo great care of the Affairs of Chriſtians, one who was convinc'd of the Truth of their Religion, and was ignorant in no point of their Doctrine, ſhould continue ſo long a time without initiating himſelf into the Church by the Sacrament of Baptiſm. And yet this was certainly ſo, either becauſe he waited to receive Baptiſm, when he ſhould be near his Death, that by this Sacrament he might throughly expiate his Sins, and ſo appear Innocent before God; or elſe becauſe he had ſome other reaſon for this delay; however it came to paſs, he never thought of preparing himſelf for Baptiſm until he felt himſelf Sick, nor had he ever the Impoſition of the Biſhops hands, to make him a Catechumen, till the Year 337 (d), a few days before his Death, being then at Helenopolis, as Euſebius obſerves in the Fourth Book of this Emperour's Life, Chap. 61. After this, he receiv'd Baptiſm from the hands of Euſebius of Nicomedia, in the Suburbs of that City, as Euſebius of Cæſarea, St. Athanaſius, St. Jerom and St. Ambroſe, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Evagrius, and all the reſt of the Ancients unanimouſly affirm (e). It is therefore a fabulous Story which is related in the Acts, falſly attributed to Pope Sylveſter, That the Baptiſm of Conſtantine was celebrated at Rome. And indeed, nothing can be more fabulous than the Account ſet down in thoſe Acts: For there it is feign'd, that Conſtantine, being an Enemy to the Chriſtian Religion, and deſiring to perſecute it, was ſmitten with Leproſie; That the Soothſayers ſaid unto him, the only way to cure him, was to bath himſelf in the Blood of New-born Infants; That many of them were ſought out to have their Throats cut, but Conſtantine being mov'd by their Tears, and the Cries of

(d) To make him a Catechumen, till the Year 337.] Euſebius ſays expreſly, That Conſtantine then firſt receiv'd Impoſition of Hands, and that he aſſiſted at the Solemn Prayers of the Church; which plainly ſhews, that he was not a Catechumen before. Neither does the Title of the Firſt Book, Chap 32. of the Life of Conſtantine, contradict this Obſervation, for there it is only ſaid that Conſtantine was Catechized, Κατηχηθεὶς, the meaning of which is, only that he was inſtructed in the Chriſtian Doctrine, which does not prove that he was a Catechumen, and we never read before this time that he aſſiſted at the Publick Prayers of the Church.

(e) All the Ancients unanimouſly affirm.] Euſebius, B. I. Of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 32. St. Jerom in his Chronicle, ſays, Conſtantius ultimo vitæ ſuæ tempore baptizatus eſt. St. Ambroſe in his Funeral Oration upon Theodoſius, ſays of Conſtantine, Cui licet baptiſmatis gratia in extremis conſtituto omnia peccata dimiſerit. The Fathers of the Council of Ariminum, in a Letter written at the beginning of that Synod, ſay, That he died a little after he was baptiz'd: which is certainly ſpoken of Conſtantine the Great, after they had mention'd in the ſame place his aſſiſting at the Council of Nice. I might add to this many other unqueſtionable Witneſſes, ſuch as Socrates, B. I. Ch. 39. Sozomen, B. II. Ch. 34. Theodoret, B. I. Ch. 32. Evagrius, B. III. Ch. 42. the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, &c.

their Mothers, reſtor'd them again, without putting them to Death: That he was afterwards admoniſh'd in a Dream by St. Peter and St. Paul, that he ſhould be cur'd if he were baptiz'd by Sylveſter; which having done, he was preſently Purify'd by Baptiſm both from his Sins and from his Leproſie. What Forgeries, what Fables are here! What inconſiſtent Ravings of Madmen! Conſtantine was never an Enemy to the Chriſtian Religion; he did never Perſecute it; he was always a Chriſtian from his heart before he came to Rome. There is no Hiſtorian that ſpeaks of his having a Leproſie, or that he was cur'd of it by Baptiſm. How came Euſebius to forget ſo conſiderable a Miracle in the Life of Conſtantine? With what Face could Julian the Apoſtate object to the Chriſtians, that Baptiſm never cleans'd any perſon from the Leproſie, if his own Grandfather had been cur'd by it; St. Cyril, to confute this Falſhood, never alledg'd an Example ſo Illuſtrious as this of the Emperour had been. But I forbear to mention any more of the many Abſurdities and Impertinencies which are contain'd in thoſe Acts (f). It's certain, Conſtantine died in a little time after his Baptiſm in the Year 337, of the vulgar Account, May 22d. in the Conſulſhip of Titianus and Felicianus, the 64th Year of his Age, after he had reign'd Thirty Years and Ten Months.

This Emperour was one of the greateſt Princes that ever was, whether you conſider his Conduct or Policy, or take a View of the great Actions of his Life, or reflect on the great Services he had done to the Church. Some accuſe him of being an Arian, but that's a Calumny; for though he favour'd ſome Biſhops, that were of Arius's Faction, and unjuſtly Baniſh'd St. Athanaſius, yet he always maintain'd the Creed of the Nicene Council, and ſuffer'd it not to be violated while he liv'd. The Greeks have given him exceſſive Praiſes, and plac'd him among the number of Saints, but I think the Latines have done more wiſely, in ſuſpending their Judgment as to that. We can ſay nothing of his Stile, becauſe it is very probable, that the Writings which bear his Name, were compos'd by others, though done by his Order: They may be diſtinguiſh'd into three ſorts; his Diſcourſes, his Letters, and his Edicts.

Euſebius aſſures us, B. III. of the Life of this Emperour, Ch. 2. That he had acquir'd ſo profound a Knowledge of the Liberal Sciences, that even to the end of his Life, he compos'd Harangues for the Inſtruction of his Subjects; and that the Method which he obſerv'd in his Diſcourſes, was, firſt to begin with the Refutation of the Errors of the Pagans, who ador'd many Gods; and then he proceeded to prove the Unity of God, and his Providence by which he governs the Univerſe: After which, he explain'd the Motives which brought the Son of God down from Heaven to this Earth, and deſcrib'd the Circumſtances of the Life which he led here; from whence he paſs'd on to the Deſcription of the laſt Judgment, and terrified his Hearers with the vehemence of his Diſcourſe, threatning the Vengeance of God, and the Juſt Puniſhment of their Sins againſt the Covetous, the Paſſionate and the Violent. The ſame Euſebius, gives us, B. III. Ch. 12. a ſhort Harangue of Conſtantine's to the Fathers of the Council of Nice, exhorting them to Peace; to which may be added, that Form of Prayer which he

(f) I forbear to mention any more of the many Abſurdities and Impertinencies which are contain'd in thoſe Acts.] There 'tis ſaid, That St. Sylveſter firſt appointed the Celebration of Sunday, that he held a Synod of 75 Biſhops at Rome in the Year 315, where they found 109 Jewiſh Prieſts. The ſame Author tells a Story of a Font and its Ornaments, which ſmells rank of a Fable. He makes Laws for Conſtantine which are ridiculous, and which never any heard of before. He reports, That Conſtantine laid the firſt Foundation of the Church of Rome, and carried thither 12 Baskets full of Earth in honour of the 12 Apoſtles. Theſe Remarks, and many more of that ſort, make it as clear as day, that thoſe Acts are Suppoſititious. And yet there is brought to maintain them, Firſt, The Authority of Pope Gelaſius, who places them among thoſe Monuments that are Genuine; And, that of Adrian, who cites thoſe Acts in his Letter to the Empreſs Irene, for maintaining Images; To which are added, the Teſtimonies of the Author of a Book call'd, The Pontifical of Damaſus; of Nicholas the Firſt in his Letter to the Emperour Michel; of Anaſtaſius, Nicephorus, and ſome other Modern Authors. But are all theſe Authorities to be compar'd with thoſe of the Ancients whom we have cited? and what elſe do they prove, but that thoſe Acts were forg'd ſince the time of Gelaſius? This Pope therefore had never ſeen them himſelf, nor does he approve them of his own knowledge, but only ſaith, That he heard that ſome Perſons had read them. As to Adrian 'tis very well known, that he was not very Critical in the choice of the Monuments which he cited, and that he alledges ſometimes thoſe that are forg'd, as well as thoſe that are Genuine. The following Teſtimonies are ſtill of leſs Authority.

Secondly, Gregory of Tours is cited for thoſe Acts, who B. II. Ch. 31. of his Hiſtory, ſaith to King Clovis, Behold, a new Conſtantine, who goes to Baptiſm to heal the Malady of an Inveterate Leproſie, and to waſh out the Spots and Stains of his paſt Life by thoſe moſt holy Waters. But this paſſage proves nothing, becauſe he does not mean the Leproſie of his Body, but only of his Soul; And moreover, it were not at all ſtrange that Gregory of Tours, a very credulous Man, ſhould give credit to thoſe forged Acts.

In ſhort, Our Adverſaries not finding any ancient Chriſtian for their turn, have recourſe to Zoſimus a Pagan Author, and a great Enemy to Conſtantine, who ſays, That Conſtantine was tormented with remorſe of Conſcience, after he had kill'd Criſpus his Son, and Fauſta his Wife; and having ſought in vain for ſome Expiation by the Sacrifices of the Pagans, he applied himſelf to an Egyptian, who told him, That the Chriſtian Doctrine had Power to expiate all Sins; after which Diſcourſe, he abandon'd the Religion of his Anceſtors. But thoſe who employ this paſſage to prove the Baptiſm of Conſtantine at Rome, do great Injury to Conſtantine's Reputation, by giving Credit to the Lye of an Heathen, who for this is convicted of Forgery by all Our Writers. Secondly, They do not conſider that the Death of Criſpus and Fauſta happen'd after the Council of Nice, and ſo this whole Story of Zoſimus is nothing to their purpoſe. In fine, Zoſimus ſays not that he was Baptiz'd, but that he Embrac'd the Chriſtian Doctrine. I ſhall not now ſtay to refute thoſe that pretend Conſtantine was twice Baptiz'd, the firſt time at Rome by Sylveſter, the ſecond time at Nicomedia by Euſebius, for the ſame Authorities we have alledg'd, deſtroy this Suppoſition; and beſides, it is altogether incredible that Euſebius and the other Biſhops with him, ſhould have Re-baptiz'd Conſtantine with ſo much Pomp and Ceremony, if he had been Baptiz'd before; eſpecially at a time when the Diſpute about the Trinity was not ſtarted.

preſcrib'd to his Souldiers, related in B. IV. and the Admonition he gave a Covetous Man of his Court, which is to be found Ch. 30. of the ſame Book: But doubtleſs the moſt conſiderable of his Monuments, is, that great Oration which he made to the Convention of the Saints, tranſlated by Euſebius into Greek, and annexed to his Life. The Preface of this Oration is about the Feaſt of Eaſter, the Goodneſs of our Saviour, and the Ingratitude of Men; but he concludes it with an Apoſtrophe to the Church. In the Body of this Diſcourſe, he diſputes againſt Idolatry and the multiplicity of Gods; and ſhows that there is but one only true God, the Creator of all things, and the Father of the World, who is begotten of Him, tho' the Father ſuffer no Diminution by it, and who is united to Him: He confutes Deſtiny, eſtabliſhes Providence and Free-will, and overthrows the Errors of the Philoſophers: He diſcovers the Advantages which Mankind receiv'd by the Incarnation of the Son of God, and ſhows that his Coming was foretold by the Prophets, to whoſe Authority he adds the Prediction of the Sybils, which he endeavours to verifie by the Teſtimony of Virgil: He deſcribes the unhappy death of thoſe Emperours who perſecuted the Church, and finiſhes this Diſcourſe with ſaying, That we ought to attribute all the Good we do to God, and before we undertake any thing, always to implore his Aid by Prayer, as being the Fountain of all Good. The whole Diſcourſe is Sublime, and worthy of the Majeſty of ſuch an Emperour as Conſtantine was. Conſtantine the Emperour.

The Letters of Conſtantine, are much more numerous than his Diſcourſes. Here's a Catalogue of them, an Account of their Arguments, the Times when they were written, and the Places where they are to be found.

1. There is a Letter of Conſtantine to Cæcilian Biſhop of Carthage, for diſtributing the Alms which he gave to the Poor of Africa, written in the Year 312, and ſet down by Euſebius, Hiſt. B. X. Ch. 6.

2. There is a Letter of his to Anulinus for the Immunity of the Clergy, written the ſame Year, B. X. C. 7.

3. His Letter to Miltiades Biſhop of Rome, empowering him to Judge the Cauſe of the Donatiſts, written in the Year 313, Euſeb. B. X. Ch. 5.

4. His Letter to Ablabius, [Dr. Cave calls him, Ælaphius or Ælianus,] commanding him to ſend the Biſhops of Donatus's Party, and Cæcilian, to Arles, to be judg'd there; written in 314, at the end of Optatus.

5. His Letter to Chreſtus Biſhop of Syracuſe, commanding him to repair to the Council of Arles; written the ſame Year, related by Euſeb. Hiſt. B. X. Ch. 5.

6. His Letter to Cæcilian, wherein he commands him to come to Rome, to be judg'd there a-new; written in 315, which is to be found at the end of Optatus.

7. His Letter to Probianus, Proconſul of Africa, to ſeize upon a Donatiſt, call'd Ingentius, ſet down by St. Auſtin, Ep. 68. and in his Third Book againſt Creſconius, Ch. 73. written in 315, as appears from hence, becauſe Probianus did not ſucceed Ælianus in the Office of Proconſul of Africk, till this Year.

8. His Letter to Celſus, Deputy of Africk, written about the end of the ſame Year, or the beginning of the next, wherein he recommends it to him, to advertiſe the Biſhops of both Parties, that he ſhould come e'er long to judge them; and to adviſe them in the mean time, to continue in Peace. He teſtifies in this Letter, That he had a mighty Paſſion to Eſtabliſh a good Agreement among them.

9. Another Letter of his to the ſame Celſus, written by his Order by the Præfectus Prætorio in favour of Four Biſhops of the Donatiſts, and one Presbyter who had obtain'd their Liberty.

10. His Letter to Eunalius, Deputy of Africk, in which he gives him Notice of the Judgment he had given in favour of Cæcilian againſt the Donatiſts, recited in the Conference of Carthage, Ch. 516. There is a Fragment of it in St. Auſtin's Third Book againſt Creſconius, Ch. 71. It was written in 316.

11. His Letter to the Biſhops of Africa, wherein he teſtifies, That he had done all that was in his Power, to procure Peace to the Church; but ſince he could not compaſs it, he muſt wait till God himſelf afforded a Remedy for their Diviſions. This Letter is at the end of Optatus.

12. His Letter to the Biſhops of Numidia, in which he grants them a place to build a Church upon, in the room of that which the Donatiſts had taken by force, and diſcharges the Eccleſiaſticks from Publick Taxes. Ibidem.

13. His Letter to Euſebius, for building of Churches at the Charge of the Emperour, written in 324 or 325, B. II. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 46.

14. His Letter to the Biſhop of Alexandria and Arius the Presbyter, concerning their Differences, wherein he exhorts them to Peace, written about the end of the Year 324, and related by Euſebius, B. II. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 64, &c.

15. His Letter to all the Biſhops about the Deciſions of the Nicene Council, B. III. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 17.

16. His Letter to the Egyptians upon the ſame Subject, Ibid.

17. His Letter to Alexander upon the ſame Subject, Ibid.

18. His Letter againſt Arius, mention'd by Socrates in the Firſt Book of his Hiſt. Ch. 9. and related at the end of the Hiſtory of Gelaſius Cyzicenus.

19. His Letter to the Nicomedians againſt Euſebius and Theognis, related in part by Theodoret, Hiſt. B. I. Ch. 20. and entirely by Gelaſius Cyzicenus.

20. His Letter to Macarius Biſhop of Jeruſalem, for building a Church in that City, in Euſeb. B. III. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 30.

21. His Letter to Euſebius for building a Church in the place where the Oak of Mamre ſtood, where Abraham had a Viſion; in Euſeb. B. III. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 52.

22. His Letter to thoſe of Antioch, upon the Depoſition of Euſtathius, written in 330, ſet down by Euſeb. B. III. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 60.

23. His Letter to Euſebius upon his Refuſal of the See of Antioch, B. III. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 61.

24. His Letter to the Synod upon the ſame Subject, Ibid. Ch. 62.

25. His

Conſtantine the Emperour.

25. His Letter to Sapor King of Perſia, in favour of the Chriſtians, B. IV. of the Life of Conſtantine Ch. 9, &c.

26. His Letter to Euſebius upon his Boock of Eaſter, Ibid. Ch. 35.

27. Another Letter to him, concerning the Copies of the Bible, Ch. 36.

28. His Letter to St. Athanaſius, in favour of Arius, in Athan. Apol. 2. p. 778.

29. His Letter to the Church of Alexandria, in favour of St. Athanaſius, Ibid. p. 779.

30. His Letter to St. Athanaſius, againſt the Cheats of his Enemies, Ibid. p. 785.

31. His Letter to John, the Head of the Meletians, wherein he congratulates his Reconciliation to St. Athanaſius, Ibid. P. 787.

32. His Letter to the Council of Tyre, in Euſeb. B. IV. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 42.

33. His Letter to the Biſhops of the Council of Tyre to cite them to Conſtantinople, in Athanaſius, Apol. 2. P. 803.

34. His Letter to Publilius Optatianus Porphyrius, who Dedicated ſome Poems to him, that were wrote in Priſon; publiſhed by Paulus Velſerus, and annexed to the Nurenburg Edition of Marcus Velſerus's Words. [The 6th. Letter to Cæcilian is only hinted at in a Letter of Conſtantine's to the Donatiſt Biſhops, wherein he tells them, That tho' he had before given Orders that they ſhould return into Africa, there to have their Controverſy with Cæcilian Examin'd; yet he was now reſolved that they ſhould of both Sides go to Rome, as he himſelf had written already to Cæcilian. This Letter is in the Collection of Records at the end of Optatus.

As alſo another Letter to the Catholick Biſhops in the Council of Arles, wherein he congratulates the Concluſion of their Differences, and expreſſes his deteſtation of thoſe Perſons who would not abide by what was already determined: Adding withal, That if the Donatiſts would not be quiet, they ſhould be brought before the Vicarius Præfecturæ, to whom he had given Orders to ſend them to his Palace, where they ſhould meet with ſuch treatment as they deſerved.]

There are many other Letters, of which Euſebius deſign'd to make a diſtinct Volume, as he himſelf teſtifies, B. III. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 24.

Tho' the Edicts which bear Names of the Emperours, are commonly Penn'd by their Secretaries of State, yet I muſt give an Account of thoſe that Conſtantine publiſh'd in favour of the Chriſtians.

The firſt Edict of Conſtantine for the Liberty of Religion, was publiſh'd at Milan, in the Year 313, whereof there is mention made in the following Edict.

The ſecond Edict of Conſtantine, by which he gave full Liberty to Chriſtians of the publick Exerciſe of their Religion, and commanded that their Churches ſhould be reſtor'd to them, was publiſhed ſometimes after the firſt, and is ſet down by Euſebius, Hiſt. B. X. Ch. 5.

His third Edict reſtrains this favour to Catholicks. 'Tis found in the ſame place.

His fourth Edict in favour of Religion, is dated the laſt of October, the ſame Year: It continues the Immunity of Eccleſiaſticks, whom the Hereticks had caus'd to be charg'd with publick Taxes, contrary to the Privileges which had been granted them. The Emperour commands that thoſe who were taxed, be diſcharg'd, and that a Courſe be taken to hinder any ſuch Proceedings for the future.

Amongſt the number of thoſe Edicts, made in favour of the Chriſtians, that which was directed to Ablabius, may be reckoned, bearing Date, May 12. 315. in which Conſtantine commands, That Proviſion be made for the Maintenance of the Children of the Poor in Italy.

The fifth Edict of Conſtantine for the Chriſtian Religion, is dated November 16. the ſame Year, wherein he condemns the Jews to the fire, that ſhould abuſe the Chriſtians. It is to be found in the Juſtinian and Theodoſian Code.

His ſeventh Edict directed to Protogenes, dated June 7th. 316, grants a very conſiderable favour to the Chriſtian Church, by appointing a new way of giving Liberty to Slaves, in the preſence of the Biſhop and the People. This Law is related in the Juſtinian Code, Tit. 13. l. 1. Beſides this, There are two other Edicts upon the ſame Subject: The firſt, which is dated in the Year 321, related in the ſame place, is added to that, which we have been ſpeaking of, That the Clergy may give Liberty to their Slaves, even out of the Church. The third Edict upon the ſame Subject is loſt.

The firſt which we have of thoſe Edicts of Conſtantine, that Eſtabliſhes the Juriſdiction of Biſhops as to Temporals, ſeems to be that which is related in an Addition to the Theodoſian Code, publiſh'd by Sirmondus, under Title 17th. It imports, That if thoſe who plead a Cauſe, ſhall appeal to the Judgment of the Biſhops, they ſhall be referred thither, altho' the Proceſs be enter'd before another Judge. This Edict is dated June 21*ſt.* 318. There is beſides this, another on the ſame Subject, without the date of the Year, related in the ſame Collection under the firſt Title, wherein he Confirms and Explains the former Order, concerning the Judicial Deciſions of Biſhops, and he will have them to ſtand firm, even tho' they are given between Minors, commanding, that at all times, and as oft as any one of the two Parties ſhall deſire an Appeal to the Judgment of the Biſhop, it ſhall be granted him. He Ordains alſo in this Edict, That the Teſtimony of a Biſhop ſhall be received by all the Judges.

In the Year 319, November 19th. He confirmed the Immunity of the Clergy by a new Edict, declaring, That they ſhould be free from all publick Taxes. This Law is related in the Theodoſian Code, Lib. 16. Tit. 2. l. 2.

There are many more Edicts of the Year 320, and 321, concerning the Church, among which may be plac'd that which abrogates the Papian Poppæan Law, which was made againſt thoſe that continued unmarried; this Law, Conſtantine ſeems to have aboliſh'd, in favour of the Chriſtians, who honour thoſe that make Profeſſion of continuing in Celibacy all their life. Euſebius makes mention of this Edict, B. IV. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 26. and after him Sozomen, B. I. of his Hiſt. Ch. 9. and St. Ambroſe, B. III. of Virgins.

It was alſo about this time, that he made ſome Edicts againſt the Donatiſts, The firſt is related by St. Auſtin, B. II. againſt Petilianus, Ch. 92. and in his Letters 167, and 168, wherein he commands that the Churches ſhould be taken from them which they poſſeſs'd: It bears Date, Anno 320. Conſtantine the Emperour.

The ſecond Edict directed to Verinus, dated May the 4*th.* in the Year 321, moderates a little the Rigor of the firſt, for it permits them to return to their own Country, and to live there in quiet, reſerving to God the Puniſhment of their Crime. This is alſo related by St. Auſtin, Ep. 152. and in his Book written after the Conference of Carthage. The Edict for the due obſervation of Sunday, of which Euſebius makes mention, B. IV. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 18, and 19. related in the Juſtinian Code, Lib. III. under the Title, De Feriis. B. III. is dated March 6*th.* in the Year 321. It imports, That all Judges, People and Artificers, ſhall ceaſe from their Labour on this Day; yet he excepts Country-men, who are permitted to Till the Ground on this Day, becauſe it often happens, ſays the Emperour, That a more ſeaſonable time cannot be found to ſow their Corn, or Plant their Vines, and it is not fit, that we ſhould loſe a favourable Opportunity which Divine Providence has put in our Hands.

There is another Edict of the firſt of July, the ſame Year, by which he permits all ſorts of Perſons to leave their Goods by Teſtament, to the Catholick Church.

In the Year 323, he publiſh'd an Edict againſt thoſe who conſtrain'd Chriſtians to Sacrifice to Idols, which is in the Theodoſian Code, Tit. 2. B. V.

In the next Year he made many Edicts after the defeat of Licinius, for the Liberty of Chriſtians, and for the Reſtitution of their Goods and their Honour. Euſebius relates them, B. II. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 20, 24, &c.

He produces likewiſe in the ſame place, his Edicts againſt the Worſhip of Falſe Gods, and for the Eſtabliſhment of the Church. Ibid. and Ch. 48.

After the Council of Nice, he publiſh'd an Edict, in which he condemns the Books of Arius to be burnt, and commands his followers to be call'd Porphyrians.

The Edict of the Month of May, in the Year 326, prohibiting the admitting of rich Perſons into the Order of the Clergy, or thoſe that were the Children of ſuch as had born publick Offices, appears but little favourable to the Clergy; but it was neceſſary, becauſe many rich and great Perſons, took Holy Orders, to exempt themſelves by this means, from the publick Taxes, which tended to the Oppreſſion of the Poor. Wherefore Conſtantine, ſays wiſely in this Edict, That it Was juſt, the Rich ſhould maintain the heavy Expences of the State, and that the Poor ſhould be fed with the Riches of the Church. We have this Law in the Theodoſian Code, B. XVI. Tit. 2. l. 6. Beſides this, there is alſo another Edict publiſh'd in the Month of July, in conſequence of the former, altho' it bears the Names of the Conſuls for the Year 320, which forbids the diſturbing of thoſe that had taken Holy Orders, before the preceeding Law was publiſh'd, and commands at the ſame time, that ſuch as had taken Orders ſince its publication, on purpoſe to avoid the publick Taxes, ſhould be remov'd from the Clergy, and ſent back into the World, and left liable to publick Taxes. This Edict is related in the ſame place, B. III. After all, by another Edict of the firſt of September, the ſame Year 326, it is ordain d, That Clergy-men who were Hereticks and Schiſmaticks, ſhould not enjoy this Privilege of Exemption, but ſhould be ſubject to Taxes and Impoſitions. This Edict is in the Juſtinian Code, B. I. Tit. de. Hæret. and in the Theodoſian.

He treats the Novatians with more moderation than the other Hereticks, permitting them by an Edict of the Month of September in the ſame Year 326, to keep their Churches, their Cœmeteries, and the Goods which they had purchas'd after their Separation from the Church. In the Code of Theodoſius, Tit. 5. B. II.

In the Year 330, he publiſh'd an Edict againſt the Hereticks, in which he forbids their Aſſemblies. It is related in Euſeb. B. III. of the Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 63. &c.

There is in the Theodoſian Code, another Edict of the ſame Year, in favour of the Clergy that were accus'd, or evil treated by Hereticks.

The Laws concerning the Jews, are the laſt which Conſtantine made in the favour of the Chriſtian Religion.

By an Edict September 27*th.* 330, He grants to the Patriarchs of the Jews, i. e. to thoſe that preſided in their Aſſemblies, Exemption from the publick Taxes. He renews the ſame favour by another Edict December 1*ſt.* in the Year following. It is probable that he granted theſe favours to the Jews for no other reaſon, but becauſe they Worſhip the ſame God with the Chriſtians, and to leave them ſome kind of Conſolation, as he ſays in one of his Laws, becauſe their's was once the only true Religion: For at the ſame time he made very ſevere Laws againſt the Jews that ſhould purchaſe or detain Chriſtian Slaves, and condemn'd thoſe to death, that circumcis'd them. There are many other Laws in the Theodoſian Code upon this Subject, of the Years 330, 331, and 336.

I do not place among the Number of Conſtantine's Edicts, the Donation which bears his Name, in which he is ſuppos'd to give to the Biſhop of Rome and his Succeſſors, the Soveraignty of the City of Rome, and of the Provinces of the Weſtern Empire; becauſe this Act has ſo many ſigns of Forgery, that it's impoſſible it can be attributed to Conſtantine. I ſhall here ſubjoin ſome of thoſe Reaſons which clearly prove, that it is an Impoſture.

1. Not one of the Ancients mentions this pretended Liberality of Conſtantine to the Church: But who can believe that Euſebius, and all the other Ancient Hiſtorians, who have exactly deſcrib'd all the Benefits of this Emperour to Chriſtians, and eſpecially to the Biſhops, ſhould paſs over in ſilence one ſo conſiderable as this of the Weſtern Empire, to the Biſhop of Rome?

2. Not one of the Popes who mention the Benefits of Kings and Emperours to the See of Rome, or who defend their Temporal Patrimony, did ever alledge this pretended Donation, tho' it had been very much for their Advantage ſo to do.

Conſtantine the Emperour.

3. The Date of this act is falſe, for it bears the names of the Conſuls, Conſtantine (for the fourth time,) and Gallicanus: Now Conſtantine in his fourth Conſulſhip, had not Gallicanus, but Licinius, for his Collegue: And this Conſulſhip anſwers to the Year 315, at which time Conſtantine was not baptiz'd, even in the Opinion of thoſe that believe he was baptiz'd at Rome by St. Sylveſter; and yet mention is made of his Baptiſm in this Edict of Donation. We muſt add to this Argument, another Error in Chronology: Byzantium is there call'd Conſtantinople, tho' it had not that Name, till Ten Years or thereabouts, after the Date of this Edict.

4. The Stile of it is barbarous, and very different from that of the Genuine Edicts of Conſtantine: It is full of new Modes of ſpeaking, the Expreſſions are affected, and the Terms ſuch as were never us'd in any publick Acts, till after the time of Conſtantine.

5. Who can believe that Conſtantine ſhould give the City of Rome, all the Provinces and Cities of the Weſt, that is to ſay, one half of his Empire, to the Biſhop of Rome, and that this ſhould never be known till the Eleventh Age of the Church?

6. There are infinite Numbers of Falſities and Abſurdities in this Edict, which demonſtrate that it was compos'd by an ignorant Impoſtor: take ſome of them as follows. In it the Pope is permitted to wear a Crown of Gold, like that of Kings and Emperours, whereas in thoſe times, Kings and Emperours did not were a Crown at all, but a Diadem. The Fabulous Hiſtory of Conſtantine's Baptiſm by Sylveſter, and the miraculous Cure of his Leproſy, is reported there as a thing Certain. There are reckon'd up in this Edict, five Patriarchal Churches, and that of Conſtantinople is put in the ſecond place, whereas it had not this Honour, till a long time after. And yet it is ſuppos'd, That Sylveſter had already acknowledg'd it for a Patriarchal See. Theſe Falſities and many others that occur in this Edict, do plainly prove, That it is a Forgery.

In ſhort, to deſtroy entirely this pretended Edict, it is ſufficient to obſerve, That while Conſtantine liv'd, and a long time after his Death, the City of Rome, and the Empire of the Weſt, were always ſubject to the Power of the Emperours; That the Popes themſelves acknowledg'd them as their Sovereigns, without pretending that the City of Rome, or Italy, or any part of the Weſtern Empire, belong'd to them: That all the Temporal Power they have obtain'd ſince, is owing to King Pepin and the Emperour Charlemaigne. The Account of this, deſerves a little Digreſſion, which will not be tedious to the Reader, and will not carry us too far from our preſent Subject.

'Tis certain, that the City of Rome, Italy, and all the other Provinces of the Weſtern Empire, were under the Power of Conſtantine and the Emperours that ſucceeded him. Hiſtory informs us, That they were abſolute Maſters of it, That they ſent Governours thither, That the City of Rome depended upon their Laws, upon their Power, and the Magiſtrates whom they ſhould appoint; That they made ſuch Changes there as they pleas'd: In a word, That they were no leſs Maſters of it, than of all the other Cities of the World. When afterwards the Barbarians begun to invade Italy, they ſent thither Generals of Armies to defend it, as being a Country that belong'd to them: But in ſpite of all their Endeavours Theodorick King of the Oſtrogoths having Conquer'd it, made it Tributary, and govern'd the City of Rome with a Power as abſolute as that of the Roman Governours. His Succeſſors, Athalaric and Theodat, maintain'd the Poſſeſſion of it, untill they were chas'd thence in the time of Juſtinian by Beliſarius the Roman Captain, who took the City of Rome by Force. A little time after, Count Narſetes delivered all Italy from the Tyranny of theſe Barbarians, and reduc'd it under the Power of the Greek Emperours, to which it had belong'd.

His Succeſſor, nam'd Longinus, finding it was difficult to govern all Italy, which was divided into many Petty Principalities, appointed Dukes or Governours over the Principal Cities, and reſerv'd to himſelf the Sovereignty over them; taking the Title of Exarch or Viceroy, and all this while acknowledging the Emperour for his Lord. From this time forward, the Emperour ſent Exarchs into Italy, who commonly reſided at Ravenna, and govern'd all Italy. But this Exarchate was diminiſh'd by little and little, and at laſt was wholly deſtroy'd, when the Lombards made themſelves Maſters of Italy. Until this time it does not appear that the Popes were Sovereigns of the City of Rome, and of Italy; on the contrary, they themſelves were ſubject to the Emperour or King of Italy, and obey'd him as all his other Subjects. The Hiſtory of the Popes furniſhes us with many Inſtances, which prove this clearly. The Firſt is that of Pope Liberius, whom the Emperour Conſtantius order'd to be made Priſoner, and carried out of Rome by Leontius Governour of that City, as St. Athanaſius teſtifies. The Schiſm of Damaſus and Urſicinus, does alſo prove, that the Popes were ſubject to the Emperours. Maximus, that then govern'd the City of Rome for the Emperour, compos'd the Differences that aroſe between thoſe two Competitors, and the Biſhops themſelves addreſs'd to the Emperour, praying him that Urſicinus might be forc'd to depart out of the City of Rome. The ſame Obſervation may be made upon the Schiſm of Eulalius and Boniface, which was alſo cur'd by the Order of the Emperour, and afterwards by King Theodorick, when he became Maſter of Italy. 'Tis remarkable, that this King exercis'd his Power over the Church of Rome and its Biſhop with ſo much Haughtineſs, that he appointed a Viſitor to this Church, and ſent poor Pope John, being very ſick, to the Greek Emperour, to obtain a Revocation of the Edict he had made againſt the Arians; which John not being able to obtain, Theodorick caus'd him to be impriſon'd at Ravenna, where he died. Theodatus ſent in like manner from Rome, Pope Agapetus, to the Emperour Juſtinian, and when he became Maſter of Italy, he us'd the Popes no leſs roughly than Theodorick had done; for he exacted of them great Summs of Money to confirm their Ordination, and caus'd the Popes, Silverus and Vigilius, to be carried to Conſtantinople, where he made them approve the Reſtauration of Anthimus, to the Patriarchal See of that City.

Martin

Martin the First, was also banished to the Province of Pontus, by the Exarch of Ravenna, according to the Orders he had receiv'd from the Emperour. Justinian the Younger banish'd also Pope Sergius. In short, The Emperour Leo Isauricus, would have put to Death, Pope Gregory the Second: But the Italians growing weary of their subjection to the Power of Strangers, who could not secure them against their Enemies, began to shake off the Yoke and to acknowledge their Dukes for Sovereigns. The Pope nevertheless oppos'd them in it, and did all that lay in his Power to retain them in their Allegiance, acknowledging, as he himself speaks in his Letter written to the Duke of Venice, That the Republick of Rome was subject to the Dominion of the Emperours. But the Lombards afterwards invading Italy, and having no expectation of Succors from the Greek Emperour who was entangled by other Wars, the Popes, Gregory the Third, and Zachary, were oblig'd to have recourse to Charles Martel Governour of the French. This Prince by menaces obtain'd of Luitprand King of the Lombards, and his Successor Rachiseus, the Restitution of the Exarchate of Ravenna, which by his means was twice restor'd to the Exarchs depending upon the Greek Emperours. But at last Astolphus the Brother of Rachiseus made himself Master of it for ever, and oblig'd Eutychius, the last Exarch of Ravenna, to retire into the East.

Constantine the Emperour.

Stephen the Second being afraid, for the City of Rome was oblig'd to make a Truce with Astolphus for Forty Years in the Name of the Roman Republick. But this King breaking his Word, came four Months after with a great Army to Take and Sack the City of Rome. In this extremity, Stephen writes presently to the Greek Emperour for Succors, but seeing there were no hopes of any from thence, he had recourse to King Pepin, who coming to besiege Pavia, forc'd King Astolphus to sue for Peace; which was granted him, upon Condition that he should not only restore to the Church of Rome, all the Lands and Territories which he had possess'd in Italy; but also should yield up the Exarchate of Ravenna, and the Cities of the Roman Dutchy. This Peace was quickly broke by the perfidiousness of this Lombard King, who perceiving that Pepin was gone out of Italy, went forthwith and besieg'd the City of Rome. Pepin presently relieved it, and raised the Siege; and yet Astolphus found himself in too good a Condition to perform the Articles of Peace, which he had made: But Pepin forc'd him to give Hostages, and enlarg'd the Bounds of the Exarchate of Ravenna, which Fulradus the Abbot of St. Denys, receiv'd in his Name, and presently restor'd into the Hands of the Pope. It is observable, that in the time of these two Expeditions of Pepin, an Ambassador came from the Greek Emperour, and demanded back again the Exarchate of Ravenna, as belonging of right to his Master: But Pepin believing that he was lawfully dispossess'd, thought it more convenient to give it to the Pope. In the mean time, the Greek Emperour was still Master of Sicily, Apulia, Calabria, and all the extreme Parts of Italy, and had a Governour call'd George in the City of Naples, who combin'd with Desiderius the Successor of Astolphus, to Invade the Exarchate of Ravenna.

Paul the First knowing of this League, and seeing himself attack'd by this Lombard, wrote presently to Pepin, his Protector. Desiderius fearing the Power of this King, push'd the Matter no further at this time, and promis'd to restore to the Roman Church what he had taken from it: But, as it plainly appeared after the Death of Pepin, Pope Adrian implor'd the Aid of Charlemaigne, who came with a great Army, defeated Desiderius, and shut him up in Pavia. From thence Charles went to Rome, and restor'd to the Pope all the Cities which his Father Pepin had given him, and all the Estates which the Roman Church had possess'd in Italy. In consideration of which Benefits, Adrian, as Head of the Roman Republick, granted him, with the consent of the People of Rome, the Title of Patricius, and gave him the Sovereignity over the City and all the Republick of Rome; insomuch that all the People and even the Bishop himself, took an Oath of Allegiance to him. After this, Charles wanted nothing but the Title of Emperour, which he received in the Year 800, being then Proclaim'd Emperour by the People of Rome, and afterwards Consecrated and Crown'd by the Pope. When Charles had gotten the Title of Emperour, he regulated all the Affairs of Italy; he permitted the Lombards to live peaceably under his Dominion; he gave the Name of Romania to the ancient Exarchate, and shar'd Italy with the Greek Emperour, on condition, that all which was on this side Naples, should belong to him; and that the City of Naples and all that was on the other side of it, should continue in the Greek Emperour's Power.

From this time the Successors of Charles were Kings of Italy, and Sovereigns of Rome; though the Popes were Temporal Lords of the Cities that anciently belong'd to the Exarchate of Ravenna, and some others. Ludovicus Pius, the Son of Charlemaigne, sent Bernard, to Rome, to allay the Dissentions that were risen there. After the Death of this Bernard, Lotharius comes to Rome with an Army, to punish some Rebels, and ordains, That for the future the Magistrates of Rome should be created by the Emperours. But Charles the Bald parted with this Noble Right, and Surrendred up to the Romans the Sovereign Power, restoring them, if I may so say, to their ancient Liberty.

In the mean while, the Popes begun to lay by little and little the Foundations of their Sovereign Dominion. For although the Sovereign Power did as yet remain in the Body of the People, who created the Magistrates in Rome, and the Neighbouring Cities, nevertheless, the Popes who were now grown Rich and Powerful, us'd all their Endeavours to make themselves Sovereigns, and that the shadow of Sovereginty should only remain in the People. Yet the Romans had two Consuls, one Prætor, and one Governor of the City, whom they chose; and oftentimes cast off the Yoke which the Popes would impose upon them; which was the Cause of those cruel Wars that happen'd between the Popes, the Principal Citizens of Rome, and the Emperours of Germany: But at last the Popes got the better on't, and remain'd sole Masters and Sovereigns of Rome, and the Countries about it.

All that we have said concerning the Foundation and Growth of the Pope's Power, plainly shews that the Settlement of their Empire is not owing to Conſtantine, but to the Kings of France; and by conſequence, that the Edict of Donation that bears the Name of Conſtantine, is wholly Suppoſititious; but it is not ſo eaſie to find out who was the Author of this falſe Monument, and upon what Motives he Forg'd it. 'Tis certain, that it is more ancient than Hincmar, ſince that Biſhop cites it in his Third Ep. Ch. 13. and Iſidore * has put it in his Collection. It is alſo alledg'd by Pope Leo the Ninth, in is Epiſtle to Michael Cerularius; and St. Anſelm, Ivo Carnutenſis, and Gratian, have inſerted it into their Collections. To conclude, Balſamon a Greek Author, has related a part of it in Greek, in his Commentaries upon Photius's Nomocanon. Baronius, and thoſe that blindly follow his Conjectures, have ſuſpected the Greeks of this Forgery, pretending that they forg'd this Monument to eſtabliſh the Antiquity of the Patriarchate of Conſtantinople, by affirming, that the Church of Rome owes its Grandeur to the Emperour Conſtantine. But beſides, that 'tis no ways probable that the Greeks ſhould forge an Act contrary to their own pretended Right over Italy, this Edict is found cited by the Latines 200 Years before it was known to the Greeks. Morinus believes that it was written by John, a Deacon of the Church of Rome, who liv'd in the Year 963: But that cannot be, ſince it was cited before that time by Hincmar. Monſieur de Marca maintains, That the Popes fram'd this Monument with the conſent of the French Kings, That they might oppoſe it againſt the Greek Emperours, who demanded back again the Exarchate of Ravenna, as belonging to them: But what probability is there, that the Popes and French Kings ſhould have recourſe to this Forgery, which might eaſily be diſcover'd, having much better Reaſons to alledge to the Greeks, why the Exarchate of Ravenna did not belong to them. Some have attributed this falſe Monument to the Author of the Collection of Iſidore, a notorious Forger of ſuch kind of Pieces; and this Conjecture is more probable than the reſt, but neither is it certain, and therefore it is better to ſuſpend our Judgment about this Matter, than to build it upon Conjectures that have ſo little ſolidity.

* Mercator.

Beſides the Greek Fragments of this Edict recited by Balſamon, 'tis ſaid, there are Four Greek Manuſcripts of the whole Edict in the Vatican Library. The Latin Editions of it do not altogether agree; for Iſidore's is different from that which is found in the ancient Manuſcript of Fuſtellus. One Bartholomew Picernas, boaſts that he made a new Tranſlation of it from a Greek Manuſcript in the Vatican Library, which he printed with a Dedication to Pope Julius the Second: But he has done nothing but corrected the ancient Latin Edition. A Prieſt of Deventer has alſo printed this Edition at Cologne in the Year 1535. The Differences of all theſe Editions are to be ſeen in Father Labbe's Firſt Volume of the Councils. It ſeems more probable to me, That the Greek was taken out of the Latin, than that the Latin was tranſlated from the Greek. However it be, this Monument has neither Authority nor Uſefulneſs.

JUVENCUS.

Juvencus.

HItherto we have not met with any Poet among the Chriſtian Writers. Here is a very excellent one who flouriſh'd under the Reign of Conſtantine; he was call'd C. Vettius Aquilinus Juvencus, and was deſcended of one of the Nobleſt Families in Spain. St. Jerom aſſures us that he was a Prieſt, and that's all that he tells us of his Life. He compos'd a Poem about the Year 329, divided into Four Books; wherein he deſcribes the Life of Chriſt in Hexameter Verſe without wandring from the Text of the Four Evangeliſts. St. Jerom alſo teſtifies, That he wrote ſome Books in Hexameter Verſe about Myſteries; and 'tis ſaid, That he compos'd ſome Hymns, of which St. Jerom ſays not a Word: But 'tis probable enough, that one who had ſo fertile a Vein in Poetry, as he had, wrote ſeveral other Books. However that be, we have now only Four Books of the Hiſtory of the Goſpel under his Name: In the Exordium of this Poem he ſays, That if the Verſes of thoſe who have publiſh'd the Actions of mortal Men, which they adorn'd with their Fictions, have purchas'd them a Reputation ſo laſting for many Ages, he ought to be aſſur'd of Immortal Glory, who writes the Life of Jeſus Chriſt, and needs not fear that the Day of Judgment ſhall conſume his Work.

Quod ſi tam longam meruerunt carmina famam,
Quæ veterum geſtis hominum mendacia nectunt;
Nobis certa fides æternæ in ſæcula laudis
Immortale decus tribuet, meritumq; rependet:
Nam mihi carmen erunt Chriſti vitalia geſta,
Divinum in populis falſi ſine crimine donum;
Nec metus ut mundi rapiant incendia ſecum
Hoc opus.

After this, he invocates the Aſſiſtance of the Holy Spirit, to enable him to recount the Actions of Chriſt, in ſuch a manner as is ſuitable to their Greatneſs.

Ergo age ſanctificans adſit mihi carminis autor
Spiritus, & puro mentem riget amne canentis
Dulcis Jordanis, ut Chriſto digna loquamur.

After

After this Invocation, he begins the History of Christ, and relates in Verse, all that has been said by the Four Evangelists, without wandering from the Text, and without adding any thing uncertain or fabulous. He concludes those Four Books with a Complement to the Emperor Constantine, whom he thanks for the Peace of the Church, and mightily commends, because he was the only King who would not allow the peculiar Names of God to be attributed to him. Juvencus.

The Air of the Poem is very Poetical, the Cadence of the Verse is fine and soft; but the words are not always Poetical, and sometimes they are not very good Latin. That which is chiefly to be commended in this Author, is the Faithfulness of his Translation; wherein he has rendred almost word for word the Text of the Evangelists This was a difficult Undertaking which he has performed with good Success, and one may say, that 'tis almost impossible to have done it better.

There are a great many Editions of this Author. His Book was printed with Sedulius and other Christian Poets at Cologne, in Octavo 1537; at Basle in Octavo, 1537, 1550; at Venice by Aldus, in Quarto 1502; at Basle by Oporinus, in Quarto also, 1564; at Lyons by Torneſius, 1588; at Paris, in 1543, 1575, 158., 1624; at Vienna, in Quarto 1519; and in many other places: And, it is also to be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

RHETICIUS.

RHETICIUS Bishop of Autun, had so great a Reputation in the time of Constantine, that the Emperour chose him to be one of the Judges in the Cause of the Donatists. He assisted at the Council of Rome, wherein Cæcilian was Absolv'd, and afterwards at the Council of Arles, held in the Year 314. St. Jerom says, that in his time, this Bishop's Commentaries upon the Canticles, were extant, and also a large Volume against Novatian; but he met with no other Books of his. The same St. Jerom, speaking of this Author's Commentaries, in his Second Letter to Florentius, says, That he gives a lofty sence of the Canticles: And lastly, in his Ep. 133. to Marcellus, he gives a Critical Judgment of these Commentaries, which is very little to their Advantage. He says, They are full of Extravagent Explication; That he found an infinite number of Errors and base Things in them; That the Stile, indeed, is lofty and swelling, but such as is not suitable to an Interpreter, who ought not to aim at the discovery of his own Eloquence, but the true sence of his Author. He relates in the same place some of the gross Mistakes of this author; e. g. That he confounds Tharsis which is mention'd in the Psalms, with the City of Tarsus where St. Paul was born: that he believ'd the Hebrew word Ophaz, which signifies Gold, signified a Stone, and so confounds it with the Name Cephas, which is given in the Gospel to St. Peter. In short, St. Jerom wrote to Marcellus, That he had not sent the Commentaries of this Author as he desir'd; because there were many things in them that displeas'd him, and but few things that he could approve of: And we have nothing more of these Commentaries, nor of the other Works of this Author. Rheticius.

EUSTATHIUS Bishop of Antioch.

EUSTATHIUS, a Native of Sydа, a City of Pamphylia (a), was chosen Bishop of Antioch, after he had govern'd the Church of Berœa for some time (b), in the room of Philogonus, in the year 323 from the birth of Christ. He assisted at the Council of Nice, where he sate in one of the chief Places (c), and there maintain'd the Faith of the Church with great Constancy. After the Council of Nice, being one of the Zealous Defenders of its Decisions, and one of the greatest Adversaries to the Arians, he Eustathius of Antioch.

(a) Syda, City of Pamphylia.] As St. Jerom observes, this is a Sea-Port Town, call'd at present Forte.

(b) After having govern'd the Church of Berœa for some time.] It is agreed upon all hands that he was Bishop of Berœa. St. Jerom, Theodoret, Socrates and Sozomen testifie it. He was also Bishop of that Church, when Alexander of Alexandria wrote his Letter against Arius, for Theodoret notes expressly, that it was directed to him. Sozomen says in the first Book of his Hist. Ch. 2. That the See of Antioch was vacant after the Death of Romanus, and that Eustathius was ordain'd Bishop of Antioch in the Council of Nice: and in Ch. 17. of the same Book, he says, that he was already Bishop of Antioch when he assisted at this Council; yet S. Romanus was not Bishop, but only a Martyr of Antioch, and Eustathius Succeeded immediately to Philogonus some time before the Council of Nice, but after the beginning of the Arian Controversy, that's to say, in the Year 323, or 324.

(c) He sate in one of the Chief Places.] Proclus of Constantinople, in a Synodical Letter to the Oriental Bishops, set down by Facundus, B. I. Ch. 1. says, That he was the chief of the Fathers in the Council of Nice. Facundus gives him the same Title, B. XI. Ch. 1. and Pope Felix III. calls him, in his 6th Ep. to Zeno, President of the council. Theodoret, B. I. of his Hist. Ch. 9. says, That he spoke to the Emperour in the Name of the Council; and Eusеb. B. I Life of Const. Ch. 11. says That he who first Harangued the Emperour, was seated in the Chief Place on the right Hand: But he seems to say at the Beginning of his Books of the Life of Constantine, That it was himself that made this Harangue, as Theodoret assures us, Hist B. I. Ch. 19. The Author of the Tripartite Hist. willing to joyn these several Opinions together, says, That Eusebius did not speak till after Eustathius. Theodorus of Mopsuestia, says, That Alexander of Alexandria, was entrusted with that Office. Be that as it will, it does not follow, that he who spoke first must therefore be President of the Council, as having the first Place upon the right hand: for besides that this might be given him only for the time while he spoke, it may be that this place was not the most honourable: Moreover, Eustathius might be call'd the Chief, because he was one of the first; But it is more probable, that Hosius was President of the Council.

Euſtathius of Antioch.

drew upon himſelf the Hatred of the Biſhops of Palæſtine, which burſt forth immediately upon the firſt occaſion they found: which offer'd it ſelf in the Year 329, when Euſebius of Nicomedia, and Theognis of Nice, return'd from their Baniſhment, and went to Palæſtine, under pretence of viſiting the Church of Jeruſalem: for then they paſs'd by Antioch, where they were honourably received by Euſtathius, and they on their part gave marks of their Friendſhip to him. But at their Return they brought with them to Antioch, Euſebius of Cæſarea, Patrophilus of Scythopolis, Aecius of Lydda, Theodotus of Laodicea, with ſome other Eaſtern Biſhops, with a deſign to depoſe Euſtathius. Theſe Biſhops being then Aſſembled at Antioch in the Year 330 (d), did not only falſly charge him with the Error of the Sabellians, but alſo accus'd him of infamous Crimes. Theodoret ſays, That they hir'd a Woman of an ill Life (e) to ſay, that ſhe had a Child by Euſtathius; That this wicked Woman entred with a Child in her Arms into the place of their Aſſembly, and declar'd with a loud Voice, That ſhe had it by Euſtathius; That this holy Biſhop having ask'd her, if ſhe had any Witneſs of what ſhe affirm'd; ſhe anſwer'd, ſhe had none; and yet notwithſtanding this, the Biſhops believ'd it upon her Oath, and Condemn'd Euſtathius as convicted of the Crime. St. Athanaſius ſays nothing of this Story, which appears otherwiſe to be fabulous enough; but he obſerves only that they accus'd Euſtathius of having treated the Emperour's Mother reproachfully (f), and that immediately he was ſent into Baniſhment, with many of his Prieſts and Deacons; but the place of his Exile is not certainly known(g). In whatſoever place it was, there he ended his days, and 'tis probable, that he liv'd not long after his Condemnation; for there is no mention made of him in Hiſtory, and 'tis falſe, whatever Socrates and Sozomen ſay, That he return'd again from Baniſhment in the time of the Emperour Jovian (h). This Biſhop is the Firſt, if we will believe St. Jerom, that wrote againſt the Arians. He compos'd many Books againſt their Doctrine, abundance of Homilies, and infinite number of Letters, many Treatiſes of the Soul, and a Diſcourſe of the Pythoniſs againſt Origen.

Facundus quotes in Latin, Ch. 1. of his B. XI. Four Paſſages of Euſtathius of Antioch whereof the two firſt are taken out of B. VII. and the two laſt out of B. VIII. againſt the Arians. He alledges them in this place to prove, That this Biſhop of Antioch, in ſpeaking of the Incarnation, made uſe of Expreſſions, at leaſt as harſh as thoſe that were objected to Theodorus of Mopſueſtia: in effect, the Paſſages which he relates, ſeem to favour the Error of Neſtorius (i). But his Doctrine muſt not be ana-

(b) Being then Aſſembled at Antioch in the Year 330.] All Hiſtorians agree, That Euſtathius was depos'd under the Reign of Conſtantine. Euſebius an unqueſtionable Witneſs, gives us an Account, B. III. Life of Conſtantine, Ch. 59. of the Tumult that aroſe in the Church of Antioch upon the Depoſition of Euſtathius, as a thing that happen'd after the Council of Nice, but before the Death of the Emperour Conſtantine St Athanaſius begins with this Depoſition, the Hiſtory of the Arian Perſecution under Conſtantine; and though there be in the Text Conſtantius for Conſtantine, that is a miſtake, for 'tis plain from S. Athanaſius that Flacillus, who was ordain'd in the room of Euſtathius, had the Title of Biſhop of Antioch, at the Council of Tyre, held under Conſtantine from whence it evidently follows that Euſtathius was then depos'd. The like Error appears in ſome Editions of St Jerom's Books of Eccleſiaſtical Writers; but in the ancient Editions & in the Greek Verſion, we read under Conſtantine, & not under Conſtantius.

(e) Theodoret ſays, That they hir'd a Woman of an ill Life.] Philoſtorgius reports alſo this Story, B. II. Ch. 7. Socrat. and Sozom. allude to it, when they ſay, That Euſtathius was accus'd of Infamous Crimes. S. Jerom mentions it in his Apol. againſt Ruffinus; Euſtathius ſays, he found ſons which he knew not of; Filios dum neſcit invenit: and the Emperour Conſtantine ſeems to hint it in his Letter to the Biſhops, the infamous Perſons being driven away, as he ſpeaks.

(f) Of having treated the Emperor's Mother reproachfully.] 'Twas to Conſtantine that they wrote this Calumny; for Euſtathius having recourſe to the Emperour, and being come to Conſtantinople to complain of the Injuſtice that was done him, the Biſhops aſſembled at Antioch made uſe of this Calumny to ſtir up the Emperour againſt him. They added alſo, that he was the Author of that Sedition which aroſe at Antioch after his Depoſition. Theſe things mov'd the Emperour to baniſh him preſently, without inquiring into the Merits of his Cauſe. The Euſebians alſo did afterwards make uſe of an Artifice juſt like this againſt St Athanaſius.

(g) But the place of his Exile is not certainly known.] Theodoret ſays, that he was ſent to Illyricum; Philoſtorgius ſays only, that he was ſent into the Weſt: But St. Jerom aſſures us, that he was carried away to Trajanopolis, a City of Thracia. St. Chryſoſtom ſays, That he died in Tracia: And in fine, Theodorus Lector at the beginning of the Second Book of his Hiſtory, ſays, That Calendion the Patriarch of Antioch, caus'd the Reliques of Euſtathius to be tranſported from Philippopolis in Macedonia to Antioch.

(h) 'Tis falſe,— that he turn'd again from baniſhment in the time of the Emperour Jovian.] Theodoret ſays, That Euſtathius was dead when Meletius was ordain'd Biſhop of Antioch. And certainly Meletius ought not to have been ordain'd in his place before, and the Euſtathians (ſo call'd becauſe they would not communicate with any Biſhop of Antioch that was ordain'd by the Arian Faction) would never have ſuffer'd, if Paulinus had been ordain'd while Euſtathius liv'd. There is no mention of him in all the Diſputes that follow'd after, neither did he return after the Death of Conſtantine, when all the baniſh'd Biſhops were recall'd; for it does not appear that he was preſent in any Council, or that he ever demanded to be reſtor'd to his Biſhoprick: In a word, there is nothing more ſaid of him in Hiſtory. From all which I conclude, that 'tis ſomething probable, that he died before the Year 337.

(i) In effect, the Paſſages which he relates, ſeem to favour the Error of Neſtorius.] In the Firſt, he ſays, [That God who united the Humane Nature to the Word for the Salvation of Mankind, has conceal'd from this humane Nature the Day of Judgment, leſt the man ſhould teach Mankind the time of his ſecond Coming.] In the Second he ſeems to ſay, That Jeſus Chriſt incarnate is another Perſon than the Word, but the word Perſon is not always taken in a ſtrict ſence. In the Third, he ſays, That the word dwells in the Humane Nature as in its Temple: an Expreſſion which Neſtorius often made uſe of. In the laſt, he ſays, That the Scepter which God prepar'd for his Son, does not agree to the Father, nor to the Word, but only to the Man Chriſt; Who is, ſays he, the Lord of all the Creatures, becauſe of the Mixture of the Divine Word.] 'Tis evident, that theſe Expreſſions are not exact; but then we ought not for this to accuſe him of Error, for 'tis eaſie to excuſe him, not only becauſe of the time when he wrote, but alſo becauſe 'tis common enough with thoſe that liv'd a long time after him, to make uſe ſometimes of Expreſſions very like this, to diſtinguiſh the Humanity of Chriſt from his Divinity to which it is united. To which we may add, That 'tis plain from the paſſages related by Theodoret, that he was far enough from the error of the Neſtorians.

thematiz'd,

thematiz'd, says Facundus, upon the account of some Expressions that are less exact, which he made use of at a time when he spoke simply and without precaution, because the Error of Nestorius did not yet appear. The Passage of Eustathius which Theodoret gives us in Greek, Hist. B. I. Ch. 8. is much more considerable than those which are cited by Facundus: It is taken out of the same Work against the Arians, and probably out of the two First Books. Take it whole as Monsieur Cousin has Translated it. Eustathius of Antioch.

" A very numerous Council being Assembled about this Matter in the City of Nice, where 270 " Bishops. or thereabouts, assisted, (for the Number was so great that I cannot precisely set it down, " and besides, I took on great care to inform my self of it.) When they first began to enquire into the " Faith, a Libel of Eusebius's was produc'd, which contain'd a convincing Proof of his Blasphemies. " The reading of it, caus'd a sensible Grief in all that heard it, and great Confusion in its Author. " The Malignity of Eusebius's Associates being discover'd, and the impious Writing being publickly " tore in pieces, some under pretence of the Peace which they proposed, impos'd Silence upon those " that used to speak better than others. The Arians apprehending that they should be cast out of the " Church by the Judgment of so great an Assembly, condemn'd the Impious Doctrine, and sign'd the " Confession of Faith. But having secur'd by their Cabals the principal Dignities to themselves, instead " of suffering Canonical Penance as they ought, they maintain'd the Doctrine that was Condemn'd, " sometimes in private, and sometimes in Publick, by several Arguments which they had invented for " that purpose. The desire they had to sow the Seeds of Division, made them shun meeting with the " Learned, and attacquing the Defenders of the Faith; but we do not think that these Atheists can " overcome God, for whatever Efforts they make will be vanquish'd according to the authentick Te- " stimonies of the Prophet Isaiah. Theodoret adds, See here what Eustathius has written of the Arians. There is also another passage in Greek taken out of this Work, related by Anastasius in his Collections, wherein Eustathius maintains, That Jesus Christ cannot be said to be Created and Begotten according to the same Nature; for if he was Created he was not Begotten, and if he was Begotten he was not Created. The same Theodoret citeth in his Dialogues many passages of Eustathius about the Incarnation, taken out of his Book upon the soul, and his Discourse upon these words of the Proverbs; God hath created me in the beginning of his ways: out of his 15th. and 92d. Homilies upon the Psalms, and out of two other Treatises upon the Inscriptions or Titles of some Psalms (k).

All the passages of Eustathius, reported by Theodoret (l), prove, That there are two Perfect Natures in Jesus Christ, the Divine and the Humane Nature; That He has a Body and a Soul like us; That He is passible according to the Humane Nature, and, That the Humanity is not chang'd into the Divinity: From whence it appears, that Eustathius did more formally reject the Error of the Eutychians, than that of the Nestorians, although there are some Expressions in the same Passages, which plainly enough show that he was perswaded, That these two Natures were united in one and the same Person. But the Oriental Writers have always more applied themselves to remark the distinction of the two Natures in Christ, than their intimate Union; whereas on the contrary, the Egyptians are more addicted to discourse of their Union, than their Distinction; Which things afterwards was the Subject of the great Disputes that were amongst them about the Mystery of the Incarnation.

The Treatise of Eustathius concerning the Pythoniss (m) cited by St. Jerom, was publish'd in Greek in the Year 1629, and translated into Latin by Allatius; together, with a Discourse of this Author upon the same Subject. The Question there treated of is, Whether the Witch mention'd B. I. of

(k) Upon the Inscriptions or Titles of some Psalms.] The First is taken from the Treatise, Εἰς ἐπιγεγραφὰς τῶν ψαλμῶν, and the Second from the Treatise, Εἰς τὰς ἐπιγεγραφὰς τῶν ἀναβαθμῶν. The 6th. Psalm which is our 5th. has for its Title in the Septuagint, Ψαλμὸς ᾠδῆς τῷ Δαβὶδ, i. e. the Inscription of a Title for David; and the 57, Τῷ Δαβὶδ εἰς στηλογραφίαν, i. e. an Inscription to David, or to David for an Inscription Στηλογραφία is properly an Inscription upon a Pillar. The Psalms 57, 58, and 59. have the like titles. The Treatise which Theodoret cites in this place, Εἰς ἐπιγεγραφὰς στηλογραφίας, was compos'd upon these Inscriptions; as the Second, Εἰς τὰς ἐπιγεγραφὰς τῶν ἀναβαθμῶν, was compos'd upon the Inscriptions of the Psalms of Degrees. St. Gregory Nyssen has since made a Treatise upon the Inscriptions of the Psalms. This Observation I owe to the Learned Cotelerius.

(l) All the Passages of Eustathius, reported by Theodoret.] In the Passages cited from the First & Second Dialogue, he asserts, That Christ had a Body and Soul of the same Substance with ours, and there he calls the Flesh of Christ, the Temple in which the Divinity dwelt. He observes in the last passage of his second Dialogue, that Christ had no need of the legal Sacrifices to purifie himself, because he purifies himself, and sanctifies all things; but he voluntarily submitted to the Law, to deliver us from that Bondage, us who were enslav'd under, and liable to the Malediction of Sin: In the Passages recited out of the last Dialogue, he proves, That the divinity of Jesus Christ was not subject to any Pains or Sufferings but only his Humanity: There he affirms, That Jesus Christ had a Soul, That he truly suffer'd, though voluntarily; and that the Word dwelling in the Body of the Man as in a Temple, restor'd by the Resurrection that temple which Death had destroy'd. In a word, he shows, that all the Properties of the Humane and Divine Nature were found in Christ; but that we must not attribute to the Divinity that which agrees only to the Humanity, or deny because of his Divinity, the Properties which agree only to the Humane Nature.

(m) The Treatise of Eustathius concerning the Pythoniss.] 'Tis entituled in Greek, Εἰς τὸ τὸν ἐγγαστρίμυθον, in Latin, De ventriloquo, which cannot be rendred in English, but by a Circumlocution; that is to say The Discourse which those Pronounce who have a Devil in their Belly. To understand this, we must observe that the Ancients believ'd, That the Dæmon which the Pagans honour'd under the Name of the God Python, entred into the Bowels of the Priests and Priestesses, and by strange agitations excited in them a kind of Fury, which made them say many things which were taken for Predictions: For which reason the women that profess'd to divine things to come, were call'd Pythonisses. Such was she, to whom Saul address'd himself for consulting Samuel, whose History is the Subject of this Dissertation, and therefore I have entituled it, Concerning the Pythoniss.

Kings,

Euſtathius of Antioch.

Kings, Ch. 28. did really bring back the Soul of Samuel into this World to ſpeak unto Saul? Euſtathius maintains the Negative againſt Origen, who had taught the Affirmative in one of his Homilies: And after he has related in a pleaſant manner all the Circumſtances of the Hiſtory, he refutes the Explication of Origen. He lays it down for a Principle, that the Devil cannot bring back Souls from the other World: He ſays, It is ridiculous to give him this Authority over the Souls of the Juſt, and that there is none but God only who is Lord over them. He demands of Origen, Whether the Witch made Samuel appear in body and Soul together, or if ſhe only brought back his Soul; and then he ſhews, that neither the one, nor the other is probable. He rallies Origen for attributing to the Holy Spirit the Words which the Witch pronounc'd when ſhe was acted by an Evil Spirit. He maintains that Saul did not at all ſee the Ghoſt of Samuel, but only was aſtoniſh'd with the extraordinary Speeches, and violent Motions of the Witch, and therefore caſt himſelf down upon the Ground to worſhip. He proves, That 'tis contrary to common ſence, to ſay, as Origen does, That the Gods which the Witch ſays ſhe ſaw aſcending out of the Earth, were the Souls of the Juſt and the Angels: He obſerves, that the Prediction of the Pythoniſs was found to be falſe; and tho' it had been true, it would not therefore follow, that it was from the Holy Spirit, ſince the Devil has often made ſuch like Predictions, which Chance and the Circumſtances of things, that are known to him, have ſometimes verified. He does alſo make it appear from the Circumſtances of this Prediction, That it was an Impoſture of the Devil, and that it cannot be attributed to the Holy Spirit, without ſome kind of Impiety. After this, he anſwers the chief Objection of Origen, taken from the Scripture, which gives the Name of Samuel to that Apparition: To which he ſays, That he was aſtoniſh'd at an Author, who durſt explain the whole Scripture Allegorically, treat as a Fable the Hiſtory of Moſes concerning the Terreſtrial Paradiſe, and give Myſtical Sences to all the Hiſtories of the Old Teſtament, that he ſhould endeavour to put off for Truth, the Fictions of a Woman acted by an evil Spirit. He ſhews, That when the Scripture gives the Name of Samuel to this apparition, 'tis not to be underſtood as if Samuel himſelf in Body and Soul were there; but only that this Woman made him believe by the Repreſentation which ſhe gave Saul of this Spectre, that this was the Prophet Samuel whom he deſir'd to conſult. In ſhort, he demonſtrates from all the Circumſtances of this Story, That there was nothing real in this Apparition; but that it was only an Apparition repreſented in the imagination of Saul and this Propheteſs, by the Devil which poſſeſs'd them. This is the Sentiment which Euſtathius confirms in this Diſſertation, which is ſhort, beautiful and very cloſe; for as he ſays nothing ſuperfluous, ſo he omits no Proof which might be of Advantage to his Opinion. There appear in it much Learning and a well-poiz'd Judgment, and one may venture to ſay, That there are few Works of this nature in all Antiquity ſo perfect as this Diſcourſe. Yet I think, he has treated Origen a little too harſhly, in a Queſtion that does not at all belong to Religion, but is purely Critical. To conclude, The Opinion of Euſtathius is ſince his time grown the more common Opinion (n), and I muſt confeſs, that 'tis more probable than the other, tho' I cannot affirm any thing for certain in this Matter.

We cannot give any Judgment ſo much to the Advantage of that Commentary upon the work of the Six Days, or the Hexameron which bears the Name of Euſtathius, publiſh'd by the ſame Allatius; but on the contrary, 'tis a Work altogether unworthy of a Man of his Senſe, and which cannot be attributed to Euſtathius, without doing him great Diſhonour; and there is no probability that it was his. For Firſt, Not only St. Jerom and Theodoret make no mention of it, but it is not found cited by any Author. Secondly, It is an ill contriv'd Collection of Paſſages out of Euſebius, St. Baſil, the Old Teſtiment, Joſephus, Artapanus, the Goſpel falſly aſcrib'd to St. James, and many other Authors. Thirdly, The Stile is perfectly different from that of his Diſſertation concerning the Pythoniſs, and the Fragments of Euſtathius's Sermons. Fourthly, The things treated of in this book, do not at all ſuit with the Genius of Euſtathius, for in his Diſſertation concerning the Pythoniſs, he reproves Origen for ſtudying to make too many uſeleſs Remarks and Allegories in explaining the Scriptures, while he neglects the literal ſence of them, and the Moral Reflections that ſhould be made upon them: Now this Treatiſe upon the Hexameron, is almoſt wholly compos'd of ſuch unprofitable Remarks, which

(n) The Opinion of Euſtathius is ſince his time grown the more common Opinion.] St. Juſtin in his Dialogue againſt Tryphon, is of the ſame Opinion with Origen, and concludes, That all Souls, even thoſe of the Juſt, fall under the Power of Dæmons: But Tertullian is of Euſtathius's Opinion, in his Book of the Soul, Ch. 57. where he ſays expreſly, That we muſt not believe that it was the Soul of Samuel which the Pythoniſs brought back from the other World; but that 'twas only a Cheat of the Devil. Since Euſtathius's time, there are but few Authors of Origen's Opinion, excepting Sulpitius Severus. St. Auſtin makes a Problem of this Queſtion, in his Letter to Simplicianus, but he inclines to Euſtathius's ſide. Eucherus, Bede, St. Anſelm, Rabanus and St. Thomas, follow St Auſtin. Theodoret and ſome others, have ſaid, That God form'd this Apparition of Samuel, or that he made an Angel appear under the form of Samuel. St. Baſil is of Euſtathius's Opinion in his Commentary upon Ch 8. of Iſaiah; but he ſeems to approve the contrary Opinion in his Letter to Euſtathius the Phyſician. St. Gregory Nazianzen touches both theſe Opinions in his firſt Oration againſt Julian. But Gregory Nyſſen, in a Letter written on this Subject, expreſly refutes the Opinion of Origen, and proves that of Euſtathius. 'Tis no wonder that Methodius and St. Jerom condemn Origen's Opinion, but 'tis ſurprizing that Philaſtrius has tax'd it of Hereſy, Hæreſ. 28. The Author of the Queſtion aſcrib'd to St. Auſtin, Queſt. 52. The Author of the Queſtions concerning the wonderful things in Scripture, B II. Ch. 2. and of the Queſtions of the Old and New Teſtament attributed to St. Auſtin, Queſt. 26. Iſidore, B. VIII. Ch. 8. of his Origines, Zonaras Hiſt. Tom. 1. Syncellus in his Chronicle, and many others, approve the Opinion of Euſtathius. The modern Commentators, are much divided about it: And indeed, the Opinion of Origen may better be maintain'd when 'tis ſuppos'd, That 'twas by the Permiſſion of God, and not by the Power of the Devil, that the Pythoniſs brought back the Soul of Samuel; and ſo it ſeems to be more agreeable to the Letter of Scripture; but the other is more rational, and explains the Matter in Diſpute more naturally.

concern neither Religion nor Manners. Fifthly, This Author begins with an Extract out of the Chronicon of Eusebius, concerning the Antiquity of Moses, and then repeats the first Verses of Genesis, from whence he takes occasion to make a particular Enumeration of all the different sorts of Plants, Herbs, Trees, Fishes, Birds and Beasts; and to discourse of their Nature and Properties, saying many things very fabulous of them: After this, he makes a very imperfect Abridgment of the History of Genesis, adding many Circumstances to it taken out of Josephus. He makes a Digression concerning the Genealogy of Jesus Christ, in which he copies out a passage of Africanus, and then gives an Abridgment of the Fables which are in the Proto Evangelium of St. James, concerning the Virgin, St. Joseph, Joachim, and Zachary. Afterwards he resumes the Continuation of his Abridgment of History, which goes as far as the End of Joshua's Government, being nothing else but Extracts out of the Books of Scripture, and the History of Josephus; whereby it appears, that there is neither Order nor Design in all this work, and that 'tis nothing else but a heap of Passages confusedly jumbled together by a Man of no Learning or Judgment: which cannot be said of Eustathius of Antioch, who was a very Learn'd, Judicious and Eloquent Man, as any one may easily perceive by his Dissertation, and the Fragments we have of his Works. Allatius has no proof that this Work is Eustathius's of Antioch, under whose Name he has publish'd it; but he endeavours to prove, that it was made by some ancient Author, because in speaking of the End of the World, he maintains that it will not continue above 6000 Years, and in giving the Chronology of Time already past, he does not go beyond the 30th. Year of Constantine. But this proof is not at all convincing, for 'tis probable, that this Author has taken what he says in those places from one of the Ancients, without adding any thing of his own: But suppose he were the Author of what is related concerning the End of the World, may not an Impostor affect to speak so, on purpose to make us believe that his Work was Ancient? Be it as it will, there is no manner of probability that it was written by Eustathius of Antioch.

Eustathius of Antioch.

I shall not now commend this Bishop for his Zeal in defending the Faith, his invincible Constancy, his Wisdom, and singular Moderation, which appear'd in suffering patiently the reproachful Accusation, wherewith his Enemies charg'd him, and the unjust Deposition which they pronounc'd against him; but shall content my self to consider him as an Author, and observe with Sozomen, Hist. B. II. Ch. 19. that he had acquired a rare Eloquence, As appears, says he, by his Works, which are most worthy of Commendation, as well for the ancient Purity of Style, as the Sublimity of Thought, the Beauty of Expression, and the Curiosity of his Discourses. These rare Qualities of this good Writer appear in his Dissertation of the Pythonists, and in his Fragments set down by Theodoret, which confirm the Judgment that Sozomen gives of this Author. I have not seen any other Edition in Greek and Latin of his Works, but that which we have already spoken of, Printed at Lyons by Durandus in Quarto, in the Year 1629.

PETER of Alexandria.

PETER of Alexandria had his Head cut off (a) for the Faith, by the Commandment of the Emperour Maximinus, in the Ninth Year of Diocletian's Persecution, that's to say, in the Year 311 from the Birth of Christ: We have the Acts of his Martyrdom; but since they do not agree with the Ecclesiastical History of that Time, we ought not to give much credit to them (b). Though St. Jerom and others, who have given an Account of Ecclesiastical Writers, do not place this Bishop among

Peter of Alexandria.

(a) Had his Head cut off.] Baronius sets down the Martyrdom of Peter at the Year 310; but Eusebius says, in two places of his History. That he Suffer'd the 9th. Year of the Persecution, which is 311. according to the vulgar Æra: The Author of the Chronicon Alexandrinum follows Eusebius. Baronius cites for himself, Ch. 13. of the Eighth Book of Eusebius, where Peter is numbred amongst the Martyrs; but in this place of his History, he does not reckon up the Martyrs in order of time, but only Discourses of many famous Bishops and Martyrs.

(b) We ought not to give much credit to them.] These Acts were publish'd by Surius, and afterwards in Greek by Combefis: But they neither agree with the History of the Time, nor with that of Peter. 1. This Author says in two places, that Peter died under Diocletian, which is false; since this Emperour abdicated the Empire a long time before the Year 311. 2. Eusebius says, That Peter was seiz'd, and executed upon the spot. These Acts suppose that he was a long time in Prison, and that he must have written of it to the Emperour who was at Nicomedia. 3. He places amongst the Bishops of Alexandria, one Milius, when, in truth, there was never a one of that Name. 4. He places Heraclas after Dionysius and Maximus, though he certainly preceded them. 5. He feigns that Heraclas had Disputes with Origen, when there was never any such thing. 6. He says, That the Body of Peter was carried into the Church of Theonas, which was built by Alexander the Successor of Achillas, who came after Peter to the See of Alexandria. In short, he relates, that Arius was Excommunicated by Peter of Alexandria, because of his Impious Doctrine: But the Ancients say not a word of this Excommunication, neither does Alexander, nor St. Athanasius object it to Arius: And indeed can there be any probability, that Achillas should receive Arius if he had been Excommunicated by Peter? Especially, if it be true which is related in those Acts, that Peter advertis'd Achillas and Alexander, that he had seen a Vision, wherein he was given to understand, that Arius should rend in pieces the Church of Jesus Christ. Besides, we read no-where that Arius publish'd his impious Doctrine before the Pontificate of Alexander, and therefore if he had been Excommunicated by Peter, it must have been for some other cause. There are found indeed in a Treatise of Justinian against Origen, some words ascrib'd to Peter of Alexandria, which are much like those that are found in those Acts; but besides that, they are not altogether the same, Justinian is neither so Ancient, nor of so great Authority, as to counter-balance the Reasons which we have alledg'd.

Peter of Alexandria.

them; yet he certainly wrote ſome things. There is in the Council of Epheſus, a paſſage or two about the Incarnation, taken out of his Book about the Divinity. Juſtinian in his Edict to Menna againſt Origen, quotes two paſſages of Peter of Alexandria: The Firſt out of a Homily againſt Pre-exiſtence of Souls; The Second out of a Myſtagogical Diſcourſe compoſed by him a little before his Martyrdom, this is very remarkable: I exhort you, ſays this holy Martyr, to watch, for you ſhall once more be in Affliction; you know how the Heathens cauſed S. Thomas my Father and my Biſhop, who bred me up, and my Predeceſſor in this See, to ſuffer. Would to God I had alſo been his Succeſſor in Holineſs too. You know the Perſecution which the great Saint Dionyſius endured, and how he was obliged to hide himſelf, and to be continually changing the place of his Abode, whilſt the Heretick Sabellius tormented him in another manner: What ſhall I ſay of the holy Biſhops Heraclas and Demetrius? What Tribulations did not they endure from Origen, who ſow'd Diviſions in their Church, and who cauſed Diſturbances there which are not yet quieted? And we have in Balſamon in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and in the laſt Edition of the Councils, the Canons which are ſaid to be drawn out of one of his Diſcourſes upon Penance. Theſe were written in the Fourth Year of the Perſecution in 306, about the Feaſt of Eaſter; for they begin with theſe words, [Seeing this is the Fourth Eaſter ſince the beginning of the Perſecution.] In theſe Canons, he regulates the time of Penance. In the firſt, he ordains, That thoſe who after long Reſiſtance had at laſt laps'd, being conquer'd by the Severity of Torments, and had been under Penance for Three Years, ſhould after Forty Days not be receiv'd into Communion; during which time, he exhorts them to watch and pray. In the Second, he adds, yet another Year of Penance for thoſe who had faln without enduring Torments, only to deliver themſelves from Priſon. In the Third, he brings an inſtance from the Parable of the Fig-Tree, to impoſe Four Years Penance upon thoſe who had voluntarily faln into Idolatry, without being put in Priſon. In the Fourth, he deplores the unhappineſs of thoſe that are altogether deſperate, and do no Penance at all. In the Fifth, he limits their Penance to Six Months, who had pretended, that they had offer'd unto Idols, or that they had approach'd their Altars, or given up their Names; or had ſent Pagans to offer in their ſtead. In the Sixth he obſerves, That there were ſome that ſent thither their Slaves, though they were Chriſtians; and in the Seventh Canon he impoſes upon them Three Years of Penance, but upon the Slaves one Year only. In the Eighth, he ſays, That 'tis but juſt to make them Partakers of the Communion of the Body and Blood of Chriſt, of the Prayers of the Church and the Word of God, who after they had been once vanquiſh'd, return'd again to the Combate, and were committed to Priſon: or thoſe who ſuffer'd Torments, after they had confeſs'd the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt. In the Ninth Canon, he blames their Conduct, who expoſe themſelves indiſcreetly to Danger, and by this means bring Perſecution upon themſelves and their Brethren. He proves by the Example of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, that their Conduct is very much to be blam'd; and yet he thinks we ought not to refuſe the Communion to thoſe who thus raſhly expoſe themſelves to Temptation, becauſe they do it in the Name of Chriſt. In the 10th. Canon, he ordains, That the Clergy who had laps'd, ſhould be depriv'd of their Miniſtry, and content themſelves with Lay-Communion, which is not to be deny'd them. In the 11th. Canon, he adviſes to treat them with Meekneſs, and receive thoſe Chriſtians into Communion, who having expos'd themſelves to Martyrdom for the Encouragement of others by their Example, had at laſt faln by the Cruelty of their Torments. In the 12th. he ſays, That thoſe who had given Money to deliver themſelves from Torments, were free from Sin in ſo doing, and moreover praiſes their Conduct. In the 13th. he makes an Apology for thoſe that fled to avoid Perſecution, and juſtifies their Carriage by many Examples. In the 14th. he ſays, That they ought to be plac'd in the Rank of Confeſſors, who had been forc'd againſt their wills to taſte of Meats offer'd unto Idols. The laſt Canon has no connexion with the former, for there he approves the Faſts of Wedneſday and Friday, [On which, he ſays, we are enjoyn'd to Faſt, according to Tradition; On Wedneſday, becauſe on that Day the Jews took up a Reſolution to deliver up Jeſus to Death; and on Friday, becauſe he ſuffer'd on that Day for us: But as to the Lord's-Day, that's a Day of Rejoycing, becauſe on that Day Jeſus Chriſt was rais'd from the Dead, and therefore we do not Kneel on that Day at our Prayers.] Of all the Canons of Antiquity concerning the Penance of the Lapſed, there are none more Judicious or more Equitable than thoſe we have now deſcrib'd. There appears in them a Wiſdom and Prudence that's altogether ſingular, in tempering the rigour of Puniſhment by a reaſonable Moderation; without which, Juſtice would be weakned by too much Indulgence. He examines carefully all the Circumſtances which might augment or diminiſh the quality of the Crime; and as he does not lengthen out Penance by too ſevere Methods, ſo neither does he deceive the Sinner by too remiſs an Eaſineſs. 'Tis probable, that about the time when thoſe Canons were compos'd, Peter of Alexandria depos'd Melitius Biſhop of Egypt, being convicted of Idolatry, who was afterwards the Author of the Sect of the Melitians; as Athanaſius reports in his Second Apology.

ALEXANDER Biſhop of Alexandria.

Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria.

AFter the Death of Peter Biſhop of Alexandria, who ſuffer'd Martyrdom in the 9th. Year of the Perſecution begun by Dioclesian, Achillas was choſen in his room to the See of Alexandria. Alexander, of whom we now write, Succeeded this Achillas in the Year 321, if we follow the Teſtimony of St. Jerom; or according to others, towards the Year 315. He oppos'd the Hereſie of Arius vigorouſly, and endeavour'd to ſtifle it in its Birth, by Excommunicating him who was the Author of it, and his Followers. This he did in a Council aſſembled into the City of Alexandria for that purpoſe. But Arius and thoſe of his Faction, having found ſome Biſhops that receiv'd them into their Communion, though they were Condemn'd by their Biſhop, Alexander complains in a Letter which he wrote to his Fellow-Biſhops, which is related by Theodoret, Ch. 4. of the Firſt Book of his Hiſtory; wherein he deſcribes the Troubles that were caus'd in the Church by Arius and his Faction, he lays open their Heretical Doctrine, and obſerves that they had withdrawn to ſome Biſhops who had received them into their Communion, and ſign'd Letters in their Favour, becauſe they diſguis'd their true Sentiments, and conceal'd the Poiſon of their corrupt Doctrine. He reprehends the Conduct of thoſe Biſhops, and accuſes them of having violated the Canon of the Apoſtles, by Patronizing the Actions of thoſe who deny'd the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt. Afterwards he refutes the impious Opinion of the Arians, and proves from Teſtimonies of Scripture, That the Word was not a Creature made of Nothing, but that he ſubſiſted from all Eternity, and is equal to his Father, being of the ſame Nature with him, and that there never was a time when the Son of God was not, and that the Father was always a Father. After having thus Eſtabliſh'd the Divinity of the Son of God by moſt convincing Proofs drawn from the holy Scriptures, he proceeds to the Explication of the Articles contain'd in the Creed, concerning the Holy Spirit, the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, and the Reſurrection of the Dead. He obſerves that Jeſus Chriſt had a real Body, and not an imaginary one, that he was Crucified and was dead; but his Divinity ſuffer'd nothing. He adds, That this is the Doctrine of the Apoſtolick Church, for which he is ready to die; and ſays, that Arius and Achillas were caſt out, becauſe they taught another Doctrine: wherefore he exhorts his Fellow-Biſhops to avoid them, and to joyn with him to repreſs their Inſolence. After all, he prays them to ſend him their Letters approving what he had done, and concludes his Letter with the Names of thoſe Hereticks whom he had Condemn'd and caſt out of the Church.

When the Biſhops who maintain'd Arius wrote alſo on their Side in his favour, Alexander found himſelf oblig'd to write again a large Letter on this Subject to all the Biſhops in the World, which is ſet down by Socrates and Theodoret, Ch. 6. of the Firſt Book of their Hiſtory. I know very well, that 'tis commonly thought that this Letter was written immediately after the Excommunication of Arius, before that which is in the Fourth Chapter of Theodoret: But this is a miſtake, ſince this Letter was written at the time when Euſebius of Nicomedia was fully declar'd a Patron of Arius. Wherefore Alexander having obſerv'd in this Letter, That ſince the Catholick Church was but one Body, and all the Biſhops were oblig'd to preſerve Peace in it, It was expedient, that they ſhould reciprocally advertiſe one another of what happen'd in each Dioceſs; to the end, that when one Member was afflicted, all the reſt ſhould mourn, or elſe rejoice together with it. " After he had begun his Letter " with this handſom Reflexion, he adds, That he had once a deſign to have buried this Diſorder in " Silence; but ſince Euſebius had taken upon him the Patronage of theſe Apoſtates, and had written " on all hands in their favour, he thought himſelf oblig'd to break Silence, and to give Notice to all " the World of this New Error, and to hinder his Fellow-Biſhops from giving credit to the Letters " which Euſebius might have written. After this, he inſerts the Names of theſe Hereticks, lays open " their Error, and refutes it in a few words. He ſays, That their Impiety was the cauſe why they were thrown out of the Church and ſmitten with an Anathema; and though he acknowledges that he was ſenſibly troubled for their loſs, yet he muſt not wonder that ſuch falſe Teachers ſhould ariſe and corrupt the Faith and Doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt, ſince we are forewarn'd of them by Chriſt and his Apoſtle.

Theſe Two Letters of Alexander were ſharp and vehement; wherein he purſues Arius and his Party vigorouſly, and having repreſented their Doctrine after ſuch a manner, as diſcovers all that's odious in it, he diſputes againſt it by many ſolid Arguments, and writes to his Fellow-Biſhops with great Aſſurance, and yet with due reſpect. In ſhort, one may ſay, That theſe Letters are the beſt in their kind.

Cotelerius has alſo publiſh'd a Letter, or a Paſtoral Advertiſement of Alexander to his Prieſts of Egypt and Mareotis, written after theſe Two Letters, in which he tells them, That tho' they had ſubſcrib'd to the Firſt Paſtoral Advertiſement which he had addreſs'd to Arius and thoſe of his Faction, wherein he exhorted them to return from their Impiety, and make Profeſſion of the Catholick Faith; yet he thought it ſtill neceſſary once more to Aſſemble the Clergy of Alexandria and Mareotis, to ſhew them the Letter which he had written to all the Biſhops ſince the firſt Condemnation of the Arians, and to give them Notice, that Carus and Piſtus Prieſts, Serapion, Potamon, Zoſimus and Irenæus, Deacons, having join'd themſelves to the other Arians, were depos'd. He demands their Conſent and Approbation, becauſe, ſays he, 'tis reaſonable that ye ſhould know what I have written, and imprint it in your Minds, as if you your ſelves had written it. This Monument of Antiquity, gives us to underſtand, That according to the Diſcipline of the Church of Alexandria, which was agreeable to that of other Churches, the Biſhop of that great See, held Synods of his Prieſts or Curates not only of thoſe that were in the City, but alſo of thoſe that were in the Country, and that he would do nothing without the Conſent and Approbation of his Clergy.

The Cauſe of Arius being afterwards carried into the Council of Nice, Alexander aſſiſted there, and held one of the Chief Places, as appears by the Council's Letter, to the Alexandrians, wherein they ſay, That he was Head of the Council and had a great Hand in all its Deciſions. He liv'd but five Months after this Council, and left Athanaſius Succeſſor to his See, and to his Zeal againſt the Arians.

St. ATHANASIUS.

St. Athanaſius.

ST. Athanaſius was born at Alexandria (a), but the preciſe Year of his Birth is not certainly known, neither do the Ancients tell us any thing of his Kindred (b). He was ſo young during the Perſecution of Dioclefian and Maximian, that when he ſpeaks of it, he does not ſay, that he had ſeen what he ſays, but only that he learn'd it of his Fathers (c). We know nothing either of his Infancy, or Education. Ruffinus, indeed, tells us, That St. Athanaſius being yet a Child, and playing with other Children, imitated the Ceremonies of the Church, and baptiz'd his Comrades; and that St. Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria, perceiving it, and having enquir'd the manner in which they were baptiz'd, he approv'd the Baptiſm, and from that time, deſign'd St. Athanaſius for the Clergy. But this Story, which, beſides its being ſo very improbable, cannot agree with the Age of St. Athanaſius, paſſes among Learned Men, rather for a Fable than a Truth (d). St. Gregory Nazianzen, aſſures us, in his Panegyrick on St. Athanaſius, that this Saint applied himſelf but a ſhort while to the profane Sciences, and proceeded quickly to the Study of the holy Scriptures. Afterwards he entred into the Clergy, and diſcharg'd his Function, when he was in Orders, with general Approbation, according to the Obſervation of Theodoret. He was particularly taken Notice of by Alexander his Biſhop, whom he accompanied to the Council of Nice, being then but a Deacon, and yet the firſt of the Deacons of his Church. He oppos'd there the Hereſy of Arius, and 'tis believ'd likewiſe, that he maintain'd a Diſputation againſt the Hereticks. When he return'd again to the City of Alexandria, Alexander caſt his Eyes upon him to make him his Succeſſor. Apollinarius, ſays, in a Paſſage related by Sozomen, *B.*II.*Ch.*17. of his Hiſtory, That St. Athanaſius fled to avoid being choſen Biſhop, and that Alexander being near his Death, did ſeveral times call for him. After the Death of this Biſhop, he was choſen Biſhop of Alexandria, in the beginning of the Year 326 (e), by the common Voice of all the People, and ordain'd by the Biſhops of Egypt, Libya and Pentapolis aſſembled in the City of Alexandria. This is the Teſtimony which the Biſhops of theſe Provinces give of his Ordination in a Synodical Letter reported by St. Athanaſius; Apol. 2. p. 726, where at the ſame time they refute the Calumny of the Arians, who ſaid, That Athanaſius was privately Ordain'd by ſeven Biſhops againſt the Will of all the reſt. The Arians and the Biſhops which Patroniz'd them, aſſoon as they ſaw St. Athanaſius their Adverſary promoted to this See, look'd upon this Promotion as a great Obſtacle to their Deſigns, and therefore reſolv'd to drive him out of the Church. And that they might execute this Deſign the more eaſily, they join'd with the Schiſmaticks call'd Meletians, (or rather (f) Melitians) becauſe they had follow'd the Party of an Egyptian Biſhop call'd Meletius or Melitius, who being depos'd in a Synod by Peter of Alexandria, for having Sacrific'd to Idols (g), ſeparated himſelf from the Church, and made a conſiderable Faction in Egypt.

(a) At Alexandria.] He was a Clergy-man of this Church, and the Clergy were commonly of that Place where they diſcharg'd their Office; but beſides this Conjecture, 'tis plain alſo that he was originally of Alexandria by the Letter of Conſtantius, who recalling him from his Exile, ſays that he would reſtore him to his own Country, &c. Apol. 2. p. 769, 770. and he takes his Country and Church for the ſame thing. Orat. 1. contr. Ar.

(b) Of his Kindred.] The Greek Author of his Life, who is very late, ſays that they were very noble and of great Piety; but he gives us no Name, nor cites any Author to warrant his groundleſs Aſſertion: His Aunt was a Catholick, and died during the Tyranny of Gregory, Ep. ad Solit. p. 817. You may ſee in a Latin Letter of this Saint related at the end of Lucifer's Works, that during his Perſecution, he had not the Liberty to ſee his Parents, which may be underſtood of his Father and Mother, according to the proper Signification of the Latin Word.

(c) But only that he learn'd it of his Fathers.] In his Letter ad Solitar p. 855. I heard from my Fathers, that the Perſecution was rais'd under Maximian Grandfather to Conſtantius.

(d) Rather for a Fable than a Truth.] 1. This Story of Children baptiz'd by Athanaſius, does not at all agree with the Diſcipline of the Church of Alexandria upon the Subject of Rebaptization, and 'tis a thing unheard of that it ſhould be approv'd of, or that any could approve a Baptiſm of this Nature, as Alexander of Alexandria is ſuppos'd to have done. 2. It does not agree with the Age of St. Athanaſius, for Alexander was not ordain'd Biſhop of Alexandria, according to the Teſtimony of St Jerom, untill the Year 321. and St. Athanaſius being ordain'd Biſhop in 326. was not, in this Interval, of an Age to play ſuch little Pranks. And though it were ſuppos'd, againſt the Authority of St. Jerom, that Alexander was ordain'd in 315, this would not remove the Difficulty; for it cannot be ſaid, that St. Athanaſius play'd at this Sport when he was above 10. or 12. Years old, from whence it would follow that he was ordain'd Biſhop at the 25. or 27*th.* Year of his Age, which is not very probable.

(e) In the Beginning of the Year 326.] Alexander died five Months after the Council of Nice, and St. Athanaſius ſucceeded him immediately. St. Epiphanius ſays in Hæreſ. 68. and 69. that Achillas was choſen by the Catholicks after the Death of Alexander, and Theonas by the Melitians, and that Athanaſius was ordain'd three Months after: But all this Story is fabulous, becauſe Achillas was Biſhop of Alexandria before Alexander, and all Hiſtorians teſtify that St. Athanaſius ſucceeded Alexander immediately; and St. Athanaſius ſays as much expreſly in his 2*d* Apology.

(f) Or rather Melitians.] Their Leader is call'd by all the Ancients Μελίτιος, and never Μελέτιος.

(g) For having ſacrific'd to Idols.] St. Athanaſius teſtifies, that this was the Occaſion of the Schiſm of Melitius, which is much more credible than what St. Epiphanius reports to be the Origin of this Schiſm, after a fabulous manner, being deceiv'd by the Memoirs of ſome Melitians.

Thus

Thus the Biſhops that favour'd Arius, not being able to perſuade St. Athanaſius to receive him into his Communion, no more than his followers, tho' Euſebius had written him a threatning Letter to that purpoſe, did for that reaſon accuſe him of laying a New Tax upon all the Linen or Woollen Veſtments of the Egyptians, for the uſe of the Church of Alexandria; and deputed Iſion, Eudemon, and Callinicus, Melitian Biſhops, to carry this Accuſation to the Emperour. But Alipius and Macarius, Prieſts of Alexandria, being then at Court when this Accuſation was brought againſt St. Athanaſius, defended him, and demonſtrated his Innocence to the Emperour Conſtantine, who thereupon wrote to Athanaſius to come and appear before him. At that time Euſebius of Nicomedia, being reſolv'd at any rate to ruin St. Athanaſius at Court, caus'd theſe three Informers to ſtay there, who invented new Accuſations, alledging that the Prieſt Macarius had broken a Sacred Chalice by Athanaſius's Order, and that Athanaſius himſelf had conſpir'd againſt the Emperour, by ſending a Cheſt full of Gold to Philumenus who deſign'd to Uſurp the Empire. But the Emperour himſelf having examin'd this Accuſation in one of their Suburbs of Nicomedia, call'd Pſammathie, declar'd St. Athanaſius Innocent of thoſe Crimes, and ſent him back to Alexandria with a very obliging Letter in his favour. This was done in the Year 331. The Enemies of St. Athanaſius not reſting ſatisfied with this Judgment, the next Year renew'd the Accuſation of the Chalice broken by Macarius, founded upon the Depoſition of one Iſchyras who call'd himſelf a Prieſt, altho' he was ordain'd by Collythus, who was not truly a Biſhop, and therefore had not Power to give him a valid Ordination. Iſchyras had dwelt at Mareotis, a Country of Egypt, where there was neither Biſhop nor Suffragan, but only a great many Pariſhes govern'd by Prieſts. He had one of theſe Churches, which Athanaſius underſtanding, ſent Macarius to forbid him when he viſited his Dioceſs, to Celebrate the Divine Myſteries, and to execute any part of the Sacerdotal Function. This gave the occaſion of accuſing Macarius, that he had broken one of the Sacred Chalices, altho' he found Iſchyras out of the Church and in his Bed. But to render St. Athanaſius more odious, they accuſe him of having put Arſenius to Death, who was Biſhop of Hipſelz in Thebais, and of the Faction of the Melitians. The Emperour who had already examin'd the firſt Accuſation, (which was likewiſe confounded by the Letter of Iſchyras, who acknowledg'd, that he was forc'd to invent this Calumny,) did not take any further notice of that Article, but wrote to Dalmatius, to enquire into the ſecond Accuſation, concerning the Murder of Arſenius. This oblig'd St. Athanaſius to ſearch every-where for this Biſhop whom the Melitians had hid in the Monaſteries at their Devotion: And at laſt, he was found at Tyre, where he was made known before Paul the Biſhop. Then St. Athanaſius having given notice to Conſtantine, that his Accuſers were convicted of an Impoſture, the Emperour wrote to Dalmatius, to ſtop all further Proceſs, and ſent a very obliging Letter to St. Athanaſius, wherein he exhorts him to Moderation, condemns the Rage of the Melitians, and promiſes him Protection. But for all this, the Arian Faction loſt not their Courage, nor did they ceaſe to contrive ſtill new Accuſations againſt him: Whereupon the Emperour being tormented with their continual Importunity, thought fit to call a Council, to put an end to all theſe Differences; which he order'd to meet at Cæſarea, in Paleſtine, where St. Athanaſius was Summon'd to appear. But this Saint, perceiving that the Council was compos'd of his Enemies, would not appear there. His Abſence, irritated the Emperour againſt him, who call'd another Council to meet at Tyre, in the Year 335, and wrote to St. Athanaſius, that he ſhould not fail to come there, which he did in ſuch Terms, as might make him ſenſible, that he was not ſatisfy'd with his Conduct. St. Athanaſius was forc'd to appear there in the quality of a Criminal; but he anſwer'd the Accuſation of the Murder of Arſenius, by producing him before the Council. Ruffinus ſays, That they ſtill went on to accuſe St. Athanaſius, by a Woman of an ill Life, who was preſently convicted of being a Cheat, becauſe ſhe took for him a Deacon call'd Timotheus, who feign'd himſelf to be Athanaſius. But this Hiſtory which is ſupported by no other Authority, but that of Ruffinus, appears very doubtful, becauſe neither St. Athanaſius nor the Council of Alexandria, which relates exactly all the Calumnies and Forgeries which were invented againſt St. Athanaſius, ſay any thing of it, which they had never omitted, if it had been propos'd. There were ſome other wandring Reports alledg'd againſt him, but wanting Proof, they inſiſted upon that of the Chalice, which was ſuppos'd to be broken by Macarius; and to inquire into this Crime, they ſent Six Biſhops to Mareotis, who were very reſolute againſt St. Athanaſius, who heard many Witneſſes to this purpoſe, in ſpite of all the Proteſtations of the Clergy of Mareotis and Alexandria. In the mean time, St. Athanaſius retires, and appeals to the Emperour; but the Synod condemns and depoſes him upon the Information at Mareotis. This was no ſooner done, but a Letter was brought from the Emperour, directed to the Biſhops of the Council, to come preſently to Jeruſalem, to Celebrate the Dedication of a Church. In the mean time, St. Athanaſius arrives at Conſtantinople, and deſires Audience of the Emperour to juſtify himſelf: But this was not granted, and all that he could obtain, was an Order, wherein the Emperour ſends for the Biſhops that had condemn'd him, to come to Court, and give an Account to him of their Proceedings. But inſtead of coming in a Body, they ſent only Euſebius of Nicomedia with Five other Deputies, who without ſaying any thing of the former Accuſations fram'd againſt St. Athanaſius, accus'd him now of having threatned to hinder the Exportation of Corn from Alexandria to Conſtantinople. The Emperour was ſo provok'd by this Accuſation, that without hearing St. Athanaſius, he baniſh'd him preſently to Triers, a City in Gaul; but would not ſuffer his Biſhoprick to be fill'd.

St. Athanaſius.

After the Death of Conſtantine the Great, the Three Cæſars his Sons, Conſtantine, Conſtantius and Conſtans, permitted all the Baniſh'd Biſhops to return to their Churches. St. Athanaſius was ſent back to Alexandria with Letters from Conſtantine, after he had been a Year and ſome Months in Exile.

St. Athanaſius.

Exile (b). This Emperour praiſes St. Athanaſius in his Letter, and ſays, That his Father would not have Baniſh'd him, but that the Euſebians had a deſign upon his Life, and that he had intended to recall him before his Death. He was no ſooner return'd to Alexandria, but his ancient Enemies attack him anew: They ſay, That ſince his Return, he had ſtirr'd up Sedition in the City, and caus'd ſome Perſons to be put in Priſon, and others to be us'd harſhly: but they chiefly inſiſted upon his Depoſition by the Synod, alledging that he was incapable, according to the Canons, of returning to his Church, or performing his Epiſcopal Function, till he was reſtor'd by another Synod. They inſinuated themſelves into the favour of Conſtantius, and moreover accuſe St. Athanaſius of Selling and taking Money for the Corn, which the Emperour had given to be diſtributed among the Poor, and the Widows of Alexandria. This Accuſation drew upon St. Athanaſius a very ſharp Letter from the Emperour. And the Euſebians not contented to have Conſtantius on their ſide, would alſo have gain'd the other two Cæſars, and therefore wrote to them againſt St. Athanaſius, but they fail'd of their aim, and were refus'd. They endeavour'd alſo to render Pope Julius favourable to them, by offering him the Arbitration of all their differences with St. Athanaſius. But this Pope having accepted their offer, and Summon'd them to come to a Council, they refus'd it. In the mean time, St. Athanaſius was abſolv'd by a Synod of almoſt a Hundred Egyptian Biſhops in the Year 339, who gave an Authentick Teſtimony of his Innocence in all the Heads of his Accuſation. On the other ſide, the Euſebians aſſembled a Council at Antioch in 341, where after they had made a new Creed different from that of Nice, they reſolv'd to ſend a Biſhop to Alexandria: for which end, they firſt pitched upon Euſebius of Emeſa; but he refuſing, they choſe one Gregory, and went to find out the Emperour, and pray'd that this Gregory might be ſent to Alexandria. St. Athanaſius having only heard of this Choice, withdrew to Rome in the Year 341 (i); where he was kindly receiv'd by Pope Julius, who admitted him to Communion, and ſent preſently Legates with Letters to Euſebius, and the other Biſhops, to cite them to Rome. But the Euſebians did not come at the day which Julius had appointed them, detain'd his Legates till the Month of January 342 (k), and ſent Gregory to Alexandria, who made himſelf Maſter of that Church by force, and uſed thoſe of Athanaſius's Party very ill. While the Euſebians thus deſolated the Church of Alexandria, the Pope held a Council at Rome in the Church of Vito the Presbyter (l), towards the end of the Year 341 (m). There all the Accuſations of the Euſebians againſt St. Athanaſius were examin'd, he himſelf was juſtified, declar'd Innocent by all the Biſhops of the Council, and continued in Eccleſiaſtical Communion: but they determin'd nothing particularly about his Reſtauration (n) to the See of Alexandria. The Eaſtern Biſhops after a long delay at laſt made anſwer, towards the Beginning of the Year 342, by the Pope's Legates whom they ſent back, excuſing themſelves becauſe of the War of the Perſians, that they could not come to Rome at the Day that he had appointed, and blaming Julius for receiving Athanaſius into Communion after he was condemn'd, and for hearing a Cauſe anew, after it had been already determin'd. This Letter was written by a Synod of Antioch, held almoſt a Year after that which we have mention'd: And that which perplexes this Part of Hiſtory to this Day, is the want of diſtinguiſhing theſe two Councils of Antioch, or the placing them at different times. Julius having received this Letter, took ſome time before he anſwer'd it, thinking that ſome-body at leaſt would come from the Eaſtern Biſhops, but no-body coming, he wrote them a long Letter (o), which is ſet down by St. Athanaſius; wherein he gives an account of all his Proceedings, and reprehends theirs with great ſharpneſs.

The Cauſe of St. Athanaſius continued in this State till the Council of Sardica, Summon'd by the Emperours in the Year 347. The Biſhops of the Eaſt and the Weſt met there; but thoſe of the Eaſt

(h) A Year and ſome Months in Exile.] Theodoret B. II. Ch. 1. ſays, that he was there two Years and four Months, but he is miſtaken; for he was ſent into Baniſhment at the End of the Year 336, and was reſtor'd again June 15. 337. before the Sons of Conſtantine had taken upon them the Title of Emperors.

(i) Withdrew to Rome in the Year 341.] Baronius makes him go in the Year 339, and ſuppoſes he was twice there; but Valeſius has very well prov'd, that he was but once there, ſince he mentions but one Voyage. When he withdrew, he had only heard of the Ordination of Gregory, and the Perſecution which was preparing againſt him and his Church, as he himſelf ſays in theſe Words, μόνον ἀκούσας.

(k) Till the Month of January 342.] For ſo it muſt be read in the Letter of Julius, and not as Baronius thought.

(l) In the Church of Vito the Presbyter.] So the Words of Julius muſt be underſtood, συνελθόντες Ἐπίσκοποι ἔνθα ὁ Βίτων πρεσβύτερος συνήγαν, which are ill-tranſlated in theſe Words, In the Church where Vito the Presbyter aſſembled them: For he did not aſſemble the Biſhops but the People, according to the common Phraſe, colligere Populum, to hold a publick Aſſembly of their People in the Church. St. Irenæus ſays, qui præterquam quod oportet colligunt, which is ſpoken of Schiſmaticks, who made Aſſemblies out of the true Church.

(m) Towards the end of the Year 341.] Valeſius thinks that the Council of Rome was not held till the Year 342, after the Return of the Legates: But Julius, ſays plainly, that the Biſhops of Italy met at the Day appointed, and that the Legates were detain'd a long time after till the Month of January, in the Year 342.

(n) They determin'd nothing particularly about his Reſtauration.] Julius and St. Athanaſius ſay expreſly, that he was only aſſur'd of that Communion which had been granted him, and that his Enemies complain'd of nothing elſe.

(o) He wrote them a long Letter.] Valeſius thinks that this Letter was written by the Council, but that cannot be; for the Pope's Legates were return'd when it was written, and they were detain'd in the Eaſt after the Day appointed for the Council, as we have already noted. It does not at all appear by this Letter, whatſoever Valeſius ſays, that the Legates were return'd when it was written: On the contrary it is evident that the Council was held on the Day prefix'd, and that the Legates were then in the Eaſt. And therefore to reconcile theſe things, it muſt be ſaid, that the Letter was written after the Council, although by Order of the Council, which had charg'd Julius to write his Deciſion, and to anſwer the 1ſt. Letter from the Eaſtern Biſhops, but not the 2d, which was not yet arriv'd.

would

would not aſſiſt at the Council, unleſs St. Athanaſius, Marcellus of Ancyra, and the other Biſhops depos'd by them, would appear as Criminals and Perſons Excommunicated, and thoſe of the Weſt would not agree to this Condition: Whereupon the former withdrew, and the latter being left alone to the number of a Hundred, or thereabouts, pronounc'd the Sentence of Abſolution of Athanaſius, of Marcellus of Ancyra, and the other Biſhops that had been condemn'd, reſtor'd them to their Dignities, and condemn'd their Principal Adverſaries; while the Biſhops of the Eaſt on the other ſide, being Aſſembled at Philippopolis, wrote againſt thoſe Biſhops whom they condemn'd and Excommunicated Julius, Hoſius and the other Zealous Partiſans of St. Athanaſius. Things being at this paſs, there was no Security for St. Athanaſius to return to the Eaſt, without the Authority of the Emperour Conſtantius, who was Lord of that part of the World, and therefore he ſtay'd then at Naiſſe, a City of Dacia, till Conſtans commanded him to come to Aquileia, and granted him his Protection. St. Athanaſius.

The Death of Gregory, which happen'd in the Year 348, came very ſeaſonable to remove the chief Obſtacle of Athanaſius's Return: For then, either becauſe Conſtantius knew his Innocence, and the Malice of his Accuſers, or becauſe he was deſir'd to do ſo by his Brother, he would not ſuffer any to be ordain'd Biſhop of Alexandria, recall'd St. Athanaſius who was gone from Aquileia to Rome, to take his Farewell, of the Church of that City and its Biſhop, and was come from thence to find out Conſtantius, and pray him to call his Enemies before him, that he might convict them in his Preſence. The Emperour would do no ſuch thing, but only ſent him back to Alexandria, with Letters directed to the Biſhops of Egypt, to the Clergy and the People of Alexandria, to which he adjoyn'd two Edicts to abrogate and annull all that had been done againſt this holy Biſhop. St. Athanaſius returning triumphantly with theſe Letters, was receiv'd even by the Biſhops that had been leſs favourable to him; and two of his greateſt Enemies, Urſacius and Valens, ſeem'd to be outwardly reconcil'd to him. The Emperour Conſtans, Athanaſius's Patron, dying in the Month of February, 350, he had ſome jealouſie leſt Conſtantius ſhould renew that Perſecution which he had already made him ſuffer. But the Emperour ſent him word, that he ſhould not trouble himſelf on that account; That he deſign'd to keep him always in his See, and forbade his Enemies to attack him. Thus Athanaſius, who was not yet entred within his Dioceſs, arriv'd there at laſt in the Month of March, 350; where he was receiv'd with the Publick Rejoycing of the Biſhops of Egypt, his Clergy, and all the People. But he enjoy'd this Repoſe but a few Years, which ſeem'd to be granted him for ever; for after the Year 354, the Emperour Conſtantius ſent a Courtier of his to the City of Alexandria with Letters to him, wherein he gives him leave to retire from Alexandria, ſuppoſing that he had deſir'd it. St. Athanaſius ſeeing that this Order was founded upon a Falſe Suppoſition, was of opinion, that he ought not for this to go out of Alexandria. Twenty ſix Months after, Diogenes comes to Alexandria, and ſpreads a Report that the Emperour had given Order to drive away St. Athanaſius from this City; but ſince Diogenes brought no Letters from the Emperour, St. Athanaſius made Anſwer, that he ſhould either ſhow him a Letter from the Emperour, commanding him to depart from Alexandria, or at leaſt, that the Governour of Egypt, or General of the Army, ſhould deliver him an Order in writing to this purpoſe. Twenty three Days after, Syrianus, General of the Army in Egypt, entered with his Souldiers into the Church, on the 27*th*. of January, 356, abus'd the Clergy, the People and the Virgins that were there aſſembled. During this Tumult, St. Athanaſius being carried out by ſome Monks, ſav'd himſelf, and retir'd into a Deſart (p). Conſtantius, underſtanding what had paſs'd, ſent an Edict to thoſe of Alexandria, wherein he approves what was done againſt St. Athanaſius, and exhorts the Youth to purſue him. The Count Heraclius publiſh'd this Edict, and encouraged ſome lewd young Men of Alexandria, who entred into the Churches, beat all thoſe they met with, tore the Veils, the Seats and the Ornaments, and broke the Epiſcopal Chair in pieces, with ſuch Violence, that none could check thoſe Diſorders; which were yet further heightned upon the Arrival of George, who was ordain'd Biſhop of Alexandria by the Enemies of St. Athanaſius. For this Man being come into the City of Alexandria ſome Days before Eaſter, entred forcibly into the Church, and caus'd all thoſe that were for St. Athanaſius to be driven away. Who meeting together in the Cœmetery and the deſart Places, for the Celebration of the Divine Myſteries on Eaſter-Day, and the following Sundays, were driven from thence and beaten by the Souldiers; nay, and ſome of them loſt their Lives. In ſhort, becauſe the Biſhops of Egypt and Libya, were all for St. Athanaſius, they drove away Eighty of them, and ſent Six into Baniſhment. Theſe Outrages were authoriz'd by the Letter which Conſtantius wrote to the Alexandrians, in which he declares againſt St. Athanaſius, and enjoins them to obey George. Thus it was impoſſible for St. Athanaſius to return into the City of Alexandria, and therefore he was forc'd to lie hid in the Deſart, where he compos'd many Books.

St. Athanaſius.

After the Death of Conſtantius, Julian the Apoſtate became Maſter of the Empire, who taking no ſide in the Diſputes of Religion that were among the Chriſtians, permitted all the exil'd Biſhops to return to their Country. It happen'd at the ſame time, that George, who had intruded himſelf into the Church of Alexandria, was kill'd in a popular Sedition in the Year 362. His Death facilitated the Return of St. Athanaſius to the City of Alexandria, and his Reſtauration to his See in that City. When he was return'd, he aſſembled a Council to regulate the manner of receiving the Arians, who had a deſire to return into the boſom of the Church, and to compoſe ſome Differences which had happen'd in the Church of Antioch. But he could not long employ himſelf for the good of the Church, for the Pagans having rendred him odious to the Emperour Julian, he ſent an Order, directed to thoſe of Alexandria, importing that Athanaſius ſhould depart from their City, becauſe he had only permitted the

(p) Retir'd into a Deſart.] Sozomen and Ruffinus ſay, that he was hid in a Ciſtern, but Athanaſius ſays, that he retir'd into a Deſart, and continued there ever after.

Exil'd

St. Athanaſius.

Exil'd Biſhops to return into their Country, but not to re-enter upon their Sees. The People of Alexandria, who lov'd St. Athanaſius extremely, ſent Deputies to the Emperour, to pray him, that he would not force him out of Alexandria: But this Meſſage only provoked the Emperour againſt him, who thereupon preſently baniſh'd him, not only from Alexandria, but alſo from all Egypt. It is ſaid alſo, That he gave Secret Orders to put him to Death. St. Athanaſius having heard this News, fled beyond the River Nile: And 'tis reported, That he was follow'd very cloſe by thoſe that were ſent to ſtop him, and he returning the ſame way that they purſu'd him, met them on the Road; but when they enquir'd if he had ſeen Athanaſius, one of his Company anſwer'd, That he was not far off, and if they would make haſte, they might overtake him; and ſo having deluded them, he return'd to Alexandria. But be this as it will, 'tis certain, That he lay conceal'd till the Reign of Jovian a Chriſtian Prince, who ſucceeded Julian. In the Year 363, this Emperour came and found him with ſome other Biſhops of Egypt, at the City of Antioch, where they held a kind of a Synod (q); and there they drew up a Letter which was addreſs'd to the Emperour, wherein they propoſe to him the Nicene Creed, as the Rule of Orthodox Faith, and condemn thoſe that denied the Divinity of the Holy Spirit.

St. Athanaſius was alſo perſecuted under the Reign of Valens, who being baptiz'd in 367, by Eudoxus, an Arian Biſhop of Conſtantinople, made an Edict, wherein he ordains, That all the Biſhops that had been depos'd under Conſtantius, ſhould be forc'd away from their Sees. The Governour of Egypt having receiv'd this Edict, prepar'd to put it in Execution againſt St. Athanaſius, but was hindred by the People. In the mean time, this Saint fearing leſt he ſhould be ſeiz'd, (as they really intended to do afterwards) and ſeeing the Commotions of the People appeas'd, retir'd to the Country into the Sepulchre of his Fathers, and lay there conceal'd for the ſpace of Four Months; but Valens was oblig'd to recall him. We are inform'd by the 47*th*. Letter of St. Baſil, That at this time St. Athanaſius had ſome Difference with the Governour of Libya, whom he Excommunicated; but we know nothing of the occaſion of this Quarrel. At laſt, St. Athanaſius, after ſo many Revolutions and Perſecutions, did happily end the courſe of this troubleſome Life, in the Year 373 of Jeſus Chriſt (r), after he had been Biſhop of Alexandria more than 48 Years. And thus I have given you in a few words the Hiſtory of this Saint, taken out of his own Works, and the Authors that wrote either his Life, or the Hiſtory of his time: Let us now give an Account of his Writings.

St. Athanaſius was one of thoſe Authors who were forc'd to write, and were engag'd to take Pen in hand, rather by an Obligation to defend themſelves, than upon any deſign to make Books; and therefore the greateſt Part of his Books, are either Apologies to juſtify himſelf, or Invectives againſt his Enemies, or Treatiſes of Controverſy againſt the Errors of the Arians. They are all written in the form of Letters, a way of Writing which is moſt ſimple in the Compoſure, and at the ſame time moſt natural, and moſt proper for one that is in a place of Retirement.

There is a great probability, that his Two Treatiſes againſt the Gentiles, were the firſt which he compos'd, becauſe he does not there attack the Arians, as he does in all the other Books which he made, after he had any perſonal Differences with them. The laſt of theſe Two Books, is entituled at preſent, Concerning the Incarnation, and Theodoret cites it under that Name; but St. Jerom gives them both the Title of, Treatiſes againſt the Gentiles, and indeed, they are both written rather to Convert Pagans, than to Inſtruct Chriſtians.

The next Work of St. Athanaſius, after theſe Two Treatiſes, is his Apologetick (ſ) to the Emperour Conſtantius, which he wrote ſometime after he was forc'd away from Alexandria, in the Year 356. He wrote alſo the ſame Year, Two Letters (t) upon the Perſecution which the Chriſtians of

(q) At the City of Antioch, where they held a kind of a Synod.] 'Tis commonly thought that this Synod was held at Alexandria: But Valeſius has well obſerv'd, that the Beginning of the Letter ſhows, that it was written by the Biſhops, deputed from the Provinces of Egypt, who were come to Antioch, where the Emperour was at that time.

(r) In the Year 373 of Jeſus Chriſt.] Proterius Biſhop of Alexandria, places the Death of St. Athanaſius in this Year, in a Letter to St. Leo; and St. Jerom ſays, that Peter of Alexandria was choſen the ſame Year. Theſe Authors are more credible than Socrates, Ruffinus and St. Cyril, who place it in the Year 371.

(ſ) The next Work of St. Athanaſius, after theſe two Treatiſes, is his Apologetick.] This was compos'd immediately, after his Retiring. Which he did with a Deſign to ſpeak it in the Preſence of Conſtantius: But underſtanding the Miſchiefs he had done to thoſe that favour'd him, he thought it not ſafe to come near him. His two Apologies and his Epiſtle to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life, were written after this, where he ſpeaks with much Sharpneſs and Freedom againſt Conſtantius, particularly, in his Letter to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life.

(t) He wrote alſo the ſame Year, Two Letters.] I ſay that theſe Two Letters were written a little while after the Enthroning of George, though I know Baronius is of Opinion, that the 1ſt. was written a long time before, when Gregory ſeized upon the Church of Alexandria and that the 2d. was written in 361. but this Opinion is not defenſible. As to the 1ſt. Baronius was deceiv'd by the Verſion, where he found ſometimes the Name of Gregory, and ſometimes that of George; but this Confuſion is avoided in the Greek, where one may always find the Name of George, when mention is made of him that came to intrude into the Church of Alexandria: But that which can never be anſwer'd, is, That Gregory is mention'd there as one that had been condem'd, long ago, and was no more. See the Place, p. 948. For after all the Churches in the World had anathematiz'd Gregory, whom the Arians had formerly, πρότερον, made Biſhop; yet the ſame Arians preſently ſent George thither. Here you ſee how Gregory and George are well diſtinguiſht We may add to this Authority, That the Circumſtances related in This Letter agree with the Enthronizing of George, and not at all with that of Gregory. It may be alledg'd for the Opinion of Baronius, 1. That 'tis ſaid in the Letter, Philagrius the Governour of Egypt introduc'd him, who is there ſpoken of, and 'tis very well known, that Philagrius carried Gregory to Alexandria: But I cannot ſee why he might not as well be employ'd to conduct George thither likewiſe. 2. 'Tis alledg'd, that 'tis ſaid in the Letter, that he who was ſent to Alexandria by

Alexandria

Alexandria ſuffer'd, when George took Poſſeſſion of that Epiſcopal See. The Firſt which was addreſs'd to the Biſhops of Egypt, is improperly call'd The firſt Diſcourſe againſt the Arians. The Second is written to all the Orthodox Biſhops. A little time after, he compos'd his Two Apologies in the place of his Retirement: 'Tis likewiſe very probable, that he wrote at that time his Four Treatiſes againſt the Arians, which he addreſs'd to the Monks, as we learn from the beginning of his Letter to Serapion, concerning the Death of Arius. His Letter to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life, is made up of two different Pieces: The Firſt is a Letter written to the Monks, which is a kind of Preface to ſome Treatiſe againſt the Arians, and may be ſo to that which follows; it contains about a Page and a half, and ends at theſe words in Page 810. Gratia Domini Jeſu Chriſti ſit vobiſcum. Amen. The following Treatiſe which was addreſs'd to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life, is a Hiſtory of all that paſs'd from the beginning of Arianiſm, to the fall of Hoſius and Liberius, i.e. to the Year 358. There are ſome Periods in the beginning, which are loſt, that not only this Treariſe has no Connexion with the Letter that precedes it, but alſo there is no Sence in the beginning of it: And I am aſtoniſh'd to think, that ſo many able Men ſhould read this Book without perceiving, or at leaſt without obſerving it. The Letter to Serapion, concerning the Death of Arius, was written after the Treatiſe which is directed to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life, as appears by the beginning of it. The Book of Synods was compos'd in 359 (u), before the Councils of Seleucia and Ariminum, were ended: He afterwards added in this Book, what concerns the Council of Conſtantinople in 360, and what is there ſaid concerning the Death of Conſtantius. The two Latin Letters which are at the End of the Works of Lucifer Calaritanus, were alſo written under Conſtantius. The Letter of the Council of Alexandria, to thoſe of Antioch, was written after the Death of that Emperour, in 362; the Letter of the Council of Antioch, under Jovian, was written in 363: That which is directed to all the Biſhops of Egypt and Arabia, Syria and Phœnicia, was written in 368, under the Reign of Valens, as well as that which is directed to the Africans (x). And the Letter to Epictetus was written laſt (y).

St. Athanaſius.

There are beſides, many other Works of St. Athanaſius, of which the Chronology is not known, which it concerns us to diſtinguiſh well from thoſe that are doubtful or ſuppoſititious. Theſe Works are in the Firſt Volume. The Homily upon theſe Words, My Father hath given me all things, p. 149. The Epiſtle to Adelphius, p. 155. That to Maximus, p. 162. Two Letters to Serapion, to prove, that the Son and the Holy Spirit are not Creatures, p. 166, and 173. An Expoſition of the Faith, p. 240. A Letter concerning the Hiſtory of the Deciſion of the Council of Nice, p. 248. A Letter of the Judgment of Dionyſius of Alexandria upon the Trinity, p. 548. A Treatiſe of the Union of the the Arians, was ordain'd by Euſebius; and Euſebius was certainly dead in George's time: But 'tis eaſy to anſwer this Difficulty, for 'tis not in the Greek Εὐσέβιοι, but οἱ περὶ Εὐσέβιον, the Euſebians, which is the Name that St. Athanaſius commonly gives to his Perſecutors. St. Athanaſius ſeems to ſay, that he was at Alexandria when this Trouble happen'd: but 'tis well known, that he was out of the City when George came thither, ſince he withdrew before Eaſter, and George did not thruſt himſelf into thoſe Churches till that time. To which I anſwer, That Athanaſius does not ſay, that he was at Alexandria, when George arriv'd there, but only when Philagrius publiſh'd the Edict againſt him. Laſtly, 'tis objected, that 'tis ſaid towards the end of this Letter, that they would have a Council aſſembled at Rome in the preceeding Year? but the Roman Church, ſay they, was not then in a Condition to have aſſembled in the Year 356, becauſe Liberius was then in Exile. Anſw. This Objection is eaſily deſtroy'd, for Liberius and the other Biſhops of Italy had many times deſired the aſſembling of a Council. 1. By their Legates ſent to Milan in 354. 2. In 355. before Liberius went from Rome. And, 3. When he was come to Court. St. Athanaſius therefore might ſay truly in 356, that thoſe of Rome had deſired a Council the Year before. The Letter to the Egyptians was written before George arriv'd at Alexandria, for there he is mention'd as one ready to be ſent thither, p. 290. and he is deſcrib'd as one that was not yet known to the Egyptians. There Cecropi is mention'd as a Biſhop alive; but he was ſwallowed up by an Earthquake which deſtroy'd Nicomedia in 358. There Liberius and Hoſius are mention'd with Commendation, who fell away in 357. Baronius objects Two Things to prove that it was not written till 360. 1ſt. Becauſe it is ſaid there, that it was now 36. Years ſince the Arians were declar'd Hereticks: 2dly becauſe mention is made in it of a Creed which they would have ſign'd; but we read of none, that there was at this time. In Anſwer, to the 1ſt. Objection it may be ſaid, that the Figures are wrong, or rather that we muſt count the 36 Years from the 1ſt Synod held by Alexander againſt the Arians. 'Tis more eaſy to anſwer the 2d. by ſaying, That the Arian Biſhops might make a Creed when they ſent George; beſides that, Athanaſius ſays onely that he heard ſay, they had made one, and not that they had done it. Be it as it will, this 1ſt. Treatiſe againſt the Arians is a Letter to the Biſhops of Egypt, which has nothing of Affinity with the Subject and Matter of the other Four: The Oration that follows begins as a new Diſcourſe, and St. Cyril cites a Paſſage out of the 3d Book of Athanaſius concerning the Trinity, which is found in that which is now call'd the 4th. and Theodoret cites one taken out of the Second, which is now in the 3d. Treatiſe.

(u) The Book of Synods was compos'd in 359] This is evident, becauſe he does not finiſh the Hiſtory of the Council of Ariminum, concluding with the Nomination of the 1ſt. Deputies which were ſent to the Emperour; and at the End he adds the Letter of Conſtantius, and the generous Anſwer of the Biſhops, which he had learn'd afterwards. He ſpeaks always of that Council as a thing preſent, and with Commendation; and he ſays nothing more of what paſs'd at Conſtantinople after the Council of Seleucia. This Book is probably that which St. Jerom ſays, St. Athanaſius had Written againſt Urſacius and Valens, unleſs we ſhould rather ſay, that it was a Work ſubjoin'd to his Letter to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life.

(x) As well as that which is directed to the Africans.] This is to the Biſhops of the Weſtern Africa, and not to thoſe of Cyrenaick, as Baronius thought, who ſays, that theſe Letters were written under the Pontificate of Damaſus.

(y) And the Letter to Epictetus was written laſt.] He obſerves in this Letter, that Auxentius and the other Arians, were anathematiz'd by the Councils of France, Spain and Rome. St. Cyril ſays that it was corrupted, but that which we now have, agrees with that which is related by the Emperour.

St. Athanaſius.

Humane Nature to the Word, which is cited by Theodoret, under the Name of, A Book againſt the Arians, p. 595. Two Books of the Incarnation, againſt Apollinarius, p. 614, 633. A Treatiſe againſt the Followers of Sabellius, p. 650. An Epiſtle to John and to Antiochus, p. 951. An Epiſtle to Palladius, p. 952. An Epiſtle to Dracontius, p. 955. An Epiſtle to Marcellinus, concerning the Interpretation of the Pſalms, p. 959. The Homily of the Sabbath and Circumciſion, p. 964. A Treatiſe upon the Words of Jeſus Chriſt, Whoſoever ſhall be guilty of blaſphemy againſt the Holy Ghoſt, it ſhall not be forgiven him, neither in this World, nor in that which is to come, p. 970.

In the Second Volume, there are few of his Genuine Works; but here follow thoſe which we own. Two Letters to Serapion, concerning the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, p. 10. and 16. A ſhort Diſcourſe againſt the Arians, p. 22. The Conferences of St. Athanaſius with the Arians, in the preſence of Jovian, from p. 27. to p. 29. An Epiſtle to Ammon, p. 35. A Fragment of one, p. 39. A Feſtival Epiſtle, p. 38. An Epiſtle to Ruffinian, p. 40. A Book of the Abridgment of the Holy Scripture, p. 55. All theſe Works, whereof ſome are cited by the Ancients, agree well enough with the Stile of St. Athanaſius, and they contain nothing in my Opinion, which gives juſt cauſe to ſuſpect them of Forgery (z).

There is not any of the other Works, that bear the Name of St. Athanaſius, beſides thoſe which we have already mention'd, that is Genuine, but they are all either manifeſtly Suppoſititious, or very doubtful.

The Treatiſe which has this Title, That there is but one Jeſus Chriſt, altho' it be ancient, yet is not written by St. Athanaſius. For, Firſt, This Author places Marcellus of Ancyra, amongſt the Hereticks, whereas St. Athanaſius always communicated with him as a Catholick Biſhop, even in the laſt Years of his Life, as appears by the Letters of St. Baſil, which complain of St. Athanaſius upon this occaſion. Secondly, The Author of this Treatiſe, acknowledges but one only Hypoſtaſis in Jeſus Chriſt, whereas St. Athanaſius always took this Word, rather to ſignify the Nature, than to denote the Perſon (aa).

For this laſt Reaſon we ought alſo to reject the little Treatiſe of the Incarnation againſt Paulus Samoſatenus, which is in the Firſt Volume of St. Athanaſius, p. 591. becauſe the Author of it owns three Hypoſtaſes in the Trinity.

The Refutation of the Hypocriſie of Meletius, is rather the Work of Paulinus of Antioch, or ſome of his Party, than of St. Athanaſius, who was neither ſo conceited of the Notion of three Hypoſtaſes, nor ſo tranſported with anger againſt Melctius, as the Author of this Treatiſe was.

(z) Which gives juſt cauſe to ſuſpect them of Forgery] Yet there is ſome Doubt of ſome of thoſe Works which are mention'd in this place; but the Conjectures which are alledg'd have little Solidity. Some have doubted of the Letters to Serapion, but theſe are written in the Stile of St. Athanaſius. The two which are in the 2*d.* Volume, are an Abridgment of the 2*d.* which is in the 1*ſt.* Volume. The Expoſition of Faith which is in p. 240. of the 1*ſt.* Volume, is cited by Facundus, B. XI. Ch. 6. The Treatiſe of the Union of the humane Nature is cited by Theodoret in his 2*d.* and 3*d.* Dialogue: And ſo it cannot be deny'd, that it is St. Athanaſius's, eſpecially ſince it has his Stile, although the Author of St. Athanaſius's Life affirms the contrary. The 2*d.* B. of the Incarnation againſt Apollinarius is no ways doubtful, but the 1*ſt.* is call'd in queſtion, which is more obſcure and leſs methodical: Yet Leontius B. II. againſt Eutyches, cites the 2*d.* under the Name of the 2*d.* Treatiſe of St. Athanaſius againſt Apollinarius. The Letter to Marcellinus about the Interpretation of the Pſalms, is in all Probability that which St. Jerom and Caſſiodorus call a Treatiſe of the Titles of the Pſalms, becauſe it contains the Subject and Argument of every Pſalm. The Epiſtle to Serapion of the Death of Arius, is cited by the Ancient Hiſtorians. The Homily of the Sabbath and of Circumciſion is not wholly of St. Athanaſius's Stile, but the Difference is very inconſiderable. Some have doubted of the Tract upon theſe Words, Whoſoever ſhall ſpeak Blaſphemy againſt the Holy Spirit; but unjuſtly, for this Tract has not only the Stile of S. Athanaſius, but alſo is prov'd to be really his, becauſe Gobarus in Photius Cod. 232. teſtifies, that St Athanaſius had many times cited Theognoſtus, who is not found cited but in this Book, and in the Treatiſe of the Judgment of Denys of Alexandria. And, Laſtly, becauſe the Treatiſe which we now diſcourſe of, is cited in the Council of Lateran, held under Martin the 1*ſt.* in the Year 549 I think we ought not to reject the Conferences of St. Athanaſius with the Arians before Jovian. 'Tis certain that St. Athanaſius came to find out this Emperor; and Philoſtorgius ſays, that the Arians came to accuſe St. Athanaſius in his Preſence. Moreover, they are written with great Simplicity, and appear to be very Ancient. Scultetus doubts of the Letter to Ammon, becauſe it preferrs Cœlibacy to Marriage, alledging that St. Athanaſius taught the contrary in his Letter to Dracontius: But he was miſtaken. The Fragment of the 39*th.* Feſtival Epiſtle ought to be receiv'd as undoubtedly his, after St. Jerom's Teſtimony, who ſays, that St. Athanaſius wrote thoſe Letters which bear his Name. I ſay the ſame of the Abridgment of the Holy Scripture, which is upon the ſame Subject with this Feſtival Epiſtle, and has the ſame Opinions of the Canonical Writers. Some doubt of this laſt Treatiſe; 1. becauſe the Author calls Lucian, who was a Ring-leader of the Arians, a holy Martyr. 2. Becauſes he does not reckon the Book, entituled Paſtor, among uſeful Books, as St. Athanaſius does in his 39*th.* Letter, and in his Book of the Nicene Synod. But 'tis eaſy to anſwer theſe Conjectures. As to the 1*ſt*, That St. Athanaſius did not think that Lucian was of the ſame Opinion that Arius had afterwards, or that knowing he died in the Boſom of the Church, he thought that he ought not to condemn him: Or Laſtly, that he cited him as commonly he had been accuſtom'd to cite him. As to the 2*d.* That he ſays nothing of the Truth of the Book entituled Paſtor, but neither does he reject it as a wicked Book, and by Conſequence there can nothing be built upon this Conjecture.

(aa) St. Athanaſius always took this Word, rather to ſignify the Nature, than to denote the Perſon] The Council of Nice ſeems to have taken the Word Hypoſtaſis in this Sence, when it condemns thoſe who ſay, that the Word is another Hypoſtaſis, or Subſtance. St. Athanaſius ſays often in his 5*th.* Oration, that the Father and the Son are one Hypoſtaſis only; and in his Letter to the Africans. That the Hypoſtaſis is the Subſtance. In ſhort, though the Synod of Alexandria was perſuaded that this Difference concern'd not Matters of Faith, yet they approv'd more the Opinion of thoſe who take Hypoſtaſis for Nature.

The

The Book of Virginity (bb), has nothing of the Stile of St. Athanaſius, and it contains ſome Precepts very remote from the Genius and Diſcipline of his time. There is a Difference between him that wrote upon this Subject, who is cited by Theodoret, and him whom St. Jerom mentions. St. Athanaſius.

The Treatiſe of Teſtimonies drawn from the Holy Scriptures, to prove the Eſſential Unity of the Three Perſons of the Holy Trinity, is none of St. Athanaſius's. 1. Becauſe the Author there relates ſome Paſſages of the Queſtions to Antiochus, which were written a long time after St. Athanaſius as we ſhall ſhew hereafter. 2. The Stile of this Treatiſe is very different from than of St. Athanaſius. 3. He uſes childiſh Expreſſions, and gives impertinent Definitions of Angels and Men.

The Homily of the Annunciation, or of the Virgin, is alſo written by a later Author that St. Athanaſius. 1. Becauſe he expreſly refutes the Error of Neſtorius, and that of the Monothelites: and yet neither St. Cyril, nor any other Catholick Author, alledges this Book againſt thoſe Hereticks. 2. In explaining the Doctrine of the Church, he uſes ſuch Terms, as were not in uſe till after the Neſtorians and Eutychians time; as when he ſays, That he acknowledges two Natures in Jeſus Chriſt, without Confuſion or Mixture, without Change or Diviſion, Terms which were not us'd till after the Council of Epheſus. 3. He deteſts the Error of thoſe that call'd Jeſus Chriſt, a Man-bearing God, an expreſſion which St. Athanaſius did not reject, and the Ancients ſometimes made uſe of, and which was not condemn'd till after Neſtorius had abus'd it. 4. He gives a ridiculous Etymology of the Greek Word ὑσία, by ſaying, that it comes from ἰσία, which is not a Greek Word.

The Life of St. Syncletica (cc), publiſh'd in Latin, by Bollandus, and in Greek, by the Learned Cotelierius, in his Firſt Volume of the Monuments of the Greek Church, is ſuſpected of falſhood, becauſe no body mentions it before Nicephorus; and in ſome Manuſcripts, 'tis aſcrib'd to a Monk named Polycarp; beſides that, it has nothing of the Stile of St. Athanaſius.

The Life of St. Anthony has better Authority (dd); for St. Jerom and St. Gregory Nazianzen, ſay poſitively, That St. Athanaſius wrote the Hiſtory of the Life of this Father of Monks; but ſtill 'tis doubted, whether that which we now have, be not different from that which was know to theſe Ancients. Rivet and other Proteſtant Criticks, being Enemies of all thoſe Books which concern Monkery, boldly reject this Life, as a ſuppoſititious Work: But their Reaſons are not wholly convincing and all the Circumſtances of the Life of St. Anthony, related by the Ancients, are to be found in this Book, and therefore I think it very probable that this was St. Athanaſius's, altho' ſomething might be added or chang'd in it, as it often happen'd to Books of this nature.

The Creed which bears the Name of St. Athanaſius (ee), paſs'd a long time without any Contradiction as a Work which was truly this Father's; and yet, now all the World agrees, that 'twas none of his,

(bb) The Book of Virginity.] This Book is written in a low Stile, and contains Precepts about the Quality of the childiſh Clothes of Virgins: There are in it Expreſſions unworthy of St. Athanaſius, as when he calls a Virgin, the Dancer of Jeſus Chriſt. Theodoret, B. II. of his Hiſt. Ch. 4. cites a Paſſage out of a Book of St. Athanaſius addreſs'd to Virgins, which is not to be found in this Treatiſe, which ſhows that this is not the genuine Treatiſe of St. Athanaſius.

(cc) The Life of St. Syncletica.] 'Tis cited as St. Athanaſius's by Nicephorus Calliſtus, and there is a Manuſcript of it which bears his Name; but in another 'tis aſcribed to a Monk named Polycarp, which is very likely to be true: For the Stile is unworthy of St. Athanaſius. It is full of childiſh Compariſons, which are to be met with almoſt in every Period, and agree much better to a Monk, than to St. Athanaſius.

(dd) The Life of St. Anthony has better Authority.] 'Tis alledg'd againſt this Life, to prove that it is not St. Athanaſius's, that this Saint relates the Death of Balacius, after another manner than it is related in this Life: For St. Athanaſius ſays, in his Epiſtle to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life. That the Letter of St. Anthony was written to Gregory, who gave it to Balacius; whereas in the Life of St. Anthony, it is ſaid, that this Letter was addreſs'd to Balacius himſelf. 2*dly*, 'Tis reported in the Life of St. Anthony, that Balacius was killed by Neſtorius the Governour of Egypt's Horſe, who accompanied him: Whereas St. Athanaſius ſays, that the Horſe upon which Balacius rode, did bite him: But theſe Differences are of little Conſequence, and the ſame Author may relate differently ſuch kind of little Circumſtances, either through the Fault of his Memory, or becauſe he is better inform'd at one time than another. The Difference of Stile which is to be met with, between this Letter and the other Works of St. Athanaſius, gives us more Trouble: But it may be that he proportion'd his Stile in this Life, both to the Matter, and the Capacity of the Monks for whom he wrote it. This is certain, the Ancients do teſtify, that St. Athanaſius wrote the Life of St. Anthony, and all that they report of it, is found to agree with what is ſaid in that Book which we now have. See St. Chryſoſt. Homil. 8. on Matth, St. Auſtin in his Confeſſions, Palladius Hiſt. Lauſ. Ch. 8. Socrates Lib. I. c. 17. and Lib. IV. c. 14. All which makes me think, that 'tis not convenient to reject it.

(ee) The Creed which bears the Name of St. Athanaſius.] The Reaſons that convince me that this Creed is none of St. Athanaſius's are theſe. 1. Becauſe 'twas not known till the Sixth Century. 2. Becauſe St. Athanaſius never would make a Confeſſion of Faith, nor a Creed, being perſuaded he ought to keep to that of Nice. 3. Becauſe this Creed rejects ſo plainly the Errors of the Neſtorians, Eutychians, and Monothelites, that 'tis eaſy to perceive, 'twas made ſince thoſe Hereticks, on purpoſe to reject their Errors. 4. The Stile and Terms do plainly ſhow, that this Creed was made by a Latin, and not by a Greek, Author. 5. No Account can be given, upon what Occaſion, at what Time, and for what Reaſon, St. Athanaſius ſhould make this Creed. See Voſſius in his Book De Tribus Symbolis. 6. It appears by the Terms, that 'twas the Work of a Latin Author. 7. 'Tis not found among the ancient Manuſcripts of St. Athanaſius. 'Twas made ſince the Council of Chalcedon, as the Reaſons we have now given do clearly prove. 'Tis cited in the Council of Autun, in the Year 670, and there we read in the Fourth Council of Toledo, in 633, ſome Phraſes which ſeem to be taken out of this Creed. But it muſt be confeſs'd, that this laſt Council does not ſay, That they were taken out of the Creed of St. Athanaſius, and that there is no certainty, that this Canon of the Council of Autun, where mention is made of St. Athanaſius's Creed, is ſo ancient, as we have ſaid, ſince it is not found among the Canons of that Council under Leodegarius; but in a Collection of thoſe Canons taken out of the Library of the Monaſtery of St. Benignus of Dijon. Hincmar but ſome Authors that liv'd a long time after him. 'Tis not certainly known whoſe it is; ſome have attributed it to ſome French; others, as Father Queſnel, think, that 'tis written by Vigilius Tapſenſis, who liv'd towards the End of the Fifth Age of the Church. Howſoever this be, 'tis certain that 'twas compos'd after the Council of Chalcedon, becauſe it rejects ſo formally the Errors of the Neſtorians and Eutychians, that 'tis evident it aims at theſe two Hereſies.

St. Athanaſius.

St. Cyril of Alexandria, in his Book addreſs'd to Queens, and his Defence of the Eighth Anathematiſm, cites a Confeſſion of Faith under the Name of St. Athanaſius, about the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, which is ſtill found among the Works of this Father, in the Second Vol. P. 30. St. John Damaſcene, B. III. Of the Orthodox Faith, Ch. 6. and Theorianus, attribute it to St. Athanaſius. Baſil of Seleucia, in the Firſt Act of the Council of Conſtantinople, ſays, 'Twas reported that St. Athanaſius was the Author of an Expreſſion which is found in this Confeſſion of Faith, viz. That the Word had but one Nature Incarnate. But Leontius in his Book of Sects, denies that St. Athanaſius was the Author of this Sentence, and the Catholick Biſhops at a Conference held at Conſtantinople againſt the Severians in the Year 533, have alſo rejected it, as being falſly attributed to St. Athanaſius. And truly the Doctrine and Expreſſions of this Confeſſion of Faith about the Incarnation, do not at all agree with thoſe of St. Athanaſius in his Books of the Incarnation; in which he does not only ſay nothing which may favour the Error of the Eutychians, but alſo he formally rejects it, and rather favours the contrary Opinion.

The other Works attributed to St. Athanaſius, are yet more manifeſtly Suppoſititious, and no body almoſt has acknowledg'd them for Genuine. The Diſpute againſt Arius (ff) which is in the Firſt Volume, is a Dialogue compos'd under the Names of St. Athanaſius and Arius, by ſome body that liv'd long after. This is plain, and all the World is agreed in't; but 'tis not known who is the Author of it. Some have attributed it to Vigilius Tapſenſis; but for my part, I rather believe that 'tis the Work of a Greek, than a Latin Author, and that it may well be attributed to Maximus.

The Letter of Liberius to St. Athanaſius, and the Anſwer of this Saint to Liberius (gg), agree not at all with the Hiſtory of theſe two Biſhops, and have no reſemblance of their Stile.

The Explication of theſe words of Jeſus Chriſt to his Apoſtles, Go to the Village that is over againſt you, and there ye ſhall find a Colt tied (hh); the Homily upon the Paſſion (ii) of Jeſus Chriſt, and that upon the Seed (kk), which are found at the End of the Firſt Volume, have neither the Stile nor the Air of St. Athanaſius, and contain many things unworthy of him.

and Abbo, who liv'd about the Tenth Century; Radulphus, Haimo, Hugo, and ſome other Ancient Frenchmen have cited it as St. Athanaſius's. The Greeks alſo, as Manuel Calecas, Lib. 2. have made no ſcruple to aſcribe it to him, Pitheus thought that a Frenchman compos'd it, becauſe the French Authors were the firſt that expreſly cited it: and perhaps ſome Frenchman did draw this Creed, partly from the Council of Toledo, and put the Name of St. Athanaſius to it. Father Queſnel is of opinion, that 'twas the Work of Vigilius Tapſenſis, and it muſt be confeſs'd, that his Conjectures are very probable; For, 1ſt. This Author has forg'd many Books under the Names of the Fathers, and particularly under the Name of St. Athanaſius. 2. In all his Writings he oppoſes the Neſtorians and Eutychians, and this Creed attributed to St. Athanaſius, is directly againſt the Errors of thoſe Hereticks. 3. The ſame Vigilius made ſeveral Confeſſions of Faith under the Name of St Athanaſius. 4. The Firſt part of the Creed ſeems to be a Recapitulation of the Chapters of Vigilius Tapſenſis's Book againſt Vurimadus: and even in the Third Book, the Three firſt Chapters contain theſe Propoſitions, Deus Pater, Deus Filius, Deus Spiritus Sanctus; Dominus Pater, Dominus Filius, Dominus Spiritus Sanctus; Omnipotens Pater, Omnipotens Filius, Omnipotens Spiritus Sanctus, which are word for word in the Creed. Theſe are the Conjectures of Father Queſnel, to which one may adhere ſo much the rather, while there is nothing to be had more certain about this Matter. Be it as it will, 'tis certainly the Work of a Latin Author, which has been ſince tranſlated into Greek, which is the reaſon why the Greek Copies differ among themſelves.

(ff) The Diſpute againſt Arius.] 'Tis evident that 'tis not a Conference made in the Council, but only a fictitious Dialogue made by ſome body, under the Names of St. Athanaſius and an Arian, and not of Arius; for the Catholick ſays, That his Adverſary is a Monſter come out of the Sect of Arius. The Author of this Dialogue is ſo ignorant, that he thinks the Council of Nice was held in the Year 310.

(gg) The Letter of Liberius to St. Athanaſius, and the Anſwer of this Saint to Liberius.] Theſe Letters neither agree with St. Athanaſius, nor with Liberius: The laſt to St. Athanaſius is ſo written, as if there were ſome doubt of his being a Catholick: He requires him to Anathematize Arius and Sabellius, that I, ſays he, may obey your Commands. The Letter of Liberius and the Anſwer of St. Athanaſius, are written as if they were Confeſſions of Faith, and they favour the Error of Neſtorius. The Stile of theſe two Letters is Childiſh and mean. The Letter attributed to Liberius, begins with a Then.

(hh) The Explication of theſe words of Jeſus Chriſt, Go to the Village that is over againſt you, and there ye ſhall find a Colt tied.] This Homily is a Fragment of ſome Commentary upon the Goſpel. It is not the Stile of St. Athanaſius. He explains all the paſſages of Scripture in a myſtical ſence, and draws from thence Allegories, which have more of ſubtilty than ſolidity. It is very different from the Air of St. Athanaſius, which is grave and ſerious; and beſides, he generally interprets the Scripture in its natural ſence.

(ii) The Homily upon the Paſſion.] This alſo is not written in the Stile of St. Athanaſius; for though it be ſomething more Sublime than the former, yet it comes not near the Gravity of this Father's Stile. There are ridiculous things related in it of the Fear of Chriſt. 'Tis ſaid, that he counterfeited the Fear of Death, leſt the Devil ſhould not withdraw, and that when the Devil heard him cry out, Eli, Eli, he had the boldneſs to attack him: But on the contrary, St. Athanaſius in his Fourth Dialogue againſt the Arians, does expreſly deny that Jeſus Chriſt counterfeited any Fear, and aſſures us, that as Man he was really afraid. The Author of this Homily diſallows all Oaths, whereas St. Athanaſius approves them upon ſeveral occaſions.

(kk) And that upon the Seed.] Or rather upon the Action of the Diſciples, who ate the Ears of Corn upon the Sabbath-Day. 'Tis found only in one Manuſcript, and it has nothing excellent, nor is it written in the Stile of St. Athanaſius.

The

The Diſcourſe againſt all Hereſies, which is the laſt Work of the Firſt Volume of St. Athanaſius, is confus'd, and the Stile mean, as is obſerv'd in an Ancient Manuſcript. He oppoſes in a few words all Hereſies, contrary to the Cuſtom of St. Athanaſius, who refutes very largely all thoſe he takes in hand. The Oration upon the Aſcenſion of Jeſus Chriſt, is of a Stile more florid than that of St. Athanaſius the Phraſes are forc'd and tumid, whereas St. Athanaſius writes in a Simple and Natural Stile. The Oration of Melchiſedeck cannot be St. Athanaſius's, ſince the Author mentions the Fathers of the Council of Nice as dead long before. St. Athanaſius.

The Letter of Jovian to St. Athanaſius, and that of St. Athanaſius to Jovian, which are in the Second Volume, are much to be ſuſpected. That of St. Athanaſius diſcovers the Forgery, becauſe it contains a Confeſſion of Faith different from that of the Council of Nice, and 'tis certain that he ſent, no other to this Emperour. The Author of this Letter writes in ſuch terms, as plainly diſcover that he was not St. Athanaſius, but rather Apollinarius, ſince he acknowledges but one Nature in Jeſus Chriſt; and indeed, Leontius teſtifies that Apollinarius had inſerted this Doctrine in a Letter to the Emperour Jovian. The Book of Definitions, which are pretended to be Collections out of St. Clement, and other Holy Fathers, cannot be St. Athanaſius's, ſince the Author cites in it Gregory Nyſſen, in the Chapter of the Act. Moreover, he ſpeaks of two Natures and one Perſon in Jeſus Chriſt, as if he had written after the Birth of the Hereſies of Neſtorius and Eutyches. A good part of the Book is taken out of a Book of Anaſtaſius Sinaita, entituled, Ὁδηγὸς, a Guide; and in ſome Manuſcripts, the Definitions are aſcrib'd to Maximus, under whoſe Name Father Combefis has Publiſh'd them.

All the Learned agree, that the Seven Dialogues of the Trinity, are not St. Athanaſius's (ll); the difference of the Stile, the Terms, and the Doctrine, are convincing Proofs of it; and 'tis plain, that the Author of this Treatiſe liv'd ſince the Council of Conſtantinople, at the time when the Diſputes about the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt were afoot in the Church. Father Combefis has reſtor'd them to Maximus (mm), upon the Authority of ſome Manuſcripts, and the Teſtimony of the Modern Greeks, who cite them often under the Name of this Author. Garnerius a very learned Jeſuit, aſcribes them to Theodoret, and has printed them under his Name, in a pretended Supplement to the Works of this Father. But he has nothing to ſupport this Opinion but ſome ſlight Conjectures (nn); and he does not ſufficiently refute the Aſſertion of Father Combefis.

The following Book, entituled, A Tragedy, is falſly attributed to St. Athanaſius. Photius in Cod. 46. ſets down all the Titles of the Queſtions which are handled in this Book, with ſome others that are not found there, and aſcribes them to Theodoret. Garnerius upon the Credit of Marius Mercator attributes them to Etherius Tyanæus a Diſciple of Theodoret.

The Queſtions to Antiochus, and thoſe that follow them, are yet later (oo) than thoſe Books of which we have already ſpoken: Theſe were made by ſome Modern Greek, and ſeem to be all written (ll) The Seven Dialogues of the Trinity, are not St. Athanaſius's.] 1. The Author ſpeaks there of an Addition made by the Council of Conſtantinople to the Nicene Creed. Annon & vos fidei Nicenæ adjeciſtis? ſays the Heretick, and the Catholick anſwers, Sed non ipſi pugnantia. 2. He explains the Six Epithets given to the Holy Spirit by the Council. 3. He treats there of ſubtile Queſtions about the Trinity, which were not ſtarted in the Time of St. Athanaſius. 4. He oppoſes Eunomius and Macedonius, whom St. Athanaſius did never particularly attack. 5. The Author of the Dialogue acknowledges Three Hypoſtaſes in Jeſus Chriſt. 6. The Stile is wholly different from that of St. Athanaſius. There are cited indeed in the Lateran Council under Martin the 1ſt. Secret. 6. Three Teſtimonies of St. Athanaſius; and the 3d. under this Title, In ſermone Athanaſii qui per modum Interrogationis & Reſponſionis cum Apollinario ſit; which Title agrees well enough with theſe Dialogues: But what is here related, is no where to be found.

(mm) Father Combefis has reſtor'd them to Maximus.] In the Greek Manuſcript which Beza us'd, 'tis obſerved on the Margin, This Dialogue is not St. Athanaſius's, but ſome ſay 'tis Maximus's. Two other Manuſcripts of Rome and Venice, and that of Du Freſne, attribute it to Maximus. Gregorius Prōtoſyncellus, Veccus, Acyndinus, Demetrius, and ſome other modern Greeks, cite it often under the Name of Maximus, and ſeldom under that of St. Athanaſius. It appears by the Stile and by all the Arguments in that Author, that theſe Seven Dialogues are by one and the ſame Hand; and the Authorities which we have alledg'd, do plainly ſhow that they ought to be attributed to Maximus.

(nn) Garnerius has nothing to ſupport this Opinion but ſome ſlight Conjectures.] He has no Manuſcripts, nor Citations from the Ancients. All that he ſays to prove it, is, 1ſt. That Theodoret writ againſt the Arians, the Eunomians, the Macedonians, and the Apollinariſts, as he teſtifies in many Places of his Works. 2. That the Doctrine, the Expreſſions, and the Reaſons of this Author reſemble thoſe of Theodoret, and this Author denies as well as he, that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son. Theſe Conjectures are very ſlight, when there are no Manuſcripts for him; for it may ſo happen that Two Authors, writing upon the ſame Principles, may agree very near in theſe Things; beſides the Reſemblance of the Stile is not ſo great as Garnerius would have us believe. The Proofs which he brings to ſhow that this Treatiſe is none of Maximus's are not of any greater Weight: He ſays this Book was written before the Creed of Epheſus, becauſe there is no Mention in it of the Neſtorians and Eutychians: That from Maximus's Time the Queſtion was no longer treated of de Genito & Ingenito: That there is no Probability, that Maximus ſhould diſpute againſt the Anomæans, with oppoſing the Eutychians, and Monothelites. 'Tis eaſie to confute theſe Conjectures, by ſaying, that Maximus in theſe Books diſputed againſt the ancient Hereſies, and that he ſufficiently oppos'd thoſe of his own Time in his other Books.

(oo) The Queſtions to Antiochus, and thoſe that follow them, are yet later.] In theſe Queſtions to Antiochus, the Author cites many Writers more modern than St. Athanaſius, as Gregory Nyſſen in his 8th. The Author of the Book aſcribed to St. Denys, Ibid. St. Epiphanius Queſtion 3. And many others in other Places. They have nothing of the Stile of St. Athanaſius, and the Author in many Places is of a contrary Opinion: in ſhort, in Athanaſius's Time, thoſe kind of Queſtions that were more Curious than uſeful, were not ſuffer'd. The Queſtions that follow about the Explication of ſome Doubts upon Places of Holy Scripture, and the other anonymous Queſtions are by the ſame Author as the preceding, and are only a Collection of Paſſages.

by

by the ſame Author. The Homily of the Vigils of Eaſter, has nothing of the Stile of St. Athanaſius, but is dry and barren, and full of affected Figures. The Fragments of the Commentary upon the Pſalms, related by Nicetas in his Catena, are very dubious, and ſo much the more, becauſe we have no account in the Ancients that St. Athanaſius ever compos'd a Commentary upon the Pſalms. The ſame muſt be ſaid of the Paſſages taken out of the Catena upon Job; for there is not much Credit to be given to theſe Catena's made by the Modern Greeks. But the Paſſages cited by Theodoret, are more valuable, for they are almoſt all found in ſome of the Works of St. Athanaſius which we have mention'd, excepting only thoſe which he cites as taken out of a large Diſcourſe of this Father about Faith. We muſt alſo acknowledge for Genuine the Fragment of a Treatiſe of St. Athanaſius upon theſe words, of Jeſus Chriſt, My Soul is troubled, which is recited in the Sixth Council, Art. 14. for beſides the Authority of this Council, which cites it as St. Athanaſius's, 'tis eaſie to perceive, that it has the Stile and Air of this Father. 'Tis alſo very probable, that the Paſſages cited by Gelaſius and St. John Damaſcene, and ſet down at the end of the Second Volume, P. 547, and 548, are St. Athanaſius's. The Paſſage of a Letter to Euphychius (pp), recited in Latin in the Sixth Council, is not ſo certainly his, for it is not written in his Stile, and we read no-where elſe that St. Athanaſius ever wrote to Euphychius. Photius mentions a Commentary of St. Athanaſius upon Eccleſiaſtes, and the Canticles: we have nothing of it at preſent, and I doubt very much, whether it was St. Athanaſius's, ſince Photius himſelf confeſſes, that it had not the Stile of his other Works, and that none of the Ancients mention it. The Eleven Books of the Unity of the Godhead in the Trinity, belong to Vigilius (qq), a Deacon of Africk, and afterwards Biſhop of Tapſa, as well as the Dialogue, or Conference of Arius and St. Athanaſius, which follows theſe Eleven Books.

The Exhortation to the Monks, and to the Spouſe of Jeſus Chriſt, which is in the Collection of Holſtenius, has nothing of the Stile of St. Athanaſius, no more than the Book entituled, Inſtructions abridg'd for Monks and Chriſtians, publiſh'd not long ago in Greek and Latin, by Arnoldus, and printed at Paris by the Widow Martin, in the Year 1685. Theſe Books are written in a mean Stile, and contain ſuch Rules and Precepts, as neither agree with the Perſon, nor the Genius of St. Athanaſius.

The Letters of St. Athanaſius to the Biſhops of Egypt, to the Popes Marcus and Felix (rr), and thoſe of theſe Popes to theſe Biſhops, are notoriouſly Falſe and Suppoſititious.

The Relation of the Paſſion of the Image of Jeſus Chriſt in the City of Berytus (ſſ), cannot be St. Atha- taken out of St. Chryſoſtom, St. Cyril of Alexandria, St. Gregory Nyſſen, St. Climacus, St. Maximus, which are ſometimes recited under their Names. The Author of theſe Queſtions calls the Occidentaliſts by the Name of Franks, and ſays that the Romans are a Nation of the Franks, ἔθνη τῆς Ῥωμαίων γενῶς τῆς Φράγγων τὸ γένος: Which plainly diſcovers that they were compos'd by the Modern Greeks, after the Empire of the Weſt came to the Franks. The modern Greeks have made many ſuch Collections, which they have put forth under the Name of ancient and famous Fathers.

(pp) The Paſſage of a Letter to Eupſychius.] Theodoret and the Council of Chalcedon cite a Letter of Atticus of Conſtantinople Succeſſor to St. Chryſoſtom, directed to Euphychius. St. Athanaſius mentions one Euphychius Biſhop of Cappadocia, Orat. 1. againſt Ar. But the ſixth Council ſays, that the Euphychius mention'd by him was a Prieſt of Cæſarea.

(qq) The Eleven Books and the Conference of Arius and St Athanaſius, belong to Vigilius Tapſenſis.] It has been obſerv'd long ſince that theſe were the Works of a Latin Author, who wrote long after St. Athanaſius. Sirmondus firſt diſcover'd that they were written by Vigilius Tapſenſis. This he obſerv'd in his Notes upon Theodolphus of Orleans, where he ſays, that theſe Two Books are found in an ancient Manuſcript, together with the Books of this African Biſhop againſt Neſtorius and Eutyches, in which he teſtifies himſelf that he compos'd theſe Dialogues under the Name of St. Athanaſius.

(rr) To the Popes Marcus and Felix.] 1. The Author of this Letter to Marcus, uſes the Words of the Epiſtle to Felix. 2. The Author of this Letter places the Perſecution againſt St. Athanaſius which happen'd in 355, under Liberius, Nineteen Years after the Death of Pope Marcus. 3. This Letter is compos'd of Paſſages of Authors who liv'd ſince St. Athanaſius, as St. Leo, Atticus, St. Cyril, St. Celeſtine, &c. 4. He ſays, that there were Eighty Canons of the Nicene Council, Forty Greek and Forty Latin, which is a manifeſt Falſhood. 5. He adds, that he reduc'd them to Seventy, that there might be as many Canons as there were Diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt, and Languages in the World, which is the Heighth of Impertinence. 6. The Stile is very different from that of St. Athanaſius, and is of a Latin Author. 7. In 336, when this Letter is ſuppos'd to be written, St. Athanaſius was in Gaul, and conſequently could not write from Alexandria. In a Word, the Letter is dated the 1*ſt*. of December, and Marcus died the ſame Year, in the Beginning of November. The ſame Reaſons, prove that the Anſwer could not be written by Marcus, for 'tis dated about a Month after his Death. The Letter written to Felix has as many Marks of Falſhood. 1. St. Athanaſius never communicated with this falſe Pope. 2. It has not the Stile of St. Athanaſius, but of a Latin Author. 3. 'Tis compos'd of Paſſages taken out of St. Innocent, Celeſtine, the Roman Council, and Adrian. 4. When Felix was choſen, St Athanaſius lay conceal'd, and could not then aſſemble a Synod. The Anſwer of Felix is compos'd of Paſſages out of the decretal Epiſtles forg'd by Iſidore, and of Teſtimonies out of the Fathers; and the Date of the Conſuls is falſe.

(ſſ) The Relation of the Paſſion of the Image of Jeſus Chriſt in the City of Berytus.] Sigibert in his Chronicle, relates this Story at the Year 765, and ſo the Treatiſe which he cites cannot be St. Athanaſius's. I ſhall give a ſhort Account of the Story; and leave the Reader to judge whether it be fabulous or no. 'Tis ſaid, that a Chriſtian having over-againſt his Bed an Image of Jeſus Chriſt which was of his natural Bigneſs, removing out of his Lodging, forgot it in the Lodging where it was, though he knew that Jeſus Chriſt gave it to Nicodemus, who left it to Gamaliel, and that from Gamaliel it paſs'd to St. James, and from St. James to Simeon, and from him to Zacheus, and ſo it paſs'd from Hand to Hand till the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem: That a Jew having hir'd the Houſe where this Image was, for ſome time did not perceive it: but having invited ſome of his Friends to eat with him, they diſcover'd it, and after that; all the Jews aſſembled together to beat it, and one of them having pierc'd it with a Lance, there came forth Blood and Water, which wrought Abundance of Miracles. The Title of this Story ſays, that it happen'd under Conſtantine and Irene. 'Tis related alſo in the 2*d*. Council of Nice, and 'tis ſaid, that it made the Fathers of the Council to weep.

nasius's; since the History which is there related, happen'd not, as is pretended, till the Year 765, and moreover, it is full of Fables, and unworthy of St. Athanasius. St. Athanasius.

The Fragment upon the Incarnation, against the Disciples of Paulus Samosatenus, is done by an ancient Author; but we have it not in Greek, and there is no proof that it was St. Athanasius's.

The other Fragment of the Sabbath, is an Extract from part of the Homily upon the same Subject, which is in Greek, Vol. 1. of St. Athanasius's Works.

The Seven Homilies publish'd by Holstenius, have nothing of the Stile of St. Athanasius, but are written by some late Greek Declaimer. There is nothing in them that is useful or sublime; and they come not near the Noble Simplicity of St. Athanasius's Writings, as those who have any relish of such things, are all agreed.

The Four other Discourses publish'd by Father Combefis, tho' they are more useful than the former, yet they are not St. Athanasius's. The First rejects so expresly the Errors of Nestorius and Eutyches, that 'tis plain, 'twas compos'd after these Two Hereticks had publish'd their Doctrine.

The Two Last about Easter and Ascension, are attributed in some Manuscripts to St. Basil of Seleucia, and 'tis probable that they are all Four written by him. St. John Damascene, or the Author of a Discourse upon the Dead, cites a Discourse of St. Athanasius, upon the same Subject; but we have none that bears this Title; and 'tis probable that this which is cited by this Author, is suppositious. I say nothing of the Commentary upon the Psalms, which in its First Edition, bore the Name of St. Athanasius, because now 'tis certainly known, that 'twas written by Theophylact.

When we consider the Works of St. Athanasius, with respect to the Subject on which they treat, they may be distinguish'd into Four sorts: The First, are Historical, and relate to the History of his own time; the Second sort, are purely Dogmatical; the Third concern Morality; and the Last, are upon the Holy Scriptures. His Apologies ought to be rank'd under the First Head. The First Apology was written immediately after he was driven out of Alexandria, and is address'd to the Emperour Constantius. There he refutes the Calumnies which his Enemies had made use of, to render him odious to Constantius. And the better to insinuate himself into the Emperour's Favour, he begins his Discourse with saying, That he made his Defence with much assurance before an Emperour, who had been long a Christian, and whose Ancestors had embrac'd the true Religion: That having made use of the Words of St. Paul, for his own Defence, he took him for his Intercessor with the Emperour, to whom, no doubt, he would give a favourable Hearing. Then he adds, That 'twas not necessary for him to purge himself from the Accusation relating to Ecclesiastical Matters, which his Enemies had formerly fram'd against him, since as to them he was sufficiently justified by the Testimony of an infinite Number of Bishops, and by the Retraction of Ursacius and Valens, who had acknowledg'd, that all those Accusations were pure Calumnies invented by them to destroy him; and that tho' these things were not so, yet he ought not to have any regard to an Information made in his absence by his Enemies, which should be of no weight, according to all Laws both Divine and Humane. And therefore without insisting upon those former Accusations in this Apology, he refutes those which were made use of since his Return, to blacken his Reputation with the Emperour. First of all, he is accus'd of having spoken ill of this Emperour to his Brother Constans. But he takes God to Witness, that he never did it, and says, That it had been a madness in him, to have attempted so bold a thing: That Constans would never have suffer'd it: That he had not so great an Interest in him, as to dare say any thing against his Brother: That he never spoke to him, but in the presence of many Persons who were Witnesses of what he said. But to prove the falseness of this Accusation beyond exception, he makes a faithful Relation of all that pass'd in his Voyage to Italy; wherein he says, That he parted from Alexandria, to put his Person and Reputation under the Protection of the Church of Rome; That he assisted at the Assemblies of the Faithful there; That he wrote but twice to Constans, while he staid at Alexandria: The First time to defend himself against some Letters full of Calumnies, which his Enemies had wrote to him; And the Second time, to send him some Copies of the Holy Scriptures; and that he never went to wait on him but twice, and both times by his own Order. At Last, he says, That the Emperour may judge by the manner of his speaking of his greatest Enemies, whether he was capable of speaking ill of him to his own Brother. The Second Accusation was no less heinous, for they accus'd him of having written a Letter to the Tyrant Magnentius, and they said, That they had the Original of his Letter. To which St. Athanasius answers, That this Accusation had no appearance of Truth; That he had never seen nor known Magnentius; That he never had occasion to write to him; That he had all the reason in the World, to detest him, and to hold no Correspondence with him; That the first Calumny destroy'd this, since 'twas incredible, that one who was so much for the Interest of Constans, should be of this Tyrant's Faction, who had revolted from him, and cruelly kill'd him. And as to their pretending to have this Letter, he says, 'Twas not to be wondred at, that they had found out an Impostor, since 'twas very well known, that they had counterfeited the Emperour's Letters. But he prays Constantius, to enquire from whence they had this Letter, and who gave it them; and to Summon before him the Secretaries of Magnentius, and inform himself, if they had ever receiv'd it: He conjures him to examine this Cause, as if Truth it self were present at his Decision; for, says he, If they had accus'd me before any other Judge, I might have appeal'd to the Emperour; but being accus'd before the Emperour, to whom can I appeal, but to the Father of him who is call'd the Truth, that is, to God? Then he addresses to him in a lively and elegant Prayer, That he might enlighten the mind of the Emperour, to judge in a Cause which concern'd the whole Church. The third Accusation is concerning his Celebration of the Holy Mysteries in the Great Church before it was Consecrated: To which he answers, That he did not Celebrate the Dedication of this Church, which he could not do, without the Order of the Emperour; but he confesses feſſes, that he did Celebrate there the Divine Myſteries before its Conſecration. He excuſes himſelf upon the account of the great Concourſe of People that came to Alexandria on Eaſter-Day; and ſays, That the old Churches were ſmall and few in Number, and that the People demanding earneſtly to Aſſemble in the Great Church, there to make Prayers for the Safety of the Emperour, he us'd much entreaty, but in vain, that they would delay it, and rather Aſſemble, tho' with ſome inconvenience, in the other Churches; and they would not obey him, but on the contrary, were ready to go out of Alexandria, to keep their Aſſembly in the Fields: That this was the reaſon which oblig'd him to Celebrate in the Great Church before it was Conſecrated, which he did ſo much the rather, becauſe during the Faſt of Lent, many Perſons had been hurt in the preſs of the People. That 'twas not a thing without Example, that he had Celebrated Divine Offices in a Church, before its Dedication. That his Predeceſſor had done the like in the Church of St. Theonas, which he had built, and he had ſeen the ſame done at Aquileia: That 'twas much more convenient to Celebrate in a place that was intended for the Aſſemblies of the Faithful, tho' it was not yet Conſecrated, than to do it in the Fields, or in thoſe Churches, where the People were in danger of being ſtifled. He obſerves, That tho' there had been no ſuch fear of Danger, yet 'twas more expedient, that all the Faithful ſhould offer up their Prayers together in one and the ſame Place, (tho' 'twas not yet Conſecrated,) than that they ſhould do it apart in ſeveral Places. He was alſo accus'd of diſobeying the Emperour's Orders, when he commanded him to depart from Alexandria. To which he anſwers, That he was not diſobedient to his Orders, but that Montanus having brought him the Letter in which the Emperour permits him to depart from Alexandria, and go for Italy, as if he had ask'd leave; he did not think 'twas the Emperour's Intention that he ſhould withdraw, but that his Enemies had inform'd the Emperour, that he deſir'd to retire. That afterwards Diogenes came to Alexandria, without bringing any Letter or Order from the Emperour, and at his Arrival, 'twas ſufficiently publiſh'd, that he muſt withdraw, but ſtill there was no Order for it to him from the Emperour, either by Word of Mouth, or in Writing: That he always ſaid, He was ready to depart, whenſoever the Emperour ſhould Write to him, or Command him to do ſo; but 'twas agreed not to trouble the Church, till ſuch time as he ſhould receive his Orders: That Twenty Three Days after, Syrianus, General of the Army in Egypt, entered into the Church with his Souldiers, the People being there at Prayers, on the Vigil when we ought to Celebrate Divine Myſteries; that there he committed great Outrages, and oblig'd him to retire into a Deſart; and ſo he was neither Guilty for Flying, nor for Diſobeying the Orders of the Emperour. He ſays, That if he had retir'd ſooner, he had been Guilty both before God and Men, for 'tis a great Crime in a Biſhop, to abandon his Flock, when he is not abſolutely forc'd to do it. He adds, That he intended to go and wait upon the Emperour, and was come out of the Deſart upon this Deſign, and tho' he knew very well the Ill treatment thoſe Biſhops had met with that refus'd to Sign againſt him, and the Violence that had been us'd againſt thoſe of Alexandria, who took his part; yet he did not give over his intended Voyage upon that Account, but having ſeen an Order to ſeize him, ſent to the Magiſtrates of Auxumis, he apprehended the Rage of his Enemies, and therefore return'd again to hide himſelf in his Solitude.

St. Athanaſius.

In the Firſt Apology for his Flying, he juſtifies himſelf againſt the Arians, who accus'd him of timorouſneſs: He deſcribes the Deadly Effects of their Fury, and the Miſchiefs they had done to the greateſt Biſhops of the World, Hoſius, Liberius, Paul of Conſtantinople, and many others. He ſhows by the Examples of Jacob, Moſes, David, Elias, St. Paul and Jeſus Chriſt; and by the Command of Chriſt in Matt. 10. That 'tis lawful to fly from Perſecution, and that 'tis oftentimes of greater Uſe than to expoſe our ſelves to danger: He obſerves, That the Saints who deliver'd themſelves up to their Perſecutors, did it by the Inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt. He demands of his Adverſaries, where they had learn'd, that 'tis permitted to Perſecute, and not permitted to Fly: He objects to them, that the Devil is the cauſe of Perſecution, and that Jeſus Chriſt has advis'd Flight. At laſt, he complains of the Violence they uſed againſt himſelf, and the Miſchiefs they ſtill do to the Church.

In the Second Apology, he juſtifies himſelf from the former Accuſations made againſt him, by ſetting down the Judgments given in his Favour, in the Councils of Egypt, Rome and Sardica, whoſe Letters he produces at full length. Theſe Monuments are very conſiderable for the Hiſtory of that Time, becauſe there are particular Remarks in them about the Diſcipline of the Church: As, for inſtance, we learn from the Letter of the Synod of Alexandria, that the Biſhop of Alexandria was choſen by the People, and ordain'd by the Biſhops of the whole Province of Egypt; That the Eccleſiaſtical Laws forbid the Tranſlations of Biſhops; That the Myſtery of the Euchariſt was carefully conceal'd from thoſe that were no Chriſtians; That 'twas an Impiety to break a Chalice, and to ſpill the Blood of Jeſus Chriſt; That the Euchariſt was given to the Laicks in both kinds; That 'twas Conſecrated on Sunday, and that 'twas kept for ſome time; That none but Prieſts lawfully ordain'd could conſecrate and diſtribute it; That the Biſhop had a Throne, or a Seat, that was rais'd higher than other Seats. Julius the Biſhop of Rome, maintains in his Letter, That he could examine anew in one Synod what had been ordain'd in another, and alledges the Example, rather than the Authority of the Council of Nice. He lays claim to this Power, and complains that St. Athanaſius was condemn'd without ſending him notice: He blames the Euſebians for ſending a Stranger, that liv'd almoſt 60 Leagues off from Alexandria, to take Poſſeſſion of the Epiſcopal See of that City. After this, he recites two Letters from the Council of Sardica, one addreſs'd to the Church of Alexandria, and the other to all the Biſhops of the World, which contain an ample Juſtification of St. Athanaſius; and the laſt contains the Subſcriptions of many Biſhops who Subſcribed in this Council afterwards. And after theſe Letters, there follow three Letters of Conſtantius to St. Athanaſius, commanding him to return; one

Letter

Letter of Julius to the Church of Alexandria, wherein he congratulates the Alexandrians upon the Return of their Bishop; the Letters of Recommendation which Constantius gave him to return to Alexandria, the Letter of the Synod of Jerusalem to the Church of Alexandria in favour of St. Athanasius, and last of all, the Retractation of Ursacius and Valens address'd to Julius, wherein they declare, That all which was said against Athanasius was false, that they acknowledg'd Arius for an Heretick, and anathematiz'd his Error; and one Letter from the same Bishops address'd to St. Athanasius, wherein they declare, that they are of his Communion. After St. Athanasius has thus produc'd these Instruments of his Absolution, being desirous to show that he had done nothing partially, out of favour to himself, goes back again as far as the beginning of the Schism of Meletius and the Heresie of Arius, and gives an account of all that pass'd upon this occasion until his Exile, reciting the Authentick Acts to justice all that he Asserts: So that for the future, to read the History of that time, one should begin at the Second Part of this Apology, which begins towards the middle of P. 777. of the Greek and Latin Edition at Paris, and then resume the Beginning of the History, when he shall have finish'd this Second Part. St. Athanasius.

He wrote also this History long before with more order, and deduces it higher in his Book which is call'd, A Letter to those that lead a Monastick Life. After he has there related all that pass'd about the Cause of Arianism till the Council of Sardica, he insists upon the Circumstances of the Banishment of Pope Liberius. He says, That the Arians did not at all spare him, that they had not any respect for the City of Rome, the Metropolis of the whole Roman Empire, nor for the holy Apostolical See; that by their Instigation, the Emperour had sent a Bishop to Rome, to perswade the Bishop there to Condemn St. Athanasius. But Liberius refusing him, answer'd, That it was against the Canons to condemn a Man that is absent, who had been judg'd worthy of Communion while he was present at Rome; That if the Emperour would determine the Controversies of the Church, he should assemble a Free Council, where there was neither Prince, nor Courtier, and where all things might be decided in the Fear of God, and according to the Doctrine of the Apostles; and where every one should follow the Faith of the Council of Nice, and from whence those should be excluded that would not profess to follow it; and afterwards the Council might Examine the Matters now in Debate. He adds, That the Bishop having entred into the Church of St. Peter to consecrate the Presents that were brought to Liberius, as soon as he understood that they were intended to procure his Subscription against St. Athanasius, he reproved the Sacristan for receiving them, and threw them out of the Church as Sacrilegious Offerings: That when these things were told to the Emperour, he caus'd him to be brought to Constantinople, and that the Pope spoke to him more sharply than he had done at Rome, whereupon he was sent into Banishment; and there he was forc'd at last to subscribe for fear of Death, after he had resisted for the space of two Years. After this he describes the Fall of Hosius; and tells us, that Constantius being sollicited by the Arians, who would fain engage to their Party a Bishop of so great Authority, exhorted him to Subscribe; and that the Holy Man not only could not endure the Proposal, but perswaded the Emperour to let him alone, and retir'd into his own Country: And that the Arians still continuing to sollicit the Emperour, he wrote many Letters, fill'd sometimes with fair Promises, sometimes with Threats, to oblige him to Condemn Athanasius. But the Generous Old-man answered him in a Letter which St. Athanasius produces, wherein he declares to him that he had suffer'd under the Reign of Maximian for the Faith, and that he was still ready to suffer, and to shed his Blood for the defence of Innocence and Truth; he advises him not to hearken to those Easterlings any more than he would do to Ursacius and Valens. He tells him, That he was Mortal, and that he ought to be afraid of the Day of Judgment; That he ought to meddle no more in Ecclesiastical Matters, than the Bishops should in Temporals. His words are excellent, which are these; [Remember, says he, that you are Mortal, fear the Day of Judgment, keep your self in Purity, that you may appear there amongst the number of the Elect: Do not meddle at all in Ecclesiastical Affairs, and Command us nothing about those Matters; but learn them of us. God has given the Power of the Empire into your hands, and has entrusted with us that which concerns the Church; and as he who Invades your Empire, acts against the Order of God, so take heed that you render not your self Guilty of a very heinous Crime, by assuming to your self a Power in those things which are of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction. 'Tis written, Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's; So then we are not permitted to govern the Empire of the World, and you, Sir, have no Power at all in things that are Sacred.] After this St. Athanasius relates the Violence that was done to Hosius to make him Subscribe, and how the Emperour caus'd him to go to Sirmium, where he detain'd him till he had communicated with Ursacius and Valens. The rest of this Letter is a very vehement Declamation, against the Outrages and Persecutions of Constantius and the Arians; to which is added, a Protestation of the People of Alexandria, concerning the Violences that were used against St. Athanasius.

The Book of the Synods of Ariminum and Seleucia, contains not only the History of these two Councils, but also of the Principal Creeds made by the Bishops of Arius's Faction after that which was made by the Council of Nice, which he sets down in its full length. From thence he takes occasion to treat of the word, Consubstantial, which he maintains against the Arians; and yet he acknowledges, that they are not to be treated as Hereticks, who scruple to make use of this word, though they confess the Faith of the Divinity of the Son: He explains in what sence this word was condemn'd in the Council of Antioch, held against Paulus Samosatenus, and alledges for his sence the Testimony of the two Dionysii, who made use of this word.

Besides these Works of St. Athanasius, which contain the Deduction of the History of that time, there are some others which concern particular Facts.

St. Athanaſius.

The Firſt is the Book of the Definitions of the Council of Nice, wherein he defends the Deciſions of this Council, and takes notice of the conſiderable Circumſtances of it. He ſays, That the Biſhops of the Council, who were about 300 in number, deſir'd the Arians with great meekneſs, to juſtifie themſelves, but ſcarce had they begun to ſpeak, when all the Biſhops diſapprov'd them; That the Hereticks could not agree among themſelves, but were oblig'd to keep ſilence, and then the Biſhops made the Creed, which was ſign'd by the Euſebians; That Euſebius of Cæſarea in Palæſtine, who had refus'd to ſign the day before, approv'd of it next day, and wrote to thoſe of his Church about it. After this, he Diſputes againſt the Impiety of the Arians, who had relaps'd into their former Error, and proves that the Son of God was from all Eternity. He Juſtifies the Terms which are us'd by the Nicene Council in their Creed, and ſays, The word Conſubſtantial, has a very good ſence, and that there is none more proper to expreſs a formal Condemnation of the Error of the Arians: And he adds moreover, that this word is not new, ſince Theognoſtus, Denys of Alexandria, Denys of Rome, and Origen have us'd it long before the Council of Nice; that this Synod had not eſtabliſh'd any new Doctrine, but confirm'd that which was approv'd by Scripture and Tradition. He obſerves, that in Matters of Faith, its Deciſions did not run in the ſame manner as thoſe that were made about the Celebration of Eaſter, when this Phraſe was us'd, It pleaſes us, we will have it ſo; for now they only ſay, This is the Catholick Faith; Ita credit Catholica Eccleſia.

The Second Book of this Nature, is a Letter to the Biſhops of Egypt, which is improperly called, The Firſt Diſcourſe againſt the Arians. There he deſcribes the Outrages which the Arians committed againſt the Catholicks, and exhorts his Brethren to ſhun their Snares: He warns them by no means to Subſcribe their Confeſſion of Faith, how Catholick ſoever it may appear to them, but to adhere to that of the Council of Nice, in which the Impiety of Arius was condemn'd. Then he recites the principal Heads of his Error, and refutes them by the Teſtimonies of Holy Scripture. He deſcribes the miſerable End of this Heretick; and concludes with an Exhortation to the Catholicks to maintain the Faith unto Death; repreſenting unto them, that he is not only a Martyr who ſuffers Death for refuſing to offer unto Idols, but alſo he that dies rather than betray the Truth.

The Letter to all the Orthodox Biſhops was written about the ſame Time, and upon the ſame Subject: There he gives an Account of the violent manner of introducing George into the Church of Alexandria, and deſcribes the Fury of the Arians, and the Damage the Church has ſuffer'd by them very particularly.

In the two Letters to Lucifer, he deſcribes the Perſecutions which the Arians ſet on foot againſt the Catholicks, and repreſents the lamentable State of the Church.

In the Letter to Serapion concerning the Death of Arius, he relates the Unhappy End of this Heretick, who periſh'd in a Jakes the very Night before he was to be receiv'd into the Church. St. Athanaſius ſays, That he learn'd this Story from the Relation of Macarius, a Presbyter.

The Letter written by St. Athanaſius concerning the Opinion of Dionyſius of Alexandria, concerning the Trinity, may be numbred amongſt his Hiſtorical Books, becauſe it teaches us a very conſiderable Point of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which we ſhould not have known if St. Athanaſius had not reported it there; namely, That Denys of Alexandria wrote againſt the Sabellians of Pentapolis, and that in Diſputing againſt them, he made uſe of ſuch Expreſſions, as would make one believe that he favour'd the contrary Error; That he was accus'd of this in a Synod held at Rome; That he wrote a Treatiſe to the Pope, entituled, A Refutation and Apology, wherein he defends himſelf and confutes his Adverſaries; and that he taught in this Book a Doctrine perfectly contrary to that of the Arians: All which St. Athanaſius proves in this Treatiſe, by citing ſeveral Paſſages out of the Book of Denys of Alexandria.

The Letter of the Council of Alexandria, to thoſe of Antioch, concerns the State of the Church of Antioch after the Death of Conſtantius. St. Athanaſius and the other Biſhops of this Council, adviſe the Church of Antioch to receive the Arians who expreſly condemn their Error, to joyn themſelves to Paulinus and thoſe of his Party, to admit into their Communion thoſe that held their Aſſemblies in the Old City, that is to ſay, thoſe of Meletius's Party, without requiring any other Profeſſion of Faith, but that of the Council of Nice. They give them notice, That there was no Creed made in the true Council of Sardica; they adviſe them to have no Diſputes among themſelves about the Hypoſtaſes, ſince thoſe who acknowledg'd Three in the Trinity, and thoſe who own'd but One, were both of the ſame Judgment, and only differ'd in the manner of Expreſſion.

St. Athanaſius ſpeaks after the ſame manner of the Reception of the Arians, in a Letter to Ruffinian, where he mentions the Deciſion of this Synod.

In a Letter to the Emperour Jovian, St. Athanaſius and the other Biſhops of Egypt, propoſe to him the Nicene Creed as the only true one: They ſay, That this contains the Faith which was maintain'd by many holy Martyrs, who are now with Jeſus Chriſt, that it had never had any Adverſaries, if the Malice of the Hereticks had not endeavour'd to corrupt it; but that Arius and his Followers intending to introduce a new Doctrine contrary to the Truth, the Council of Nice condemn'd it, and made a Confeſſion of Faith to eſtabliſh the Truth, and extinguiſh the Flame that was kindled by his Partizans: That this Creed was prais'd and ſincerely believ'd in all the Churches of Chriſt, till ſome Biſhops, having a mind to revive the Error of the Arians, began to deſpiſe it; and yet they did not openly declare themſelve againſt it, but only in their Explications of it they reflected obliquely upon the Conſubſtantiality, and ſpoke Blaſphemies againſt the Holy Spirit. After they have thus explain'd the Nicene Creed, they ſet it down, and tell the Emperour, That this is the only Creed to which we muſt adhere.

I ſay

I ſay nothing of the Conferences of the Arians and St. Athanaſius, becauſe they contain little remarkable.

St. Athanaſius.

The Catholick Epiſtle to the Biſhops of Egypt, Arabia, Syria, Cilicia, and Phœnicia, was written, as well as the preceding Letters, in the Name of the Synod of Egyptian Biſhops, in which St. Athanaſius preſided. They Exhort the Biſhops to whom they write, to ſeparate themſelves from the Arians, to act unanimouſly in the Defence of the Faith, and not to diſſemble the Truth for Fear or Ambition; and to acknowledge the Divinity of the Holy Spirit: and at laſt they propoſe to them as a Badge and Teſt of the true Faith, theſe words, The Conſubſtantial Trinity.

The Letter to the Africans was written upon the ſame Subject in the Name of St. Athanaſius, and 82 Egyptian Biſhops; wherein they recommend the Faith of the Nicene Council eſtabliſh'd by 318 Biſhops, publiſh'd and receiv'd by all the World, becauſe this Synod had follow'd the Doctrine, and manner of Expreſſion us'd by the Holy Scriptures, and the Fathers.

In the Letter to John and Antiochus Presbyters, St. Athanaſius rejoyces becauſe he underſtood by their Letters written from Jeruſalem, that a great number of Brethren were re-united in one and the ſame Communion; he reproves thoſe that would trouble the Church by their Diſputes about words, and wonders that any ſhould dare to reprehend the Doctrine of St. Baſil.

In the following Letter to Palladius, he commends him for being Orthodox, and approves of his ſtaying with Innocent. He rebukes thoſe Monks that would not obey St. Baſil, but praiſes this Biſhop, ſaying he was the Glory of the Church, for he contended for the Truth, and taught thoſe that needed Inſtruction, and none could be good Catholicks that had any Diſpute with him. He adds, That he had written to his Monks to obey him as their Father, and that they were to blame for complaining of him. Probably 'twas about the Queſtion of the Hypoſtaſes, that the Monks had ſome Diſpute with St. Baſil.

After we have ſpoken of his Hiſtorical Works, let us now come to the Dogmatical.

The firſt of theſe, are the two Treatiſes againſt the Gentiles, whereof the Second is now entituled, Of the Incarnation. In the Firſt of theſe two Books he Oppoſes Idolatry, and Eſtabliſhes the Worſhip of the true God: he diſcovers the ſource of Idolatry, that it comes from the Corruption of Man's Heart, who being created after the Image of God, fell under the guilt of Adam's Sin, and inherited from him an unhappy Inclination to Sin, which the Will does very often follow, though it be free to reſiſt it. From this Principle he concludes, in the firſt place, againſt the Hereticks, That 'tis not neceſſary there ſhould be two Principles, or two Gods, one Good, the Author of Good; and another Evil, the Author of Evil. He refutes this Impious Opinion by Reaſon and Authority, and concludes that Sin is not a Subſtance, but that it entred into the World by the Fall of the Firſt Man. He obſerves that this is the ſource of all Idolatry, that Men being fallen from their firſt Eſtate do no longer raiſe their Heart and Spirit to things Spiritual, but fix them on things Terreſtrial and Senſible. He refutes afterwards the different kinds of Idolatry, and ſhows that we ought not to Worſhip, nor Acknowledge for Divinities, either the Gods of the Poets, or the World, or any part of it. After he has thus overthrown all kinds of Idolatry, he eſtabliſhes the Exiſtence and Worſhip of the true God: He demonſtrates, that God may be known by the Light of Nature, 1. From our ſelves, that's to ſay, by Reflection upon our own Thoughts, that he is neither Corporeal, nor Mortal. 2. From the Beauty of the Univerſe, which diſcovers the Exiſtence of him as the Cauſe of it: Then he ſhows that this God is the Father of Jeſus Chriſt, and that he created all things, and governs them by his Word.

The Second Treatiſe againſt the Gentiles, is that which is entituled, Of the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt; becauſe there he treats of that Myſtery. For explaining the Cauſes of it, he goes back as far as the Beginning of the World, and proves that it was not made by chance, nor fram'd of an Eternal Matter, but that God the Father created it by his Word. After this he ſpeaks of the Fall of Man, who being created after the Image of God, addicted himſelf to things corruptible and periſhing, and ſo became the Cauſe of his own Miſery and Corruption. He ſays that the Fall of Man was the cauſe of the Incarnation of the Word; becauſe God pitying Man, reſolv'd to ſend his Son to Save him, and to give him the means of obtaining that Immortality which he had loſt. Upon this Principle he founds the Neceſſity of the Incarnation of the Word; which he proves, Firſt, Becauſe the Son being the Eſſential Image of his Father, there was none but he that could render Man like to God, as he was before his Fall: 2. Becauſe as the Word is the Reaſon and Wiſdom of his Father, there is none but he can teach Men and undeceive them of their Errors. From the Cauſes of the Incarnation, he paſſes to its Effects, and after he has deſcribed the Graces which the Word has merited for Mankind by his Incarnation, he ſpeaks of his Death; and ſhows, that he was to die as he did, by the Torments of the Croſs, that by his Death he might conquer Death both in himſelf and us. Laſtly, He proves the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt by the wonderful Effects that follow'd his Death, and by the contempt of Death wherewith it inſpir'd his Diſciples. After he has thus explain'd the Doctrine of Chriſtians, he refutes the Jews and Pagans, the former by proving from the Prophets that Jeſus is the Meſſias promis'd in the Old Teſtament; and the latter from the Miracles of Jeſus Chriſt, from the deſtruction of Idolatry, and the Eſtabliſhment of the Doctrine of the Goſpel; which, though contrary to the Luſts and Paſſions of Men, was entertain'd without difficulty, and in a little time by the greateſt part of the World. He concludes theſe Diſcourſes with an Advertiſement to his Friend Macarius, to whom they are directed, That he ſhould have recourſe to the Holy Scripture, which is the Fountain from whence theſe things are drawn; to which he adds this Remark, that for the better underſtanding of it, we ſhould lead a Life like to that of the Authors of theſe holy Books.

St. Athanaſius wrote but two Treatiſes againſt the Gentiles, for his other Dogmatical Treatiſes are either about the Trinity, or the Incarnation. The Four Diſcourſes againſt the Arians are the chief of his Dogmatical Works. In the Firſt, which is call'd the Second, he convicts the Sect of the Arians of Hereſie; for which end, he firſt makes uſe of an Argument which he employs againſt all Hereticks, which is the Novelty of their Sect, and the Name which it bears; Then he explains their Doctrine, and proves, that 'tis Impious, full of Blaſphemies, and comes near to that of the Jews and Gentiles. Laſtly, He refutes their Reaſons, and clears up a great many difficulties which they propoſe againſt the Doctrine of the Church.

In the Second Treatiſe, which is the Third in the common Editions, he explains ſome of the Paſſages which the Arians alledge, to prove that the Son is a Creature, and inſiſts chiefly upon that in Chap. 8. of the Proverbs, The Lord hath created me in the beginning of his ways, &c. He ſays towards the end, "That the Arians run a hazard of having no true Baptiſm; becauſe, to make this Sacrament valid, 'tis "not ſufficient to pronounce the words, but we muſt alſo have a right underſtanding of them, and "a right Faith. He adds, That if the Baptiſm of other Hereticks who pronounce the ſame words, be "null and void, becauſe they have not a true Faith, 'tis to be thought, that we ought to give the "ſame Judgment of the Baptiſm of the Arians, who are become the worſt of all Hereticks. Theſe words of St. Athanaſius ſhew, That in his time, thoſe that had been Baptiz'd by Hereticks, were Re-baptiz'd in the Church of Alexandria, though they had been Baptiz'd in the Name of the Trinity.

In the Third Diſcourſe, which is reckon'd for the Fourth, he proves, That the Father and the Son have but one and the ſame Subſtance, and one and the ſame Nature, amd that they are one God only, though they be two diſtinct Perſons. Afterwards he ſhows that all that is ſaid of Jeſus Chriſt in the Scriptures, which ſeems unworthy of his Divinity, ſhould be applied to his Humane Nature, becauſe Chriſt being a Perſon compos'd of the Divine and Humane Nature, the Properties of both theſe Natures may be attributed unto him. At laſt, he examines a Queſtion propos'd by the Arians, viz. Whether the Father begot his Word voluntarily or neceſſarily: To which he anſwers, That he begot him naturally and not by conſtraint, and ſo in this ſenſe he begot him voluntarily, becauſe he would beget him, though he could not but beget him.

In the laſt Diſcourſe he refutes the Arians, proving that the Word is Eternal and Conſubſtantial to the Father, and the Sabellians, who deny'd that the Son was a Perſon diſtinct from the Perſon of the Father; and the Paulianiſts, who diſtinguiſh'd the Word from the Son of God, and the Paraclete from the Holy Spirit.

The Diſcourſe upon the words of the Goſpel of St. Matth. Ch. 11. My Father has given me all things, &c. contains a Refutation of that falſe Concluſion which the Arians drew from thoſe words, by ſaying, That if the Father had given all things to his Son in time, ſo that there was a time when he had not all things, and by conſequence he had not always a Supreme Empire over the Creatures, from whence it would follow, that he was not equal to the Father: To which St. Athanaſius anſwers, That this Paſſage does not treat of the Abſolute Power of God over his Creatures, but concerns the Myſtery of the Incarnation. That the Father has given Mankind to Jeſus Chriſt, as a Sick Perſon is left to a Phyſician for his Cure: That Man having ſinn'd, and Death being the Puniſhment of his Sin, the Word became Man, and God gave all Mankind unto him, that he might heal them, and reſtore to them that Life and Light which they had loſt.

In the Letter to Adelphius, St. Athanaſius proves againſt the Arians, that we muſt worſhip the Word in the Perſon of Jeſus Chriſt.

In the following Letters to Maximus, he ſhows, That Jeſus Chriſt is truly God, and truly Man. The Titles of the Letters to Serapion, ſufficiently ſhew what they treat about: Againſt thoſe that ſay, that the Son and the Holy Spirit are Creatures. The Treatiſe againſt the Sabellians, is a Collection of paſſages out of Holy Scripture, which prove the Trinity of Perſons and the Divinity of the Word. The deſign of the Treatiſe about the Union of the Humane Nature with the Word, is rather to prove the Divinity of the Son of God, than to explain the Incarnation. The Expoſition of Faith, which is in the Firſt Volume, P. 240. is an Explication of the Nicene Creed, concerning the Unity and the Incarnation. The ſhort Diſcourſe againſt the Arians, is a Writing of the ſame Nature. The Letter to Epictetus, is the principal Treatiſe of St. Athanaſius, concerning the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, where he refutes the Error and the Arguments of thoſe that maintain that the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt, was of the ſame Subſtance with his Divinity; That the Divinity was chang'd into the Humanity, or the Humanity into the Divinity; That the Word had adopted a Body without being naturally united to it; That the Body was not aſſum'd in the Womb of the Virgin Mary; That the Divinity did ſuffer; or in a word, That the Word was a Perſon different from the Man. In ſhort, he there refutes the foundations of the Error of the Apollinarians and Eutychians, and the principle of the Error of the Neſtorians, by ſhewing, That Jeſus Chriſt is one Perſon compos'd of a Divine and Humane Nature, wherein all the Properties of thoſe two Natures are found. He refutes the ſame Errors in the Books of the Incarnation againſt Apollinarius, in which he proves particularly againſt this Heretick, That Jeſus Chriſt took one Humane Nature entire and perfect, That it was not deſtitute of a Soul, nor of Underſtanding and Will.

There are few Moral Treatiſes amongſt the Works of St. Athanaſius. The Epiſtle to Dracontius is one of the Chief. [This is rather concerning Diſcipline, tho' urg'd with Moral Arguments.] Dracontius was a Monk that had been choſen Biſhop: But, either becauſe he was afraid of Perſecution, or elſe becauſe he thought himſelf unworthy to govern a Biſhoprick, he fled and hid himſelf, leſt he ſhould be oblig'd to take care of the People, of whom he had been ordain'd Biſhop. St. Athanaſius in this Letter, reproves his Puſillanimity, and exhorts him to return to his Biſhoprick. He repreſents to him, That his Conduct ſcandaliz'd many Perſons; That being ordain'd Biſhop, he was no longer at his own disposal, but ow'd himself to those for whom he was ordain'd; That he was oblig'd to take care of them, and that he should be answerable for the Salvation of those that should perish for want of Instruction; That he should improve the Talent that God had given him, and take Care of the Flock that God had entrusted him with; That if the Fear of Persecution made him flee from a Bishoprick, it was a great weakness in him; but if it was from any dislike of the Episcopal Function, 'twas an injurious Contempt of the Authority and Mystery of Jesus Christ; That he could not excuse himself, by saying, That he had Sworn or Vow'd to the contrary, since Jeremy and Jonas were oblig'd to do contrary to what they had resolv'd; and besides, That many Monks whom he names, had accepted of a Bishoprick, and that this Profession was no hindrance to their Ordination; That a Bishoprick was so far from being an occasion of Sin, as some would perswade Dracontius, that it would be rather a means to Sanctify him by his imitating the Apostles; That this State did not hinder, but he might still observe the Customs of the Cloyster: [You will be permitted, says he, being a Bishop, to fast, or to abstain from Wine: We have known Monks great Eaters, and Bishops great Fasters: We have seen Monks that drink Wine, and Bishops that drink none: Bishops for the most part live in Celebacy, and we have seen Monks married: In a word, 'tis permitted to every one, in whatsoever State he is, to use such abstinences as he pleases,*] He concludes, with exhorting him to return to his Bishoprick before Easter, that his People might not be abandon'd, and oblig'd to Celebrate that Feast without him; and with earnest Entreaties, that he would not hearken to their Counsels, that would hinder his Return: They would, says he, have Priests among themselves, Why then are they unwilling that the People should have Bishops?

St. Athanasius.

* [St. Athanasius's Words are these, Many Bishops never married, and Monks have been Fathers of Children. (Πολλοὶ γὰρ Ἐπισκόπων οὐδὲ γεγαμήκασι, μοναχοὶ δὲ πατέρες τέκνων γεγόνασιν, p 958. D. Vol. 1.) As these Words are translated, they have quite a different meaning from that which was at first designed by St. Athanasius. He makes his Comparison between those that practised, and those that omitted the Austerities there mentioned, in such a manner as shews that he thought them absolutely indifferent; and besides, there is a great difference between many and the most part.

Yet I should not have taken notice of it, if in his account of St. Athanasius's Doctrine, Mr. du Pin had not repeated what he had before observed in this place, and with some Additions; for there he says, That there were Priests and Bishops married, tho' but few. Here is a double mistake; for neither does St. Athanasius say, that there be but few Priests or Bishops married, nor does he speak a word of Priests. Monks were not constantly Ordain'd in those days. St. Anthony, their great Master, was a Lay-man, and in this very Letter to Dracontius, St. Athanasius, amongst other Arguments to perswade him to accept the Bishoprick to which he was Canonically Elected, tells him, That if the Monks desire to have Presbyters among them, to instruct them in their Duty, they ought not to envy others, who for the same Reason were earnest to have Dracontius for their Bishop.]

In the Letter to Ammon the Monk, he refutes the Error of some Monks, who condemn'd the use of Marriage; and shews by the Scripture, that 'tis permitted, and that 'tis Impiety to condemn it, tho' Virginity is a more perfect State, and deserves greater Rewards.

The Life of St. Anthony may be reckon'd among his Moral Writings, for it contains excellent Instructions for all Monks.

We must also place among the Moral Works of St. Athanasius his Homily of Circumcision and the Sabbath. There he treats of the Institution of the Sabbath, and thinks that the principal end of its Celebration was not merely to rest, but that it was Instituted to make known the Creator; that the Reason why 'tis abrogated in the New Law, and the Feast of Sunday establish'd in its room, is, because the first Day was the end of the first Creation, and the second was the beginning of the New: For the same Reason he believes that Circumcision was appointed on the eighth Day, to be a figure of that Regeneration which is made by Baptism.

Lastly, That I may say something of the Treatises of St. Athanasius upon the Holy Scriptures, the Abridgment of the Scriptures, is the most useful of them. There you may see in one view, an Enumeration of all the Canonical Books of the Old Testament according to the Catalogue of the Hebrews, which contains but 22; and he adds those that are not Canonical, but yet are read in the Church to the Catechumens, which according to him, are the Books of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Esther, Judith and Tobit; with this Observation, That some plac'd the Books of Esther and Ruth amongst those which they esteem'd Canonical. In the Catalogue of the Canonical Books of the New Testament, he places all those which we acknowledge at present. After he has given us these Catalogues, he makes a very faithful Abridgment of what is contain'd in every Book, and gives the Reason, why 'tis call'd by such a Name and Discourses of the Author that wrote it. Afterwards, he gives a Catalogue of those Apocryphal Books which are of little or no use at all. He speaks particularly of the Four Gospels, their Authors, and the places where they were compos'd; he treats in a few Words of the Greek Versions of the Old Testament, and at last gives a Catalogue of some Books cited in Scripture that are lost. The Fragment of the 39th. Festival Letter is upon the same Subject, and it contains also a Catalogue of the Canonical Books of the Old and New Testament, and of those that are useful, tho' they be not Canonical, which he distinguishes from these Apocryphal Books, that have been forg'd by Hereticks; and here he follows the same Catalogue which is in the Abridgment: But, he adds to the number of these Books, that may be read to the Catechumens, The Doctrine of the Apostles, and the Book, entituled Pastor.

The Book to Marcellinus upon the Psalms is also of the same Nature. St. Athanasius, shows there the Excellency of the Book of Psalms, and relates the Subject of many of them, those that are Historical, and those that are Moral. He observes there, That the Book of Psalms, referrs to all the Histories of the Old Testament; That it includes all the Prophecies of Jesus Christ; That it expresses all

St. Athanaſius.

all the Opinions which we ought to have, That it contains the Prayers that ſhould be made, and comprizes all the Precepts of Morality: He obſerves, That there are ſome Pſalms Hiſtorical, ſome Moral, ſome Prophetical, beſides thoſe that conſiſt of Prayers and Praiſes; all which he diſtinguiſhes, and places in their proper Rank and Order. He ſhews, that the Pſalms repreſent to every one of the Faithful, the State of his own Soul, that every one may ſee himſelf there repreſented, and may obſerve from the different Paſſions there expreſs'd, what he feels in his own Heart, and that in whatever State any one is, there he may find Words ſuitable to his preſent Diſpoſition, Rules for his Conduct, and Remedies for his Troubles. Wherefore he divides the Pſalms according to the different Matters of which they treat, that every one may make uſe of them according to his Neceſſities, and according to the different States that he falls into. He adds, That thoſe who Sing, ſhould be of a free and quiet Spirit, that the Melody of their Song, may agree with the Harmony of their Spirit. And laſt of all, He would not have any Words of the Pſalms, which may appear ſimple, chang'd, under pretence of making them more Elegant.

The Treatiſe upon theſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt, Whoſoever ſhall ſpeak a word againſt the Holy Spirit, his ſin ſhall not be forgiven him, neither in this World, nor in the other, is an Explication of this difficult place of Scripture, wherein he firſt obſerves, that Origen and Theognoſtus thought, That the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, was the Sin of thoſe who after they were baptiz'd loſt the Grace of Baptiſm by their Crimes. But St. Athanaſius maintains, That this Explication is not Natural, becauſe thoſe that violate their Vows of Baptiſm, ſin no more againſt the Holy Spirit, than againſt the Father and the Son, in whoſe Name Baptiſm is adminiſtred: And to ſhew that this Opinion of the Ancients, is not defenſible, he obſerves, That theſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt were addreſs'd to the Phariſees who were never baptiz'd, and yet ſinned againſt the Holy Spirit, by ſaying, That Jeſus Chriſt caſt out Devils in the Name of Beelzebub: He adds, That if this Explication were admitted, it would give up the Cauſe to Novatus. He explains the Paſſage of St. Paul to the Hebrews, where the Apoſtle ſays, 'Tis impoſſible that thoſe who were once baptiz'd ſhould be renew'd again, which does not exclude, ſays St. Athanaſius, Repentance after Baptiſm, but only a ſecond Baptiſm. After he has rejected this Explication, he advances a New one of his own; and is of Opinion, That to ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, is to deny the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, by attributing to the Devil, as the Phariſees did, his moſt Divine Actions. Thus he explains himſelf, Thoſe, ſays he, who obſerving the Humane Actions of Jeſus Chriſt, conſider'd him as a Man only, were in ſome meaſure excuſable; Thoſe alſo who obſerving his Divine Actions, doubted if he was a Man, were not ſo much to be blam'd: But thoſe who ſeeing his moſt Divine Actions, deny'd his Divinity, by attributing his Actions to the Devil, as the Phariſees and the Arians do, commit ſo enormous a Crime, that they cannot hope for Pardon. The former ſin againſt the Son of Man, i.e. againſt the Humanity of Jeſus Chriſt; and the latter ſin againſt the Spirit, i.e. his Divinity. This in ſhort, is the ſum of the Explication that St. Athanaſius has given of theſe Words of the Goſpel, whereof he treats, and I leave it to the Judgment of the Reader, if he can find another more probable than this of the Ancients.

We may add likewiſe to thoſe Treatiſes of St. Athanaſius, upon the Holy Scripture, the Fragments that are found at the end of his Second Volume, and particularly, that which is taken out of the Sixth Council, upon theſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt, My Soul is exceeding ſorrowful.

I ſhall make no Extracts out of thoſe Books which I have rejected, as being none of St. Athanaſius's, tho' there be ſome things in them which may be uſeful, becauſe I would make no Confuſion, by mixing the Doctrine of another Author with that of this Saint, and therefore without ſtaying to ſpeak of theſe Books, I proceed to his Character.

His Stile cannot be better deſcrib'd than 'tis already by the Learn'd Photius, in Vol. 140 of his Bibliotheque. " The Diſcourſes of St. Athanaſius, ſays he, are clear, ſimple and natural, and yet they have much ſtrength " and gravity: He places the Reaſons which he uſes in a wonderful Light; He ſhews great copiouſneſs of " Invention, and a wonderful eaſineſs of Thought. There is in his Works, a Depth of Logick, I do not mean " of that barren Logick which propoſes Reaſonings and Syllogiſms, without any Ornament, and makes " uſe of Dialectical Terms as School-Boys do, who would make a ſhew of Wit; but of a Logick like that " of the ancient Philoſophers, who propos'd their Idea's and Reaſonings in an excellent manner, accom- " panied with great Ornaments of Eloquence. He makes uſe alſo of Teſtimonies of the Holy Scrip- " ture, and draws from thence convincing Proofs of what he advances. In a word, His Books alone " are ſufficient for the Refutation of Arianiſm, and he that ſhould ſay, That St. Gregory and St. Baſil " drew from this Fountain thoſe great Torrents of Learning which they employ'd againſt this Error, " would not be much miſtaken. The ſame Photius ſays alſo in another place, ſpeaking of the Letters and Apologies of this Father, " That they are written with Clearneſs, Elegance and Grandeur; That " he has given a turn at once perſuaſive and agreeable to all that he ſays. This Character appears chiefly in his Apology to the Emperour Conſtantius, which is a Maſter-piece in its kind, for never any Book had a greater Air of Candor and Simplicity than this, never was any Diſcourſe more Elegant, more beautified with Figures, or more perſuaſive: Here was St. Athanaſius's great Excellency in all his Works; they appear ſimple and open, and yet being cloſely conſider'd, one may perceive, that they are compos'd with wonderful Artifice: He obſerves all along an admirable fitneſs of Expreſſion, and always adapts his Stile to the Subject of which he treats, and to the Perſons to whom he ſpeaks. He inſinuates himſelf ſo dextrouſly into the mind by his manner of expreſſing things, that one entertains his Reaſons, and feels himſelf often perſuaded by them, before he is aware. How ſoft ſoever his Diſcourſe appears, it wants nothing of ſharpneſs; for when he attacks his Enemies, he ſpares them not in the leaſt, but on the contrary, uſes the moſt ſmart and emphatical Words that can be found to cover them with Confuſion; and to render them Odious, he makes no ſcruple to load them with the the reproachful Names which they have deserv'd, and to represent the Crimes they have committed, in the most lively Colours that can be drawn with a Masterly Hand: And yet he does it after such a manner, that it seems rather to proceed from a Zeal for the Truths of Religion, than from any Personal hatred which he bears to the Men themselves. The Conduct of this Saint is less admirable than his manner of Writing. St. Basil gives this Character of him in his 48 Letter, address'd to himself. "Who can be found, says he, That has more Prudence than you? Who has a clearer Inspection into "the Affairs of the Church, and who has a greater Facility in executing his Designs? Is there any that "has more Charity and Compassion for his Brethren? Are not you the Bishop in all the World, that "is in most Veneration with those of the West. And in the following Letter he has these Words; "The more the Miseries of the Church encrease, the more are we oblig'd, says he, to have recourse "unto you; we have no hopes of any Consolation under our Afflictions but by your means, since you "can do much, both by your Prayers which are very Effectual, and also by the sharpness of your "Wit, whereby you understand at the same time what is most advantageous to the Church. And again in another Letter, "When we consider our Calamities, and the State to which we are reduc'd, we "do almost Despair of Safety; but when we cast our Eyes upon you, we take Courage, and consider "you as a Physician whom God hath given to heal all our Maladies. Who can be a fitter Pilot in this "Tempest, than he who has all his Life time endur'd the like Persecutions for the Faith? And truly, 'Tis hard to say, which of the two is most to be admir'd in St. Athanasius, his unmoveable Constancy and Firmness, which he always show'd, or the Prudence that appear'd in his Conduct under all his Persecutions. I say nothing of his Humility, his Charity, Pastoral Vigilance, and his other Vertues, because they don't fall directly within the Compass of that Design which I have propos'd to my self in this Book. St. Athanasius.

His Doctrine is very pure, and his Opinions are not only very Orthodox, but his Expressions are very just and exact. He proves the Existence of a God, the Creation of the World, and Providence, in his Books against the Gentiles. He establishes the Trinity of Three Divine Persons, and the Unity of the Nature and Substance, almost in all his Works; but he explains this Mystery with much simplicity; for he would not amuse the Reader with Disputes about Words, nor search too profoundly into this Matter. He confesses, That he cannot comprehend it, and he will not employ humane Reasonings to Prove or to explain the Mystery of the Trinity and the Generation of the World: In short, He shuns as much as he can, to enter upon any of those subtile Questions, which have since unprofitably exercis'd the Wit of so many School-Divines. He speaks admirably of the Fall of the first Man, of the Punishments of Sin, of the Necessity and Effects of the Incarnation of the Son of God. He explains this Mystery in such a manner as is equally contrary to all the Errors of the Hereticks of either side; for he teaches against the Paulianists, That the Word is united to the Humanity; against the Valentinians, That it took a Body like ours in the Womb of the Virgin; against the Arians and Apollinarians, That it took a Soul and Spirit; against the Nestorians, That the Divinity is united in the same Person with the Humanity, so that the Virgin may be called the Mother of God; against the Eutychians, That these two Natures subsist in the same Person with their Properties, without Confusion, without Mixture, without Change. He believes, That the Soul is Spiritual and Immortal, and makes no scruple to affirm it as a thing certain, That the Saints are happy and with Jesus Christ. He speaks of the Efficacy of Baptism, and rejects that of the Hereticks: He acknowledges not only in his Apology, but also in his Treatise of the Faith, cited by Theodoret; He acknowledges, I say, in both places, That the Eucharist is the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ *. He praises Virginity, and prefers it to Marriage, tho' he thinks, that 'tis not forbidden. He condemns the Error of the Novatians; He acknowledges the Holy Scripture to be the Rule of Faith, and joyns

* [That is to say, St. Athanasius calls the Bread the Body, and the Wine the Blood of Christ: He had no occasion to Dispute the Question, nor to determine of either side, concerning the Real Presence. This is plain from his Second Apology to the Emperour Constantius, for his Flight, wherein he clears himself from the Crime that was laid to his Charge in the Synod of Tyre, That he abetted one Macarius a Presbyter in Mareotis, who broke the Cup in which the Wine was usually Consecrated: The Council of Alexandria, that was call'd to examine the Cause of St. Athanasius, in their General Epistle, always call the Cup, Ποτήριον μυστικὸν, the Mystical Cup: and speaking of Presbyters, (p 732. ap. St. Athana. Vol. 1.) say, μόνον ὑμῶν ἔξεστι προσφέρειν τὸ αἷμα τῷ χριστῷ; it belongs to you alone first to drink of the Blood of Christ; that is, to receive before the Congregation: This determines nothing as to the Nature of the Presence; and our Saviour had sufficiently warranted such Expressions by his Discourse in the sixth Chapter of St. John.

If St. Athanasius had said any thing to declare his Opinion, upon a Question at that time not started in the World, his Arguments could have been consider'd, and his Notions might have then been known: But since all his Writings bend to one scope, from which he hardly ever wanders any occasional Expressions relating to other Disputes, cannot be urg'd any further than as they do in all probability shew what was the Stile of that Age; and it is certain, That the Elements were after Consecration, call'd, the Body and Blood of Christ, at that time; as well, they might, since the Church then believ'd, what our Church likewise professes, That worthy Communicants do Spiritually eat the Body, and drink the Blood of Jesus Christ, when they eat the Bread and drink the Wine in the Lord's Supper. Mr. Du Pin, takes a great deal of Pains in his First Volume, to Vindicate the Fathers who liv'd before the Council of Nice, from the imputation of Arianism: And he observes all along, That before those Questions were professedly Examin'd and Determin'd by the Church, Men did not speak so exactly as they did afterwards: His Observation is certainly right, and it has always been the receiv'd Excuse, whenever the Opinions of these earliest Fathers have been urg'd on behalf of the Arian or Socinian Doctrines. If therefore this Excuse be just in one Cause, it is equally so in another; and an occasional Expression can no more be urg'd in Favour of Transubstantiation than in Favour of Arianism, when we otherways know, what was the Opinion of that Age, in which the Question was never put concerning it. There will be no necessity therefore to take notice in every place, where our Author fansies, that the Ancients favour'd his Cause, of the particular Reasons, why they spoke in such a manner, or of the Sence in which their Words are to be understood; since it has been so often prov'd by those who have examin'd all the contested Passages in the Writings of these more Ancient Fathers, that either they favour our Opinions, or that they speak nothing to the purpose of the Dispute that has so long been manag'd between us and the Church of Rome] with

St. Athanaſius. with it Tradition and the Authority of the Holy Fathers. He obſerves that the Faith is always the ſame, and that it does not change, and that the Councils do nothing but declare what is the Doctrine of the Church. He attributes much to Free-Will, and yet he confeſſes, that ſince the ſin of Adam Man is enclin'd to Evil, and fix'd upon ſenſible things. He teaches, That the Soul of Jeſus Chriſt, without diſſolving the Union to his Divinity, deſcended into Hell, to fetch thence the Souls of the Juſt, and alſo of thoſe who had liv'd well under the Law of Nature, who were there in Sorrow waiting for their Deliverance. As to what concerns Diſcipline in his time, one may obſerve in his Works, That the Communion in both kinds was then given to the Laicks; That the Prieſts only Conſecrated; That the Euchariſt was offer'd upon an Altar of Wood; That the Myſteries were hid from the Catechumens and Gentiles; That the Faithful aſſembled in Churches, where they were a long time at Prayers; That there were then a Multitude of Monks that were ſubject to their Biſhop as their Father, and that ſome of them were made Biſhops; That there were alſo Virgins who religiouſly kept their Virginity; That they were not ſhut up, but aſſiſted at the Divine Myſteries in the Church; That there were Prieſts and Biſhops married, tho' but few; That Eunuchs could not then be ordain'd; That the Tranſlation of Biſhops was condemn'd; That the People and Clergy choſe them, and other Biſhops ordain'd them; That they muſt be choſen out of thoſe that were born in the place, rather than Strangers; That they had a Reverence for Churches and Sacred Veſſels; That Churches were dedicated with Ceremonies, and that 'twas not permitted to celebrate Divine Myſteries in them before their Dedication, without ſome kind of Neceſſity; That there were Fonts in Churches, and that the Biſhop had a Chair rais'd on high, call'd the Epiſcopal Throne; That Oyl and Wine, and Bread for Offerings were kept it the Font; That they had Cœmeteries where they aſſembled in caſe of Neceſſity; That the Churches there were govern'd by Prieſts, who kept there the Aſſemblies of the People; That the Biſhops made their Viſitations in their Dioceſſes; That the Church of Rome was conſider'd as the Firſt; That the Church of Alexandria had much Authority over all Egypt; That they us'd to make the ſign of the Croſs, and believ'd that it drove away Devils; That they receiv'd not the Offerings of the Impious, but only thoſe of the Juſt; That a Biſhop was not allow'd to abdicate his Church; That they Faſted in Lent; That they celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter with great Solemnity; That they us'd the Prayers of the Church, and read the Goſpel in the Vulgar tongue, which was underſtood by the People. I ſhall not ſtay to relate the Principles of Morality which are to be found in his Writings, becauſe they are but few, and thoſe few are not handled in their full extent, excepting only what concerns flight from Perſecution, and from a Biſhoprick, and the defence of the Truth.

The Firſt Editions of St. Athanaſius's Works are very imperfect, and the Laſt are confus'd. The moſt Ancient that we have found, is a Latin Edition of ſome Books, which one Barnabas Celſanus printed at Vicenza in the Year 1482, and which he Dedicated to Peter Brutus a Biſhop. This Edition is entituled, Treatiſes of St. Athanaſius againſt the Hereticks, and it contains the Four Treatiſes againſt the Arians, that of the Union of the Humane Nature, together with the Diſpute againſt Arius, which was alſo printed in 1500.

This Edition was follow'd by that of Paris in 1520, which contains a good part of the Works of St. Athanaſius in Latin, tranſlated by different Authors, together with the Commentaries of Theophylact upon the Pſalms, which were alſo publiſh'd under the Name of St. Athanaſius, by Chriſtopher Perſona, who caus'd them to be printed at Rome in the Year 1477, [in fol. and afterwards in 1496. in fol.] and by Reuchlin at Tubing, in the Year 1515.

Theſe Diſcourſes were reprinted at Francfort by Knobulchus in 1522, and at Baſle by Froben in 1527. Euſtachius Cornecef Printer at Cologne, printed them in 1532, without the Commentary of Theophylact upon the Pſalms, and they were alſo printed the ſame Year at Lyons by the Treſchels.

After theſe, Epiſcopius and Froben undertook a new Edition of the Works of this Father: They were aſſiſted by Nannius Profeſſor at Louvain, who made a new Verſion of the moſt part of the Books which bear the Name of St. Athanaſius, and compar'd the Greek with three Manuſcripts. They divide the whole into Four Tomes, and place in the laſt ſome Diſcourſes attributed to St. Athanaſius, which had not been tranſlated by Nannius: This Edition was finiſh'd at Baſle in 1558, and reprinted in 1564.

Nivelle added a Fifth Tome, wherein he put the Life of St. Anthony, the Five Dialogues of the Trinity publiſh'd by Beza at Baſle in 1570. This Edition was printed twice at Paris, and the Letter to Ammon, in the Year 1572, and in the Year 1581.
